START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT
CONSERVATION CENTER
Andover, MA 01810

JANUARY 1994

Camera Operator:
Kathy Wilder

MASTER NEGATIVE NUMBER:

BSO-56-015

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library
(August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Music Department
Boston Public Library
Post Office Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOKS

1889 - 1973

132 VOLUMES

Source: Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives

FINDING AID

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks
(Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

GUIDE TO CONTENTS

Institution: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Series Name: PRESS CLIPPINGS
Series Number: 56
Series Dates: 1889-1991

Sub-series Name: SCRAPBOOKS
Sub-series Number: 1
Sub-series Dates: 1889-1973

VOLUME LISTING

VOL	TITLE	DATES
1	BSO	1889-1890
2	BSO
	Kneisel Quartet	1890-1891
3	BSO	1891-1892
4	Promenade (Pops)	1892
5	BSO
	Kneisel Quartet	1892-1893
6	BSO
	Kneisel Quartet	1893-1894
7	BSO
	Kneisel Quartet	1894-1895
8	BSO	1895-1896
9	Promenade (Pops)	1895-1896
10	BSO	1896-1897
11	BSO	1897-1898
12	Promenade (Pops)	1897-1898
13	BSO	1898-1899
14	BSO	1899-1900
15	Pops	1899-1900
16	BSO	1900-1901
17	BSO	1901-1902
18	Pops	1901-1903
19	BSO	1902-1903
20	BSO	1903-1904
21	BSO	1904-1905
22	Pops	1904-1905
23	BSO	1905-1906
24	BSO	1906-1907
25	BSO	1907-1908
26	BSO	1908-1909
27	BSO
	Pops	1909-1910
28	BSO
	Pops	1910-1911
29	BSO Advertisements	1910-1911
30	BSO
	Pops	1911-1912
31	BSO
	Pops	1912-1913
32	BSO
	Pops	1913-1914
33	BSO
	Pops	1914-1915
34	BSO
	Pops	1915-1916
35	BSO
	Pops	1916-1917
36	BSO
	Pops	1917-1918
37	Karl Muck	1918
38	BSO
	Pops	1918-1919
39	BSO
	Pops	1919-1920
40	BSO Advertisements	1919-1920
41	BSO
	Pops	1920-1921
42	BSO
	Pops	1921-1922
43	BSO
	BSO Advertisements
	Pops Advertisements	1922-1923
44	BSO
	Pops	1922-1924
45	BSO
	Pops	1924
46	BSO
	BSO Advertisements
	Pops Advertisements	1924-1926
47	BSO
	Pops	1925-1926
48	BSO Advertisements
	Pops Advertisements	1926-1927
49	BSO
	Pops	1926-1928
50	BSO	1928
51	BSO
	Pops	1928-1929
52	BSO
	Pops
	U.S. Tour	1929-1930
53	BSO	1930-1931
54	BSO
	Pops	1931-1932
55	BSO
	Pops	1932-1933
56	BSO	1933-1934
57	BSO	1934-1935
58	BSO	1935-1936
59	BSO	1936-1937

VOL	TITLE	DATES
60	Pops Tanglewood	1936-1937
61	BSO	1937
62	BSO	1937-1938
63	Pops Tanglewood	1938
64	BSO	1938-1939
65	Pops Tanglewood	1939
66	BSO	1939-1940
67	Tanglewood	1939-1941
68	BSO Pops	1940
69	BSO	1940-1941
70	Tanglewood	1940-1944
71	BSO	1941-1942
72	BSO	1942-1943
73	BSO	1943-1944
74	BSO Pops Tanglewood	1944-1945
75	BSO Pops Tanglewood	1945-1946
76	BSO Pops Tanglewood	1946-1947
77	Tanglewood	1947-1948
78	BSO	1947-1949
79	Tanglewood	1949-1950
80	BSO	1949-1951
81	Tanglewood	1950-1951
82	BSO Pops	1951-1952
83	BSO Pops	1952-1953
84	Tanglewood	1952-1953
85	BSO	1953-1955
86	Tanglewood	1953-1954
87	Tanglewood	1954-1955
88	BSO Pops	1955-1956
89	Tanglewood	1955-1956
90	Tanglewood	1955-1956
91	European Tour	1956
92	European Tour	1956-1957
93	BSO Pops	1956-1957
94	Tanglewood	1957
95	BSO	1957-1958
96	BSO Pops	1958-1959
97	BSO	1958-1959
98	Tanglewood	1958-1959
99	Tanglewood	1959
100	BSO Pops	1959-1960
101	Tanglewood	1959-1960
102	Far Eastern Tour	1959-1960
103	BSO Pops	1960-1961
104	Tanglewood	1961
105	BSO Pops	1961-1962
106	Tanglewood	1962
107	BSO Pops	1962-1963
108	Tanglewood	1963
109	BSO Pops	1963-1964
110	Tanglewood	1963-1964
111	BSO Pops	1964-1966
112	Tanglewood	1965
113	BSO 85th Anniversary	1965
114	BSO Pops	1965-1966
115	Tanglewood	1966
116	BSO Pops	1966-1967
117	Tanglewood	1967
118	BSO Pops	1967-1968
119	Tanglewood	1968-1969
120	BSO Pops	1968-1969
121	Tanglewood	1969
122	BSO Pops	1969-1970
123	Tanglewood	1970
124	BSO Pops	1970-1971
125	Tanglewood	1971
126	BSO Pops	1971-1972
127	European Tour	1970-1971
128	European Tour	1971
129	Tanglewood	1972
130	BSO Pops	1972-1973
131	Tanglewood	1973
132	BSO Pops	1973-1974

MATERIALS NOT FILMED

SUB-SERIES NUMBER	SUB-SERIES NAME	SUB-SERIES DATES
2	Loose Clippings	1931-1991
3	Oversize Newspapers and Journals	1919-1979

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholarship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

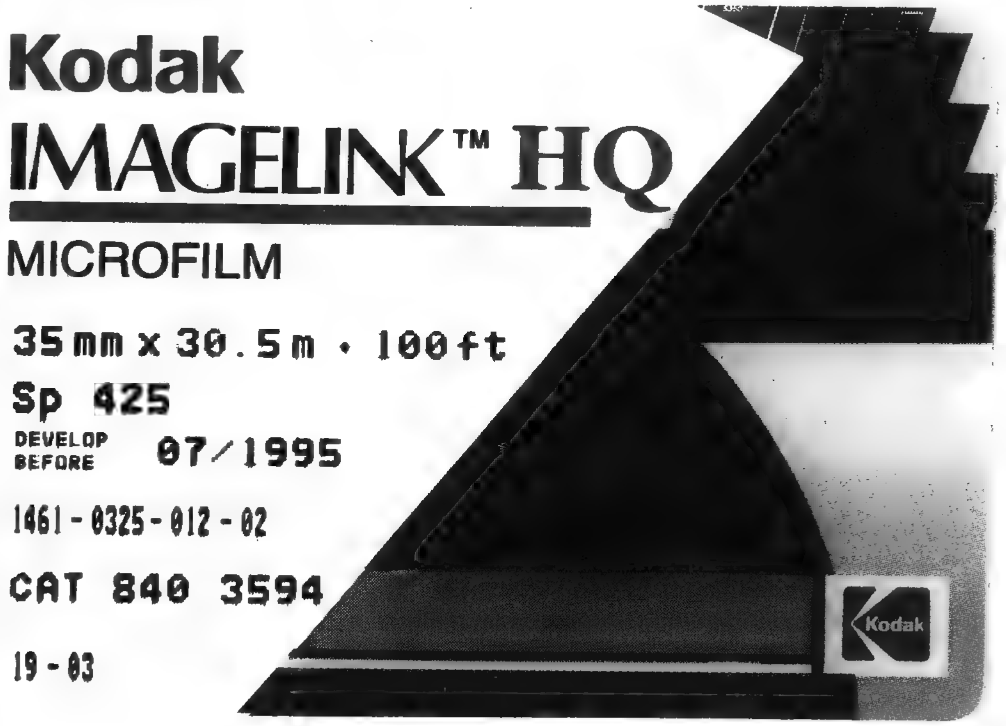
This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copyright law.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: [✓ IA] IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATION: 12X

FILM STOCK:



Kodak
IMAGELINK™ HQ
MICROFILM
35mm x 30.5m · 100ft
Sp 425
DEVELOP BEFORE 07/1995
1461-0325-012-02
CAT 840 3594
19-03

REEL 15

Volume 31-32

BSO-POPS
1912-1913 to BSO-POPS
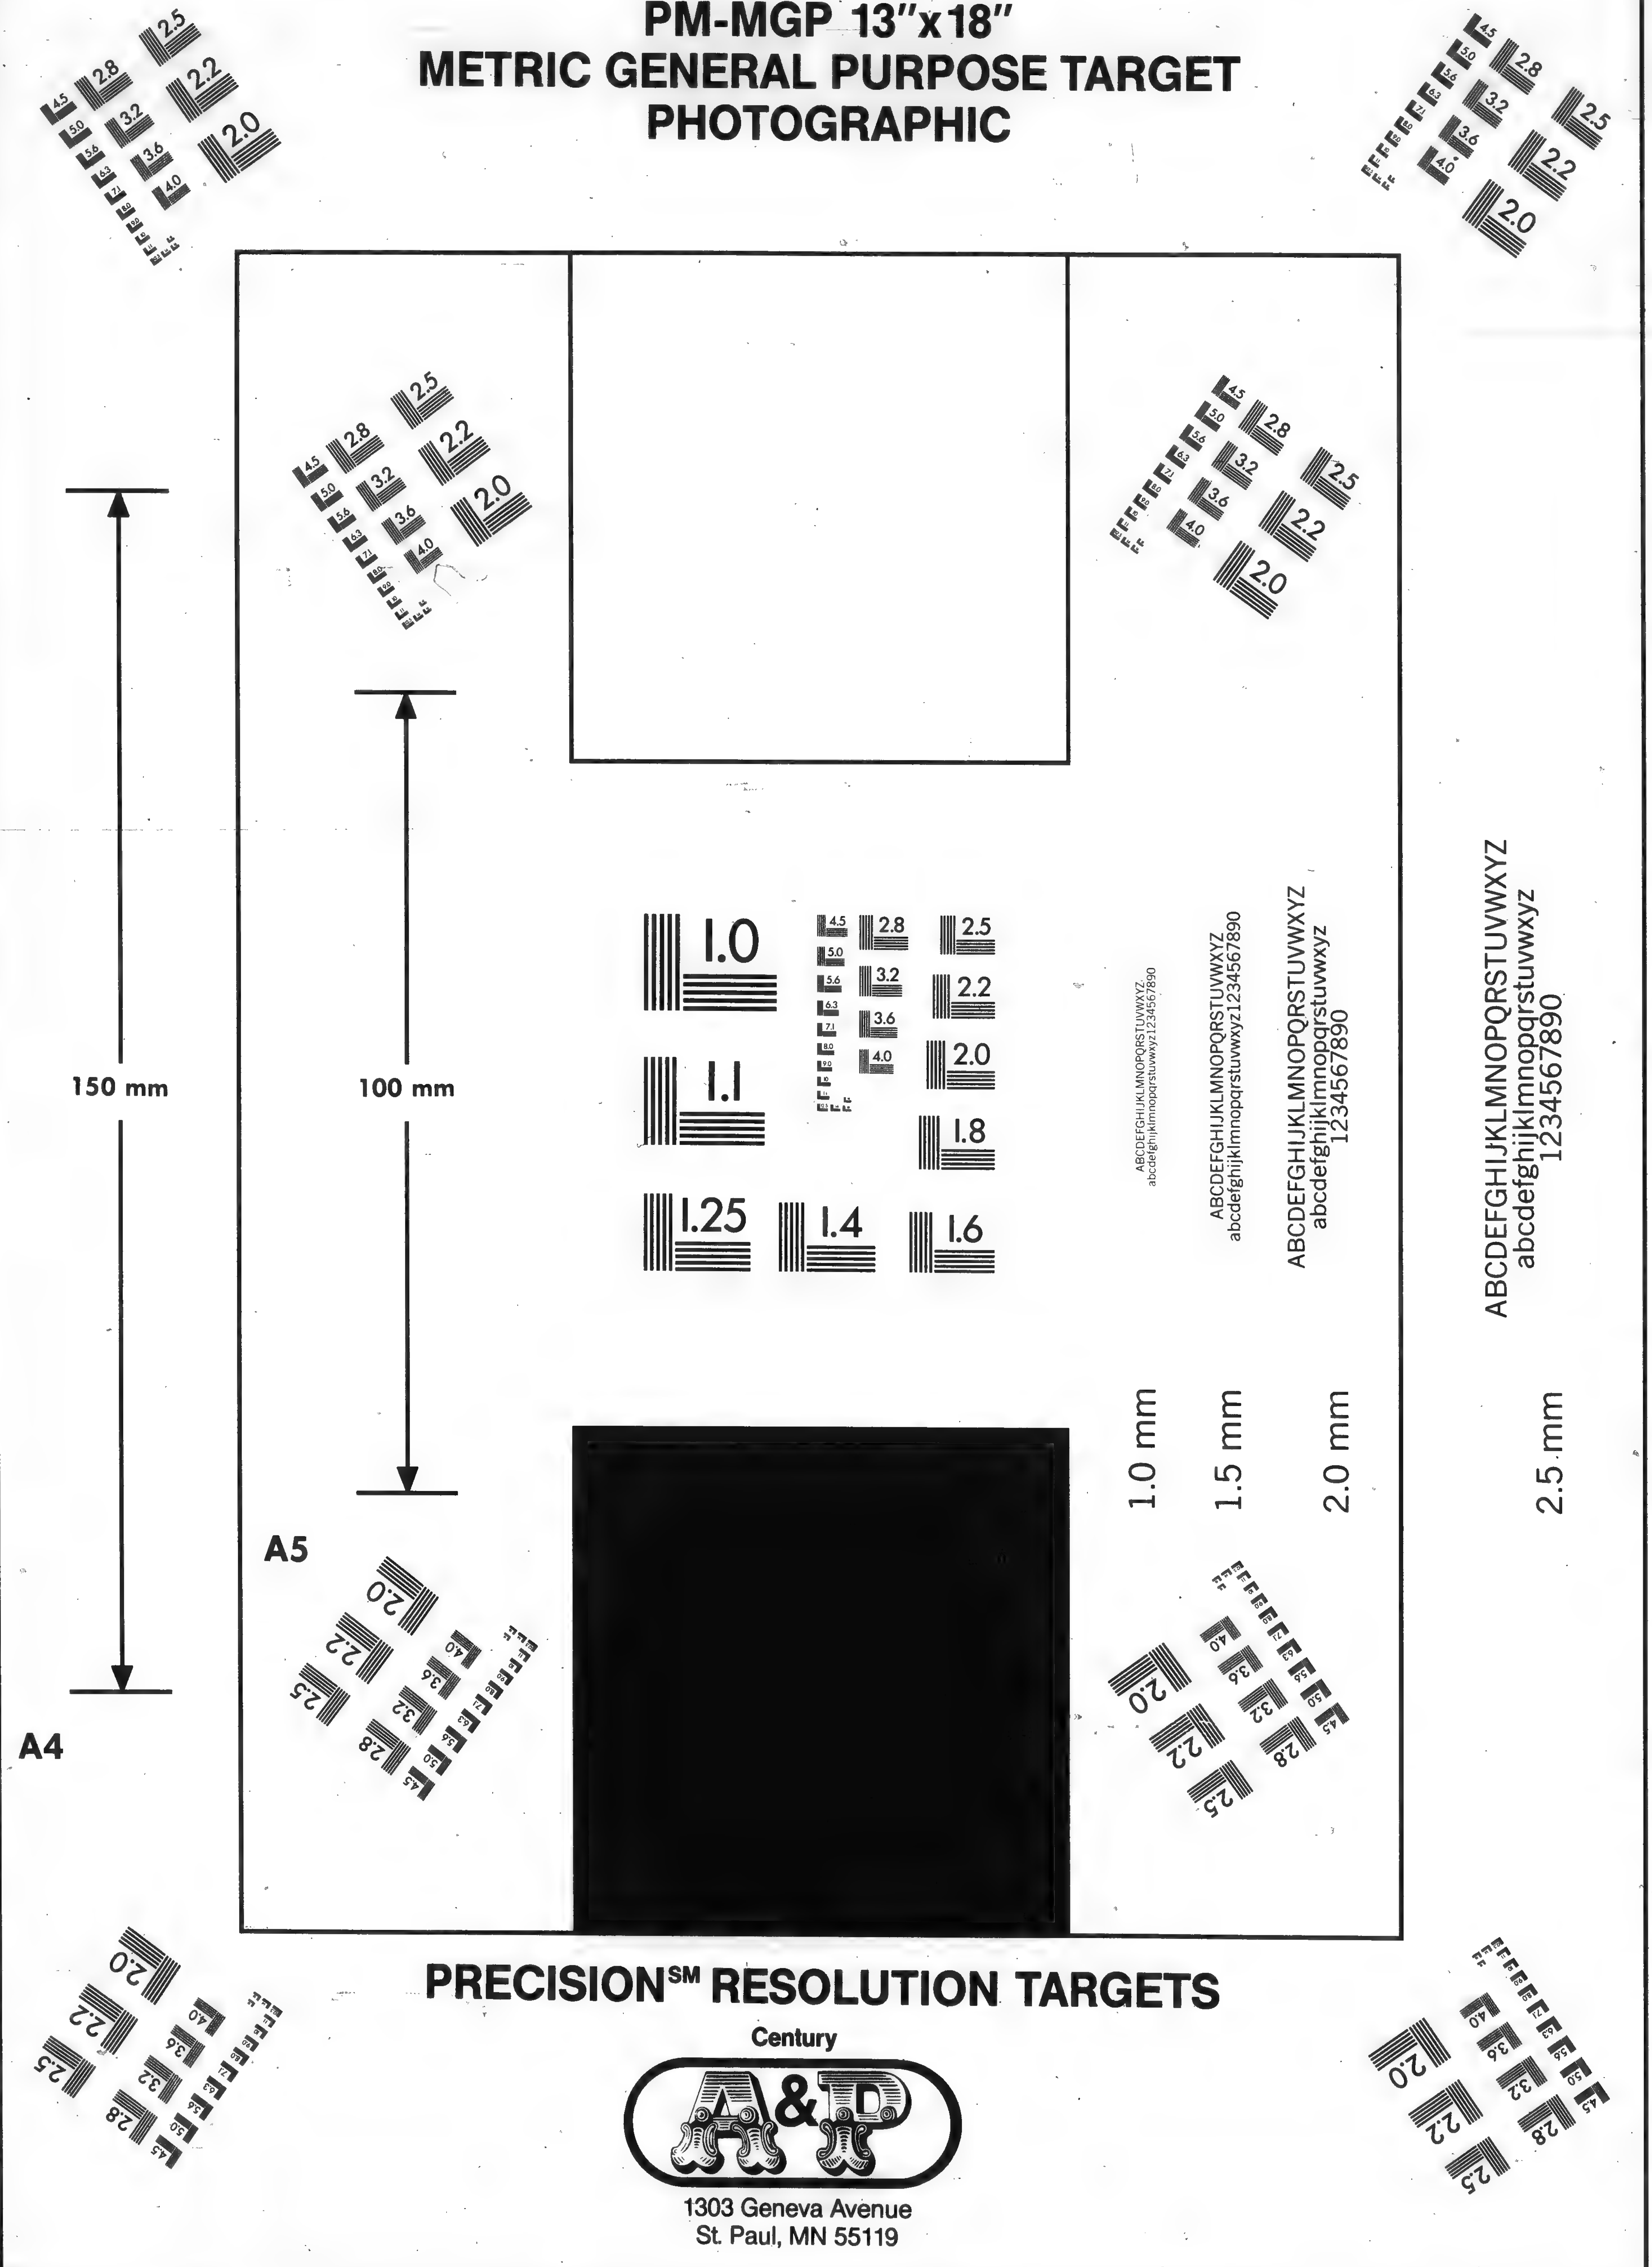
1913-1914

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES
DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS
AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

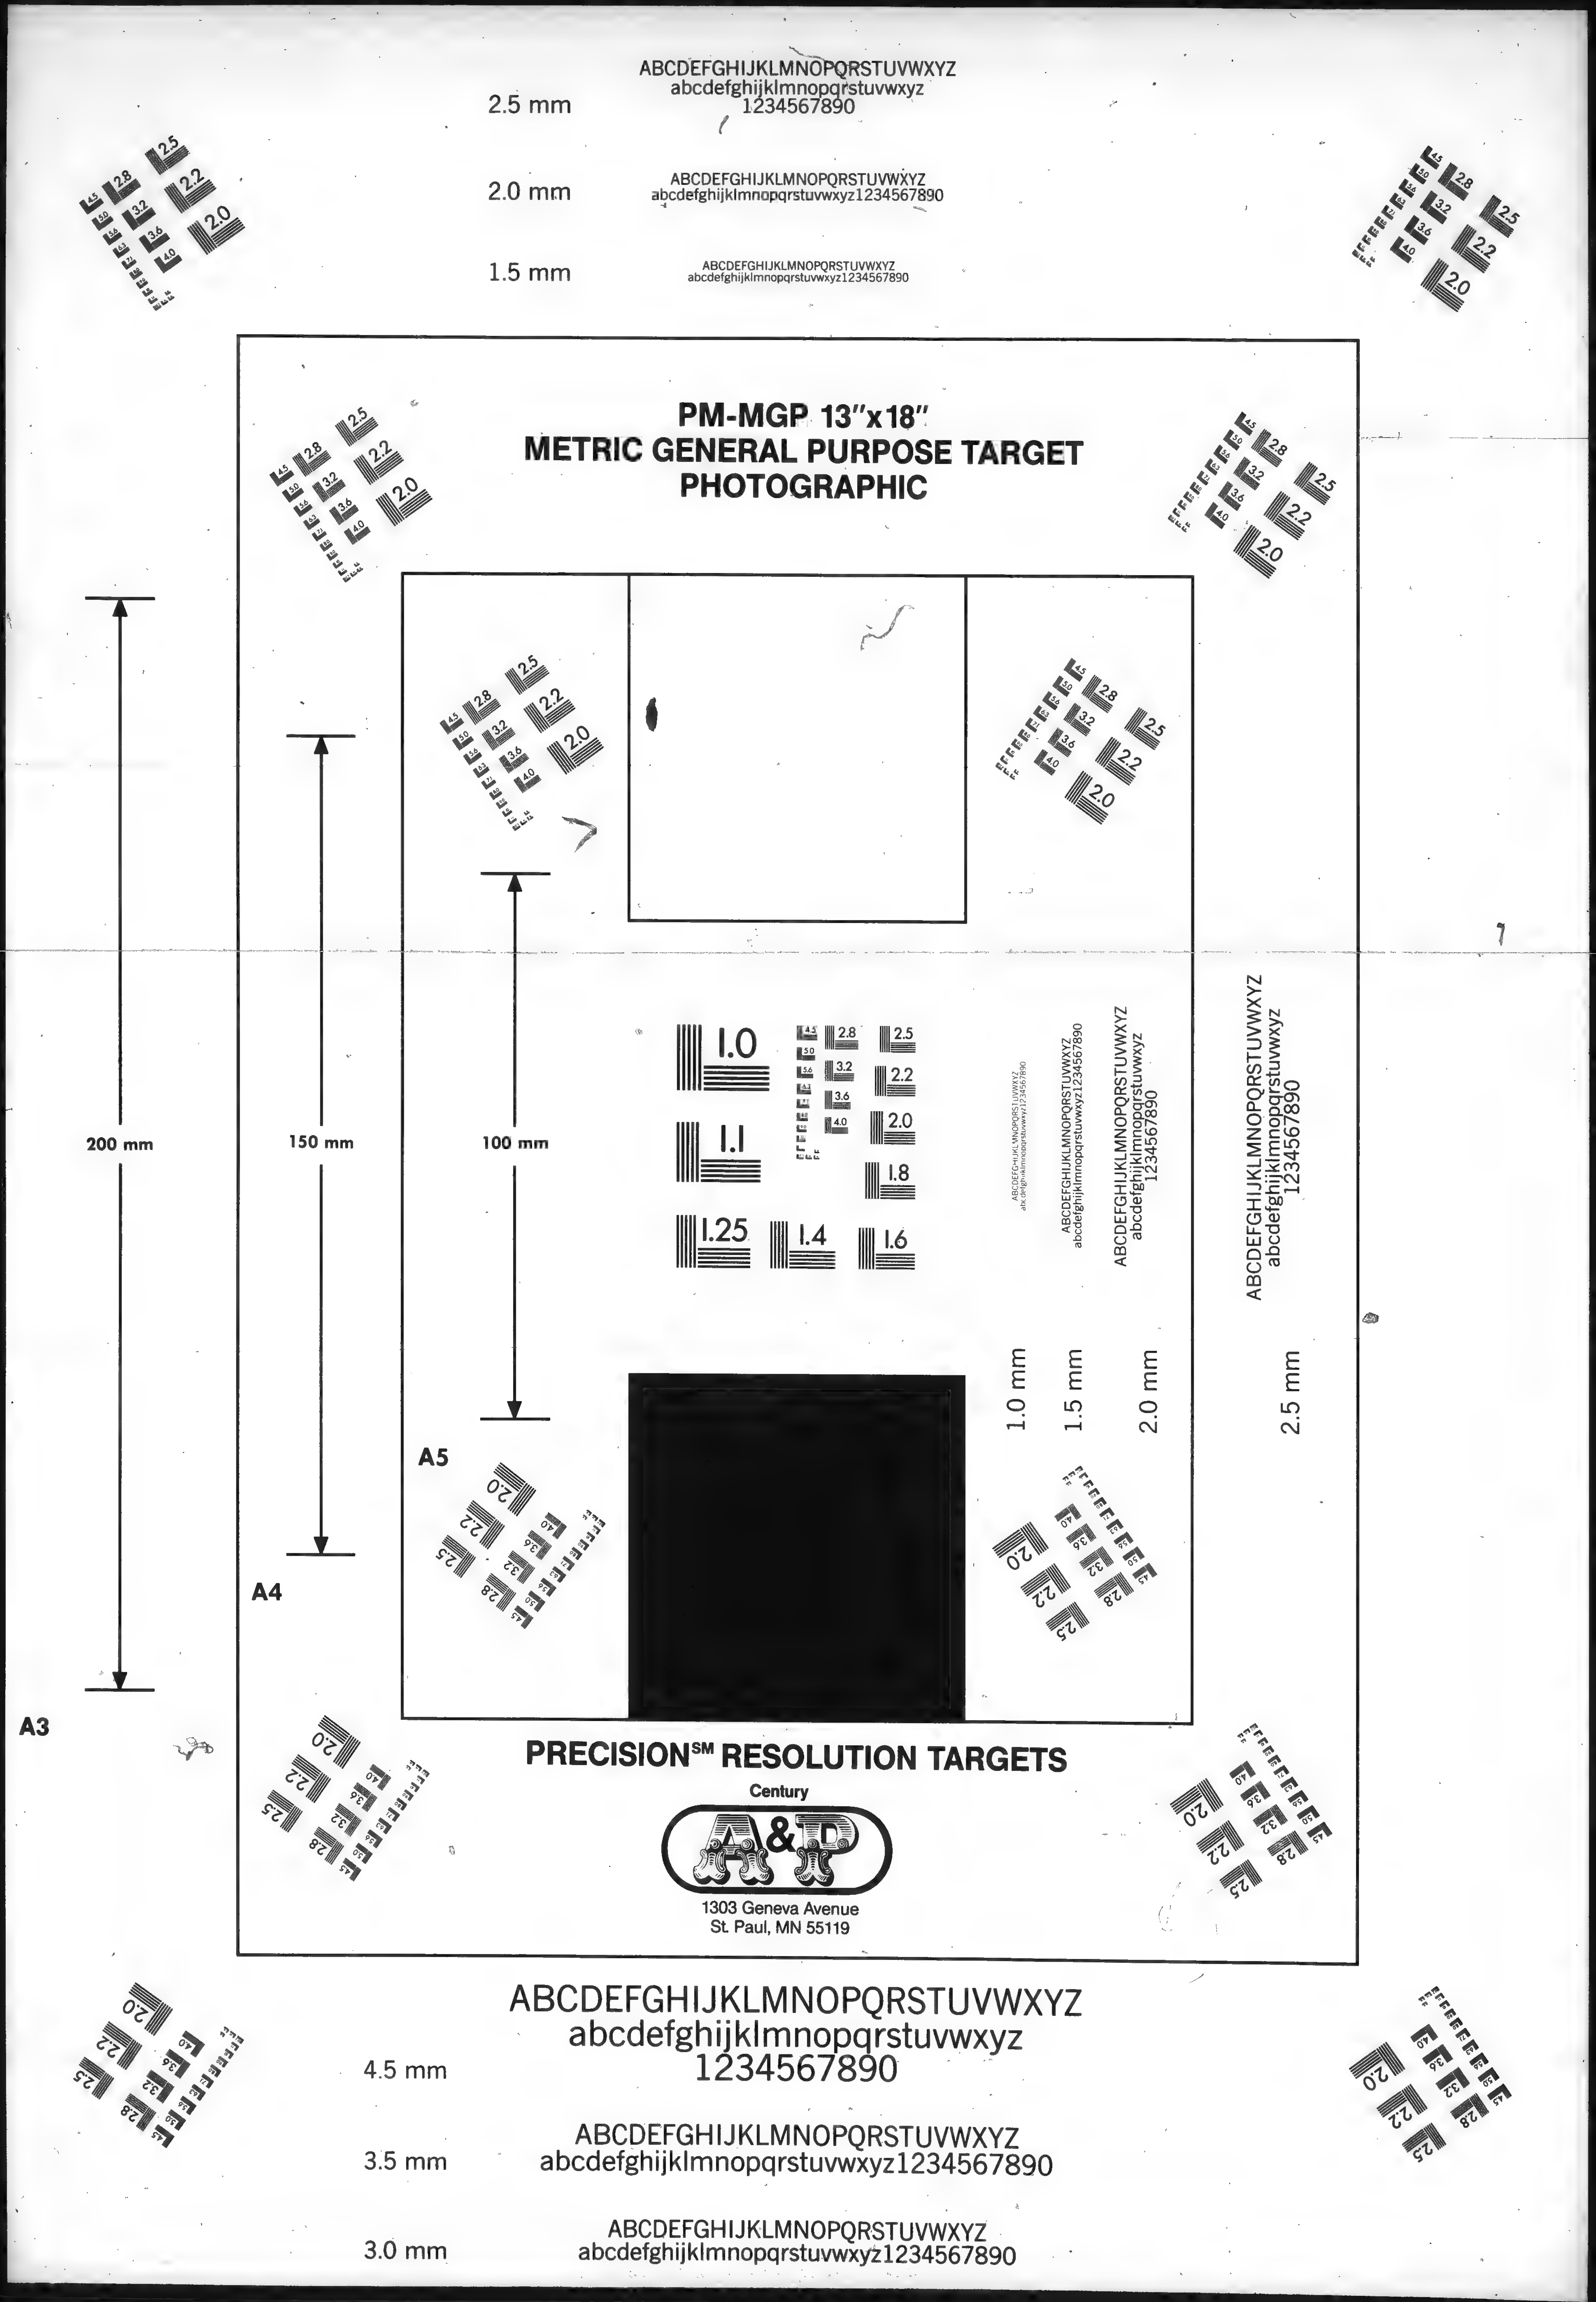
VOLUME 31

BSO
Pops

1912 - 1913

REDUCTION
RATIO
17x



2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

[1]

Georg Henschel's Fifty Years: The Symphony's First Conductor

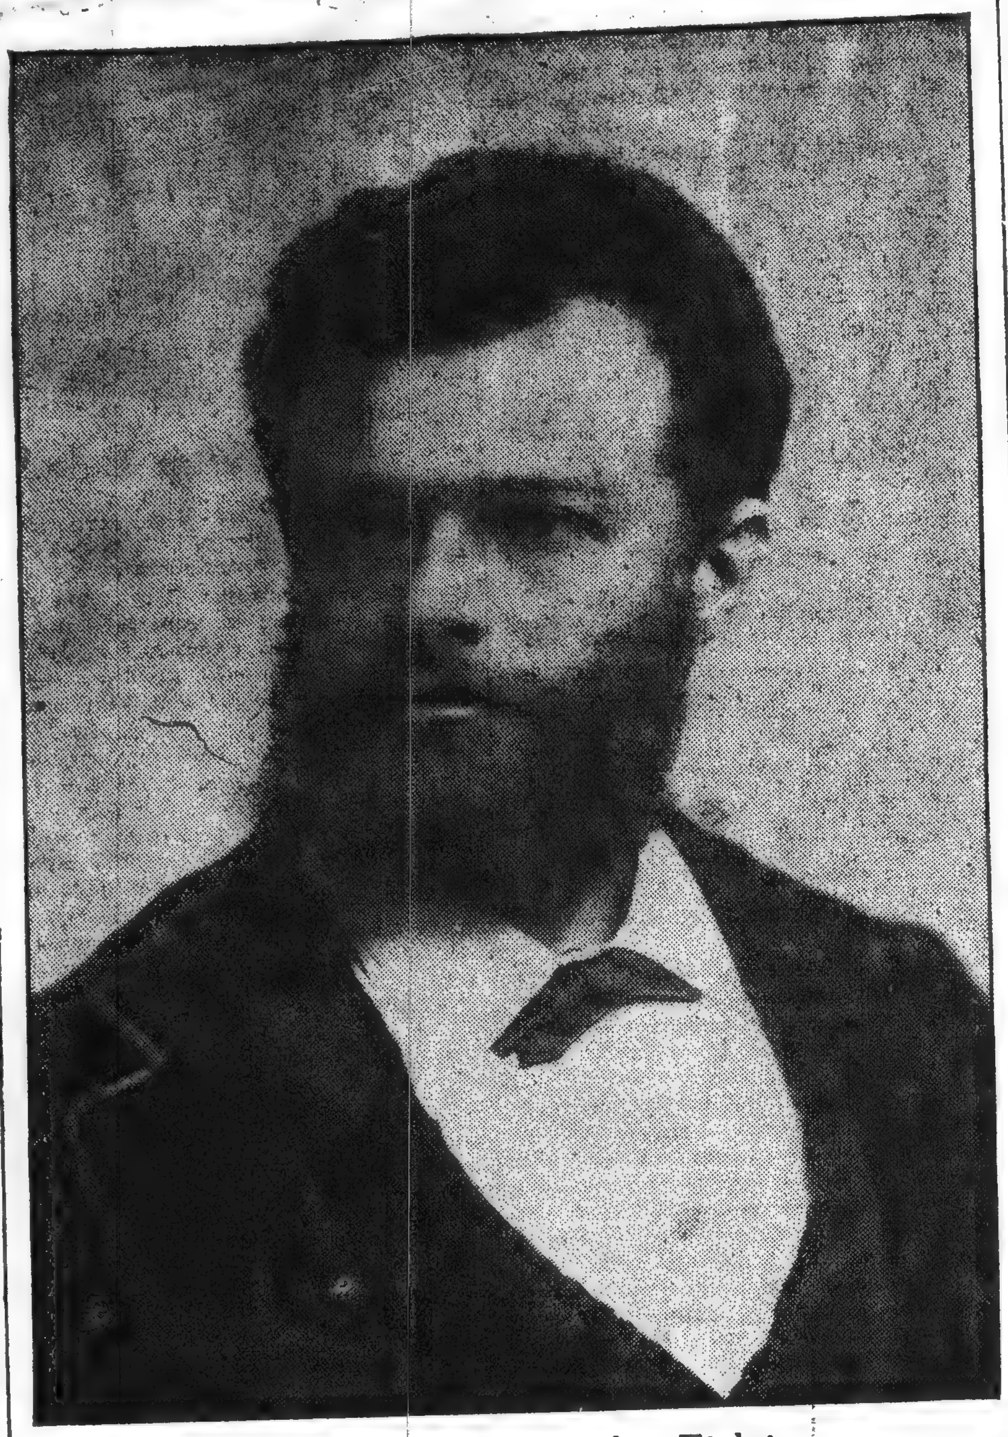
His Life and Work in the 80's and 90's

F… years … all in Berlin that …orrow, on Oct. 31, 1862, …able record names and no circumstances that none happens to recite, Georg Henschel made his first appearance on any stage. He was a boy of twelve; he had come from his birthplace, Breslau; and he played the pianoforte. There record and recollection, so far as they are obtainable in Boston, cease. In this October of 1912, Mr. Henschel is a man of sixty-two, who has long lived in London and whose capacity for work the years have diminished little. Only the other day he was conducting at the Promenade Concerts there in the absence of Sir Henry Wood; he will sing in concerts in the course of the winter; and he has announced his usual song recitals. Were it not for the number of these engagements and for his preoccupations with his pupils, he might have returned this very season to sing again in the United States.

It is now six or nearly seven years since Boston has seen or heard Mr. Henschel; and he last conducted here as the guest of the Symphony Orchestra at one of its concerts for its Pension Fund. The youngest generation in our concert-rooms knows him only by much good report; the middle generation has heard him as singer and conductor, though hardly in his years with the Symphony Orchestra; the eldest generation knew and admired him then, and still earlier, when, with Lilian Bailey, his pupil and afterward his wife, he was beginning "The Henschel Concerts" of songs and duets. In those days, though he had no such established reputation as the succeeding thirty years have accumulated upon his head, he was a conspicuous, vital and well-liked figure in the musical life of this town. He himself, as he was in these eighties and as he came back to Boston for occasional visits in the nineties, deserves to be recalled in this hour of his jubilee. In an article that follows, Mr. Foote, the composer and Mr. Henschel's close friend from those days onward, has done so out of long and intimate recollections.

As it happens also the latest mail from England has brought an admirably supplementary article. As all Mr. Henschel's friends know, he has kept a journal these many years, from which he may some time compile and publish his recollections. In these anniversary days, he opened a few of its pages to Mr. Robin Legge, the reviewer of music for the Daily Telegraph in London. Mr. Legge was quick to make an article out of them and it follows herewith as a pendant to Mr. Foote's.

H. T. P.



Georg Henschel in the Eighties

His Work and Life in Boston

By Arthur Foote

THE decade 1880-1890 was musically of great significance in Boston in many ways, eminently because of the establishment of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gave a new life to things here and set a new standard. With the entrance of those concerts as the most important factor in our musical conditions Georg Henschel was identified; that such was the case was what people call accident, but it may be more truly described as the result of a chain of circumstances—and the latter it is worth while to relate. To do so is to recall concerts and persons that were dear to concert-goers of the twenty or more years from 1879 to 1901—that is, the Henschels.

The Connecting Link

In the seventies Lilian Bailey, with her family, was living in Boston, and the young girl, with her … exquisite voice and keenly sensitive nature was soon to make a place for herself. Many of us remember the surprise at finding such art in one at the beginning of her career, and such instinctive feeling for the best and abhorrence of the commonplace in music. She also played the piano well, so that she would play her own accompaniment for a song such as Schubert's "Meine Ruh' ist hin,"—a thing as unusual then as it is now. Her first appearance of consequence was at one of a pair of concerts given by Mr. Lang in March, 1876, and it is interesting to note from the programme which follows that her career began just when the first music of Saint-Saëns and Tschaikowsky was being heard, and when Brahms (of whom Henschel was an intimate friend) was becoming known to us. Here is the programme:

Trio in F major........................St. Saëns
Mr. Lang, August Fries and Wulf Fries.
Aria: "Ritormerai fra poco"..............Hasse
Miss Lilian Bailey.
A group of piano pieces..........St. Saëns-Bach
Song: "Murmeln des Lüftchen...........Jensen
Concerto in B-flat minor...........Tschaikowsky
(With second piano.)

For a year or two she remained here, singing more and more in public (for instance in the Harvard Musical Association symphony concerts), but in 1878 went to Europe—first to Paris, where she studied with Madame Viardot, and the next year to England, where she became a pupil of Henschel.

The Henschels' Concerts

In England she sang a good deal at the best concerts, such as the Monday "Pops" (the famous chamber music concerts of the day), but before long returned to Boston, Henschel also coming, for his first visit to us. And now began the long series of concerts which lasted for twenty years, those concerts which they gave from San Francisco to St. Petersburg, that linger in the memory as the highest and most perfect expression of vocal recitals. She has always seemed to me the finest singing artist that we have produced; her voice was not large, but very beautiful and admirably trained; her passion for perfection led her all her life to the working towards her ideal; while her rare musical nature gave the rounding and finishing touch. Henschel himself was the great artist then that he is today; his singing of a picturesque song, such as Rubinstein's "Der Asra," of Löwe's ballades, of Brahms's songs and his own, is unforgettable. An intimate feeling was given to the whole through his playing the accompaniments, even for their duets—and wonderful playing it was. An example of their early programmes is the following, of January, 1881:

Aria ("Orfeo")............................Haydn
"Vieni o cara."—"Mi du speranza".......Händel
Mr. Henschel.
Nacht und Traüme......................Schubert
Der Nussbaum ....Schumann
Lullaby ....Brahms
Miss Bailey.
Piano soli:
Nocturne in G.—Gavotte in C........Henschel
Mr. Henschel.
Duet: "O that we two were Maying"..Henschel
Miss Bailey and Mr. Henschel.
Minnelied .... Brahms
Der Asra .... Rubinstein
Widmung ....Franz
Ich grolle nicht......................Schumann
Mr. Henschel.
O, hush thee, my babie.—Sing Heigh-ho!...........................Henschel
Miss Bailey.
Songs from "Die schöne Müllerin"......Schubert
Mr. Henschel.

They also often sang in other concerts, as in Mr. Lang's production of Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust." They were married in March, 1881.

With the Symphony Orchestra

Now to come to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There had already been for sixteen years a series of about eight Thursday afternoon orchestral concerts, given by the Harvard Musical Association and conducted by Carl Zerrahn; at one of them, March 3, 1881, Henschel was asked to conduct a MS. Overture of his own, and from this came important consequences; for his conducting was so inspiring as to be without doubt the determining cause of his subsequent engagement as conductor of the new orchestra. There were, already to be sure, the concerts of the Harvard Musical Association, and those of the rival Philharmonic Orchestra (which had an existence of two or three years); but rumors were about the town of a projected new series of such concerts on a larger scale with more secure backing by some one—it was not known exactly who; although Mr. Higginson's name was connected with the scheme in some minds. This latter conjecture proved correct; for an announcement was shortly made that a series of concerts would be given in the next autumn by Mr. Higginson, with Mr. Henschel as conductor, on practically the same lines that are familiar to us now, i. e. that the players should be given contracts of such nature that their services would be entirely at the command of the conductor, adequate rehearsals being thus secured (for the first time in our experience.) And on Oct. 22,1881, the first concert was given, all musical people being on tip-toe with excitement; the success waas immediate, the programe being the following:

Overture: "Dedication of the House".Beethoven
Air from "Orpheus".........................Gluck
Miss Annie Louise Cary.
Symphony in B-flat major..................Haydn
Ballet: "Rosamunde"...................Schubert
Scene from "Odysseus"......................Bruch
Miss Cary.
Jubel-Ouverture .... Weber

The Harvard Musical Association tried one more year of concerts, but then abandoned the hopeless idea of competing with the stronger series, while for the same reason the Philharmonic Orchestra left the field free. Under Henschel the membership of the orchestra remained substantially the same as it had been with the other orchestras, being by no means of so high a grade as it is now, its practical reorganization occurring mainly under Gericke.

Mr. Henschel as Conductor

Henschel was then a man of about thirty, of striking and picturesque appearance, especially when sitting at the piano accompanying himself; in fact the portrait by Sargent gives a very just idea of him; he was a man of great interest and personality, of uncompromising ideals and contagious enthusiasm. He was just the one for the task; and it was by no means an easy one, nor was it a certainty that a constant and sure audience could be built up, so far as the past could give indication. The audiences of the other orchestral concerts had been dwindling, and it looked as if Boston was not dependable. To be sure, Mr. Higginson was as able as he was generous in his intention to back the expenses to any extent,—but would the public respond? Not unless the concerts were worth while and could interest people. They soon proved that both these things were the case, and the solid beginning of that remarkably successful undertaking was assured. For this the conductor was largely responsible, and the judgment of the founder of the concerts was justified. There is no doubt that one important factor was Henschel's skill in programme making: the orchestra might have played as well as it did, and he might have conducted as well,—if the concerts had bored people they would have failed. But (like Theodore Thomas) he cared about making fine, well-balanced and interesting programmes, and had the gift of knowing how, so that the keen interest with which the concerts started w as never lost, and when Gericke took ho d of them (in 1884) they were a fixed in tution. As an example of the lighter ort of programme that we sometimes had

Tragic Overture .... Brahms
Air: "Giulio Cesare"...............Händel
Mrs. He hel.
Symphony in G-minor.. ....Mozart
Two Slavonic Dances... ....Dvořák
Hymne au Créateur.... ....Henschel
Mrs. He hel.
Overture: "Merry Wives Windsor"...Nicolai

Leaving and Returnin

During their stay i Boston the Henschels lived on Otis P ce in a house that became known for its charming and easy hospitality, and becau e sooner or later pretty nearly every visitor to Boston who was worth while found his way there, there were delightful little suppers after the Saturday night concerts where there was good talk too. Th e hosts had a very individual place in Boston society, apart from their professiona standing.

But after three yea s Henschel felt the call of London; he believed that one can conduct at any perio in one's life, but that the singer must make the most of his youth (not forese ing that today, at 62, he would be singin g with all the success of his earlier yea s,) and both he and his wife wished to si g much and often. There were twenty tim es the opportunities in Europe that could be found here, and it was obvious that s oner or later they must go back to re urn to us for occasional visits. Such was the case; they went back to London, eventually establishing themselves in the charming house in Bedford Gardens whic many Bostonians have known, and singi g constantly from Rome to St. Petersburg, from Berlin to Paris, in those recitals that w love to remember. Henschel also establishe in London a series of London Symphony Concerts in 1886, which continued for a dozen years or so (that was before the days of London's present winter musical activity), also conducting the Scottish Symphony Orchestra for some years, and w as active in teaching. Their home life (with their daughter Helen) was delightful and their public career full and successful, but the end was drawing near. 1901 they were here again, and, in a concert on March 31 of that year, Henschel produced his Stabat Mater, a very be utiful work which was deeply felt by the audience. At its very close came the words "In Paradisi gloria," in which the lovely voice of Mrs. Henschel soared abov all in ineffable beauty. Those were the last words that she sang in Boston, f in November of that same year came her lamented and untimely death.

In memory of her Henschel composed a Requiem, a work of r al originality, and in the autumn of 1902 he came again to this country with his daughter and wife's parents, so that there was an opportunity for its production by the Cecilia Society. He conducted himself (his daughter being one of the soloists) and the Requiem made a strong impression, not only on its own account, but because Mrs. Henschel had been so loved here as well as admired.

Lasting Work

It will be seen that Henschel's part in music here was an important one; years go by and the impression of the moment fades; but all in Bosto who were interested in music in those twenty years must still remember with keen appreciation the importance of Henschel work in the early days of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and can never lose the affectionate remembrance of the beautifu concerts of "The Henschels."

Pages fr m His Diary

By Robin Legge

ON Oct. 31, 18 , there appeared as pianist, in Berlin, a musician who for ver five and thirty years has een one of the most prominent musicia in England, the land of his adoption. I emphasize the fact of his being at fir a pianist because it is not at all as such that his fame was established here. Perhaps some will recognize the personality from the fact that the celebrator of the jubilee has impersonated in England alone two Mephistopheles, Boito's and Berlioz's; two Lucifers, by Sullivan and Rubinstein, and one Satan, by Sir Charles Stanford. If I am wrong, then let me say that the Jubilator, so to speak, is Dr. Georg Henschel, who in spite of his sixty-two years is still as singer delighting audiences and affording to budding artists an example of beauty of style. The other day I came into the temporary possession of a manuscript volume of Mr. Henschel's reminiscences of forty years, and a mighty interesting document it is. It is from this manuscript that I propose to quote some tales of the experiences of Mr. Henschel, and of many famous musicians with whom he has come in contact during his career of half a century.

Adventure in America

It was the late Mr. Arthur Chappell, the founder and director of the Popular Concerts, at one period, and that a lengthy one, the most famous concerts we possessed, who was the first to induce Mr. Henschel to come to England. That was in February 1877. He came, and his success was so emphatic and so immediate and so prolonged that—well, here he still is, long to remain, let us hope! But, during this period there was a gap of three seasons during which Dr. Henschel was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; I think he was actually the first conductor of that now famous institution. The work there was arduous, but it was also profitable; yet so great was the conductor's yearning for Europe that at the end of his first engagement he declined the offer of a renewal for five years, and returned home. "I remember once," says Mr. Henschel, "while at dinner in a hotel at which we were staying during our travels with the orchestra, just before a concert, being very carefully watched by a dusky waiter, and wondered why. When I had finished and got up to leave, the dusky gentleman-in-waiting removed my chair politely, and with a broad grin wished me every success, adding, 'I, too, have been in the show business myself.' "

A tale of Jenny Lind that is new to me is told by Mr. Henschel, as related to him by Jenny Lind herself. Mr. Henschel, it should be stated, succeeded the great singer as professor at the Royal College of Music. In 1850 Jenny Lind was engaged for a long tour of the United States of America by Barnum, "the greatest showman on earth." In Europe she had appeared before audiences of, say, 2000; but in America she found herself compelled to sing in halls that would (and did) hold 8000, and even more. Railway stations and the like, were converted into temporary concert-rooms in towns wh the latter were not sufficiently large. Her first appearance took place at Castle Garden, where many thousands of immigrants have subsequently landed. Terrified at the enormous auditorium, Jenny Lind mentioned to Barnum her fears, and declared that nothing would have induced her to sign a contract binding her to sing in places three or four times as large as any in which she had previously appeared. Nowadays it is easy to understand the singer's surprise when Barnum, without a moment's hesitation, took from his pocket the contract on which was Jenny Lind's signature, and tore it into a thousand pieces, saying, "Madame, send me your lawyer tomorrow, and I will sign any contract he may care to submit to me." By the way, I should have stated that it was on his return from Boston, at the end of 1884, that Mr. Henschel founded his London Symphony Concerts—an act that puts him high in the list of pioneers here.

New Tales of Rubinstein

Here is another story that is new to me, as told by Mr. Henschel: "I remember a dinner once at Mme. Schumann's in Berlin, when Anton Rubinstein entertained us with the story of his experiences in America, whence he had just returned after a tour of 215 concerts in eight months—there were no Sunday concerts then. Somewhere out in the wild and woolly West, about an hour before the concert, a man thrust his head into Rubinstein's room and said, 'Say, boss, don't you think it's time to have your face blacked?' 'O', cried Mme. Schumann, 'you didn't, did you?' "

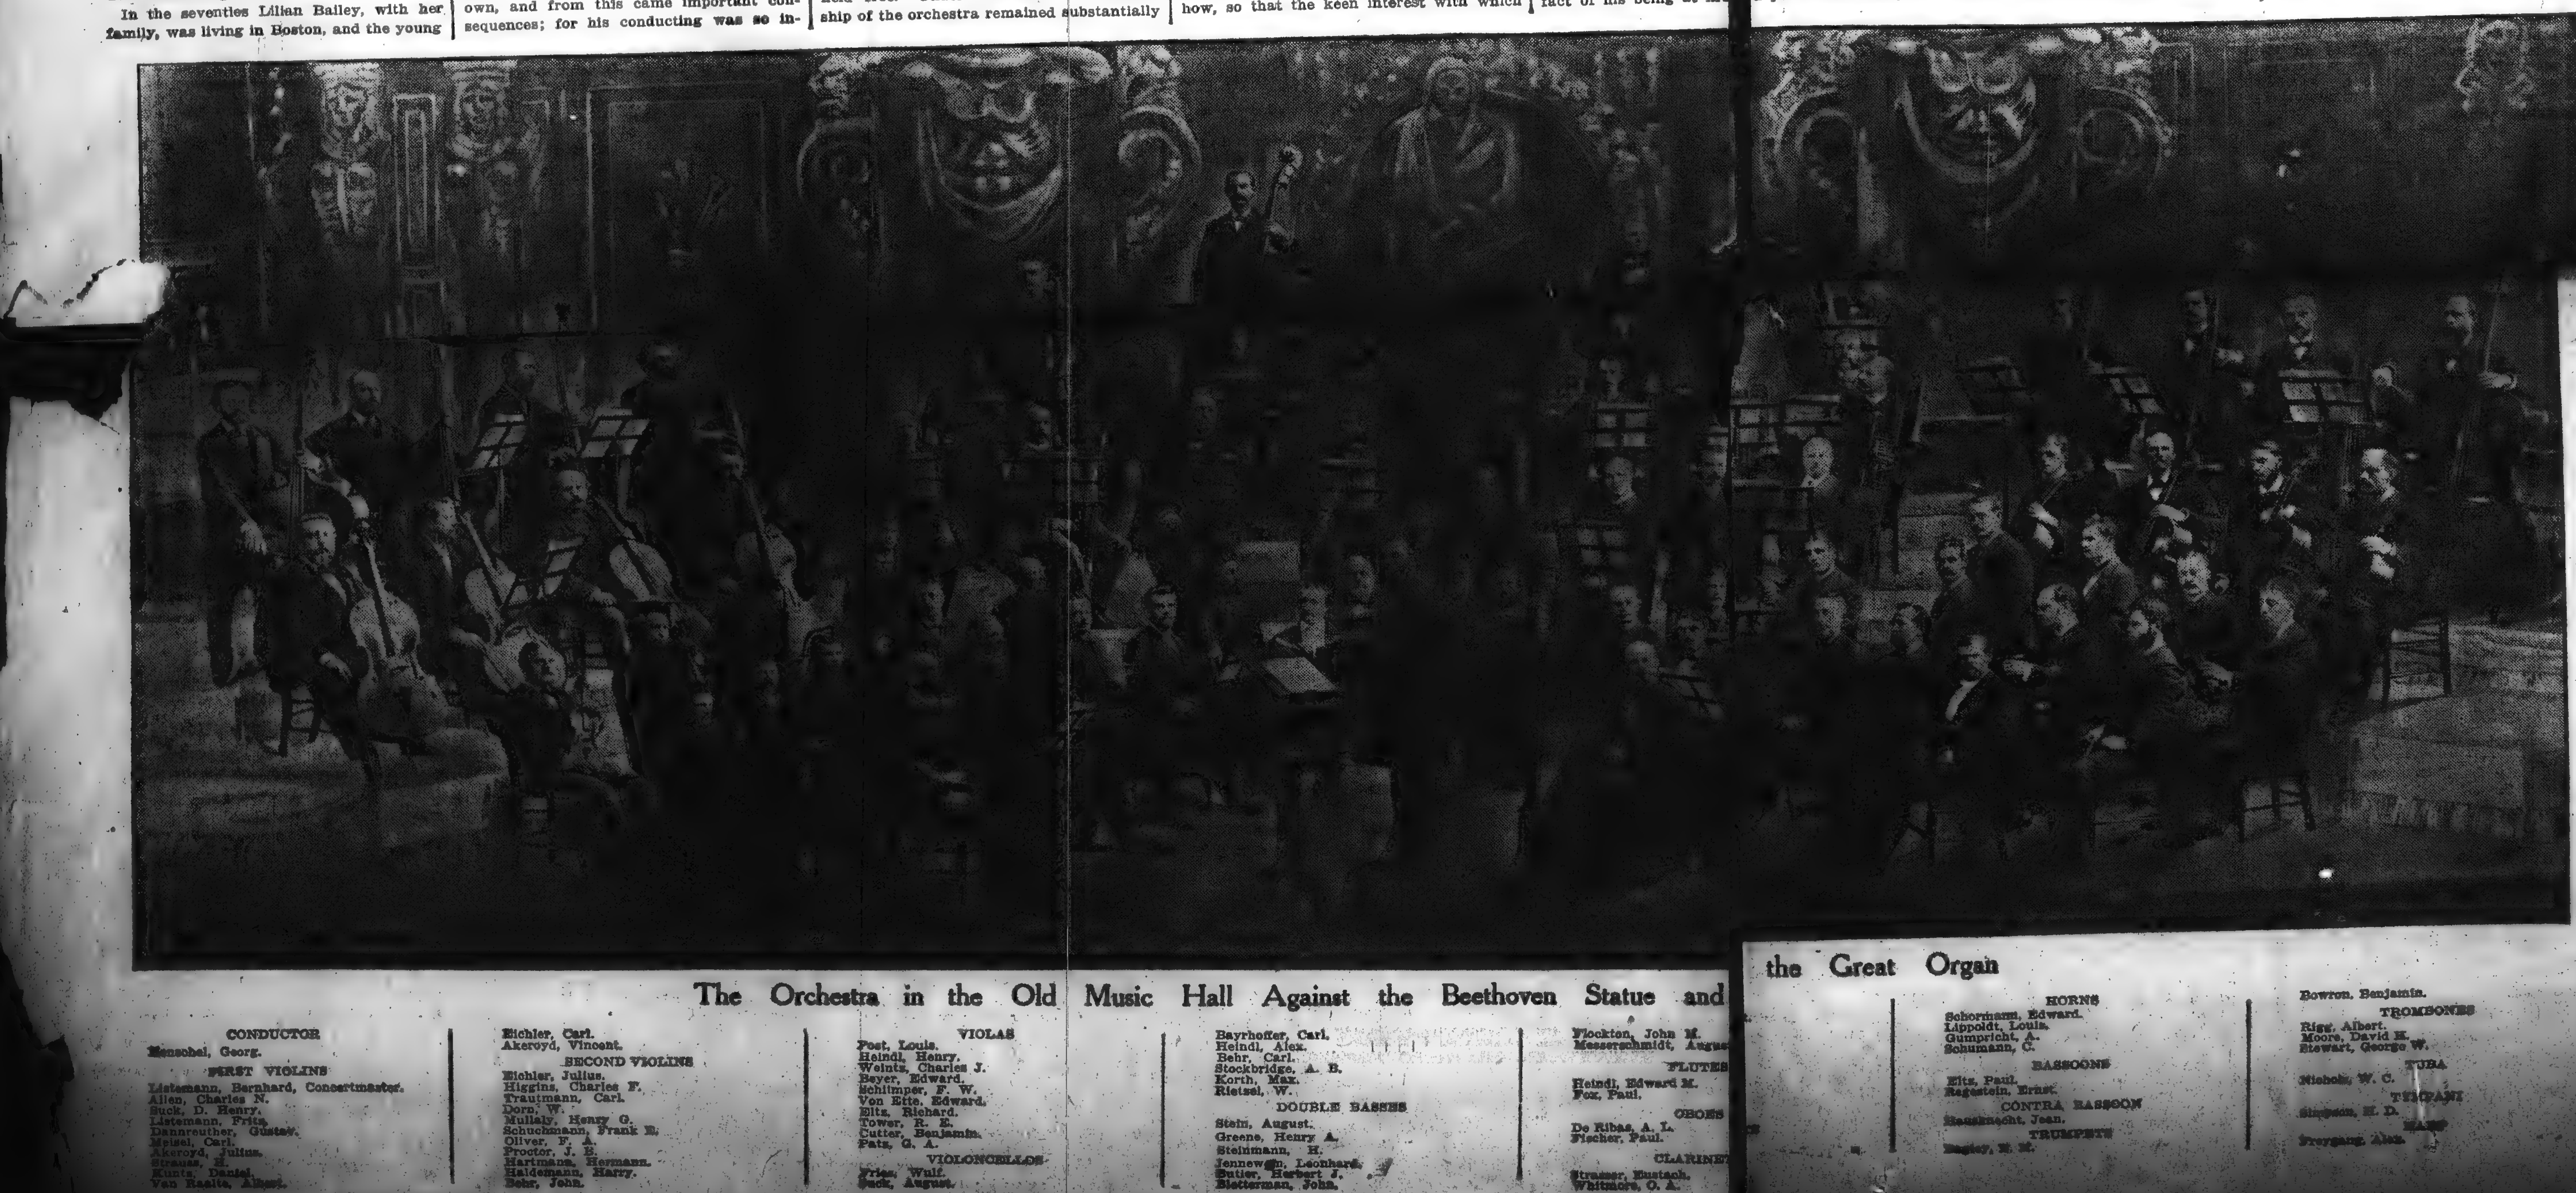
Another story is of a luncheon party that met at the Golden Goose at Breslau on the morning of the day on which Rubinstein and Henschel were to join forces in an important concert. "We seated ourselves at the large table in the middle of the room," says Mr. Henschel, "at the other end of which was the only other guest in the room—a locally well-known amateur musician, an army surgeon by profession. Our party consisted of Rubinstein, Constantin Sander (a famous publisher), and myself. We had just begun our lunch when from the other end of the room came in stentorian tones from the surgeon the question, 'I say, Sander, how old you like Tausig the other day?' Sander, by nature a shy, meek little man, got red in the face and was still composing a polite reply when the irrepressible surgeon trumpeted forth this, 'Well, I can only tell you that, compared with Tausig, Rubinstein is no more than a mere threshing-flail.' " In Germany this expression implies more than the ancient agricultural implement; it indicates a particularly ill-mannered, uncouth and rude person. A hideous silence followed; we dropped our soup spoons in consternation, and suddenly the surgeon realized in whose presence he was. But Rubinstein sat quite unmoved. 'Pray pay no attention to this; a public man must not mind such things, and, to tell you the truth, I rather like them!' was all he said."

And of Liszt Also

I hope Mr. Henschel may be induced one day to amplify his "Recollections," for they are very vivid, and the manuscript before me is a veritable human document. There seems to have been no musician of any note in his career with whom he was not on terms of friendship. He first met Liszt at Altenburg. There, at a meeting of the Algemeiner Tonkünstler Verein, Liszt was the chief figure. Following on this meeting, Henschel paid a long visit to Weimar, where Liszt was then living, daily holding a kind of court. On one occasion, when Mr. Henschel was present, there were among the company Rubinstein, Tausig and Hans von Bulow. Imagine the effect on a young man of eighteen on hearing on one evening four of the greatest pianists the world has ever known! They are all gone, but, says Mr. Henschel, the memory of that evening can never fade. On another occasion Liszt pointed out to Henschel a small parcel he had received the day before from Wagner, which was lying on a table. This he gave to the singer. Before an eager crowd present, "I opened the parcel," says Henschel, "and discovered it to be the score, just then published, of 'Die Walküre.' 'Allons, donc,' said Liszt, 'mon cher, chantons Les Adieux de Wotan.' Liszt seated himself at the piano, and I, leaning over him, sang that grand finale for the first time!" And at sight!

A Hint of More

There is a good story of old Moscheles, who, explaining to Henschel, then his pupil, that when composing he heard in his head all that he was writing, said: "When I wrote my concert with three kettledrums I came to a tutti which I wanted rather fully scored. Well, will you believe it, I heard that tutti and all those instruments whilst I was writing, so distinctly and clearly in my mind's ear that—that I got a headache!" I have said nothing about Mr. Henschel's great friendship with Brahms. The details in a far ampler form than in the manuscript I have here have already been given to the world. Nor have I space to cite many more experiences of this accomplished and versatile artist. I hope he will give them all to the world, for they are in many cases of great historic interest.



The Orchestra in the Old Music Hall Against the Beethoven Statue and the Great Organ

CONDUCTOR
Henschel, Georg.
FIRST VIOLINS
Listemann, Bernhard, Concertmaster.
Allen, Charles N.
Buck, D. Henry.
Listemann, Fritz.
Dannreuther, Gustav.
Meisel, Carl.
Akeroyd, Julius.
Strauss, H.
Kuntz, Daniel.
Van Raalte, Albert.
Eichler, Carl.
Akeroyd, Vincent.
SECOND VIOLINS
Eichler, Julius.
Higgins, Charles F.
Trautmann, Carl.
Dorn, W.
Mullaly, Henry G.
Schuchmann, Frank E.
Oliver, F. A.
Proctor, J. B.
Hartmann, Hermann.
Haldemann, Harry.
Behr, John.
VIOLAS
Post, Louis.
Heindl, Henry.
Weintz, Charles J.
Beyer, Edward.
Schlimper, F. W.
Von Ette, Edward.
Eltz, Richard.
Tower, R. E.
Cutter, Benjamin.
Patz, G. A.
VIOLONCELLOS
Fries, Wulf.
Suck, August.
Bayrhoffer, Carl.
Heindl, Alex.
Behr, Carl.
Stockbridge, A. B.
Korth, Max.
Rietzel, W.
DOUBLE BASSES
Stein, August.
Greene, Henry A.
Steinmann, H.
Jennewein, Leonhard.
Butler, Herbert J.
Bletterman, John.
Flockton, John M.
Messerschmidt, August
FLUTES
Heindl, Edward M.
Fox, Paul.
OBOES
De Ribas, A. L.
Fischer, Paul.
CLARINETS
Strasser, Eustach.
Whitmore, O. A.
HORNS
Schormann, Edward.
Lippoldt, Louis.
Gumpricht, A.
Schumann, C.
BASSOONS
Eltz, Paul.
Regestein, Ernst.
CONTRA BASSOON
Hausknecht, Jean.
TRUMPETS
Bagley, E. M.
Bowron, Benjamin.
TROMBONES
Rigg, Albert.
Moore, David H.
Stewart, George W.
TUBA
Nichols, W. C.
TYMPANI
Simpson, H. D.
HARP
Freygang, Alex.

REDUCTION
RATIO
12x

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

Georg Henschel's Fifty Years: The Symphony's First

His Life and Work in the 80's and 90's

F orrow, on Oct. 31, 1862 years a all in Berlin that able record names and no circumstances that none happens to recite, Georg Henschel made his first appearance on any stage. He was a boy of twelve; he had come from his birthplace, Breslau; and he played the pianoforte. There record and recollection, so far as they are obtainable in Boston, cease. In this October of 1912, Mr. Henschel is a man of sixty-two, who has long lived in London and whose capacity for work the years have diminished little. Only the other day he was conducting at the Promenade Concerts there in the absence of Sir Henry Wood; he will sing in concerts in the course of the winter; and he has announced his usual song recitals. Were it not for the number of these engagements and for his preoccupations with his pupils, he might have returned this very season to sing again in the United States.

It is now six or nearly seven years since Boston has seen or heard Mr. Henschel; and he last conducted here as the guest of the Symphony Orchestra at one of its concerts for its Pension Fund. The youngest generation in our concert-rooms knows him only by much good report; the middle generation has heard him as singer and conductor, though hardly in his years with the Symphony Orchestra; the eldest generation knew and admired him then, and still earlier, when, with Lilian Bailey, his pupil and afterward his wife, he was beginning "The Henschel Concerts" of songs and duets. In those days, though he had no such established reputation as the succeeding thirty years have accumulated upon his head, he was a conspicuous, vital and well-liked figure in the musical life of this town. He himself, as he was in these eighties and as he came back to Boston for occasional visits in the nineties, deserves to be recalled in this hour of his jubilee. In an article that follows, Mr. Foote, the composer and Mr. Henschel's close friend from those days onward, has done so out of long and intimate recollections.

As it happens also the latest mail from England has brought an admirably supplementary article. As all Mr. Henschel's friends know, he has kept a journal these many years, from which he may some time compile and publish his recollections. In these anniversary days, he opened a few of its pages to Mr. Robin Legge, the reviewer of music for the Daily Telegraph in London. Mr. Legge was quick to make an article out of them and it follows herewith as a pendant to Mr. Foote's.

H. T. P.

His Work and Life in Boston

By Arthur Foote

THE decade 1880-1890 was musically of great significance in Boston in many ways, eminently because of the establishment of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gave a new life to things here and set a new standard. With the entrance of those concerts as the most important factor in our musical conditions Georg Henschel was identified; that such was the case was what people call accident, but it may be more truly described as the result of a chain of circumstances—and the latter it is worth while to relate. To do so is to recall concerts and persons that were dear to concert-goers of the twenty or more years from 1879 to 1901—that is, the Henschels.

The Connecting Link

In the seventies Lilian Bailey, with her family, was living in Boston, and the young girl, with her fresh, exquisite voice and keenly sensitive nature was soon to make a place for herself. Many of us remember the surprise at finding such art in one at the beginning of her career, and such instinctive feeling for the best and abhorrence of the commonplace in music. She also played the piano well, so that she would play her own accompaniment for a song such as Schubert's "Meine Ruh' ist hin,"—a thing as unusual then as it is now. Her first appearance of consequence was at one of a pair of concerts given by Mr. Lang in March, 1876, and it is interesting to note from the programme which follows that her career began just when the first music of Saint-Saëns and Tschaikowsky was being heard, and when Brahms (of whom Henschel was an intimate friend) was becoming known to us. Here is the programme:

Trio in F major........................St. Saëns
Mr. Lang, August Fries and Wulf Fries.
Aria: "Ritormerai fra poco"..............Hasse
Miss Lilian Bailey.
A group of piano pieces..........St. Saëns-Bach
Song: "Murmeln des Lüftchen...........Jensen
Concerto in B-flat minor...........Tschaikowsky
(With second piano.)

For a year or two she remained here, singing more and more in public (for instance in the Harvard Musical Association symphony concerts), but in 1878 went to Europe—first to Paris, where she studied with Madame Viardot, and the next year to England, where she became a pupil of Henschel.

The Henschels' Concerts

In England she sang a good deal at the best concerts, such as the Monday "Pops" (the famous chamber music concerts of the day), but before long returned to Boston, Henschel also coming, for his first visit to us. And now began the long series of concerts which lasted for twenty years, those concerts which they gave from San Francisco to St. Petersburg, that linger in the memory as the highest and most perfect expression of vocal recitals. She has always seemed to me the finest singing artist that we have produced; her voice was not large, but very beautiful and admirably trained; her passion for perfection led her all her life to the working towards her ideal; while her rare musical nature gave the rounding and finishing touch. Henschel himself was the great artist then that he is today; his singing of a picturesque song, such as Rubinstein's "Der Asra," of Löwe's ballades, of Brahms's songs and his own, is unforgettable. An intimate feeling was given to the whole through his playing the accompaniments, even for their duets—and wonderful playing it was. An example of their early programmes is the following, of January, 1881:

Aria ("Orfeo")............................Haydn
"Vieni o cara."—"Mi du speranza".......Händel
Mr. Henschel.
Nacht und Traüme.......................Schubert
Der Nussbaum ....Schumann
Lullaby ....Brahms
Miss Bailey.
Piano soli:
Nocturne in G.—Gavotte in C........Henschel
Mr. Henschel.
Duet: "O that we two were Maying"..Henschel
Miss Bailey and Mr. Henschel.
Minnelied .... Brahms
Der Asra .... Rubinstein
Widmung .... Franz
Ich grolle nicht........................Schumann
Mr. Henschel.
O, hush thee, my babie.—Sing Heigh-ho!..................................Henschel
Miss Bailey.
Songs from "Die schöne Müllerin"......Schubert
Mr. Henschel.

They also often sang in other concerts, as in Mr. Lang's production of Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust." They were married in March, 1881.

With the Symphony Orchestra

Now to come to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There had already been for sixteen years a series of about eight Thursday afternoon orchestral concerts, given by the Harvard Musical Association and conducted by Carl Zerrahn; at one of them, March 3, 1881, Henschel was asked to conduct a MS. Overture of his own, and from this came important consequences; for his conducting was so inspiring as to be without doubt the determining cause of his subsequent engagement as conductor of the new orchestra. There were, already to be sure, the concerts of the Harvard Musical Association, and those of the rival Philharmonic Orchestra (which had an existence of two or three years); but rumors were about the town of a projected new series of such concerts on a larger scale with more secure backing by some one—it was not known exactly who; although Mr. Higginson's name was connected with the scheme in some minds. This latter conjecture proved correct; for an announcement was shortly made that a series of concerts would be given in the next autumn by Mr. Higginson, with Mr. Henschel as conductor, on practically the same lines that are familiar to us now, i. e. that the players should be given contracts of such nature that their services would be entirely at the command of the conductor, adequate rehearsals being thus secured (for the first time in our experience.) And on Oct. 22,1881, the first concert was given, all musical people being on tip-toe with excitement; the success waas immediate, the programe being the following:

Georg Henschel in the Eighties

Overture: "Dedication of the House".Beethoven
Air from "Orpheus"........................Gluck
Miss Annie Louise Cary.
Symphony in B-flat major.................Haydn
Ballet: "Rosamunde"..................Schubert
Scene from "Odysseus"....................Bruch
Miss Cary.
Jubel-Ouverture .... Weber

The Harvard Musical Association tried one more year of concerts, but then abandoned the hopeless idea of competing with the stronger series, while for the same reason the Philharmonic Orchestra left the field free. Under Henschel the membership of the orchestra remained substantially the same as it had been with the other orchestras, being by no means of so high a grade as it is now, its practical reorganization occurring mainly under Gericke.

Mr. Henschel as Conductor

Henschel was then a man of about thirty, of striking and picturesque appearance, especially when sitting at the piano accompanying himself; in fact the portrait by Sargent gives a very just idea of him; he was a man of great interest and personality, of uncompromising ideals and contagious enthusiasm. He was just the one for the task; and it was by no means an easy one, nor was it a certainty that a constant and sure audience could be built up, so far as the past could give indication. The audiences of the other orchestral concerts had been dwindling, and it looked as if Boston was not dependable. To be sure, Mr. Higginson was as able as he was generous in his intention to back the expenses to any extent,—but would the public respond? Not unless the concerts were worth while and could interest people. They soon proved that both these things were the case, and the solid beginning of that remarkably successful undertaking was assured. For this the conductor was largely responsible, and the judgment of the founder of the concerts was justified. There is no doubt that one important factor was Henschel's skill in programme making: the orchestra might have played as well as it did, and he might have conducted as well,—if the concerts had bored people they would have failed. But (like Theodore Thomas) he cared about making fine, well-balanced and interesting programmes, and had the gift of knowing how, so that the keen interest with which the concerts started w as never lost, and when Gericke took ho d of them (in 1884) they were a fixed in tution. As an example of the lighter ort of programme that we sometimes ha

Tragic Overture .... Brahms
Air: "Giulio Cesare"... ....Händel
Mrs. He hel.
Symphony in G-minor.. ....Mozart
Two Slavonic Dances... ....Dvořák
Hymne au Créateur.... ....Henschel
- Mrs. He hel.
Overture: "Merry Wives Windsor"...Nicolai

Leaving and Returnin

During their stay i Boston the Henschels lived on Otis P ce in a house that became known for its charming and easy hospitality, and becau e sooner or later pretty nearly every vi itor to Boston who was worth while fou nd his way there, there were delightful little suppers after the Saturday night co ncerts where there was good talk too. Th e hosts had a very individual place in Bo ston society, apart from their professiona standing.

But after three year s Henschel felt the call of London; he be ieved that one can conduct at any perio in one's life, but that the singer must make the most of his youth (not forese ing that today, at 62, he would be singin g with all the success of his earlier year s,) and both he and his wife wished to si g much and often. There were twenty tim es the opportunities in Europe that could be found here, and it was obvious that s oner or later they must go back to re urn to us for occasional visits. Such was the case; they went back to London, eventually establishing themselves in the charming house in Bedford Gardens whic many Bostonians have known, and singi ng constantly from Rome to St. Petersburg, from Berlin to Paris, in those recitals that w e love to remember. Henschel also establishe d in London a series of London Symphony Concerts in 1886, which continued for a dozen years or so (that was before the days of London's present winter musical activity), also conducting the Scottish S ymphony Orchestra for some years, and w as active in teaching. Their home life (with their daughter Helen) was delightful, and their public career full and succe ssful, but the end was drawing near. n 1901 they were here again, and, in a concert on March 31 of that year, Hen schel produced his Stabat Mater, a very be autiful work which was deeply felt by th e audience. At its very close came the words "in Paradisi gloria," in which the l ovely voice of Mrs. Henschel soared abov e all in ineffable beauty. Those were t he last words that she sang in Boston, f or in November of that same year came her lamented and untimely death.

In memory of her H nschel composed a Requiem, a work of r al originality, and in the autumn of 1902 he came again to this country with his d aughter and wife's parents, so that there was an opportunity for its production by he Cecilia Society. He conducted himself his daughter being one of the soloists) and the Requiem made a strong impression, n t only on its own account, but because Mrs. Henschel had been so loved here as w ell as admired.

Lasting Work

It will be seen that Henschel's part in music here was an im portant one; years go by and the impress on of the moment fades; but all in Bosto n who were interested in music in those twenty years must still remember with ke n appreciation the importance of Henschel work in the early days of the Boston Sy mphony Orchestra and can never lose the ffectionate remembrance of the beautifu concerts of "The Henschels."

Pages fr m His Diary

By Robin Legge

ON Oct. 31, 18 , there appeared as pianist, i Berlin, a musician who for ver five and thirty years has een one of the most prominent musicia in England, the land of his adoption, I emphasise the fact of his being at fir a pianist because it is not at all as su established here: P ognize the personalit the celebrator of t sonated in England pheles, Boito's and fers, by Sullivan an Satan, by Sir Charl wrong, then let me lator, so to speak, i who in spite of his s as singer delighting ing to budding artist ty of style. The othe temporary possession ume of Mr. Hensch forty years, and a mi ment it is. It is fron I propose to quote s riences of Mr. Hens mous musicians with contact during his tury.

Adventure in Americ

It was the late the founder and dir Concerts, at one peri one, the most famous who was the first to i come to England. T 1877. He came, and h phatic and so imm longed that—well, h to remain, let us ho period there was a during which Dr. H tor of the Boston S I think he was actu tor of that now fam work there was ard profitable; yet so gre tor's yearning for end of his first eng the offer of a renew returned home. "I r Mr. Henschel, "while at which we were travels with the orc concert, being very a dusky waiter, a When I had finished the dusky gentleman my chair politely, an wished me every suc have been in the sho

A tale of Jenny me is told by Mr. H him by Jenny Lind it should be stated, singer as professor of Music. In 1850 gaged for a long tour of America by Bar showman on earth." appeared before aud but in America she pelled to sing in halls hold 8000, and even m and the like, were con concert-rooms in tow were not sufficiently la ance took place at C many thousands of im quently landed. Terri auditorium, Jenny Lin num her fears, and would have induced h binding her to sing in times as large as any i viously appeared. Now understand the singer' num, without a mome from his pocket the c Jenny Lind's signatu a thousand pieces, say me your lawyer tomor any contract he may me." By the way, I that it was on his ret the end of 1884, that M his London Symphony that puts him high in here.

New Tales of Rubinste

Here is another stor as told by Mr. Hensch dinner once at Mme.

l's Fifty Years: The Symphony's First Conductor exquisite voice and ture was soon to make Many of us remember ing such art in one at er career, and such in-or the best and abhoronplace in music. She iano well, so that she n accompaniment for a ubert's "Meine Ruh' ist unusual then as it is pearance of consequence air of concerts given by h, 1876, and it is intern the programme which areer began just when Saint-Saëns and Tschai-heard, and when Brahms was an intimate friend) wn to us. Here is the ..................St. Saëns

Fries and Wulf Fries. a poco"..............Hasse Lilian Bailey.
es.........St. Saëns–Bach
s Lüftchen...........Jensen inor...........Tschaikowsky second piano.)

two she remained here, more in public (for in-ard Musical Association
), but in 1878 went to aris, where she studied rdot, and the next year she became a pupil of ncerts sang a good deal at the as the Monday "Pops" iber music concerts of re long returned to Bos-o coming; for his first ow began the long series lasted for twenty years, ich they gave from San etersburg, that linger in e highest and most pervocal recitals. She has me the finest singing ave produced; her voice very beautiful and ader passion for perfection to the working towards ier rare musical nature

g and finishing touch.
was the great artist then his singing of a pictur-as Rubinstein's "Der ballades, of Brahms's n, is unforgettable. An was given to the whole ng the accompaniments, ets—and wonderful playexample of their early o following, of January,

......................Haydn
l du speranza".......Händel
r. Henschel.
....................Schubert
..................Schumann
....................Brahms
iss Bailey.
Gavotte in C.........Henschel
r. Henschel.
two were Maying"..Henschel y and Mr. Henschel.
.... Brahms
.... Rubinstein
.... Franz
...................Schumann
r. Henschel.
habie.—Sing Heigh-
.....................Henschel
iss Bailey.
chöne Müllerin"......Schubert
r. Henschel.

n sang in other concerts,
's production of Berlioz's Faust." They were mar-81.

ony Orchestra to the Boston Symphony re had already been for series of about eight noon orchestral concerts, arvard Musical Association by Carl Zerrahn; at one h 3, 1881, Henschel was t a MS. Overture of his this came important con-is conducting was so in-

Georg Henschel in the Eighties

spiring as to be without doubt the determining cause of his subsequent engagement as conductor of the new orchestra. There were, already to be sure, the concerts of the Harvard Musical Association, and those of the rival Philharmonic Orchestra (which had an existence of two or three years); but rumors were about the town of a projected new series of such concerts on a larger scale with more secure backing by some one—it was not known exactly who; although Mr. Higginson's name was connected with the scheme in some minds. This latter conjecture proved correct; for an announcement was shortly made that a series of concerts would be given in the next autumn by Mr. Higginson, with Mr. Henschel as conductor, on practically the same lines that are familiar to us now, i. e. that the players should be given contracts of such nature that their services would be entirely at the command of the conductor, adequate rehearsals being thus secured (for the first time in our experience.) And on Oct. 22,1881, the first concert was given, all musical people being on tip-toe with excitement; the success waas immediate, the programe being the following:

Overture: "Dedication of the House".Beethoven
Air from "Orpheus"......................Gluck
Miss Annie Louise Cary.
Symphony in B-flat major.................Haydn
Ballet: "Rosamunde"..................Schubert
Scene from "Odysseus"...................Bruch
Miss Cary.
Jubel-Ouverture .... Weber

The Harvard Musical Association tried one more year of concerts, but then abandoned the hopeless idea of competing with the stronger series, while for the same reason the Philharmonic Orchestra left the field free. Under Henschel the membership of the orchestra remained substantially the same as it had been with the other orchestras, being by no means of so high a grade as it is now, its practical reorganization occurring mainly under Gericke.

Mr. Henschel as Conductor

Henschel was then a man of about thirty, of striking and picturesque appearance, especially when sitting at the piano accompanying himself; in fact the portrait by Sargent gives a very just idea of him; he was a man of great interest and personality, of uncompromising ideals and contagious enthusiasm. He was just the one for the task; and it was by no means an easy one, nor was it a certainty that a constant and sure audience could be built up, so far as the past could give indication. The audiences of the other orchestral concerts had been dwindling, and it looked as if Boston was not dependable. To be sure, Mr. Higginson was as able as he was generous in his intention to back the expenses to any extent,—but would the public respond? Not unless the concerts were worth while and could interest people. They soon proved that both these things were the case, and the solid beginning of that remarkably successful undertaking was assured. For this the conductor was largely responsible, and the judgment of the founder of the concerts was justified. There is no doubt that one important factor was Henschel's skill in programme making: the orchestra might have played as well as it did, and he might have conducted as well,—if the concerts had bored people they would have failed. But (like Theodore Thomas) he cared about making fine, well-balanced and interesting programmes, and had the gift of knowing how, so that the keen interest with which the concerts started w[illegible]as never lost, and when Gericke took ho[illegible]d of them (in 1884) they were a fixed in[illegible]tution. As an example of the lighter [illegible]ort of programme that we sometimes had[illegible]

Tragic Overture ....[illegible]............ Brahms
Air: "Giulio Cesare"....[illegible]...........Händel
Mrs. He[illegible]hel.
Symphony in G-minor..[illegible]...........Mozart
Two Slavonic Dances....[illegible]..........Dvoràk
Hymne au Créateur....[illegible]..........Henschel
Mrs. He[illegible]hel.
Overture: "Merry Wives[illegible] Windsor"...Nicolai

Leaving and Returnin[illegible]

During their stay i[illegible] Boston the Henschels lived on Otis P[illegible]ce in a house that became known for its[illegible]charming and easy hospitality, and becau[illegible]e sooner or later pretty nearly every vi[illegible]itor to Boston who was worth while fou[illegible]nd his way there, there were delightful [illegible]little suppers after the Saturday night co[illegible]ncerts where there was good talk too. Th[illegible]e hosts had a very individual place in Bo[illegible]ston society, apart from their professional[illegible] standing.

But after three year[illegible]s Henschel felt the call of London; he be[illegible]lieved that one can conduct at any perio[illegible] in one's life, but that the singer must [illegible]make the most of his youth (not forese[illegible]ing that today, at 62, he would be singi[illegible]g with all the success of his earlier year[illegible]s,) and both he and his wife wished to si[illegible]g much and often. There were twenty tim[illegible]es the opportunities in Europe that could [illegible]be found here, and it was obvious that s[illegible]ooner or later they must go back to re[illegible]urn to us for occasional visits. Such [illegible]was the case; they went back to London, [illegible]eventually establishing themselves in the [illegible]charming house in Bedford Gardens whic[illegible] many Bostonians have known, and singi[illegible]ng constantly from Rome to St. Petersburg, [illegible]from Berlin to Paris, in those recitals that w[illegible]e love to remember. Henschel also establishe[illegible]d in London a series of London Symphony[illegible] Concerts in 1886, which continued for a[illegible]dozen years or so (that was before the [illegible]days of London's present winter musical [illegible]activity), also conducting the Scottish S[illegible]ymphony Orchestra for some years, and w[illegible]as active in teaching. Their home life ([illegible]with their daughter Helen) was delightful[illegible] and their public career full and succe[illegible]ssful, but the end was drawing near. [illegible]n 1901 they were here again, and, in a [illegible] concert on March 31 of that year, Hen[illegible]schel produced his Stabat Mater, a very be[illegible]autiful work which was deeply felt by th[illegible]e audience. At its very close came the [illegible]words "in Paradisi gloria," in which the [illegible]ovely voice of Mrs. Henschel soared abov[illegible]e all in ineffable beauty. Those were t[illegible]he last words that she sang in Boston, f[illegible]or in November of that same year came [illegible] her lamented and untimely death.

In memory of her H[illegible]enschel composed a Requiem, a work of r[illegible]eal originality, and in the autumn of 1902[illegible] he came again to this country with his [illegible]aughter and wife's parents, so that there [illegible]was an opportunity for its production by [illegible]he Cecilia Society. He conducted himself ([illegible]his daughter being one of the soloists) and[illegible] the Requiem made a strong impression, n[illegible]ot only on its own account, but because [illegible]Mrs. Henschel had been so loved here as w[illegible]ell as admired.

Lasting Work

It will be seen that [illegible]Henschel's part in music here was an im[illegible]portant one; years go by and the impress[illegible]ion of the moment fades; but all in Bosto[illegible]n who were interested in music in those [illegible]twenty years must still remember with ke[illegible]n appreciation the importance of Henschel[illegible]s work in the early days of the Boston S[illegible]mphony Orchestra and can never lose the [illegible]ffectionate remembrance of the beautifu[illegible] concerts of "The Henschels."

Pages fr[illegible]m Hi[illegible] Diary

By Robin [illegible] Legge

On Oct. 31, 18[illegible], there appeared as pianist, i[illegible] Berlin, a musician who for [illegible]ver five and thirty years has [illegible]een one of the most prominent musici[illegible]s in England, the land of his adoption. [illegible]I emphasise the fact of his being at firs[illegible]a pianist because it is not at all as such that his fame was established here. Perhaps some will recognize the personality from the fact that the celebrator of the jubilee has impersonated in England alone two Mephistopheles, Boito's and Berlioz's; two Lucifers, by Sullivan and Rubinstein, and one Satan, by Sir Charles Stanford. If I am wrong, then let me say that the Jubilator, so to speak, is Dr. Georg Henschel, who in spite of his sixty-two years is still as singer delighting audiences and affording to budding artists an example of beauty of style. The other day I came into the temporary possession of a manuscript volume of Mr. Henschel's reminiscences of forty years, and a mighty interesting document it is. It is from this manuscript that I propose to quote some tales of the experiences of Mr. Henschel, and of many famous musicians with whom he has come in contact during his career of half a century.

Adventure in America

It was the late Mr. Arthur Chappell, the founder and director of the Popular Concerts, at one period, and that a lengthy one, the most famous concerts we possessed, who was the first to induce Mr. Henschel to come to England. That was in February 1877. He came, and his success was so emphatic and so immediate and so prolonged that—well, here he still is, long to remain, let us hope! But, during this period there was a gap of three seasons during which Dr. Henschel was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; I think he was actually the first conductor of that now famous institution. The work there was arduous, but it was also profitable; yet so great was the conductor's yearning for Europe that at the end of his first engagement he declined the offer of a renewal for five years, and returned home. "I remember once," says Mr. Henschel, "while at dinner in a hotel at which we were staying during our travels with the orchestra, just before a concert, being very carefully watched by a dusky waiter, and wondered why. When I had finished and got up to leave, the dusky gentleman-in-waiting removed my chair politely, and with a broad grin wished me every success, adding, 'I, too, have been in the show business myself.' "

A tale of Jenny Lind that is new to me is told by Mr. Henschel, as related to him by Jenny Lind herself. Mr. Henschel, it should be stated, succeeded the great singer as professor at the Royal College of Music. In 1850 Jenny Lind was engaged for a long tour of the United States of America by Barnum, "the greatest showman on earth." In Europe she had appeared before audiences of, say, 2000; but in America she found herself compelled to sing in halls that would (and did) hold 8000, and even more. Railway stations and the like, were converted into temporary concert-rooms in towns where the latter were not sufficiently large. Her first appearance took place at Castle Garden, where many thousands of immigrants have subsequently landed. Terrified at the enormous auditorium, Jenny Lind mentioned to Barnum her fears, and declared that nothing would have induced her to sign a contract binding her to sing in places three or four times as large as any in which she had previously appeared. Nowadays it is easy to understand the singer's surprise when Barnum, without a moment's hesitation, took from his pocket the contract on which was Jenny Lind's signature, and tore it into a thousand pieces, saying, "Madame, send me your lawyer tomorrow, and I will sign any contract he may care to submit to me." By the way, I should have stated that it was on his return from Boston, at the end of 1884, that Mr. Henschel founded his London Symphony Concerts—an act that puts him high in the list of pioneers here.

New Tales of Rubinstein

Here is another story that is new to me, as told by Mr. Henschel: "I remember a dinner once at Mme. Schumann's in Berlin, when Anton Rubinstein entertained us with the story of his experiences in America, whence he had just returned after a tour of 215 concerts in eight months—there were no Sunday concerts then. Somewhere out in the wild and woolly West, about an hour before the concert, a man thrust his head into Rubinstein's room and said, 'Say, boss, don't you think it's time to have your face blacked?' 'O', cried Mme. Schumann, 'you didn't, did you?' "

Another story is of a luncheon party that met at the Golden Goose at Breslau on the morning of the day on which Rubinstein and Henschel were to join forces in an important concert. "We seated ourselves at the large table in the middle of the room," says Mr. Henschel, "at the other end of which was the only other guest in the room—a locally well-known amateur musician, an army surgeon by profession. Our party consisted of Rubinstein, Constantin Sander (a famous publisher), and myself. We had just begun our lunch when from the other end of the room came in stentorian tones from the surgeon the question, 'I say, Sander, how did you like Tausig the other day?' Sander, by nature a shy, meek little man, got red in the face and was still composing a polite reply when the irrepressible surgeon trumpeted forth this, 'Well, I can only tell you that, compared with Tausig, Rubinstein is no more than a mere threshing-flail.' " In Germany this expression implies more than the ancient agricultural implement; it indicates a particularly ill-mannered, uncouth and rude person. A hideous silence followed; we dropped our soup spoons in consternation, and suddenly the surgeon realized in whose presence he was. But Rubinstein sat quite unmoved. 'Pray pay no attention to this; a public man must not mind such things, and, to tell you the truth, I rather like them!' was all he said."

A.d of Liszt Also

I hope Mr. Henschel may be induced one day to amplify his "Recollections," for they are very vivid, and the manuscript before me is a veritable human document. There seems to have been no musician of any note in his career with whom he was not on terms of friendship. He first met Liszt at Altenburg. There, at a meeting of the Algemeiner Tonkünstler Verein, Liszt was the chief figure. Following on this meeting, Henschel paid a long visit to Weimar, where Liszt was then living, daily holding a kind of court. On one occasion, when Mr. Henschel was present, there were among the company Rubinstein, Tausig and Hans von Bülow. Imagine the effect on a young man of eighteen on hearing on one evening four of the greatest pianists the world has ever known! They are all gone, but, says Mr. Henschel, the memory of that evening can never fade. On another occasion Liszt pointed out to Henschel a small parcel he had received the day before from Wagner, which was lying on a table. This he gave to the singer. Before an eager crowd present, "I opened the parcel," says Henschel, "and discovered it to be the score, just then published, of 'Die Walküre.' 'Allons, donc,' said Liszt, 'mon cher, chantons Les Adieux de Wotan.' Liszt seated himself at the piano, and I, leaning over him, sang that grand finale for the first time!" And at sight!

A Hint of More

' There is a good story of old Moscheles, who, explaining to Henschel, then his pupil, that when composing he heard in his head all that he was writing, said: "When I wrote my concert with three kettledrums I came to a tutti which I wanted rather fully scored. Well, will you believe it, I heard that tutti and all those instruments whilst I was writing, so distinctly and clearly in my mind's ear that—that I got a headache!" I have said nothing about Mr. Henschel's great friendship with Brahms. The details in a far ampler form than in the manuscript I have here have already been given to the world. Nor have I space to cite many more experiences of this accomplished and versatile artist. I hope he will give them all to the world, for they are in many cases of great historic interest.

His Life and Work in the 80's and 90's

F[illegible]orrow, on Oct. 31, 1862 [illegible] years [illegible] small in Berlin that ng [illegible]able record names and circumstances that none happens to recite, Georg Henschel made [illegible] first appearance on any stage. [illegible] a boy of twelve; he had come from his birthplace, Breslau; and he played the pianoforte. There record and recollection, so far as they are obtainable in Boston, cease. In this October of 1912, Mr. Henschel is a man of sixty-two, who has long lived in London and whose capacity for work the years have diminished little. Only the other day he was conducting at the Promenade Concerts there in the absence of Sir Henry Wood; he will sing in concerts in the course of the winter; and he has announced his usual song recitals. Were it not for the number of these engagements and for his preoccupations with his pupils, he might have returned this very season to sing again in the United States.

It is now six or nearly seven years since Boston has seen or heard Mr. Henschel; and he last conducted here as the guest of the Symphony Orchestra at one of its concerts for its Pension Fund. The youngest generation in our concert-rooms knows him only by much good report; the middle generation has heard him as singer and conductor, though hardly in his years with the Symphony Orchestra; the eldest generation knew and admired him then, and still earlier, when, with Lilian Bailey, his pupil and afterward his wife, he was beginning "The Henschel Concerts" of songs and duets. In those days, though he had no such established reputation as the succeeding thirty years have accumulated upon his head, he was a conspicuous, vital and well-liked figure in the musical life of this town. He himself, as he was in these eighties and as he came back to Boston for occasional visits in the nineties, deserves to be recalled in this hour of his jubilee. In an article that follows, Mr. Foote, the composer and Mr. Henschel's close friend from those days onward, has done so out of long and intimate recollections.

As it happens also the latest mail from England has brought an admirably supplementary article. As all Mr. Henschel's friends know, he has kept a journal these many years, from which he may some time compile and publish his recollections. In these anniversary days, he opened a few of its pages to Mr. Robin Legge, the reviewer of music for the Daily Telegraph in London. Mr. Legge was quick to make an article out of them and it follows herewith as a pendant to Mr. Foote's.

H. T. P.

His Work and Life in Boston

By Arthur Foote

THE decade 1880-1890 was musically of great significance in Boston in many ways, eminently because of the establishment of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gave a new life to things here and set a new standard. With the entrance of those concerts as the most important factor in our musical conditions Georg Henschel was identified; that such was the case was what people call accident, but it may be more truly described as the result of a chain of circumstances—and the latter it is worth while to relate. To do so is to recall concerts and persons that were dear to concert-goers of the twenty or more years from 1879 to 1901—that is, the Henschels.

The Connecting Link

In the seventies Lilian Bailey, with her family, was living in Boston, and the young [illegible] exquisite voice and keenly sensitive nature was soon to make a place for herself. Many of us remember the surprise at finding such art in one at the beginning of her career, and such instinctive feeling for the best and abhorrence of the commonplace in music. She also played the piano well, so that she would play her own accompaniment for a song such as Schubert's "Meine Ruh' ist hin,"—a thing as unusual then as it is now. Her first appearance of consequence was at one of a pair of concerts given by Mr. Lang in March, 1876, and it is interesting to note from the programme which follows that her career began just when the first music of Saint-Saëns and Tschaikowsky was being heard, and when Brahms (of whom Henschel was an intimate friend) was becoming known to us. Here is the programme:

Trio in F major..............................St. Saëns
Mr. Lang, August Fries and Wulf Fries.
Aria: "Ritormerai, fra poco"..............Hasse
Miss Lilian Bailey.
A group of piano pieces..........St. Saëns-Bach
Song: "Murmeln des Lüftchen...........Jensen
Concerto in B-flat minor...........Tschaikowsky
(With second piano.)

For a year or two she remained here, singing more and more in public (for instance in the Harvard Musical Association symphony concerts), but in 1878 went to Europe—first to Paris, where she studied with Madame Viardot, and the next year to England, where she became a pupil of Henschel.

The Henschels' Concerts

In England she sang a good deal at the best concerts, such as the Monday "Pops" (the famous chamber music concerts of the day), but before long returned to Boston, Henschel also coming, for his first visit to us. And now began the long series of concerts which lasted for twenty years, those concerts which they gave from San Francisco to St. Petersburg, that linger in the memory as the highest and most perfect expression of vocal recitals. She has always seemed to me the finest singing artist that we have produced; her voice was not large, but very beautiful and admirably trained; her passion for perfection led her all her life to the working towards her ideal; while her rare musical nature gave the rounding and finishing touch. Henschel himself was the great artist then that he is today; his singing of a picturesque song, such as Rubinstein's "Der Asra," of Löwe's ballades, of Brahms's songs and his own, is unforgettable. An intimate feeling was given to the whole through his playing the accompaniments, even for their duets—and wonderful playing it was. An example of their early programmes is the following, of January, 1881:

Aria ("Orfeo")............................Haydn
"Vieni o cara."—"Mi du speranza".......Händel
Mr. Henschel.
Nacht und Traüme.........................Schubert
Der Nussbaum ....Schumann
Lullaby ....Brahms
Miss Bailey.
Piano soli:
Nocturne in G.—Gavotte in C........Henschel
Mr. Henschel.
Duet: "O that we two were Maying"..Henschel
Miss Bailey and Mr. Henschel.
Minnelied .... Brahms
Der Asra .... Rubinstein
Widmung .... Franz
Ich grolle nicht........................Schumann
Mr. Henschel.
O, hush thee, my babie.—Sing Heigh-ho!.....................................Henschel
Miss Bailey.
Songs from "Die schöne Müllerin"......Schubert
Mr. Henschel.

They also often sang in other concerts, as in Mr. Lang's production of Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust." They were married in March, 1881.

With the Symphony Orchestra

Now to come to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There had already been for sixteen years a series of about eight Thursday afternoon orchestral concerts, given by the Harvard Musical Association and conducted by Carl Zerrahn; at one of them, March 3, 1881, Henschel was asked to conduct a MS. Overture of his own, and from this came important consequences; for his conducting was so inspiring as to be without doubt the determining cause of his subsequent engagement as conductor of the new orchestra. There were, already to be sure, the concerts of the Harvard Musical Association, and those of the rival Philharmonic Orchestra (which had an existence of two or three years); but rumors were about the town of a projected new series of such concerts on a larger scale with more secure backing by some one—it was not known exactly who; although Mr. Higginson's name was connected with the scheme in some minds. This latter conjecture proved correct; for an announcement was shortly made that a series of concerts would be given in the next autumn by Mr. Higginson, with Mr. Henschel as conductor, on practically the same lines that are familiar to us now, i. e. that the players should be given contracts of such nature that their services would be entirely at the command of the conductor, adequate rehearsals being thus secured (for the first time in our experience.) And on Oct. 22,1881, the first concert was given, all musical people being on tip-toe with excitement; the success waas immediate, the programe being the following:

Overture: "Dedication of the House".Beethoven
Air from "Orpheus"......................Gluck
Miss Annie Louise Cary.
Symphony in B-flat major.................Haydn
Ballet: "Rosamunde"..................Schubert
Scene from "Odysseus"...................Bruch
Miss Cary.
Jubel-Ouverture .... Weber

The Harvard Musical Association tried one more year of concerts, but then abandoned the hopeless idea of competing with the stronger series, while for the same reason the Philharmonic Orchestra left the field free. Under Henschel the membership of the orchestra remained substantially the same as it had been with the other orchestras, being by no means of so high a grade as it is now, its practical reorganization occurring mainly under Gericke.

Mr. Henschel as Conductor

Henschel was then a man of about thirty, of striking and picturesque appearance, especially when sitting at the piano accompanying himself; in fact the portrait by Sargent gives a very just idea of him; he was a man of great interest and personality, of uncompromising ideals and contagious enthusiasm. He was just the one for the task; and it was by no means an easy one, nor was it a certainty that a constant and sure audience could be built up, so far as the past could give indication. The audiences of the other orchestral concerts had been dwindling, and it looked as if Boston was not dependable. To be sure, Mr. Higginson was as able as he was generous in his intention to back the expenses to any extent,—but would the public respond? Not unless the concerts were worth while and could interest people. They soon proved that both these things were the case, and the solid beginning of that remarkably successful undertaking was assured. For this the conductor was largely responsible, and the judgment of the founder of the concerts was justified. There is no doubt that one important factor was Henschel's skill in programme making: the orchestra might have played as well as it did, and he might have conducted as well,—if the concerts had bored people they would have failed. But (like Theodore Thomas) he cared about making fine, well-balanced and interesting programmes, and had the gift of knowing how, so that the keen interest with which the concerts started was never lost, and when Gericke took hold of them (in 1884) they were a fixed institution. As an example of the lighter sort of programme that we sometimes had:

Tragic Overture ....Brahms
Air: "Giulio Cesare"......................Händel
Mrs. Henschel.
Symphony in G-minor.........................Mozart
Two Slavonic Dances..........................Dvorák
Hymne au Créateur..........................Henschel
Mrs. Henschel.
Overture: "Merry Wives of Windsor"...Nicolai

Leaving and Returning

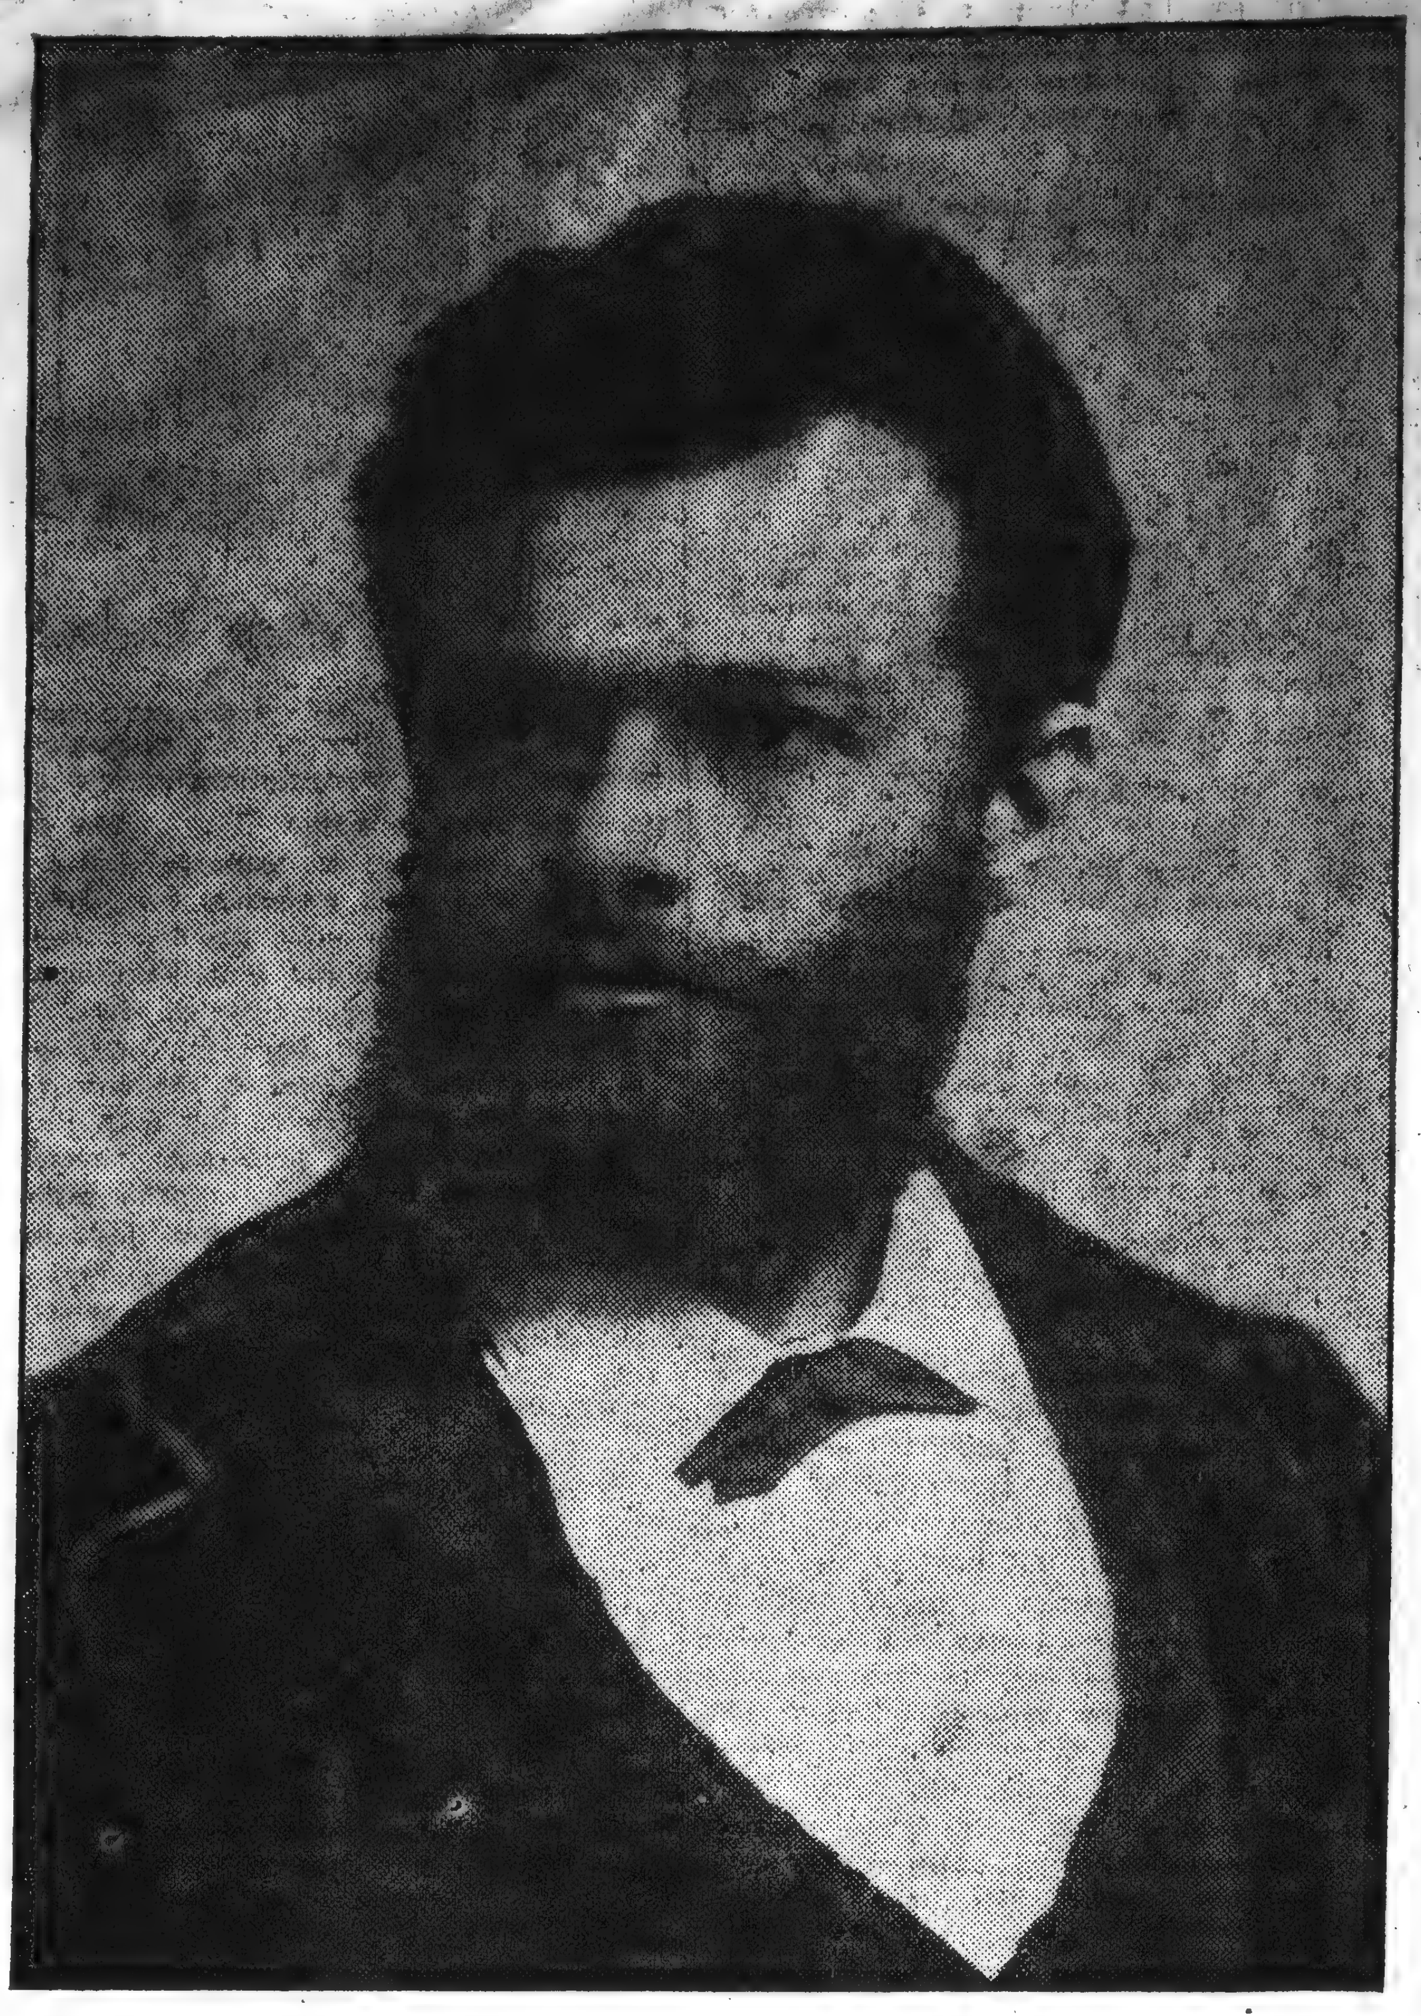
During their stay in Boston the Henschels lived on Otis Place in a house that became known for its charming and easy hospitality, and because sooner or later pretty nearly every visitor to Boston who was worth while found his way there, there were delightful little suppers after the Saturday night concerts where there was good talk too. The hosts had a very individual place in Boston society, apart from their professional standing.

But after three years Henschel felt the call of London; he believed that one can conduct at any period in one's life, but that the singer must make the most of his youth (not foreseeing that today, at 62, he would be singing with all the success of his earlier years,) and both he and his wife wished to sing much and often. There were twenty times the opportunities in Europe that could be found here, and it was obvious that sooner or later they must go back, to return to us for occasional visits. Such was the case; they went back to London, eventually establishing themselves in the charming house in Bedford Gardens which many Bostonians have known, and singing constantly from Rome to St. Petersburg, from Berlin to Paris, in those recitals that we love to remember. Henschel also established in London a series of London Symphony Concerts in 1886, which continued for a dozen years or so (that was before the days of London's present winter musical activity), also conducting the Scottish Symphony Orchestra for some years, and was active in teaching. Their home life (with their daughter Helen) was delightful, and their public career full and successful, but the end was drawing near. In 1901 they were here again, and, in a concert on March 31 of that year, Henschel produced his Stabat Mater, a very beautiful work which was deeply felt by the audience. At its very close came the words "in Paradisi gloria," in which the lovely voice of Mrs. Henschel soared above all in ineffable beauty. Those were the last words that she sang in Boston, for in November of that same year came her lamented and untimely death.

In memory of her Henschel composed a Requiem, a work of real originality, and in the autumn of 1902 he came again to this country with his daughter and wife's parents, so that there was an opportunity for its production by the Cecilia Society. He conducted himself (his daughter being one of the soloists) and the Requiem made a strong impression, not only on its own account, but because Mrs. Henschel had been so loved here as well as admired.

Lasting Work

It will be seen that Henschel's part in music here was an important one; years go by and the impression of the moment fades; but all in Boston who were interested in music in those twenty years must still remember with keen appreciation the importance of Henschel's work in the early days of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and can never lose the affectionate remembrance of the beautiful concerts of "The Henschels."



Georg Henschel in the Eighties

Pages from His Diary

By Robin [illegible] Legge

ON Oct. 31, 18[illegible], there appeared as pianist, in Berlin, a musician who for over five and thirty years has been one of the most prominent musicians in England, the land of his adoption. I emphasize the fact of his being at first a pianist because it is not at all as such established here. Perha ognize the personality the celebrator of the sonated in England alo pheles, Boito's and Be fers, by Sullivan and R Satan, by Sir Charles wrong, then let me sa lator, so to speak, is D who in spite of his sixty as singer delighting aud ing to budding artists an ty of style. The other da temporary possession of ume of Mr. Henschel's forty years, and a mighty ment it is. It is from th
I propose to quote some riences of Mr. Henschel, mous musicians with wh contact during his care tury.

Adventure in America

It was the late Mr.
the founder and directo
Concerts, at one period, one, the most famous con who was the first to indu come to England. That 1877. He came, and his s phatic and so immedi longed that—well, here to remain, let us hope!
period there was a gap during which Dr. Hens tor of the Boston Sym
I think he was actually tor of that now famous work there was arduou profitable; yet so great tor's yearning for Eu end of his first engage the offer of a renewal f returned home. "I reme Mr. Henschel, "while at at which we were sta travels with the orches concert, being very care a dusky waiter, and When I had finished and the dusky gentleman-in my chair politely, and w wished me every succes have been in the show b

A tale of Jenny Lind me is told by Mr. Hensc him by Jenny Lind hers it should be stated, suc singer as professor at of Music. In 1850 Jen gaged for a long tour of of America by Barnun showman on earth." In appeared before audienc but in America she fo pelled to sing in halls tha hold 8000, and even more.
and the like, were convert concert-rooms in towns were not sufficiently large. ance took place at Castl many thousands of immig quently landed. Terrified auditorium, Jenny Lind m num her fears, and decla would have induced her binding her to sing in pla times as large as any in w viously appeared. Nowada understand the singer's s num, without a moment's from his pocket the contr
Jenny Lind's signature, a thousand pieces, saying me your lawyer tomorrow any contract he may ca me." By the way, I sh that it was on his return the end of 1884, that Mr.
his London Symphony that puts him high in th here.

New Tales of Rubinstein

Here is another story t as told by Mr. Henschel:
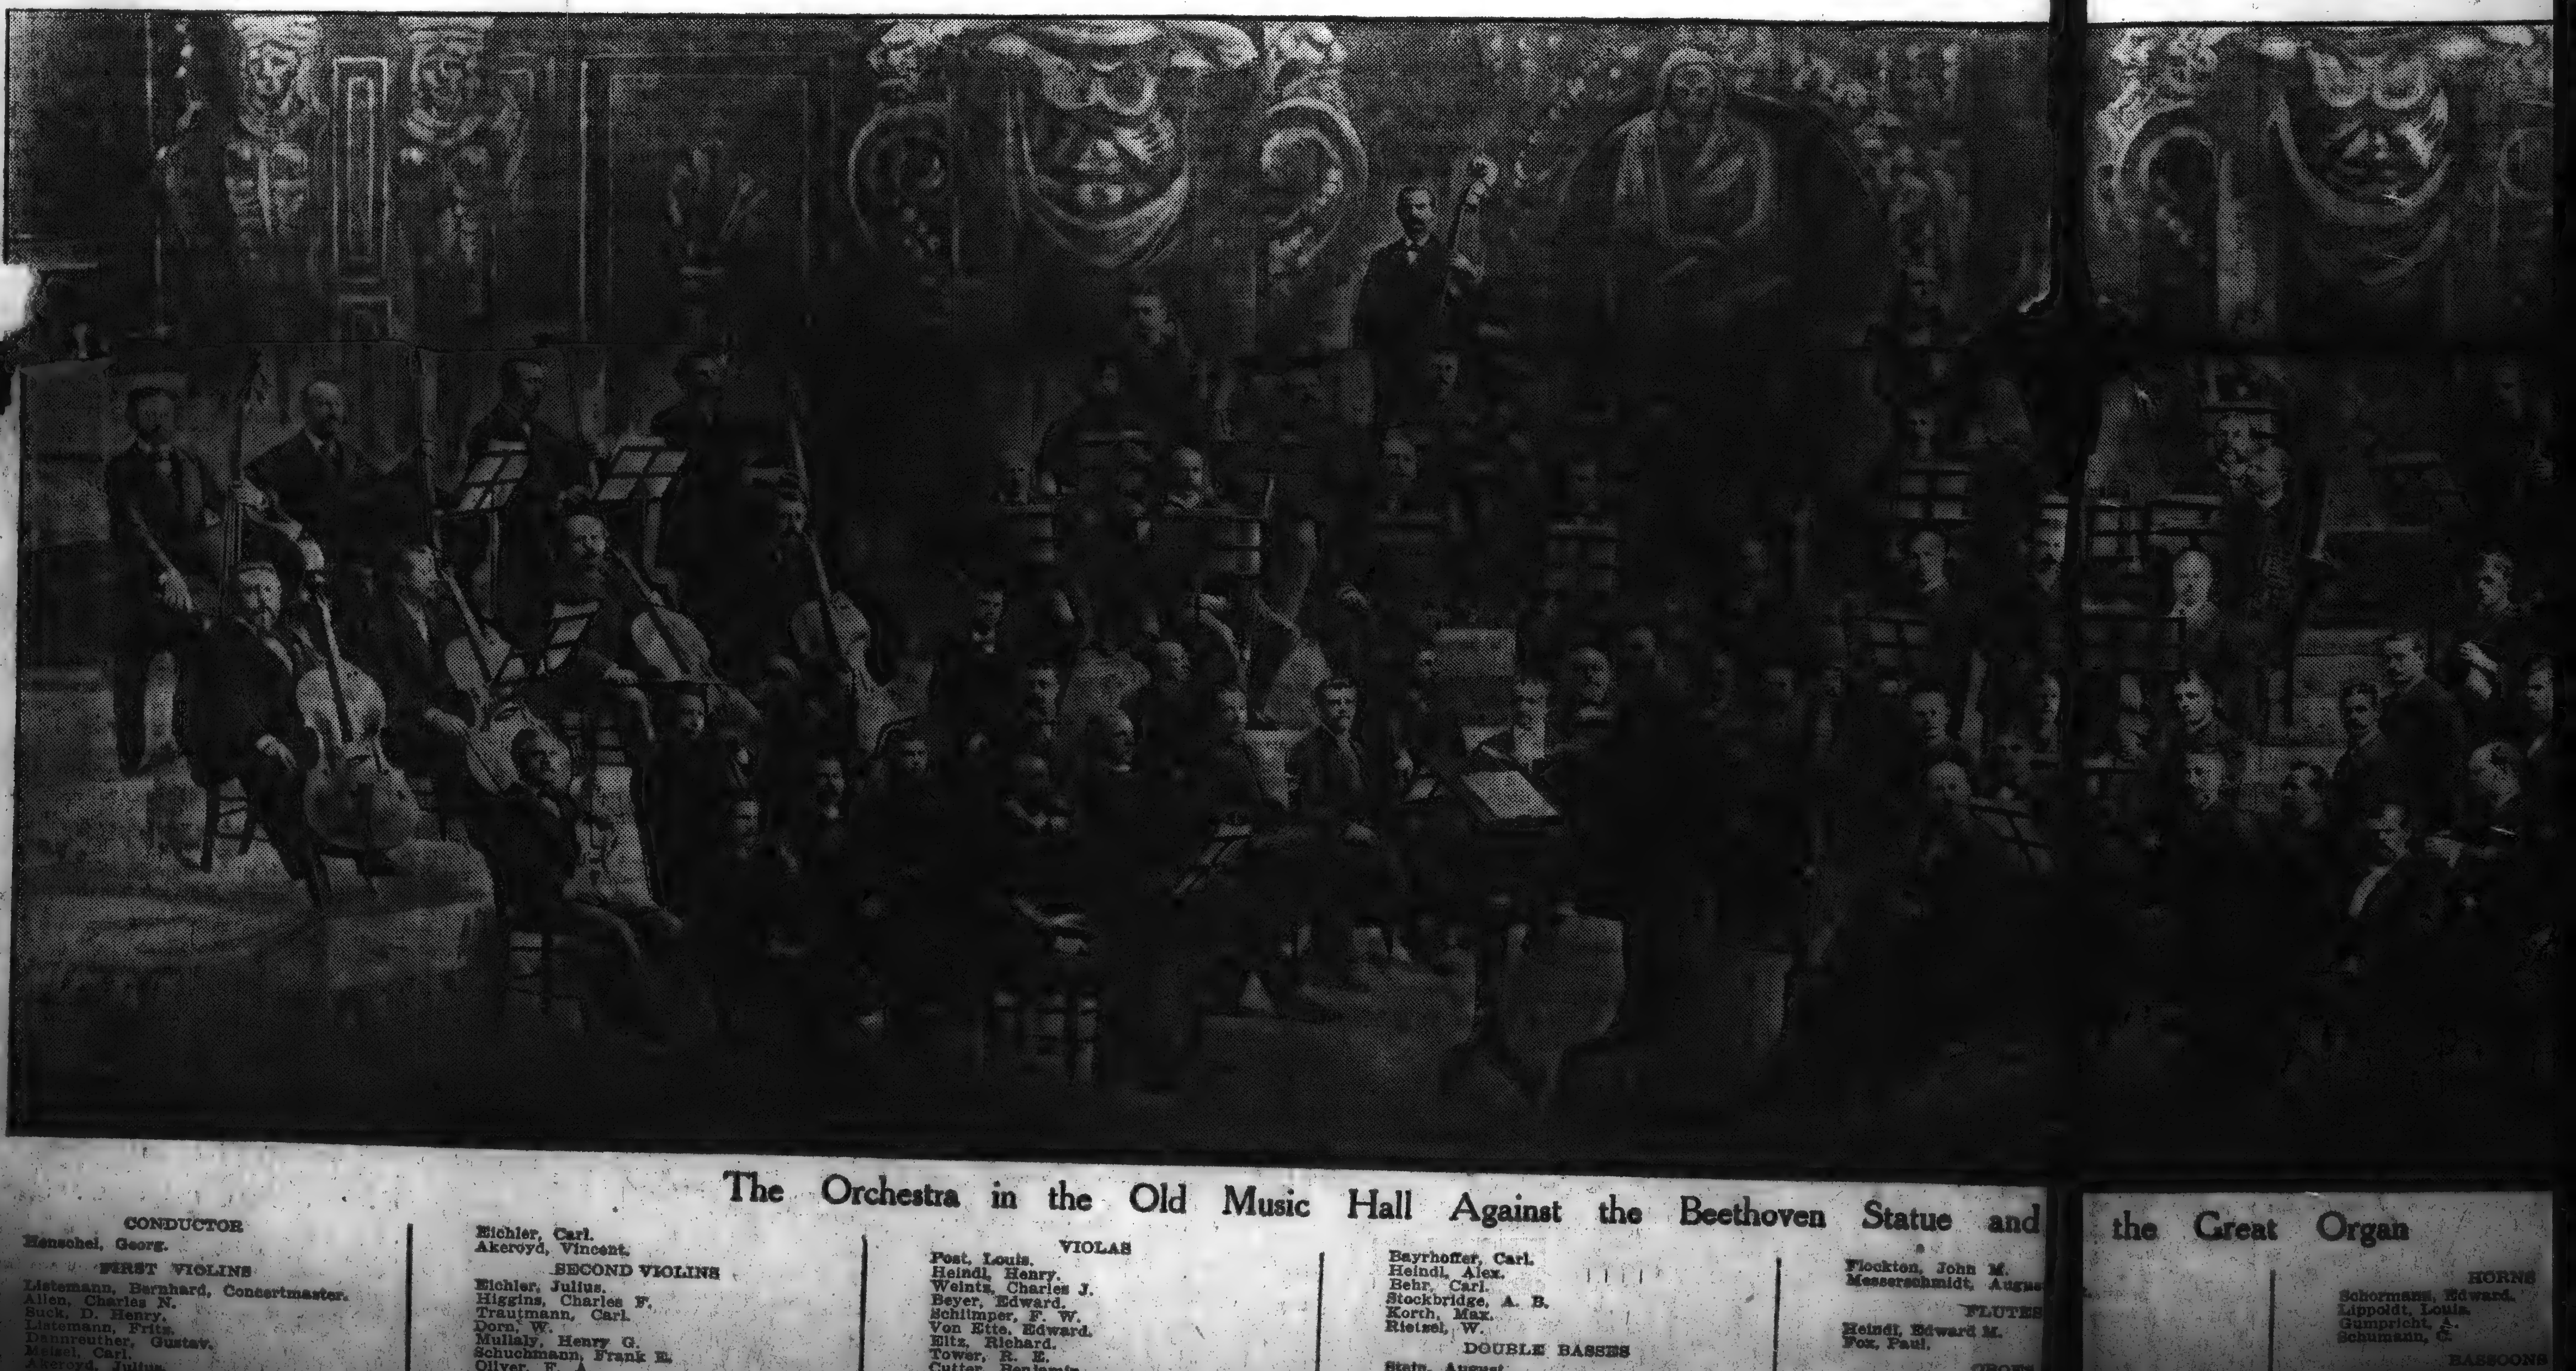
dinner once at Mme. Sc



The Orchestra in the Old Music Hall Against the Beethoven Statue and the Great Organ

CONDUCTOR
Henschel, Georg.

FIRST VIOLINS
Listemann, Bernhard, Concertmaster.
Allen, Charles N.
Suck, D. Henry.
Listemann, Fritz.
Dannreuther, Gustav.
Meisel, Carl.
Akeroyd, Julius.
Strauss, H.
Kuntz, Daniel.
Van Raalte, Albert.
Eichler, Carl.
Akeroyd, Vincent.

SECOND VIOLINS
Eichler, Julius.
Higgins, Charles F.
Trautmann, Carl.
Dorn, W.
Mullaly, Henry G.
Schuchmann, Frank E.
Oliver, F. A.
Proctor, J. B.
Hartmann, Hermann.
Haldemann, Harry.
Behr, John.

VIOLAS
Post, Louis.
Heindl, Henry.
Weintz, Charles J.
Beyer, Edward.
Schlimper, F. W.
Von Ette, Edward.
Eltz, Richard.
Tower, R. E.
Cutter, Benjamin.
Patz, G. A.

VIOLONCELLOS
Fries, Wulf.
Suck, August.
Bayrhoffer, Carl.
Heindl, Alex.
Behr, Carl.
Stockbridge, A. B.
Korth, Max.
Rietzel, W.

DOUBLE BASSES
Stein, August.
Greene, Henry A.
Steinmann, H.
Jennewein, Leonhard.
Butler, Herbert J.
Bletterman, John.
Flockton, John M.
Messerschmidt, August.

FLUTES
Heindl, Edward M.
Fox, Paul.

OBOES
De Ribas, A. L.
Fischer, Paul.

CLARINETS
Strasser, Eustach.
Whitmore, O. A.

HORNS
Schormann, Edward.
Lippoldt, Louis.
Gumpricht, A.
Schumann, C.

BASSOONS
Eltz, Paul.
Regestein, Ernst.

CONTRA BASS
Hausknecht, Jean.

TRUMPET
Bagley, E. M.

exquisite voice and ensitive nature was soon to make for herself. Many of us remember prise at finding such art in one at inning of her career, and such in- feeling for the best and abhor- f the commonplace in music. She ayed the piano well, so that she play her own accompaniment for a ch as Schubert's "Meine Ruh' ist thing as unusual then as it is Her first appearance of consequence one of a pair of concerts given by ng in March, 1876, and it is inter- o note from the programme which that her career began just when t music of Saint-Saëns and Tschai- was being heard, and when Brahms m Henschel was an intimate friend) coming known to us. Here is the mme:

F major..........St. Saëns
Lang, August Fries and Wulf Fries.
"Ritormerai fra poco"..........Hasse
Miss Lilian Bailey.
of piano pieces..........St. Saëns–Bach Murmeln des Lüftchen..........Jensen in B-flat minor..........Tschaikowsky
(With second piano.)

a year or two she remained here, more and more in public (for in- in the Harvard Musical Association ny concerts), but in 1878 went to —first to Paris, where she studied adame Viardot, and the next year land, where she became a pupil of el.

enschels' Concerts ngland she sang a good deal at the ncerts, such as the Monday "Pops" mous chamber music concerts of y), but before long returned to Bos- enschel also coming, for his first us. And now began the long series erts which lasted for twenty years, concerts which they gave from San sco to St. Petersburg, that linger in mory as the highest and most per- pression of vocal recitals. She has seemed to me the finest singing that we have produced; her voice t large, but very beautiful and ad- trained; her passion for perfection all her life to the working towards eal; while her rare musical nature the rounding and finishing touch. hel himself was the great artist then e is today; his singing of a pictur- song, such as Rubinstein's "Der of Löwe's ballades, of Brahms's and his own, is unforgettable. An te feeling was given to the whole h his playing the accompaniments, or their duets—and wonderful play was. An example of their early mmes is the following, of January,

"Orfeo")..........Haydn
o cara."—"Mi du speranza"..........Händel
Mr. Henschel.
und Traüme..........Schubert ssbaum..........Schumann
..........Brahms
Miss Bailey.
oli:
rne in G.—Gavotte in C..........Henschel
Mr. Henschel.
"O that we two were Maying"..Henschel
Miss Bailey and Mr. Henschel. ed..........Brahms ra..........Rubinstein ng..........Franz lle nicht..........Schumann
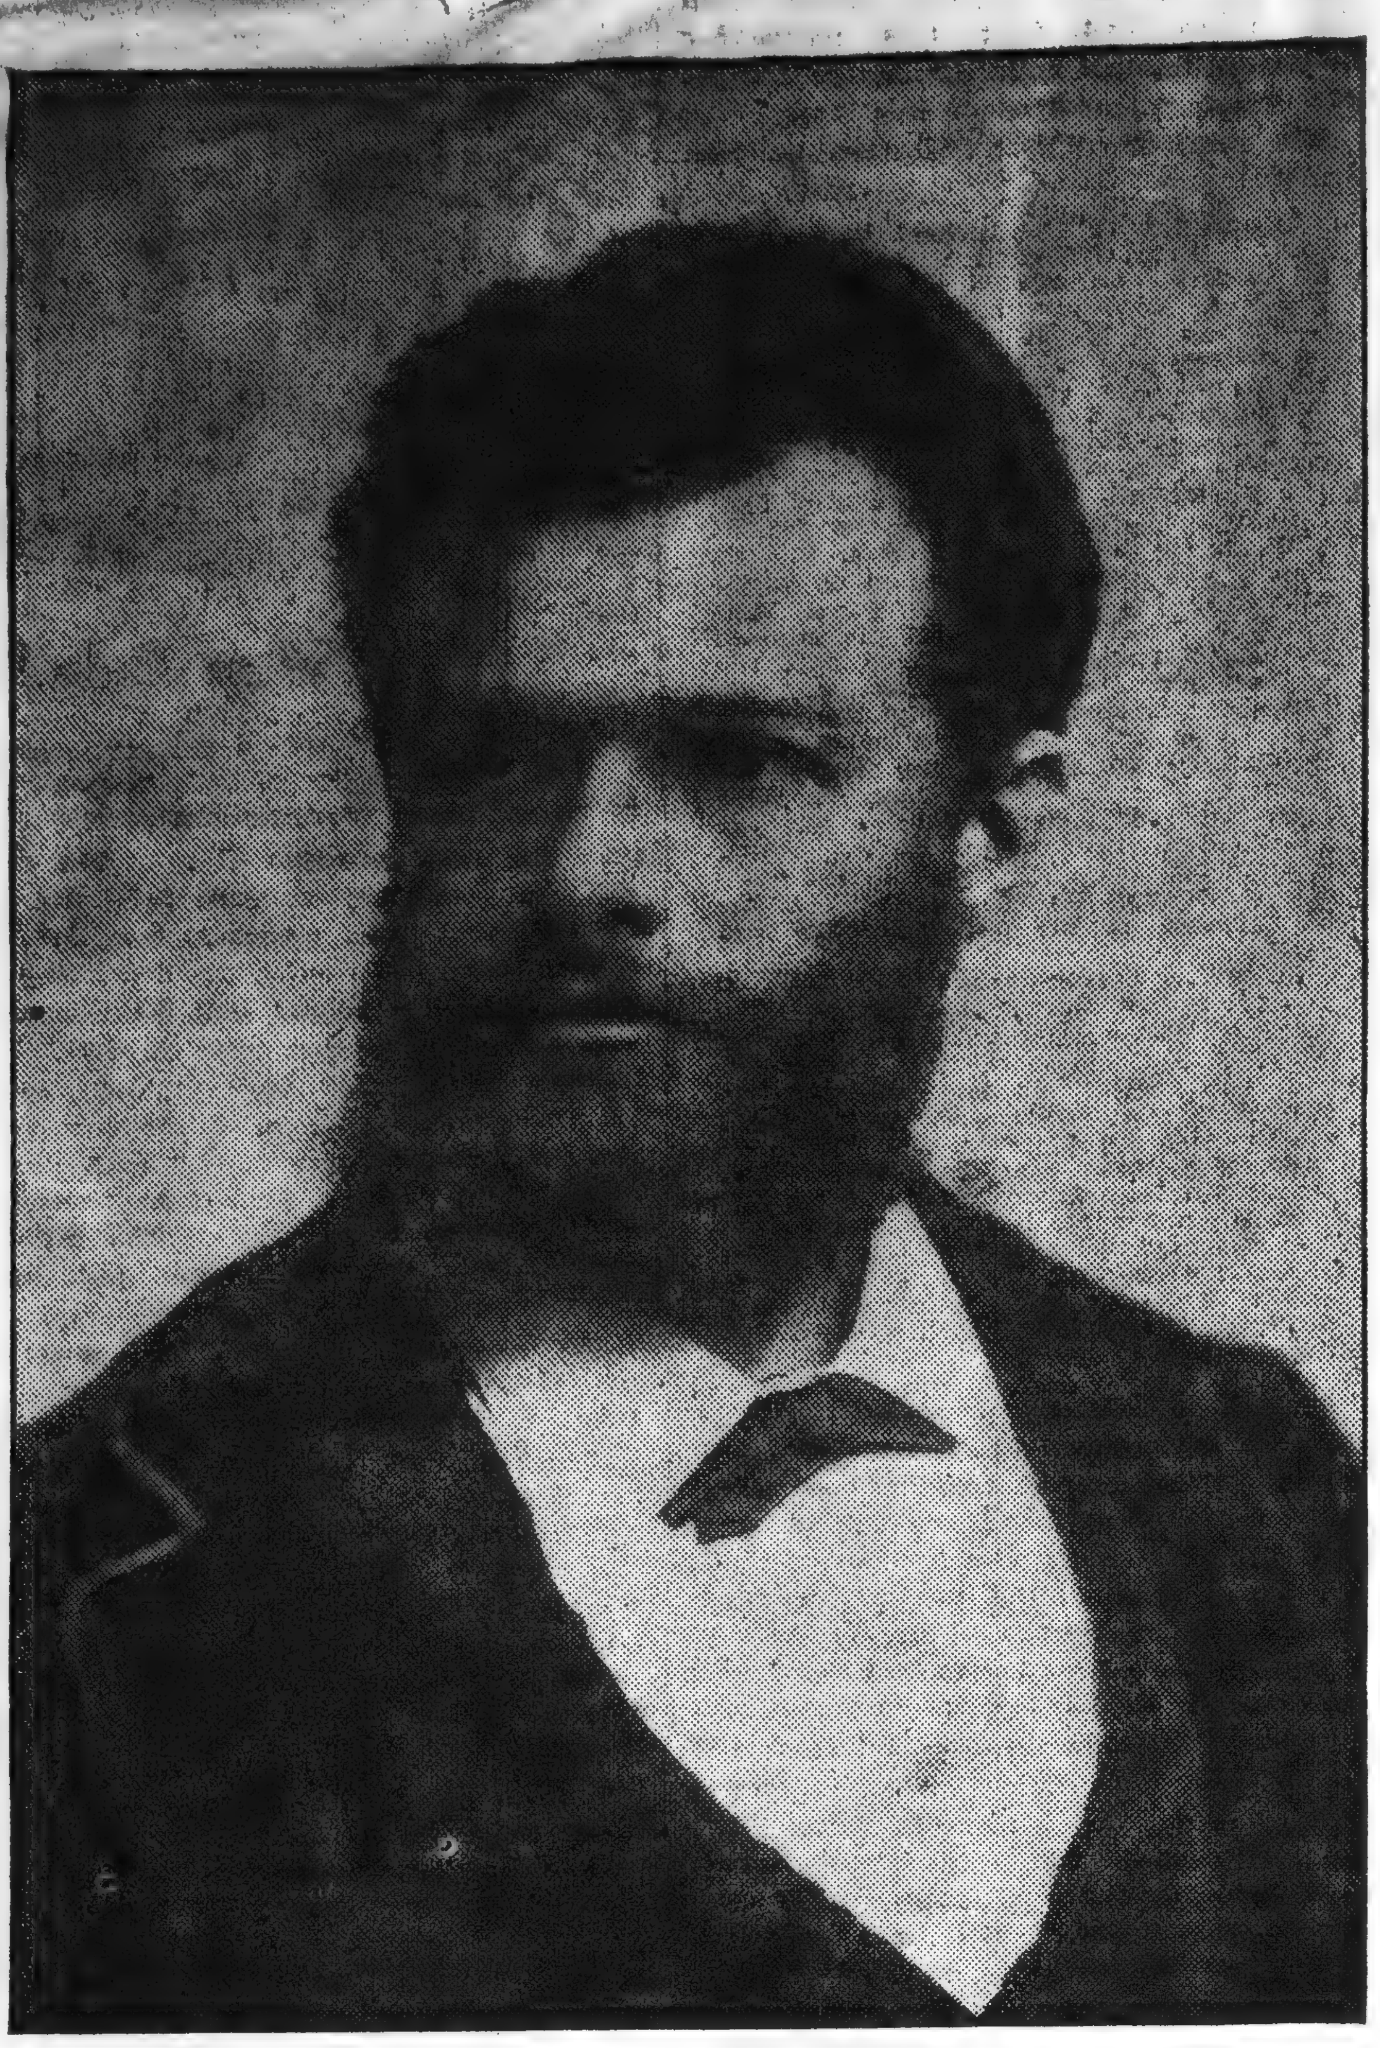
Mr. Henschel.
h thee, my babie.—Sing Heigh-
..........Henschel
Miss Bailey.
rom "Die schöne Müllerin"..........Schubert
Mr. Henschel.

also often sang in other concerts, Mr. Lang's production of Berlioz's nation de Faust." They were mar- March, 1881.

the Symphony Orchestra

to come to the Boston Symphony stra. There had already been for n years a series of about eight day afternoon orchestral concerts, by the Harvard Musical Association conducted by Carl Zerrahn; at one hem, March 3, 1881, Henschel was to conduct a MS. Overture of his and from this came important con- nces; for his conducting was so inspiring as to be without doubt the determining cause of his subsequent engagement as conductor of the new orchestra. There were, already to be sure, the concerts of the Harvard Musical Association, and those of the rival Philharmonic Orchestra (which had an existence of two or three years); but rumors were about the town of a projected new series of such concerts on a larger scale with more secure backing by some one—it was not known exactly who; although Mr. Higginson's name was connected with the scheme in some minds. This latter conjecture proved correct; for an announcement was shortly made that a series of concerts would be given in the next autumn by Mr. Higginson, with Mr. Henschel as conductor, on practically the same lines that are familiar to us now, i. e. that the players should be given contracts of such nature that their services would be entirely at the command of the conductor, adequate rehearsals being thus secured (for the first time in our experience.) And on Oct. 22,1881, the first concert was given, all musical people being on tip-toe with excitement; the success waas immediate, the programe being the following:



Georg Henschel in the Eighties

Overture: "Dedication of the House"..Beethoven
Air from "Orpheus"..........Gluck
Miss Annie Louise Cary.
Symphony in B-flat major..........Haydn
Ballet: "Rosamunde"..........Schubert
Scene from "Odysseus"..........Bruch
Miss Cary.
Jubel-Ouverture..........Weber

The Harvard Musical Association tried one more year of concerts; but then abandoned the hopeless idea of competing with the stronger series, while for the same reason the Philharmonic Orchestra left the field free. Under Henschel the membership of the orchestra remained substantially the same as it had been with the other orchestras, being by no means of so high a grade as it is now, its practical reorganization occurring mainly under Gericke.

Mr. Henschel as Conductor

Henschel was then a man of about thirty, of striking and picturesque appearance, especially when sitting at the piano accompanying himself; in fact the portrait by Sargent gives a very just idea of him; he was a man of great interest and personality, of uncompromising ideals and contagious enthusiasm. He was just the one for the task; and it was by no means an easy one, nor was it a certainty that a constant and sure audience could be built up, so far as the past could give indication. The audiences of the other orchestral concerts had been dwindling, and it looked as if Boston was not dependable. To be sure, Mr. Higginson was as able as he was generous in his intention to back the expenses to any extent,—but would the public respond? Not unless the concerts were worth while and could interest people. They soon proved that both these things were the case, and the solid beginning of that remarkably successful undertaking was assured. For this the conductor was largely responsible, and the judgment of the founder of the concerts was justified. There is no doubt that one important factor was Henschel's skill in programme making: the orchestra might have played as well as it did, and he might have conducted as well,—if the concerts had bored people they would have failed. But (like Theodore Thomas) he cared about making fine, well-balanced and interesting programmes, and had the gift of knowing how, so that the keen interest with which the concerts started when Gericke took ho they were a fixed in ample of the lighter that we sometimes had Tragic Overture ....

Air: "Giulio Cesare"..........
Mrs. He
Symphony in G-minor..
Two Slavonic Dances..
Hymne au Créateur....
Mrs. He Overture: "Merry Wives

Leaving and Returnin

During their stay schels lived on Otis P became known for its hospitality, and beca pretty nearly every v was worth while fo there were delightful the Saturday night was good talk too. individual place in B from their professiona

But after three yea call of London; he b conduct at any perio that the singer must his youth (not fores 62, he would be singi cess of his earlier yea his wife wished to si There were twenty tin in Europe that could it was obvious that must go back to re casional visits. Such went back to London, ing themselves in the Bedford Gardens whi have known, and sing Rome to St. Petersburg, in those recitals that Henschel also establish of London Symphony which continued for (that was before the present winter musica ducting the Scottish for some years, and ing. Their home life Helen) was delightfu career full and succ was drawing near. here again, and, in 31 of that year, He Stabat Mater, a very was deeply felt by t very close came the gloria," in which the Henschel soared abo beauty. Those were she sang in Boston, that same year cam untimely death.

In memory of her Requiem, a work of in the autumn of 190 this country with his parents, so that there for its production by He conducted himself one of the soloists) an a strong impression, account, but because been so loved here as

Lasting Work

It will be seen tha music here was an i go by and the impres fades; but all in Bos ested in music in thos still remember with k importance of Hensche days of the Boston S and can never lose the brance of the beautifu Henschels."

as never lost, and d of them (in 1884) tution. As an ex- ort of programme

..........Brahms
..........Händel
hel.
..........Mozart
..........Dvorák
..........Henschel
hel.
Windsor"...Nicolai

Boston the Hen- ce in a house that charming and easy e sooner or later itor to Boston who nd his way there, little suppers after ncerts where there e hosts had a very ston society, apart standing.

s Henschel felt the ieved that one can in one's life, but make the most of ing that today, at g with all the suc- s,) and both he and g much and often. es the opportunities be found here, and ooner or later they urn to us for oc- was the case; they ventually establish- charming house in many Bostonians ng constantly from rom Berlin to Paris, e love to remember. d in London a series Concerts in 1886, dozen years or so days of London's activity), also con- ymphony Orchestra as active in teach- with their daughter and their public ssful, but the end n 1901 they were concert on March schel produced his autiful work which e audience. At its words "in Paradisi ovely voice of Mrs. e all in ineffable he last words that r in November of her lamented and nschel composed a al originality, and he came again to aughter and wife's was an opportunity he Cecilia Society. his daughter being the Requiem made t only on its own Mrs. Henschel had ell as admired.

Henschel's part in portant one; years on of the moment n who were inter- twenty years must n appreciation the work in the early mphony Orchestra fectionate remem- concerts of "The Pages fr m

Hi Diary

By Robin . Legge

On Oct. 31, 1 as pianist, i cian who for ty years has most prominent music land of his adoption fact of his being at fir there appeared Berlin, a musi- ver five and thir- een one of the s in England, the I emphasize the a pianist because it is not at all as such that his fame was established here. Perhaps some will recognize the personality from the fact that the celebrator of the jubilee has impersonated in England alone two Mephistopheles, Boito's and Berlioz's; two Lucifers, by Sullivan and Rubinstein, and one Satan, by Sir Charles Stanford. If I am wrong, then let me say that the Jubilator, so to speak, is Dr. Georg Henschel, who in spite of his sixty-two years is still as singer delighting audiences and affording to budding artists an example of beauty of style. The other day I came into the temporary possession of a manuscript volume of Mr. Henschel's reminiscences of forty years, and a mighty interesting document it is. It is from this manuscript that I propose to quote some tales of the experiences of Mr. Henschel, and of many famous musicians with whom he has come in contact during his career of half a century.

Adventure in America

It was the late Mr. Arthur Chappell, the founder and director of the Popular Concerts, at one period, and that a lengthy one, the most famous concerts we possessed, who was the first to induce Mr. Henschel to come to England. That was in February 1877. He came, and his success was so emphatic and so immediate and so prolonged that—well, here he still is, long to remain, let us hope! But, during this period there was a gap of three seasons during which Dr. Henschel was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; I think he was actually the first conductor of that now famous institution. The work there was arduous, but it was also profitable; yet so great was the conductor's yearning for Europe that at the end of his first engagement he declined the offer of a renewal for five years, and returned home. "I remember once," says Mr. Henschel, "while at dinner in a hotel at which we were staying during our travels with the orchestra, just before a concert, being very carefully watched by a dusky waiter, and wondered why. When I had finished and got up to leave, the dusky gentleman-in-waiting removed my chair politely, and with a broad grin wished me every success, adding, 'I, too, have been in the show business myself.' "

A tale of Jenny Lind that is new to me is told by Mr. Henschel, as related to him by Jenny Lind herself. Mr. Henschel, it should be stated, succeeded the great singer as professor at the Royal College of Music. In 1850 Jenny Lind was engaged for a long tour of the United States of America by Barnum, "the greatest showman on earth." In Europe she had appeared before audiences of, say, 2000; but in America she found herself compelled to sing in halls that would (and did) hold 8000, and even more. Railway stations and the like, were converted into temporary concert-rooms in towns where the latter were not sufficiently large. Her first appearance took place at Castle Garden, where many thousands of immigrants have subsequently landed. Terrified at the enormous auditorium, Jenny Lind mentioned to Barnum her fears, and declared that nothing would have induced her to sign a contract binding her to sing in places three or four times as large as any in which she had previously appeared. Nowadays it is easy to understand the singer's surprise when Barnum, without a moment's hesitation, took from his pocket the contract on which was Jenny Lind's signature, and tore it into a thousand pieces, saying, "Madame, send me your lawyer tomorrow, and I will sign any contract he may care to submit to me." By the way, I should have stated that it was on his return from Boston, at the end of 1884, that Mr. Henschel founded his London Symphony Concerts—an act that puts him high in the list of pioneers here.

New Tales of Rubinstein

Here is another story that is new to me, as told by Mr. Henschel: "I remember a dinner once at Mme. Schumann's in Berlin, when Anton Rubinstein entertained us with the story of his experiences in America, whence he had just returned after a tour of 215 concerts in eight months—there were no Sunday concerts then. Somewhere out in the wild and woolly West, about an hour before the concert, a man thrust his head into Rubinstein's room and said, 'Say, boss, don't you think it's time to have your face blacked?' 'O', cried Mme. Schumann, 'you didn't, did you?' "

Another story is of a luncheon party that met at the Golden Goose at Breslau on the morning of the day on which Rubinstein and Henschel were to join forces in an important concert. "We seated ourselves at the large table in the middle of the room," says Mr. Henschel, "at the other end of which was the only other guest in the room—a locally well-known amateur musician, an army surgeon by profession. Our party consisted of Rubinstein, Constantin Sander (a famous publisher), and myself. We had just begun our lunch when from the other end of the room came in stentorian tones from the surgeon the question, 'I say, Sander, how did you like Tausig the other day?' Sander, by nature a shy, meek little man, got red in the face and was still composing a polite reply when the irrepressible surgeon trumpeted forth this, 'Well, I can only tell you that, compared with Tausig, Rubinstein is no more than a mere threshing-flail.' " In Germany this expression implies more than the ancient agricultural implement; it indicates a particularly ill-mannered, uncouth and rude person. A hideous silence followed; we dropped our soup spoons in consternation, and suddenly the surgeon realized in whose presence he was. But Rubinstein sat quite unmoved. 'Pray pay no attention to this; a public man must not mind such things, and, to tell you the truth, I rather like them!' was all he said."

And of Liszt Also

I hope Mr. Henschel may be induced one day to amplify his "Recollections," for they are very vivid, and the manuscript before me is a veritable human document. There seems to have been no musician of any note in his career with whom he was not on terms of friendship. He first met Liszt at Altenburg. There, at a meeting of the Algemeiner Tonkünstler Verein, Liszt was the chief figure. Following on this meeting, Henschel paid a long visit to Weimar, where Liszt was then living, daily holding a kind of court. On one occasion, when Mr. Henschel was present, there were among the company Rubinstein, Tausig and Hans von Bülow. Imagine the effect on a young man of eighteen on hearing on one evening four of the greatest pianists the world has ever known! They are all gone, but, says Mr. Henschel, the memory of that evening can never fade. On another occasion Liszt pointed out to Henschel a small parcel he had received the day before from Wagner, which was lying on a table. This he gave to the singer. Before an eager crowd present, "I opened the parcel," says Henschel, "and discovered it to be the score, just then published, of 'Die Walküre.' 'Allons, donc,' said Liszt, 'mon cher, chantons Les Adieux de Wotan.' Liszt seated himself at the piano, and I, leaning over him, sang that grand finale for the first time!" And at sight!

A Hint of More

There is a good story of old Moscheles, who, explaining to Henschel, then his pupil, that when composing he heard in his head all that he was writing, said: "When I wrote my concert with three kettledrums I came to a tutti which I wanted rather fully scored. Well, will you believe it, I heard that tutti and all those instruments whilst I was writing, so distinctly and clearly in my mind's ear that—that I got a headache!" I have said nothing about Mr. Henschel's great friendship with Brahms. The details in a far ampler form than in the manuscript I have here have already been given to the world. Nor have I space to cite many more experiences of this accomplished and versatile artist. I hope he will give them all to the world, for they are in many cases of great historic interest.

The Orchestra in the Old Music Hall Against the Beethoven Statue and the Great Organ er, Carl.

oyd, Vincent.
SECOND VIOLINS
es, Julius.
ins, Charles F. tmann, Carl.
, W. aly, Henry G.
chmann, Frank E.
er, F. A.
tor, J. B.
rmann, Hermann. lemann, Harry.
r, John.

VIOLAS
Post, Louis.
Heindl, Henry.
Weintz, Charles J.
Beyer, Edward.
Schlimper, F. W.
Von Etts, Edward.
Eltz, Richard.
Tower, R. E.
Cutter, Benjamin.
Patz, G. A.
VIOLONCELLOS
Fries, Wulf.
Suck, August.

Bayrhoffer, Carl.
Heindl, Alex.
Behr, Carl.
Stockbridge, A. B.
Korth, Max.
Rietzel, W.
DOUBLE BASSES
Stein, August.
Greene, Henry A.
Steinmann, H.
Jennewein, Leonhard.
Butler, Herbert J.
Bletterman, John.

Flockton, John M.
Messerschmidt, August.
FLUTES
Heindl, Edward M.
Fox, Paul.
OBOES
De Ribas, A. L.
Fischer, Paul.
CLARINETS
Strasser, Eustach.
Whitmore, O. A.

HORNS
Schormann, Edward.
Lippoldt, Louis.
Gumpricht, A.
Schumann, C.
BASSOONS
Eltz, Paul.
Regestein, Ernst.
CONTRA BASSOON
Hausknecht, Jean.
TRUMPETS
Bagley, E. M.

Bowron, Benjamin.
TROMBONES
Rigg, Albert.
Moore, David H.
Stewart, George W.
TUBA
Nichols, W. C.
TYMPANI
Simpson, H. D.
HARP
Freygang, Alex.

Georg

His Life and Work in the 80's and 90's

keenly sensitive natu
a place for b
the 1912 - 1913

SEPTEMBER 7, 1912.

SYMPHONY SEASON TO OPEN OCT. 11

Auction Sale of Season Tickets to Begin Monday, Sept. 30.

The regular Symphony season will open with the usual public rehearsal and concert Friday afternoon, Oct. 11, and Saturday evening, Oct. 12. The auction sales of season tickets will begin Monday, Sept. 30, and continue Tuesday, Thursday and Friday of that week.

Dr. and Mrs. Muck are to sail from Bremen Sept. 24 and will arrive here the following week. Dr. Muck formally severed his connection with the Berlin opera last May. After conducting the Lower Rhenish musical festivals at Aachen he went to Bayreuth, there preparing the "Parsifal" performances and conducting the greater part of them. At present he is at his summer home.

The prospects for a successful season in Boston are very gratifying. The return of Dr. Muck seems to have aroused an unusual amount of interest, and while under the system of the sale of tickets by auction it is impossible to make any estimates, all indications now seem to point to one of the largest sales in the history of the orchestra.

GLOBE—SEPTEMBER 8.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Dr Muck's Return a Feature.

Will Conduct This Season for the Symphony.

The most interesting feature of the Symphony season, which will open Oct 11 and 12, is the return of Dr Muck as conductor, after an absence of four years. As was announced last Spring, Dr Muck was finally released from his engagement in Berlin, where he had been conductor of the Opera for the past 20 years, and was able to fulfill his promise to return to Boston as soon as this had been brought about. Dr Muck left Berlin last May under most unusual conditions.

His farewell performances at the Opera had not been announced as such, but the word passed around and the Opera House was filled to its utmost capacity by his enthusiastic admirers. As he began his engagement in Berlin at the Berlin Royal Opera, conducting "Tristan and Isolde," so he ended it. Contrary to the general usage in Germany, where, so far as the public is concerned, the conductor in a performance of opera is taken rather as a matter of course, on his last night in Berlin Dr Muck was the star and the singers were lost in the ovation given to him.

Following on the heels of this came an extraordinary occurrence. The question of his having been allowed to leave Berlin was brought up first in the Prussian Diet and a few days later in the German Reichstag, and was made in both houses the subject of very bitter debate. That the intendant of the Royal Opera had allowed Boston to secure Dr Muck made him the subject of attack in the Parliament, and judging from the discussion going on during the past Summer in Germany, Dr Muck's leaving Berlin promises to bring about a revolution in the management of the Imperial Theatres. For once the accusation was not made that "the almighty dollar of America" was the lure that brought the distinguished musician to Boston, but because he would have greater opportunity to express his artistic ideals than is given to any conductor in Germany.

Dr and Mrs Muck sail for this country on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie on Sept 24, arriving in Boston a week later. They intend going at once to housekeeping in an apartment on Commonwealth av. Since leaving Berlin Dr Muck has conducted the great Lower Rhenish festivals in Aachen and has prepared the performance of "Parsifal" in Bayreuth, conducting the greater part of them. At the present he is in his country home at Doblbad-bei-Gras, Steuermark.

The usual auction sale of tickets will occur at the end of this month. The rehearsal tickets will be sold Monday, Sept 30, and Tuesday, Oct 1, and the concert tickets Thursday, Oct 3 and Friday, Oct 4.

SEPTEMBER 14,
ADVERTISER.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

When the Symphony Orchestra assembles for its first rehearsal on Monday morning, Oct. 7, it will contain a number of new members, because at the end of last season there were several of the oldest members retired from active work and several others have gone into other fields. There will be two changes in the first violins, William Krafft and Henry Eicheim having retired. In place of Mr. Eicheim Dr. Muck has engaged Maurice Koessler, who for the past several years has been at the second desk of the first violins in the Royal Opera, Berlin.

Among those who have retired from the ranks of the second violins is Mr. Carl Barleben, who was the leader of this section for many years. In his place Dr. Muck has engaged Mr. Walther Habenichl, who for the past several seasons has been first concert-master of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Kiel, Germany.

Messrs. Alwin Schroeder, Arthur Hadley and Ralph Smalley have retired from the 'cello section. The first desk of the 'cellos will be shared by Warnke with Otto Urack. Mr. Urack has for the last several seasons been 'cello soloist of the Bayreuth Festival Orchestra.

The return of Dr. Muck has stimulated interest in the orchestra beyond all expectation. For the five Thursday night concerts in New York less than 100 seats, scattered throughout the house, have not been taken by subscription. For the first time every box in Carnegie Hall has been sold for these concerts.

JOURNAL—

SEPTEMBER 14,

Record Symphony Season Promised

The return of Dr. Muck has stimulated interest in the Symphony Orchestra beyond all expectations. For the five Thursday night concerts in New York less than 100 seats scattered throughout the house have not been taken by subscription. For the first time every box in Carnegie Hall has been sold for these concerts. For the Saturday afternoon concerts there are a few over 100 seats that have not yet been taken by subscription, and to counterbalance these there are more than enough applications now on file to sell every one of them.

No condition comparable to this has been recorded in the history of music in this country, and from reports that are coming in from other cities where the orchestra gives a series of concerts, similar state of affairs is promised.

[illegible] prospectus of the Boston season [illegible] published in The Journal ne[illegible] week.

HERALD. SEPTEMBER 8.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The return of Dr. Muck, as conductor, after four years absence is the most interesting feature of the season of the Symphony Orchestra, which will open Friday afternoon, Oct. 11, and Saturday evening, Oct. 12. Dr. Muck was finally released from his engagement in Berlin, where he had been conductor of the Opera for the past 20 years. His farewell performances at the Opera had not been announced as such but there were rumors to that effect and the Opera House was filled by enthusiastic admirers. He began and ended his engagement at the Berlin Royal Opera with "Tristan and Isolde."

The question of his leaving Berlin was brought up first in the Prussian Diet and a few days later in the German Reichstag. In both houses it was the subject of debate. That the Intendant of the Royal Opera had allowed Boston to secure Dr. Muck made him the subject of attack in the Parliament. Dr. Muck's leaving Berlin promises to bring about a revolution in the management of the Imperial Theatres. The accusation was not made that financial considerations brought the distinguished musician to Boston but it was generally agreed that he came because here he would have greater opportunity to express his artistic ideals than is given to any conductor in Germany. Dr. and Mrs. Muck sail for this country Sept. 24, arriving in Boston a week later. They will go at once to their apartment on Commonwealth avenue. Since leaving Berlin Dr. Muck has conducted the great Lower Rhenish Festivals in Aachen and has prepared the performances of "Parsifal" in Bayreuth, conducting the greater part of them.

The usual Auction Sales of tickets will come at the end of this month. The Rehearsal tickets will be sold Monday, Sept. 30 and Tuesday, Oct. 1, and the Concert tickets, Thursday, Oct. 3 and Friday, Oct. 4.

Full details regarding Dr. Muck's plans, the soloists, etc. will be announced later.

JOURNAL—
SEPTEMBER 13.

FAMOUS MUSICIANS FOR THE SYMPHONY

Eight of Europe's Most Celebrated Artists to Join Boston's Orchestra.

No less than eight distinguished musicians are coming from Europe to join the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Otto Urack, who for several seasons has been 'cello soloist of the famous Wagner Festival Orchestra at Bayreuth, will share the first 'cello desk with Heinrich Warnke, and so take the place of Alwin Schroeder, the veteran who has retired to devote himself to concert work.

Mr. Urack is one of the foremost violinists in Germany. Besides his high reputation as a soloist, he is also noted for his skill as a conductor. He has conducted in concert and opera during the past few years and is recognized as one of the most promising young men on the other side of the Atlantic.

Walther Habenichl, late concert master of the Philharmonic Orchestra in Kiel, has been chosen by Dr. Muck, who returns to resume the conductorship of Boston's celebrated orchestra, to become leader of the second violins in place of Carl Barleben, retired. Mr. Habenichl ranks as one of Germany's leading violinists. His reputation rests not only on his successful work with the orchestra at Kiel, but on his numerous appearances as soloist from one end of Germany to the other.

Two prominent prize winners from the Paris Conservatoire have been selected for places in the wood-wind section of the Symphony Orchestra. Albert Chevrot will take the place of Paul Fox, one of the original members of the orchestra, and so complete the quartet of flute players. Pierre Fosse, who, like Mr. Chevrot, won a first prize at the Paris Conservatoire, will replace Mr. Sautet among the oboes, and, it is expected, maintain the great prestige the Boston oboeists, who include the brilliant Longy and Lenom, have enjoyed for many years.

From the Royal Opera in Berlin, Dr. Muck is bringing Maurice Koessler, a noted violinist, to fill the vacancy caused by the retirement of Mr. Eichheim, one of the well-known members of Boston's incomparable company of first violins. Mr. Koessler is an accomplished artist. For some years past he has sat at the second desk among the first violins in the Royal Opera, of which Dr. Muck has been chief conductor since his departure from Boston three years ago.

Another musician prominent in Berlin, Max Fuhrmann, will succeed Mr. Regenstein among the bassoon players, and a brilliant horn player from Cologne, Ernst Huebner, will succeed Carl Schumann, who was also one of the original members of the Symphony Orchestra. Bruno Steink[illegible] of Berlin is to replace Ralph Small[illegible], the 'cellist, who has resigned to [illegible] the Minneapolis Orchestra.

Altogether there have been 10 resignations from the Symphony Orchestra since last spring—an unusually large number. Among those who have gone, in addition to the players already mentioned, are William Krafft, of the first violins, and Arthur Hadley, 'cellist. The former is in charge of the orchestra at the Copley-Plaza, and the latter is going to San Francisco to become 'cello soloist in the orchestra led by his brother, Henry Hadley.

Coming Here Soon

DR. KARL MUCK,
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

All the new members will report for the first rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra, which takes place on Monday, Oct. 7. Dr. Muck is due in Boston Oct. 4.

GLOBE
-SEPTEMBER 15.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

New Players Engaged for the Symphony.

Coleridge-Taylor---His Early Work and Its Promise.

Sunday Matinee Opera Concerts---Notes.

The first rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be held Monday, Oct 7, will discover some new faces in the various chairs. Two of those who retire, Paul Fox, flute, and Carl Schumann, horn, have seen 31 years of continuous service as members of the orchestra. August Sautet, considered in his day an oboist of the first rank, Mr Regestein of the bassoons and Mr Rettberg of the percussion department, have long and honorable service behind them.

Mr Krafft and Mr Eichheim have resigned from their positions in the first violins; Mr Krafft to take charge of the music in the Copley-Plaza Hotel and Mr Eichheim to accept a place in the New England Conservatory faculty, while Mr Barleben, for many years the leader of the second violins has retired on account of ill-health.

There will be three changes among the 'cellos. Mr Schroeder will give his time wholly to concert and recital playing. Arthur Hadley has accepted the position of solo 'cellist of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra of which his brother 's conductor, and Ralph Smalley will join the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra. There will be a few other changes in the personnel.

The management has used great care in engaging musicians to replace these men. In Mr Schroeder's chair sharing the first desk of the 'cello section with Mr. Warnke, will come Otto Urack of Berlin. Mr Urack is regarded as one of the most brilliant 'cello virtuosi of Germany. He is a Bohemian by descent, but is a native of Berlin and for the past several seasons has been 'cello soloist in the Bayreuth Festival Orchestra. Mr Urack also brings with him the reputation of being a conductor of great promise. Despite his youth, for he is still in his twenties, he has conducted opera in Barmen and Elberfeld, and has conducted many concerts in the Lower Rhine cities.

Special pains have been taken to make the second violin section stronger than ever. To this end a very distinguished violinist has been engaged as the leader of the section. This is Mr Walter Habenichl, who for the past two years has been first concert master of the Kiel Philharmonic Orchestra. Mr Habenichl has also undertaken several tours on the continent as a virtuoso, and has met with flattering success. One of the new first violins will be Maurice Koessler of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and one of the new 'cellists will be Bruno Steinke, also of Berlin.

To take the places respectively of Mr Fox and Mr Sautet, Albert Chevrot and Pierre Fosse have been engaged, a young flutist and an oboist, both of whom won first prizes at the Paris Conservatory. The new bassoonist is Max Fuhrmann, originally of Cologne, but of recent years in Berlin, and the new fourth horn will be Ernst Hubner of Cologne.

Several changes are noted in the viola section. Mr Spoor is transferred to the second violins, and Mr Werner from the second violins to the violas, taking the place of Mr Hoyer, whose illness last spring compelled his retirement. A new viola player will be Mr Berliner, who season before last was the leading viola of the Boston Opera House.

The total strength of the orchestra, including the conductor, will this year be an even 100, as compared with 101 a year ago. This year there is one less man in the percussion department.

The return of Dr Muck has stimulated interest in the orchestra beyond all expectation. For the five Thursday night concerts in New York less than 100 seats scattered throughout the house have not been taken by subscription. For the first time every box in Carnegie Hall has been sold for these concerts. For the Saturday afternoon concerts there are a few over 100 seats that have not yet been taken by subscription. To counterbalance these there are more than enough applications now on file to sell every one of them. No condition comparable to this has been recorded in the history of music in this country, and from reports that are coming in from other cities where the orchestra gives a series of concerts, a similar state of affairs is promised. The full prospectus of the season will be published next week.

SEPTEMBER 19,

ADVERTISER,

DR MUCK TO SAIL.

Symphony Conductor Accompanied by New Players Will Leave Bremen Sept 24.

Mr C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has received a cable from Dr Karl Muck stating definitely that he will sail from Bremen on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie next Tuesday, Sept 24. He also informed Mr Ellis that all the engagements of the new members of the orchestra have now been made. Several of these were hanging fire the greater part of the summer, but now the personnel of the orchestra for [illegible] is complete.

With [illegible] the Kronprinzes

SEPTE
AMERICAN-

NEW PLAYERS THIS YEAR IN SYMPHO

Owing to the retirement of some of older members of the Boston Symph Orchestra and the resignations of othe who are going into other classes of wor there will be several new faces when first rehearsal is held on Monday, Oc 7. Of the older members that ha tired, both Paul Fox of the flute and Carl Schumann of the horn sec have completed thirty-one years of tinuous service. August Sautet of oboes and Mr. Regesttin of the bass and Mr. Rettberg of the percussion de ment have long and honorable year service behind them.

Mr. Krafft and Mr. Eichheim have signed from their positions in the violins, Mr. Krafft to take charge of music in the Copley-Plaza Hotel and Eichheim to devote himself to teachi while Mr. Barleben, for many years leader of the second violins, has retir on account of ill health.

Goes to Frisco.

Mr. Schroeder has retired from 'cellos to devote himself to concert while Arthur Hadley and Ralph Sm have left this season, the first to b solo 'cellist of the San Francisco phony Orchestra, of which his broth conductor, and the second to join the neapolis Symphony Orchestra. There h been a few other changes in the rank file.

The work of replacing these men been done with the utmost care and management feels confident that the sicians who are joining the orchestra year will be most valuable additions do much to increase the orchestra's ef iency. In Mr. Schroeder's place to sh the first desk of the 'cello section Mr. Warnke will come Otto Urack Berlin. Mr. Urack is regarded as one the most brilliant 'cello virtuosi in many. He is a Bohemian by descen is a native of Berlin, and for the pa eral seasons has been 'cello soloist Bayreuth Festival Orchestra. Mr. also brings with him the reputati being a conductor of great promise spite his youth, for he is still in his ties, he has conducted opera in B and Elberfeld and has conducted concerts in the Lower Rhine cities.

Special pains have been taken to the second violin section stronger.

In Violin Section.

Several changes are noted in the section. Mr. Spoor is transferred to second violin section, and Mr. Werne been transferred from the second section into the violas, taking the p Mr. Hoyer, whose illness last Sprin pelled his retirement. A new viola will be Mr. Berliner, who season last was the leading viola of the Opera House.

The total strength of the orches cluding the conductor, will this year even hundred, as compared wit year ago, there being this year on man in the percussion department.

The return of Dr. Muck has sti interest in the orchestra beyond pectation. For the five Thursda concerts in New York less than a dred seats scattered throughout th have not been taken by subscription the first time every box in Carnegie has been sold for these concerts. Fo Saturday afternoon concerts few over one hundred seats yet been taken by subsc counterbalance these there enough applications now every one of them. No co ble to this has been reco tory of music in this co reports that are coming cities where the orchestr of concerts a similar st promised. The full prosp son will be published ne

SEPTEMBER 15, POST.

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S REVISED PERSONNEL

The New Men to Assemble at First Rehearsal—Effects of Muck's Re-engagement

The first rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1912-13 will be held in Symphony Hall on Monday morning, Oct. 7. A full prospectus of the season will be published next Sunday. Dr. Muck's return, which has had a remarkable effect upon the subscription sales for the Symphony concerts in New York and other cities, is also accompanied by a number of important changes in the ranks of the orchestra.

Of the older members that have retired are Mr. Paul Fox of the flute section and Mr. Carl Schumann of the horn section, both of whom have completed 31 years of continuous service. Mr. August Sautet of the oboes and Mr. Regestein of the bassoons and Mr. Rettberg of the percussion department have long and honorable years of service behind them. Mr. Krafft and Mr. Eichheim have resigned from their positions in the first violins, Mr. Krafft to take charge of the music in the Copley-Plaza Hotel and Mr. Eichheim to devote himself to teaching, while Mr. Barleben, for many years the leader of the second violins, has retired on account of ill health. Mr. Schroeder has retired from the 'cellos in order to devote himself to concert work, while Mr. Arthur Hadley and Mr. Ralph Smalley have left this section, the first to become solo 'cellist of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, of which his brother is conductor, and the second to join the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra. There have been a few other changes in the rank and file.

The work of replacing these men has been done with the utmost care, and the management feels confident that the musicians who are joining the orchestra this year will be most valuable additions and do much to increase the orchestra's efficiency. In Mr. Schroeder's place, to share the first desk of the 'cello section with Mr. Warnke, will come Otto Urack of Berlin. Mr. Urack is regarded as one of the most brilliant 'cello virtuosi of Germany. He is a Bohemian by descent, but is a native of Berlin, and for the past several seasons has been 'cello soloist in the Bayreuth Festival Orchestra. Mr. Urack also brings with him the reputation of being a conductor of great promise. Despite his youth, for he is stil in his twenties, he has conducted opera in Barmen and Elberfeld, and has conducted many concerts in the lower Rhine cities.

Special pains has been taken to make the second violin section stronger than ever, and to this end a very distinguished violinist has been engaged as the leader of the section. This is Mr. Walther Habenichl, who for the past two years has been first concertmaster of the Kiel Philharmonic Orchestra. Mr. Habenichl has also undertaken several tours on the continent as a virtuoso, and has met with flattering success. One of the new first violins will be Maurice Koessler of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and one of the new 'cellists will be Bruno Steinke, also of Berlin.

To take the place of Mr. Fox in the flute section Albert Chevrot of Paris has been engaged and to take the place of Mr. Sautet in the oboe section Pierre Fosse of Paris. Both of these musicians are young, both of them won first prizes in their respective classes in the Paris Conservatoire, and both of them come most highly recommended by the leading Paris musicians. The new bassoonist is Max Fuhrmann, originally of Cologne, but of recent years in Berlin, and the new fourth horn will be Ernst Hubner of Cologne.

Several changes are noted in the viola section. Mr. Spoor is transferred to the second violin section, and Mr. Werner has been transferred from the second violin section into the violas, taking the place of Mr. Hoyer, whose illness last spring compelled his retirement. A new viola player will be Mr. Berliner, who the season before last, was the leading viola of the Boston Opera House.

The total strength of the orchestra including the conductor will this year be an even hundred as compared with 101 a year ago, there being this year one less man in the percussion department.

The return of Dr. Muck has stimulated interest in the orchestra beyond all expectation. For the five Thursday night concerts in New York less than 100 seats scattered throughout the house have not been taken by subscription. For the first time every box in Carnegie Hall has been sold for these concerts. For the Saturday afternoon concerts there are a few over 100 seats that have not yet been taken by subscription, and to counterbalance these there are more than enough applications now on file to sell every one of them. No condition comparable to this has been recorded in the history of music in this country, and from reports that are coming in from other cities where the orchestra gives a series of concerts, a similar state of affairs is promised.

SEPTEMBER 14,
TRANSCRIPT,

DR. MUCK'S NEW PLAYERS

The Changes in the Personnel of the Symphony Orchestra for 1912-13—Retirements and Resignations Take Away Several of the Older Men—Those Who Will Succeed Them

RESIGNATIONS, retirements on pension and departures to other bands have made considerable changes in the personnel of the Symphony Orchestra for the musical year that is just beginning. Mr. Eichheim, to devote himself to study and composition, and Mr. Krafft, to take charge of the music at the Copley-Plaza Hotel, have both left the first violins. Mr. Barleben of the second violins has retired for reasons of health. From the violoncellos, Mr. Schroeder, Mr. Hadley and Mr. Smalley have all gone. Mr. Schroeder will give his time to playing as a virtuoso in concerts and to teaching. Mr. Hadley will join the new orchestra in San Francisco, of which his brother, Henry, is the conductor; and Mr. Smalley will enter the Symphony Orchestra at Minneapolis. From the wind choir, Mr. Fox, the flutist; Mr. Sautet, the player upon the English horn; Mr. Regestein, the bassoon-player, and Mr. Schumann of the horns have retired on pension after many years of service. A new viola-player has been engaged. Otherwise, the personnel of the orchestra remains as it has been in recent years.

Dr. Muck, to whom the choice of the new men naturally fell, has filled all these vacancies but two. Since Mr. Krafft resigned very recently [illegible] successor to him has still to [illegible] 'cellist is yet announced [illegible] of Mr. Smalley. For the rest, Mr. Koessler of the orchestra of the Royal Opera at Berlin will succeed Mr. Eichheim in the first violins and Mr. Habenichl of the Philharmonic Orchestra at Kiel in Germany, where he has been concert master, will follow Mr. Barleben as leader of the second violins. In Mr. Schroeder's place will come Mr. Urack, accounted one of the most promising young violoncellists in Germany, of orchestral experience at Baireuth and even of some reputation as a conductor. Mr. Steinke of Berlin will follow Mr. Hadley among the violoncellos, and Mr. Berliner, for a time first viola at the Boston Opera House, has been added to the violas. Mr. Spoor of the violas has passed to the second violins and Mr. Werner of that choir has replaced him among the violas. It is the custom of the orchestra to recruit its wood-wind choir from Paris because of the superior training and aptitude of French players upon such instruments. Accordingly Mr. Chevrot will succeed Mr. Fox in the flutes, and Mr. Fossé will follow Mr. Sautet in the oboes. The new bassoonist and the new horn-player are both Germans—Mr. Fuhrmann of Berlin and Mr. Hübner of Cologne. All these new members of the orchestra are actually or relatively young men and by so much the more valuable acquisitions to it.

SEPTEMBER 19,
GLOBE—

DR. MUCK TO SAIL NEXT TUESDAY

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has received a cable from Dr. Karl Muck stating definitely that he is sailing from Bremen on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie next Tuesday. He also informed Mr. Ellis that all the engagements of the new members of the orchestra have now been made.

Several of these were hanging fire the greater part of the summer, but now the personnel of the orchestra for 1912-13 is complete. With Dr. Muck on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie will come Mr. Habenichl, the new leader of the second violins; Mr. Urak, Mr. Schroeder's successor, and Mr. Steinke of the 'cellists. Mr. Koessler, one of the new first violins, sailed Sept. 12 on the Kaiserin Auguste Victoria. Mr. Chevrot and Mr. Fosse, the new French members of the orchestra, are on the Touraine, due in New York next week. Mr. Witek, the concert master of the orchestra, cables that he is sailing on the Victoria Louise on Sept. 26, and will arrive in Boston on Oct. 5.

SEPTEMBER 13, 1912.
TRAVELER
HERALD,

NEW FACES FOR SYMPHONY RANKS

Dr. Muck Engages European Celebrities—Big Ticket Demand.

When the symphony orchestra assembles for its first rehearsal Monday morning, Oct. 7, it will contain a number of new members. At the end of last season there were several of the oldest members retired from active work and several have gone into other fields. There will be two changes in the first violins, William Krafft and Henry Eicheim having retired, Mr. Eicheim to devote himself to teaching and Mr. Krafft to have charge of the music at the Copley-Plaza Hotel. In place of Mr. Eicheim Dr. Muck has engaged Maurice Koessler who for the past several years has been at the second desk of the first violins in the Royal Opera, Berlin.

Among those who have retired from the ranks of the second violins is Carl Barleben, the leader for many years. Mr. Barleben's health was not able to stand the strain of the work. In his place Dr. Muck has engaged Walter Habenichl, first concert-master of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Kiel, Germany.

Otto Urack Engaged.

Messrs. Alwin Schroeder, Arthur Hadley and Ralph Smalley have retired from the 'cello section. Mr. Schroeder to devote himself to concert and solo work, Mr. Hadley to become principal 'cellist of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra of which his brother is conductor, and Mr. Smalley to become 'cello in the Minneapolis Orchestra. The first desk of the 'cellos will be shared by Mr. Warnke with Otto Urack, 'cello soloist of the Bayreuth Festival Orchestra. Mr. Urack in addition to being a soloist of first distinction has had much experience as a conductor and is regarded by Dr. Muck as being one of the most promising young men of Germany.

Bruno Steinke of Berlin has been engaged in Mr. Hadley's place. In the violas Mr. Spoor has been shifted to the second violin section, while Mr. Werner has gone from the second violin to the violas and among those who have been engaged for the violas is Mr. Berlinger for two seasons the leader of the viola section of the Boston Opera House. As announced last spring Messrs. Fox, Sautet, Regestein and Schumann retired after many years of service in the orchestra. In Mr. Fox's place Albert Chevrot of Paris has been engaged, Mr. Chevrot having been a winner of the first prize in flute at the Paris Conservatoire. In Mr. Sautet's place Pierre Fosse of Paris has been engaged. Mr. Fosse also have been a first prize winner in the oboe at the Conservatoire. In the bassoon section to take the place of Mr. Regestein, Max Fuhmann of Berlin has been engaged and in Mr. Schumann's place, as fourth horn, Ernst Hubner of Cologne has been engaged.

Big Ticket Demand.

The return of Dr. Muck has stimulated interest in the orchestra beyond all expectation. For the five Thursday night concerts in New York less than 100 seats scattered throughout the house have not been taken by subscription. For the first time every box in Carnegie Hall has been sold for these concerts. For the Saturday afternoon concerts there are a few over 100 seats that have not yet been taken by subscription, and to counterbalance these there are more than enough applications now on file to sell every one of them.

SEPTEMB[illegible] 19,
POST,

DR. MUCK SAILS NEXT TUESDAY

Cables New Members of Symphony Are Engaged

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has received a cable from Dr. Karl Muck stating definitely that he is sailing from Bremen on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie next Tuesday, Sept. 24. He also informed Mr. Ellis that all the engagements of the new members of the orchestra have now been made.

Several of these were hanging fire the greater part of the summer, but now the personnel of the orchestra for 1912-1913 is complete. With Dr. Muck on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie will come Mr. Habenichl, the new leader of the second violins; Mr. Urak, Mr. Schroeder's successor, and Mr. Steinke of the 'cellists.

Mr. Koessler, one of the new first violins, sailed Sept. 12, on the Kaiserin Augusta Victoria. Mr. Chevrot and Mr. Fosse, the new French members of the orchestra, are on the Touraine due in New York next week. Mr. Witek, the concert

---

SEPTEMBER 15,
HERALD.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Owing to the retirement of older members of the Symphony orchestra and the resignations of others, there will be several new faces when the first rehearsal is held on Monday, Oct. 7. Of the older members that have retired are Mr. Fox of the flute section and Mr. Schumann of the horn section, both of whom have completed 31 years of continuous service. Mr. Sautet of the oboes and Mr. Regestein of the bassoons and Mr. Rettberg of the percussion department have long and honorable years of service behind them. Mr. Krafft and Mr. Eichheim have resigned from their positions in the first violins, Mr. Krafft to take charge of the music in the Copley-Plaza Hotel and Mr. Eichheim to devote himself to teaching, while Mr. Barleben, for many years the leader of the second violins, has retired on account of ill health.

Mr. Schroeder has retired from the 'cellos in order to devote himself to concert work, while Mr. Hadley and Mr. Smalley have left this section, the first to become solo 'cellist of the San Francisco Symphony orchestra and the second to join the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra. There have been a few other changes.

In Mr. Schroeder's place to share the first desk of the 'cello section with Mr. Warnke will come Otto Urack of Berlin, regarded as one of the most brilliant 'cello virtuosi of Germany. For the past several season he has been 'cello soloist in the Bayreuth Festival orchestra. Although still in his twenties, he has conducted opera in Barmen and Elberfeld and many concerts in the lower Rhine cities.

Special pains have been taken to make the second violin section stronger, and a distinguished violinist, Walter Habenichl, has been engaged as the leader of the section. For the past two years he has been rst concert-master of the Kiel Philharmonic orchestra. Mr. Habenichl has also undertaken several tours on the continent as a virtuoso. One of the new first violins will be Maurice Koessler of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and one of the new 'cellists will be Bruno Steinke, also of Berlin.

To take the place of Mr. Fox in the flute section Albert Chevrot of Paris has been engaged, and to take the place of Mr. Sautet in the oboe section Pierre Fosse of Paris. Both of these musicians won first prizes in their respective classes in the Paris Conservatoire. The new bassoonist is Max Fuhrmann, originally of Cologne, but of recent years in Berlin, and the new fourth horn will be Ernst Hubner of Cologne.

Several changes are noted in the viola section. Mr. Spoor is transferred to the second violin section, and Mr. Werner has been transferred from the second violin section into the violas, taking the place of Mr. Hoyer, whose illness last spring compelled his retirement. A new viola player will be Mr. Berliner, who season before last was the leading viola of the Boston Opera House.

The total strength of the orchestra, including the conductor, will this year be an even 100, as compared with 101 a year ago, there being this year one less man in the percussion department.

The return of Dr. Muck has stimulated interest in the orchestra beyond expectation. For the five Thursday night concerts in New York every box in Carnegie Hall has been sold. The full prospectus of the season will be published next week.

SEPTEMBER 25,
POST,

ORCHESTRA IS NOW COMPLETE

Dr. Muck Sends List of New Symphony Players

C. A. Ellis received from Dr. Karl Muck yesterday a complete list of the new members of the orchestra who have been engaged by Dr. Muck during the past summer. The list which he received some days ago was incomplete. On that list were the names of Maurice Koessler of the first violins, Walther Habenicht, leader of the second violins, Otto Urack and Bruno Steinke of the 'cellists and the new members of the wind selection.

In addition to these, Dr. Muck has engaged Edvard Tak to take the place of F. William Krafft. Mr. Tak is a Hollander by birth, a pupil of Joachim. At one time he was first concert-master of the Pittsburg Orchestra, under Emil Paur, and during the season of 1910-1911 he was concert-master of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra.

The two new second violins are Eric Haynes, an Australian, and Carlos E. Pinfield, a Bostonian. Both of these gentlemen have been pupils of Professor Willy Hess, who was for so many years concert-master of the Symphony Orchestra, and are graduates of the Berlin Hochschule.

The two new members of the violin section who are coming from abroad are Paul Schwerley and Walther Blumenau. Mr. Schwerley is a German, a pupil of Professor Hermann Ritter of Wuerzburg, and has been in recent years solo-viola of the Grand Ducal Court Orchestra of Darmstadt. Mr. Blumenau is a graduate of the Hochschule, Berlin, and for a few years has been a member of the Bluethner orchestra of that city. The third 'cellist, in addition to Messrs. Urack and Steinke, is Emil Folgmann. He is a pupil of Professors Housmann and Becker, and for two years has been with the Philharmonic Orchestra, Berlin. The personnel of the orchestra is now complete.

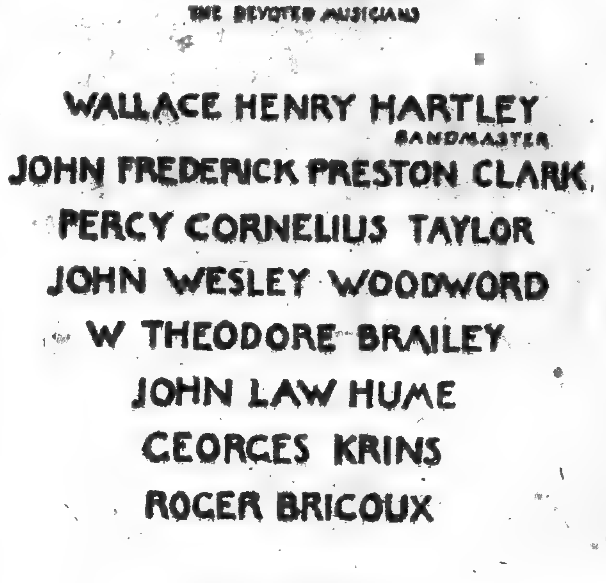
[3]

SEPTEMBER 23,
GLOBE—

TELLS OF HEROISM.

Tablet to Musicians of Titanic in Place.

There has just been placed in the wall of the Massachusetts corridor of Symphony Hall a very handsome marble tablet as memorial to the musicians of the steamship Titanic who continued to play while the ship was sinking. The donor of the tablet prefers to remain anonymous.



IN MEMORY OF
THE DEVOTED MUSICIANS
WALLACE HENRY HARTLEY
BANDMASTER
JOHN FREDERICK PRESTON CLARK
PERCY CORNELIUS TAYLOR
JOHN WESLEY WOODWORD
W THEODORE BRAILEY
JOHN LAW HUME
GEORGES KRINS
ROGER BRICOUX
WHO WERE DROWNED
STILL PLAYING
AS THE TITANIC WENT DOWN
APRIL 15 1912

INSCRIPTION ON TABLET AT SYMPHONY HALL TO MEMORY OF MUSICIANS WHO WENT DOWN WITH THE TITANIC.

The tablet is of white marble, three feet four inches long by two feet four inches wide. It is inscribed in gold letters as follows:

"In memory of the devoted musicians, Wallace Henry Hartley, bandmaster; John Frederick Preston Clark, Percy Cornelius Taylor, John Wesley Woodword, W. Theodore Brailey, John Law Hume, George Krins, Roger Bricoux, who were drowned still playing as the Titanic went down, April 15, 1912.

SEPTEMBER 23,
HERALD,

HONORS MUSICIAN HEROES OF TITANIC

There has been placed in the wall of the Massachusetts avenue corridor of Symphony Hall a very handsome marble tablet as memorial to the musicians of the White Star steamship Titanic who continued to play while the ship was sinking. The donor of the tablet prefers to remain anonymous.

The tablet is of white marble, three feet four inches long by two feet four inches wide. It is inscribed in gold letters as follows:

IN MEMORY OF
THE DEVOTED MUSICIANS
WALLACE HENRY HARTLEY
Bandmaster
JOHN FREDERICK PRESTON CLARK
PERCY CORNELIUS TAYLOR
JOHN WESLEY WOODWORD
W. THEODORE BRAILEY
JOHN LAW HUME
GEORGES KRINS
ROGER BRICOUX
Who were drowned
Still Playing
As the Titanic Went Down
April 15, 1912

The tablet is the work of John Evans & Co. of this city.

SEPTEMBER 25,
MONITOR,

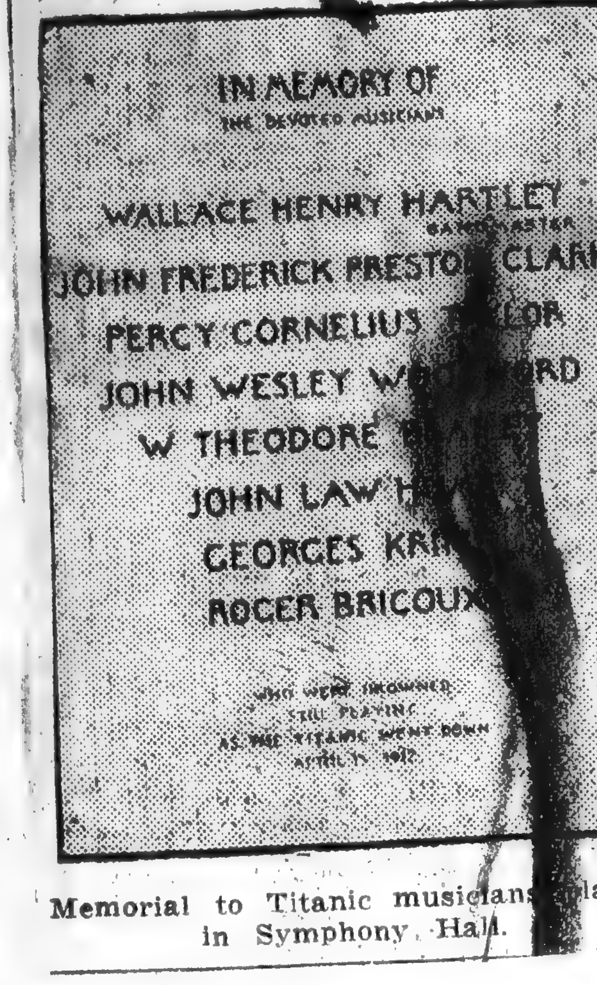
NEW MEN FOR STRING SECTION OF SYMPHONY

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, received from Dr. Karl Muck yesterday a complete list of the new members of the orchestra who have been engaged during the past summer.

Dr. Muck has engaged Eduard Tak to take the place of Wiliam Krafft. Mr. Tak is a Hollander and a pupil of Joachim. At one time he was concert master of the Pittsburgh orchestra under Emil Paur and in 1910-1911 he was concert master of the San Francisco Symphony orchestra. Two new second violins are Eric Hayes, an Australian, and Carlos E. Pinfield, a Bostonian. Both of these men have been pupils of Willy Hess and are graduates of the Berlin Hochschule. Two members of the viola section are Paul Schwerley and Walter Blumenau. Schwerley is a German, a pupil of Prof. Herman Ritter of Wuerzburg and has been solo viola of the Grand Ducal court orchestra of Darmstadt. Mr. Blumenau is a graduate of the Hochschule, Berlin, and has been a member of the Bluethner orchestra of that city. A new 'cellist is Emil Folgmann

SEPTEMBER 23, JOURNAL-

Heroes Honored



Memorial to Titanic musicians placed in Symphony Hall.

TABLET HONOR FOR MUSICIAN HEROES

Marble Memorial to Titanic Orchestra Set in Symphony Hall Corridor.

There has just been placed in the wall of the Massachusetts avenue corridor of Symphony Hall a very handsome marble tablet as a memorial to the musicians of the White Star steamship Titanic, who continued to play while the ship was sinking. The donor of the tablet prefers to remain anonymous.

The tablet is of white marble, three feet four inches long by two feet four inches wide. It is inscribed in gold letters as follows:

IN MEMORY OF
THE DEVOTED MUSICIANS
WALLACE HENRY HARTLEY
(Bandmaster)
JOHN FREDERICK PRESTON CLARK
PERCY CORNELIUS TAYLOR
JOHN WESLEY WOODWORD
W. THEODORE BRAILEY
JOHN LAW HUME
GEORGES KRINS
ROGER BRICOUX
Who were drowned
Still playing
As the Titanic went down
April 15, 1912

SEPTEMBER 25,

TRANSCRIPT,

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA FOR 1912-13

More Changes Announced in the Personnel—A Complete List of the Men for the New Season—Mr. Dippel's Company and Novel Operas—A New Piece by Bantock—Comparing Korngold and Mozart—News and Opinion

WHEN the management of the Symphony Orchestra announced ten days ago the changes in the personnel of the band for the new season, several vacancies were still unfilled. Dr. Muck has now sent forward a list of the players whom he has picked to fill them. In Mr. Krafft's place in the first violins will come Edward Tak, formerly concert-master of the Pittsburgh and the San Francisco orchestras. Eric Haynes, an Australian, and Carlos Pinfield, a Bostonian, both pupils of Willy Hess, will join the second violins. To the violas will come Paul Schwerley of Darmstadt, and Walter Blumenau of Berlin, while the third new 'cellist is Emil Folgmann of the Philharmonic Orchestra in Berlin. Again the changes bring to the orchestra either young men or highly experienced players in their prime. In all fifteen newcomers will sit in the orchestra at the first concerts a fortnight hence.

In view of all these changes, it is worth while to make hereunder a complete list of the orchestra, tabulated by instruments, but without regard to sittings on the stage, as it will stand next season:

KARL MUCK, Conductor.

VIOLINS

Witek, A., Concert-master.
Noack, S.
Strube, G.
Koessler, M.
Habenicht, W.
Fiumara, P.
Tischer-Zeitz, H.
Goldstein, S.
Roth, O.
Kuntz, D.
Rissland, K.
Bak, A.
Akeroyd, J.
Gerardi.
Kurth, R.
Spoor, S.
Hoffmann, J.
Tak, E.
Ribarsch, A.
Mullaly, J.
Fiedler, B.
Marble, E.
Pinfield, C.
Grünberg, M.
Theodorowicz, J.
Mahn, F.
Traupe, W.
Goldstein, H.
Berger, H.
Haynes, E.

VIOLAS

Férir, E.
Gietzen, A.
Werner, H.
Berliner,
Pauer, O. H.
Kluge, M.
Blumenau, W.
Forster, E.
VanWynbergen, C.
Schwerley, P.

VIOLONCELLOS

Warnke, H.
Urack, O.
Keller, J.
Nagel, R.
Barth, C.
Nast, L.
Belinski, M.
Steinke, B.
Warnke, J.
Folgmann, E.

BASSES

Kunze, M.
Gerhardt, G.
Agnesy, K.
Jaeger, A.
Seydel, T.
Huber, E.
Ludwig, O.
Schurig, R.

FLUTES

Maquarre, A.
Brooke, A.
Battles, A.
Chevrot, A.

OBOES

Longy, G.
Lenom, C.
Fossé, P.

CLARINETS

Grisez, G.
Mimart, P.
Varnini, A.

BASSOONS

Sadony, P.
Mueller, E.
Fuhrmann,

ENGLISH HORN

Mueller, F.

BASS CLARINET

Stumpf, K.

CONTRA-BASSOON

Mosbach, J.

HORNS

Hess, M.
Lorbeer, H.
Hain, F.
Phair, J.
Wendler, G.
Gebhardt, W.
Hackebarth, A.
Hübner.

TRUMPETS

Kloepfel, L.
Mann, J.
Heim, G.
Merrill, C.

TROMBONES

Hampe, C.
Aloo, M.
Mäusebach, A.
Kenfield, L.

TUBA

Lorenz O.

HARP

Schuecker, H.

TYMPANI

Neumann, S.
Kandler, F.

PERCUSSION

Zahn, F.
Senia, T.
Burkhardt, H.

ORGAN

Marshall, J. P.

LIBRARIAN

Sauerquell, J.

SEPTEMBER 25,

ADVERTISER,

MORE ADDITIONS TO SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Eduard Tak Has Been Engaged by Conductor Muck to Take Place of William Krafft.

C. A. Ellis received from Dr. Karl Muck yesterday a complete list of the new members of the orchestra who have been engaged by Dr. Muck during the past summer. The list which he received some days ago was incomplete. On that list were the names of Maurice Koessler of the first violins, Walther Habenicht, leader of the second violins; Otto Urack and Bruno Steinke of the 'cellists and the new members of the wind section.

In addition to these Dr. Muck has engaged Eduard Tak to take the place of William Krafft. Mr. Tak is a Hollander by birth, a pupil of Joachim. At one time he was first concert-master of the Pittsburgh orchestra, under Emil Paur, and during the season of 1910-1911 he was concert-master of the San Francisco Symphony orchestra.

The two new second violins are Eric Haynes, an Australian, and Carlos E. Pinfield, a Bostonian.

The two new members of the viola section who are coming from abroad are Paul Schwerley and Walther Blumenau. The third 'cellist, in addition to Messrs. Urack and Steinke, is Emil Folgmann.

SEPTEMBER 25,

TRAVELER HERALD,

DELEGATES ENJOY EVENING OF MUSIC

Symphony Hall Thronged by Chamber of Commerce Visitors.

Expressions of delight were heard on all sides last night in Symphony Hall at the concert given in honor of the fifth International Congress of Chambers of Commerce. The visiting delegates and their friends were manifestly impressed with the many charms of the hall and the excellence of the music as given by Gustave Strube directing 60 players of the Symphony Orchestra. The hall was handsomely decorated, while the stage was a veritable fairyland of palms.

Mr. Strube and his players were in excellent form and set a pace that was well in keeping with the exceptional success which has attended the efforts of the Boston Chamber of Commerce to make this congress a most memorable one. Members of the chamber were everywhere seeing to it that everybody had a thoroughly enjoyable evening. It was very evident even to the most casual observer that everybody did.

Grouped about the small refreshment tables on the floor of the hall delegates and friends chatted while they partook of the light refreshments. Not the least impressive event of an exceptionally successful evening was the closing number "Hands Across The Sea," at which all stood up and applauded enthusiastically the tributes to their respective nationalities.

SEPTEMBER 25,

HERALD,

NEW SYMPHONY LIST COMPLETE

C. E. Pinfield, a Bostonian, Is Among Additions to Personnel.

C. A. Ellis received from Dr. Karl Muck yesterday a complete list of the new members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who have been engaged by Dr. Muck. The list which he received some days ago was incomplete. On that list were the names of Maurice Koessler of the first violins, Walter Rabenicht, leader of the second violins, Otto Urack and Bruno Steinke of the 'cellists and the new members of the wind instrument section.

In adition to these Dr. Muck has engaged Eduard Tak to take the place of William Krafft. Mr. Tak is a Hollander, a pupil of Joachim. At one time he was first concert-master of the Pittsburgh Orchestra under Emil Paur. During the season of 1910-1911 he was concert-master of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra.

The two new second violins are Eric Haynes, an Australian and Carlos E. Pinfield, a Bostonian. Both have been pupils of Prof. Willy Hess, who was for so many years concert-master of the Symphony Orchestra, and are graduates of the Berlin Hochschule.

The two new members of the violin section who are coming from abroad are Paul Schworley and Walther Blumenau. Mr. Schwerley is a German, a pupil of Prof. Hermann Ritter, of Wuerzburg, and has been in recent years solo-viola of the Grand Ducal Court Orchestra of Darmstadt. Mr. Blumenau is a graduate of the Hochscule, Berlin, and for a few years has been a member of the Bluethner Orchestra of that city. The third 'cellist in addition to Messrs. Urack and Steinke is Emil Folgmann. He is a pupil of Housmann and Becker and for two years has been with the Philharmonic Orchestra, Berlin. The personnel of the orchestra is now complete.

SEPTEMBER 26,

JOURNAL-

SYMPHONY SEAT SALE ON MONDAY

Dr. Karl Muck Returns as Conductor — Concerts Start Friday, Oct. 11.

Next Monday will see the opening of the annual auction sale of Symphony season seats. The sale will take place at Symphony Hall, beginning at 10 in the morning.

On Monday the $18 seats for the Friday matinee performances will be auctioned off to the highest bidder. On Tuesday the $10 rehearsal seats will be similarly disposed of. There will be a gap of one day, and then on Thursday will come the auction of the $18 seats for the Saturday night performances. The $10 Saturday night seats will be offered Friday.

Dr. Karl Muck returns as conductor after a four years' absence. The soloists this season will include Ysaye, Kreisler, Godowsky, Max Pauer, Elena Gerhardt, Julia Culp, Marie Rappold, Maggie Teyte and other celebrities of the musical world.

Manager Ellis has received from Dr. Muck a complete list of the new members of the orchestra who have been engaged during the summer. The list received some days ago was incomplete. The complete list shows that Dr. Muck has engaged Eduard Tak to take the place of William Krafft among the first violins. Mr. Tak is a Hollander by birth, a pupil of Joachim. At one time he was first concert master of the Pittsburg Orchestra, under Emil Paur, and during the season of 1910-1911 he was concert master of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra.

The two new second violins, besides Walther Habenicht, are Eric Haynes, an Australian, and Carlos E. Pinfield, a Bostonian.

The two new members of the viola section, who are coming from abroad, are Paul Schwerley and Walther Blumenau. The third 'cellist, in addition to Otto, Urack and Bruno Steinke, is Emil Folgmann.

The opening concerts will take place Friday afternoon, Oct. 11, and Saturday night, Oct. 12.

SEPTEMBER 14, MONITOR,

SYMPHONY SEASON NEARING

New Players in String and Wind Sections of Orchestra to Take Places of Retiring Members

MUSICAL PUBLIC ALERT FOR DR. MUCK

(Photo by Garo, Boston)

Coming of renowned interpreter of orchestral masters stirs anticipations of symphony orchestra patrons

ACCORDING to predictions of the Symphony hall managers, the demand for season tickets at the Symphony concert auction sales this year, owing to the return of Dr. Karl Muck as conductor, will be far greater than in any previous year. The predictions are based on advance orders reported from the ticket agents who act as bidders and brokers for patrons of the concerts, choosing locations and offering premiums according to the exigencies of the sale. How many persons will attend the auctions to bid for seats on their own account there is no way of telling in advance.

The desirable end of such demand, so far as the managers are concerned, would be a complete subscription of the Saturday night concerts. The Friday afternoon rehearsals, may be expected, as in former years, to sell out entirely anyway. The only difference that can come there will be in the size of the premiums offered the auctioneer.

In the Carnegie hall series of concerts in New York, where subscription books are opened and a flat scale of prices prevails, the demand has surpassed former records. Less than 100 seats remain, the managers report, for the five Thursday night concerts in that city of the monthly tours. Every box in Carnegie hall is reported sold for that series of concerts. For the Saturday afternoon series there are about 100 seats that have not yet been taken by subscription, and to counterbalance these there are more than enough applications now on file, it is said, to take every one of them.

New players in the Boston Symphony orchestra the coming season include Otto Urak, who will sit at the first desk of the 'cello section with Mr. Warnke; Walther Habenichl, who will be the principal of the second violin section; Albert Chevrot, who will be the third flutist; Pierre Fosse, who will be the third oboist; Max Fuhrmann, who will play in the bassoon section; Maurice Koessler, who will play on the first violin side; Ernst Huebner, who will play fourth horn; Bruno Steinke, who will play in the 'cello section; and Mr. Berliner, formerly with the Boston opera house orchestra, who will be one of the viola players.

Mr. Urack has been 'cello soloist of the Bayreuth festival orchestra. Mr. Habenichl has been first concert-master of the Philharmonic orchestra of Kiel, Germany. Mr. Koessler has been at the second desk of the first violins in the Royal opera, Berlin. Mr. Chevrot has the distinction of winning the first prize for flute playing at the Paris conservatory. Mr. Fosse has won the first prize at the Paris conservatory in the oboe. Dr. Muck is understood to be responsible for all the new appointments.

Retiring members of the orchestra include Messrs. Krafft, Barleben, Eicheim, Schroeder, Hadley, Fox, Sautet, Regestein, Smalley and Schumann.

SEPTEMBER 30,

HERALD,

AUCTION OF SYMPHONY SEATS BEGINS TODAY

All Having Upset Price of $18 Will Be Offered to Bidders.

The first of the auction sales of season tickets for the Symphony concerts will begin at Symphony Hall this morning at 10 o'clock. The sale includes all the seats in the hall which have the upset price of $18. These are the seats on the floor back to the balcony line; that is to say, to the last nine rows; the seats on the sides of the first balcony and those in the centre of the first balcony back to the second balcony line; that is to say except the last five rows.

The sale will begin with the seats in the front of the floor, and they will be sold in order. It will take at least to the intermission for luncheon at half-past 12 to sell back to the broad [illegible]

As is [illegible] understood, the premiums [illegible] today will be added in every [illegible] $18 for each seat and the cost [illegible] the seat will be $18 plus the premium. Only four seats may be bought on one bid.

SEPTEMBER 21, 1912

ADVERTISER.

BRILLIANT SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SEASON EXPECTED UNDER DR. MUCK'S LEADERSHIP

DR. KARL MUCK.

The opening of the 32d season of the Symphony orchestra is but three weeks away, the first rehearsal coming Oct. 11, the first concert on the following evening. The annual auction sales of season tickets will be held Sept. 30, Oct. 1, 3 and 4, at 10 a. m. On Monday the first day the $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold, on Tuesday the $10 seats. On Thursday the $18 seats for the concerts will be sold and on Friday the $10 seats. Between Oct. 11, the opening, and May 3, the orchestra will give 110 concerts exclusive of its pension fund benefits, of which there are always two. Boston will have its usual 24 public rehearsals on successive Friday afternoons and its 24 concerts on successive Saturday evenings excepting those weeks when the orchestra is out of town: Nov. 8 and 9, Dec. 6 and 7, Jan. 10, 11 and 31, Feb. 1, 21 and 22 and March 21 and 22.

Dr. Muck's Return.

Interest in the season naturally centers in the return of Dr. Muck as conductor. No man who has held this important post since the organization of the orchestra made so profound an impression on the orchestra itself and on the patrons as he did.

Soloists.

The management announces that 14 artists have been engaged to assist at as many concerts during the season. There will be five singers, Julia Culp, Marie Rappold, Elena Gerhardt, Maggie Teyte and Herbert Witherspoon; five pianists, Germaine Schnitzer, Leopold Godowsky, Max Pauer, George Proctor and Norman Wilks; three violinists, Fritz Kreisler, Anton Witek and Eugene Ysaye; one 'cellist, Otto Urack, the successor of Alwin Schroeder. The engagements of these artists have so been arranged that they will alternate as far as possible with the concerts which are purely orchestral.

Of the singers the only one who will be new to Boston is Julia Culp. Miss Culp is Dutch by birth and for several years has held a very high place among the concert singers of Europe. She is described as a mezzo soprano of unusual beauty of voice and as an artist of first rank. This will be her first season in America.

The Pianists.

A pianist whose coming has long been eagerly looked forward to by the musical public is Leopold Godowsky. He has been made the head of the piano school in the Vienna Conservatory and is today one of the leading figures in European music. His engagement with the Symphony orchestra will bring him here in the first half of the season.

A name new to Boston is that of Norman Wilks. Mr. Wilks is an English pianist, the greater part of whose career has been spent in Germany and he comes to America very highly recommended.

Another newcomer in the list if pianists is Max Pauer. He is coming to America for the first time and has been engaged by the Boston Symphony orchestra for several of its concerts.

SEPTEMBER 28.

JOURNAL-

DR. MUCK IS DUE TO ARRIVE TUESDAY

Auction of Symphony Seats For Rehearsals Begins on Monday.

Dr. Karl Muck and Mrs. Muck are ue to arrive in New York next Tues- ay and they will come directly to oston, when it is expected that Dr. uck will make formal announcement his plans for the season. He has elayed doing this until his arrival.

On the day he sailed from Breme ave he cabled C. A. Ellis, manag the Symphony Orchestra, the fir ogram which will be played on F y afternoon, Oct. 11, and Saturd ening, Oct. 12. This comprises t roica" symphony from Beethove Roman Carnival" overture by Berlio he symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," iszt, and the prelude to Wagne Die Meister singer von Nuremberg." Sixty members of the orchestra t eek are in Worcester for the annu stival in that city. All of the ne mbers of the personnel have arriv the orchestra will be called her for its first meeting of the ye onday, Oct. 7.

The first of the auction sales of se son tickets comes on next Monda morning, Sept. 30, when the $18 sea for the public rehearsals will be sol The sale of the floor seats will occup the whole of the morning, and the ba cony will be reached some time be tween 2 and 3 o'clock in the after noon.

The seats to be sold Monday com prise the entire floor, excepting the las nine rows, which are under the balcony, and the entire first balcony, except the last five rows, which are under the second balcony. These two lots of seats, the upset price of which is $10, will be sold on Tuesday. The second balcony is not sold for the rehearsals, but is held out for the 25-cent "rush" tickets sold on the day of the rehearsal.

Thursday the $18 seats for the twenty-four Saturday night concerts will be sold, the same number of seats as are sold for the rehearsals Monday. The last day of the sale will be Friday. Then all the rest of the seats will be sold, with an upset price of $10, these seats including not only the last nine rows on the floor and the last five rows in the first balcony, but the entire second balcony.

SEPTEMBER 21, 1912.

JOURNAL-

SYMPHONY SEASON OPENS IN THREE WEEKS DR. MUCK'S RETURN IS EAGERLY AWAITED

Noted List of Soloists Announced—Several New Comers to Be Heard.

The opening of the thirty-second season of the Symphony Orchestra is but three weeks away, the first rehearsal coming on Friday afternoon, Oct. 11, and the first concert on the following evening.

The auction sales of season tickets will be held in Symphony Hall on Sept. 30, Oct. 1, 3 and 4, beginning at 10 o'clock. On Monday the $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold, on Tuesday the $10 rehearsal seats, on Thursday the $18 seats for the concerts, and on Friday the $10 concert seats.

Between Oct. 11 and May 3 the orchestra will give 110 concerts, exclusive of its pension fund benefits, of which there are always two.

Boston will have its usual 24 matinee performances on successive Friday afternoons, and its 24 concerts on successive Saturday evenings, except when the orchestra is out of town. These dates are Nov. 8 and 9, Dec. 6 and 7, Jan. 10 and 11, Jan. 31 and Feb. 1, Feb. 21 and 22 and March 21 and 22.

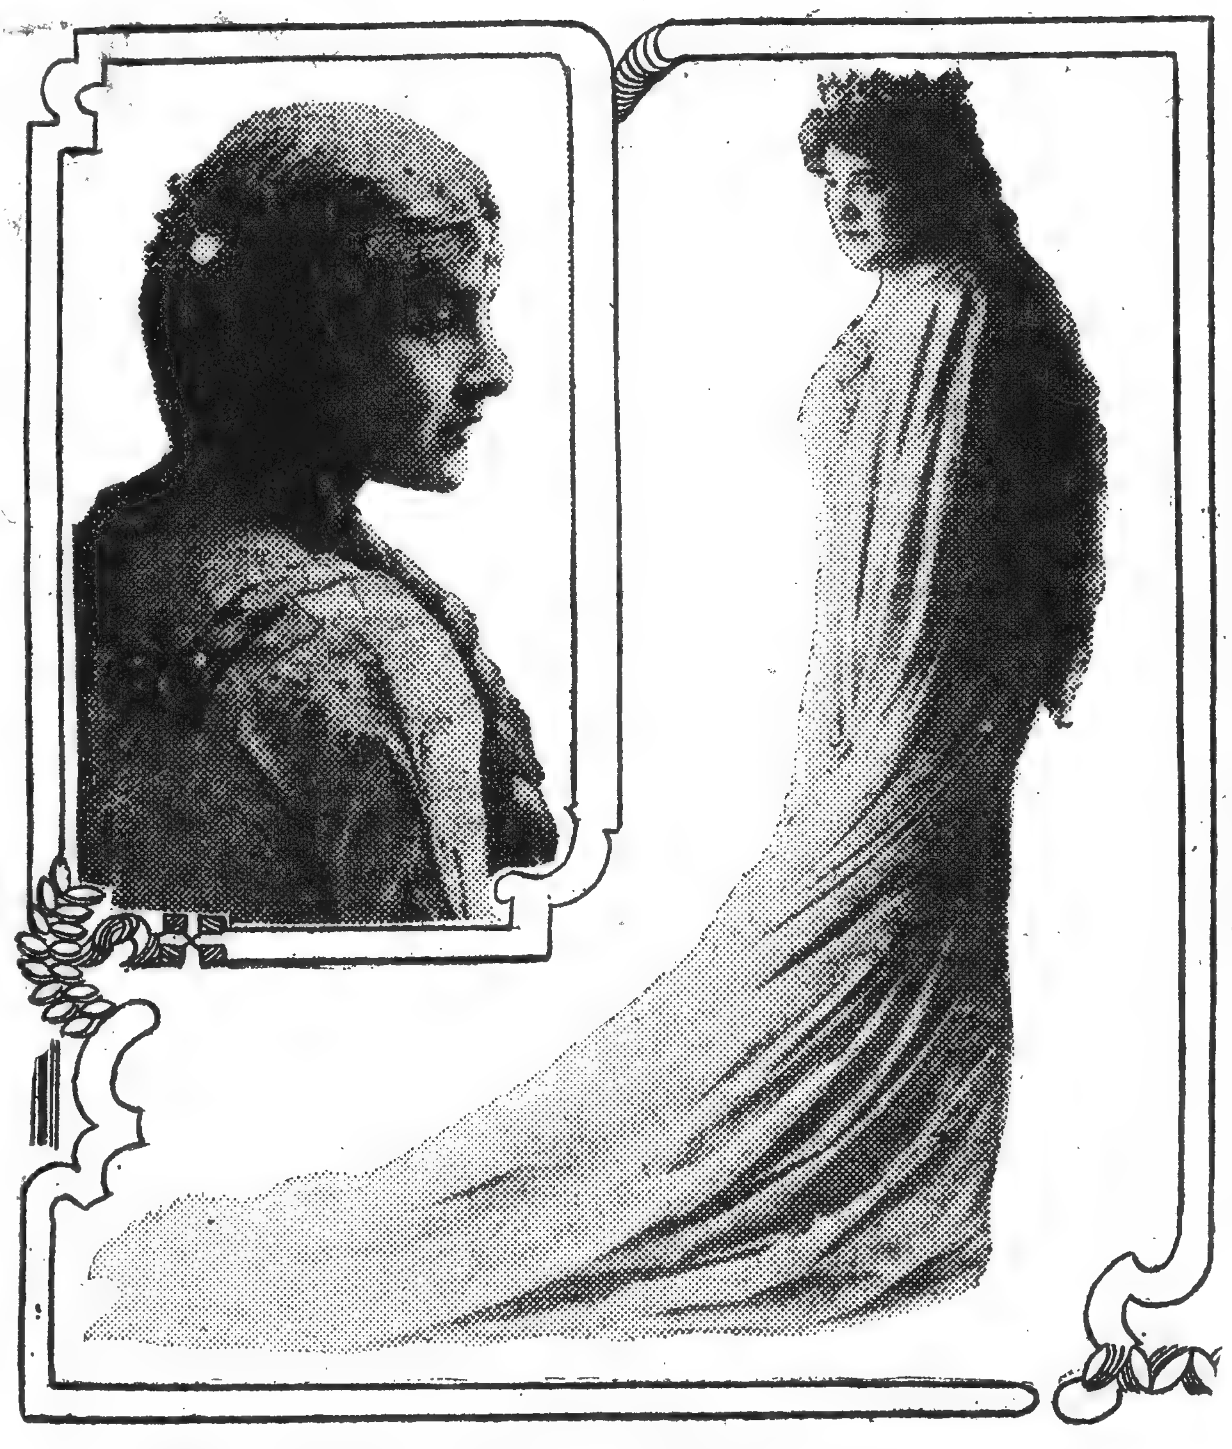
Interest in the season naturally centers in the eagerly awaited return of Dr. Muck as conductor of the orchestra. It is only fair to say that no man who has held this important post since the organization of the orchestra made so profound an impression on the orchestra itself and on the patrons of the concerts as did this distinguished musician from Berlin. Now the orchestra has a long contract with him, and for many seasons to come Boston will be his home and America the field of his work.

The new members of the orchestra, most of whom come from Europe, are all of them, without exception, men of distinguished rank.

The management announces the names of fourteen artists who have been engaged to assist during the season. All of them are musicians of high rank. There will be five singers, Julia Culp, Marie Rappold, Elena Gerhardt, Maggie Teyte and Herbert Witherspoon; five pianists, Germaine Schnitzer, Leopold Godowsky, Max Paper, George Proctor and Norman Wilks; three violinists, Fritz Krisler, Anton Witek and Eugene Ysaye, and one 'cellist, Otto Urack, the successor of Alwin Schroeder. The engagements of these artists have been so arranged that they will alternate as far as possible with concerts which are purely orchestral. In recent years there has been an increasing demand for concerts without soloists.

Of the singers the only one who will be new to Boston is Julia Culp, who is Dutch by birth and who holds a very high place among the concert singers of Europe. She is described as a mezzo-soprano of unusual beauty of voice and as an artist of first rank. This will be her first season in America.

Another newcomer is Max Pauer, who ranks as Germany's leading interpreter of the piano classics, and who is also coming to America for the first time.



AT LEFT—MAGGIE TEYTE. AT RIGHT—MARIE RAPPOLD.
Soloists with the Symphony Orchestra.

JULIA CULP

SEPTEMBER 29, 1

POST,

AUCTION OF SYMPHONY SEATS

First Sales Tomorrow—Unusual Season of Opera Expected—Other Notes

Dr. Muck has forwarded Mr. Charles Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the programme of the first Symphony concerts of the season, which will take place on Friday afternoon, Oct. 11, and Saturday evening, Oct. 12. This programme is a sound and safe one, but interesting withal: "Eroica" symphony, Beethoven; overture, "Roman Carnival," Berlioz; symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," Liszt; overture, "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," Wagner.

The first of the auction sales of the Symphony seats will open tomorrow (Monday) morning in Symphony Hall. The $18 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be disposed of then. For the benefit of those who wish to time their arrival it is here remarked that the sale of the floor seats will occupy the whole of the morning, and that the balcony seats will be reached some time between 2 and 3 o'clock in the afternoon. The same rules will hold this year as at the auction of last year. The seats will be put up in their regular order for sale, commencing with the first row on the floor, next the stage, and no more than four seats will be sold at each bid. It must be remembered that the amount bid is offered in addition to the up-set price of $18. Thus, a $20 bid means a total payment of $38 for the seat desired. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram on the stage and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold. The seats to be sold tomorrow comprise the floor seats, with the exception of the last nine rows, which are under the balcony, and the seats in the first balcony, with the exception of the last five rows, which extend under the second balcony.

The seats remaining on the floor and in the first balcony are sold at the up-set price of $10 on Tuesday morning. None of the seats in the second balcony are sold for the Friday afternoon rehearsals, as these seats, 525 in number, are reserved for the "rush" patrons on that day.

On Thursday morning the $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be put on sale, these seats being the same that are sold at the same up-set price for the public rehearsals. The $10 seats for the Saturday night concerts, which will be sold on Friday morning, when the auction will come to an end, comprise all the seats left in the hall, including the entire second balcony, after the $18 seats have been disposed of.

For the benefit of those who have been misled in the past by very high bids between competitive parties for certain of the more expensive seats, the attention of music lovers should be called to the fact that a season ticket for the Boston Symphony concerts can be secured at a rate which is inexpensive indeed for what the concerts offer. Among the cheapest of the $18 seats a $12 bid should secure a place. For the $10 seats, particularly the sale for Saturday evening, a $10 bid should be fully sufficient to gain a place in a hall where all seats are good for purposes of seeing and hearing. The prices just quoted are based on the records of former sales, making allowance for an increase in the bids which may be expected this season.

Dr. Muck and Mrs. Muck will arrive in New York sometime next Tuesday. They will come directly to Boston, when Dr. Muck is expected to make complete announcements of his plans and the novelties which he intends to produce during the season. Sixty members of the Symphony Orchestra are in Worcester this week for the annual music festival. All of the new members of the orchestra have arrived in Boston, and the first rehearsal in Symphony Hall will be called on Monday morning, Oct. 7. As so many changes have been made in the ranks of the orchestra, a full list of its members, for the better information of those who will watch for familiar and unfamiliar faces, is here published. The order of seating awaits the arrival of Dr. Muck.

Violins—A. Witek, concert-master; S. Noack, G. Strube, M. Koessler, W. Habenicht, P. Fiumara, H. Tischer-Zeitz, S. Goldstein, O. Roth, D. Kuntz, K. Rissland, A. Bak, J. Akeroyd, Gerardi, R. Kurth, S. Spoor, J. Hoffmann, E. Tak, A. Ribarsch, J. Mullaly, B. Fiedler, E. Marble, C. Pinfield, M. Grunberg, J. Theodorowicz, F. Mahn, W. Traupe, H. Goldstein, H. Berger, E. Haynes.

Violas—E. Ferir, A. Gietzen, H. Werner, Berliner, O. H. Pauer, M. Kluge, W. Blumenau, E. Forster, C. Van Wynbergen, P. Schwerley.

Violoncellos—H. Warnke, O. Urack, J. Keller, R. Nagel, C. Barth, L. Nast, M. Belinski, B. Steinke, J. Warnke, E. Folgmann.

Basses—M. Kunze, G. Gerhardt, K. Agnesy, A. Jaeger, T. Seydel, E. Huber, O. Ludwig, R. Schurig.

Flutes—A. Maquarre, A. Brooke, A. Battles, A. Chevrot.

Oboes—G. Longy, C. Lenom, P. Fosse.

Clarinets—G. Grisez, P. Mimart, A. Vannini.

Bassoons—P. Sadony, E. Mueller, Fuhrmann.

English horn—F. Mueller.

Bass clarinet—K. Stumpf.

Contra-bassoon—J. Mosbach.

Horns—M. Hess, H. Lorbeer, F. Hain, J. Phair, G. Wendler, W. Gebhardt, A. Hackebarth, Hubner.

Trumpets—L. Kloepfel, J. Mann, G. Heim, C. Merrill.

Trombones—C. Hampe, M. Aleo, A. Mausebach, L. Kenfield.

Tuba—O. Lorenz.

Harp—H. Schuecker.

Tympani—S. Neumann, F. Kandler.

Percussion—F. Zahn, T. Senia, H. Burkhardt.

Organ—J. P. Marshall.

Librarian—J. Sauerquell.

THE BOSTON SUNDAY POST, SEPTEMBER 22, 1912

SYMPHONY TO OPEN SEASON

Notable List of Soloists—Worcester Festival Programme Announced

One week from tomorrow, on the 30th of September, the auction sales of seats for the 32d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin. The first concerts of the season will take place on the Friday afternoon and Saturday following, and with these concerts the music of the season may be said to be formally inaugurated.

A list of 14 soloists for the concerts is a notable one, including the names of Ysaye, the violinist; Godowsky, whose incredible feats of pianism have been echoing over the Atlantic for years, and who, after a long sojourn in Europe, has conquered his dread of the sea voyage sufficiently to visit America again; some important singers, and a new 'cellist. Julia Culp, the Dutch soprano, who will visit America for the first time this winter, comes, preceded by remarkable reports of her voice and her interpretative talents. The new 'cellist, Mr. Otto Urack of Berlin and other European music centres, brings with him a reputation which is not new. He, with Mr. Witek, the admired concertmeister of the orchestra, will be one of the season's important soloists, but also, and fortunately, a permanent member of the band, replacing Mr. Schroeder, who resigned last spring.

List of Soloists

Here is the list of the soloists in full: Singers, Julia Culp, Elena Gerhardt, Marie Rappold, Maggie Teyte and Herbert Witherspoon, the excellent American basso; pianists, Leopold Godowsky, Max Pauer, George Proctor, Norman Wilks, Germaine Schnitzer; violinists, Fritz Kreisler, Eugene Ysaye, Anton Witek; 'cellist, Otto Urack.

Julia Culp is Dutch by birth, and for the past several years has held a very high place among the concert singers of Europe. She is described as a mezzo soprano of unusual beauty of voice, and as an artist of first rank. This will be her first season in America, and it is promised that she will be one of the most artistic features of the coming winter.

Miss Teyte's history is fairly familiar to the musical public of this city. A young Scotchwoman, she went to Paris and first made her reputation as the successor to Mary Garden in the role of Melisande at the Opera Comique. Last year she came to this country as a member of the Chicago Grand Opera Company, and incidentally gave a number of recitals. This year she will again be a member of the Chicago company, but expects to do much more concert work.

Another singer on the list, Herbert Witherspoon, has many admirers in this city through his several appearances in concert here. This year, however, he will sing for the first time at a Symphony concert. Mr. Witherspoon in addition to being an admirable concert singer is a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and in the last three years has created the principal parts there in Mr. Converse's opera "The Pipe of Desire" and Parker's prize opera "Mona."

Pianists

A pianist whose coming has long been eagerly looked forward to by the musical public is Leopold Godowsky. A good many years ago Godowsky was teaching in a musical college in Chicago and incidentally gave throughout this country a number of recitals. He was famous then chiefly for his extraordinary technique, which was said to exceed even that of Moritz Rosenthal. Godowsky returned to Europe, and for the last several years has had merely to announce a concert in Berlin, Vienna and other principal cities, to be assured of a sold out house. He has been made the head of the piano school in the Vienna Conservatory, and is today one of the leading figures in European music. His engagement with the Symphony Orchestra will bring him here in the first half of the season.

Miss Germaine Schnitzer, who returns to America after an absence of several years, will be remembered as an attractive young woman with all the technique necessary in her art and rather uncommon musical perception. Few young women pianists have been more favorably received in Boston and reports have it that she has grown greatly in her art since leaving this country.

A name new to Boston is that of Norman Wilks. Mr. Wilks is an English pianist, the greater part of whose career has been spent in Germany, and he comes to America very highly recommended.

Another newcomer in the list of pianists is Max Pauer. Pauer's father was the famous pianist and pedagogue, and Pauer himself is regarded in Germany as the greatest classical player of our time. He is coming to America for the first time and has been engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for several of its concerts.

The fifth pianist, Mr. George Proctor, is too well known in Boston to require further introduction to the public.

EUGENE YSAYE ·

JULIA CULP ·

PHOTO BY GARO

DR. KARL MUCK ·

While the names of only three violinists are announced in the prospectus, these three are of extraordinary importance and it is not without pride that the Symphony Orchestra counts one of them as its concert master. Ysaye and Kreisler undoubtedly today stand undisputed at the head of their virtuosos in their instrument. Ysaye has not been heard in America for eight years and it is four since Kreisler was last here. Kreisler, incidentally, is coming to America under contract with the Symphony Orchestra which gives the orchestra his exclusive services in the East. He will give recitals in Boston and New York, but otherwise, his only appearance will be with the Boston Symphony. Anton Witek has proved in the last two years that he will be able to maintain a place in such distinguished company.

It is expected that in Mr. Urack a most valuable addition to the orchestra has been found. He is a young man, still in his twenties, for the past several years has been solo 'cellist and leader of the 'cello section in the Bayreuth Festival Orchestra and is famous in Germany and Austria as a virtuoso. He also has won his spurs as a conductor. One or two other soloists will probably be announced in the course of the season. It will be seen that the soloists chosen for the coming season are of the usual high artistic rank, and that there is a fortunate variety in their selection. But most important of all, to the majority of the patrons of the concerts, is the return of Dr. Karl Muck, who sails from Bremen for America next Tuesday and who comes to Boston to make his home in this city for several years.

MAGGIE TEYTE ·

· ANTON WITEK ·

Out-of-Town Concerts

Between Oct. 11, when the first public rehearsal is given, and May 3, the date of the last concert, the orchestra will give a total of 110 concerts, exclusive of its pension fund benefits. Boston will have the usual 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts. Cambridge will have its usual series of eight concerts, New York its two series of five concerts each; Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Providence their series of five each; Hartford, Worcester and Providence their series of five each, and several New England cities will have a single concert. In the last week of January the orchestra makes its annual trip to the Middle West, this year limiting itself to one tour of this kind. It will then give concerts in Albany, Toronto, Buffalo, Cleveland, Ann Arbor and Detroit. The dates on which there will be no public rehearsals and concerts in Boston are Nov. 8 and 9, Dec. 6 and 7, Jan. 10 and 11, Jan. 31 and Feb. 1, Feb. 21 and 22 and March 21 and 22.

The auction sales will be held in Symphony Hall on Monday, Sept. 30; Tuesday, Oct. 1; Thursday, Oct. 3, and Friday, Oct. 4, all beginning at 10 o'clock, precisely. On Monday the $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold, and on Tuesday, the $10 seats. On Thursday, the $18 seats for the concerts will be sold and on Friday, the $10 seats.

Muck's Return

It is well known that Dr. Muck has been looking forward eagerly to his return ever since he left Boston four years ago. He discovered during his stay here that only in Boston and with the Boston Symphony Orchestra could he work out successfully the idealistic aims he has cherished for many years. While he was practically the musical head of the Berlin Opera House and was one of the most sought-after "guest" conductors in Europe, he was constantly hampered in his efforts to achieve highest artistic results. Here, with probably the finest orchestra in the world, he is given a free hand, and it is only fair to assume that under these conditions even the wonderful work of the past which has been the glory of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be excelled.

The changes that have been made in the orchestra since last year, and have already been noted, are in pursuance of the steadfast policy of its founder to maintain it always at the highest point of efficiency. The new members are all of them, without exception, musicians of distinction and reputation and are fully alive to the

ELENA GERHARDT ·

MARIE RAPPOLD ·

LEOPOLD GODOWSKY ·

SEPTEMBER 29.

HERALD.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Program for the First Concerts.

Dr. Karl Muck and Mrs. Muck arrive in New York sometime next Tuesday and will come directly to Boston, when Dr. Muck will make formal announcement of his plans for the season. The first program, to be played on Friday afternoon, Oct. 11, and Saturday evening, Oct. 12, will comprise the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven; "Roman Carnival," overture of Berlioz; the symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," of Liszt, and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nuremberg."

Sixty members of the orchestra this week are in Worcester for the annual festival in that city. All the new members have arrived and the orchestra will have its first meeting of the year on Monday, Oct. 7.

The first of the auction sales of season tickets comes on next Monday morning, Sept. 30, when the $18 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold. The same rules will hold this year as in past years. The seats will be put up for aution in their regular order, beginning with the first row on the floor and the premium at which they are bid will be added to the upset price of $18, no more than four seats being sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be immediately resold.

The sale of the floor seats will occupy the whole of the morning and the balcony will be reached sometime between 2 and 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

The seats to be sold Monday comprise the entire floor excepting the last nine rows which are under the balcony and the entire first balcony except the last five rows, which are under the second balcony. These two lots of seats, the upset price of which is $10, will be sold on Tuesday. The second balcony is not sold for the rehearsals as this is held out for the 25 cent "rush" tickets sold on the day of the rehearsal.

Thursday morning, beginning at 10 o'clock, with the same rules in force, the $18 seats for the 24 Saturday night concerts will be sold, the same number of seats as are sold for the rehearsals Monday. The last day of the sale will be Friday, the 4th. Then all the rest of the seats will be sold with an upset price of $10, these seats being not only the last nine rows on the floor and the last five rows in the first balcony, but the entire second balcony.

SEPTEMBER 30.

POST.

AUCTION SALE AT SYMPHONY

Season Tickets for $18 Seats to Be Put Up

The first of the auction sales of season tickets for the Symphony concerts will begin at Symphony Hall this morning at 10 o'clock. The sale includes all the seats in the hall which have the upset price of $18. These are the seats on the floor back of the balcony line; that is to say, to the last nine rows; the seats on the sides of the first balcony and those in the centre of the first balcony back to the second balcony line; that is to say, except the last five rows.

The sale will begin with the seats in the front of the floor and they will be sold in order. It will take at least to the intermission for luncheon at half past 12 to sell back to the broad aisle on the floor and the sale of the balcony seats, beginning with those on the right side, followed by those on the left side, and finally those in the centre will begin about 2 o'clock.

Those desiring to bid in for these seats would do well not to be later than this hour. As is generally understood, the premiums bid today will be added in every case to $18 for each seat, and the cost of the seat will be $18 plus the premium. Only four seats may be bought on one bid.

-SEPTEMBER 29,

GLOBE-

Sale of Symphony Season Tickets Opens Tomorrow

Dr Karl Muck and Mrs Muck are due to arrive in New York next Tuesday and they will come directly to Boston, when it is expected that Dr Muck will make formal announcement of his plans for the season. On the day he sailed from Bremerhaven he cabled C. A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony Orchestra, the first program which will be played Friday afternoon, Oct 11, and Saturday evening, Oct 12. This comprises the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz, the symphonic poem "Mazeppa" of Liszt and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nuremberg."

Sixty members of the orchestra this week are in Worcester for the annual festival in that city. All of the new members of the personnel have arrived and the orchestra will be called together for its first meeting of the year Monday, Oct 7.

The first of the auction sales of season tickets comes tomorrow morning, when the $18 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold. The seats will be put up for auction in their regular order, beginning with the first row on the floor, and the premium at which they are bid in will be added to the upset price of $18, no more than four seats being sold on one bid.

The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be immediately resold.

The seats to be sold Monday comprise the entire floor excepting the last nine rows, which are under the balcony and the entire first [illegible]

These two lots of seats, the upset price of which is $10, will be sold Tuesday. The second balcony is not sold for the rehearsals as this is held out for the 25-cent "rush" tickets sold on the day of the rehearsal.

Thursday morning the $18 seats for the 24 Saturday night concerts will be sold.

The last day of the sale, Friday, the rest of the seats will be sold, with an upset price of $10, these seats being not only the last nine rows on the floor and the last five rows in the first balcony but the entire second balcony.

THE BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—SEPTEMBER 22, 1912

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Symphony Season's Soloists Announced.

Julia Culp, Ysaye, Godowsky and Kreisler Included.

New Light Opera by Walter Damrosch---Notes.

The formal opening, in a sense, of the musical season of 1912-1913 will come one week from tomorrow, Monday, Sept 30, when the auction sales of season tickets for the Symphony concerts begin. On that day beginning at 10 o'clock in the morning, the $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold, and on Tuesday at the same hour the $10 seats for the rehearsals. On Thursday, Oct. 3, the $18 seats for the concerts, and on Friday, Oct. 4, both at 10 o'clock in the morning, the $10 seats for the concerts will be placed on sale.

While it is always impossible to tell in advance what the fortune of the Symphony Orchestra in its home city will be, the signs at least seem to indicate this year as one of the most prosperous, if not the most prosperous in its history. The return of Dr Muck in itself has been sufficient to arouse extra interest in the concerts and the list of soloists the management has engaged presents much attraction for all lovers of music.

Dr Muck's Return.

When Dr Muck left Boston in May, 1908, it was with the promise that he would return as soon as he could be released from his Berlin engagements. There was actually no written contract at that time, but the verbal understanding was very distinct. When he left he thought he could return in a year's time, then it was postponed for another year and finally for two years more, and it was not until this last Spring that he had finished his work in Berlin.

When he arrived in the Fall of 1906 it was fairly well known that he looked upon his engagement for a year in Boston in the nature of a pleasant change from which nothing permanent would result, but during that year and during his second season he became convinced that only in Boston with the Boston Symphony Orchestra would he be able to realize the ideals which he had fought for so long in Berlin with only partial success. Those who have seen Dr Muck during the last four years have known that Boston and its Symphony Orchestra have been uppermost in his mind and that he has followed the work that has been done here with keenest interest.

Now he is coming to make Boston his home. He sails from Bremen next Tuesday and will arrive in Boston the following week. He is bringing with him his lares and penates and he will establish his home in an apartment he has taken in Commonwealth av. His plans for the season he still keeps to himself, but being a most methodical and systematic worker it may fairly be assumed that he has long since mapped out this program and chosen the works he intends to play.

The changes that have been made in the orchestra have already been announced and discussed. They have been made with the sole idea of maintaining the efficiency of the personnel at its highest point. The new members that are joining it this year are all of them men of reputation and the quality of the work should be even higher than it has been in the past.

The Soloists of the Season.

No more difficult problem confronts the management of the Symphony Orchestra than the choice and placing of soloists. To be sure the task is made easier by the eagerness of singers, violinists, pianists and the like to appear in Boston at these concerts. It has come to the point where an artist, no matter how great his or her reputation, feels it absolutely necessary to appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra if the tour of America is to be a success. This makes, in a way, the arrangement of dates easier than is the case with most of the other orchestras of the country, for Boston has first choice.

Time was not so many years ago that custom demanded a soloist at every concert, and as the supply of really great artists is limited, necessarily there appeared many who were hardly worthy of the honor given them. This custom, however, has changed, chiefly owing to the fact that there is a large and constantly growing part of the patrons of the Symphony concerts who demand a certain number of orchestral concerts without soloists. Therefore, it is the duty of the management not merely to engage the most representative artists available, but so to distribute them that there will be sufficient variety to maintain a high degree of interest.

For the coming season it is possible now to announce the names of 14 soloists, five singers, five pianists, three violinists and one cellist. The singers are Julia Culp, Elena Gerhardt, Marie Rappold, Maggie Teyte and Herbert Witherspoon. The pianists are Germaine Schnitzer, Leopold Godowsky, Max Pauer, George Proctor and Norman Wilks. The violinists are Fritz Kreisler, Anton Witek and Eugene Ysaye, while Otto Urack is the cellist. It is possible that this list may be added to before the end of the season, for it usually happens that after all arrangements have been made some artist worth hearing comes to America and is given an engagement.

SYMPHONY SOLOISTS FOR THE SEASON

ELENA GERHARDT

EUGENE YSAYE

Garo Photo
ANTON WITEK

GERMAINE SCHNITZER

Photo by APEDA STUDIO
JULIA CULP

DR KARL MUCK
Conductor of the Symphony Orchestra
Photo by Garo

MAGGIE TEYTE

FRITZ KREISLER

MAX PAUER

MARIE RAPPOLD
Photo by APEDA STUDIO

HERBERT WITHERSPOON

LEOPOLD GODOWSKY

Julia Culp a New Singer.

Of the singers the only one who will be new to Boston is Julia Culp. Miss Culp is Dutch by birth and for the past several years has held a very high place among the concert singers of Europe. She is described as a mezzo-soprano of unusual beauty of voice and as an artist of first rank. This will be her first season in America, and it is promised that she will be one of the most artistic features of the coming Winter.

Elena Gerhardt now needs no introduction in Boston, for last season, her first in America, brought her to this city several times in recital, in the Symphony concerts and at the second Pension Fund concert. Few singers have won so quickly a public in this very critical city, and it is owing to that that Miss Gerhardt has been engaged to sing with the orchestra, not only in Boston, but in several other cities which it will visit.

One of the most interesting afternoons of music of last year was the recital of Debussy songs given by Miss Maggie Teyte of the Chicago Opera Company. Miss Teyte's history is fairly familiar to the musical public of this city. A young Scotchwoman, she went to Paris, and first made her reputation as the successor to Mary Garden in the role of Melisande at the Opera Comique. Last year she came to this country as a member of the Chicago Opera Company, and incidentally gave a number of recitals. This year she will again be a member of the Chicago Company, but expects to do much more concert work. Her appearance with the Symphony Orchestra will be awaited with much interest.

Mme Marie Rappold, who will be the first soloist of the season, is the well-known soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, who has already been heard in this city in opera and in concert. The other singer on the list, the bass, Herbert Witherspoon, has sung here at various times in concert, and now will appear for the first time at the Symphony concerts. He has been a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company for the last three years.

Godowsky Among the Pianists.

A pianist whose coming has long been eagerly looked forward to by the musical public is Leopold Godowsky. A good many years ago Godowsky was teaching in a musical college in Chicago, and incidentally gave throughout this country a number of recitals. He was famous then chiefly for his extraordinary technic which was said to exceed even that of Moritz Rosenthal. Godowsky returned to Europe, and for the last several years has had merely to announce a concert in Berlin, Vienna and other principal cities to be assured of a sold-out house. He has been made the head of the piano school in the Vienna Conservatory, and is today one of the leading figures in European music. His engagement with the Symphony Orchestra will bring him here in the first half of the season.

Miss Germaine Schnitzer, who returns to America after an absence of several years, will be remembered as an attractive young woman, with a splendid technic and an uncommon musical perception. Few young women pianists have been more favorably received in Boston and reports have it that she has grown greatly in her art since leaving this country.

A name new to Boston is that of Norman Wilks. Mr Wilks is an English pianist, the greater part of whose career has been spent in Germany, and he comes to America very highly recommended.

Another newcomer in the list of pianists is Max Pauer. Pauer's father was the famous pianist and pedagogue, and Pauer himself is regarded in Germany as a great classical player. He is coming to America for the first time and has been engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for several of its concerts.

The fifth pianist, George Proctor, is well known in Boston, through many appearances in concert and recital.

Ysaye Leads the Violinists.

While the names of only three violinists are announced in the prospectus, these three are of extraordinary importance, and it is not without pride that the Symphony Orchestra counts one of them as its concert master. Ysaye and Kreisler undoubtedly today stand undisputed at the head of their branch of the art of music. Ysaye has not been heard in America for eight years. Kreisler incidentally is coming to America under a contract, which gives the orchestra his exclusive services in the East. He will give a recital in Boston and New York, but otherwise his only appearance will be with the Boston Symphony. Anton Witek has proved in the last two years that he is well able to maintain a place in such distinguished company.

The only cellist announced is the new member of the orchestra, Otto Urack, who succeeds Alwin Schroeder, sharing the first desk of the cellos with Heinrich Warnke. It is expected that in Mr Urack a most valuable addition to the strings has been found. A young man, still in his 20s, he has been for the past several years solo cellist and leader of the cello section in the Bayreuth Festival Orchestra. He is famous in Germany and Austria as a virtuoso, and also has won his spurs as a conductor.

TRAVELER

HERALD,

SEPTEMBER 28,

DR. MUCK CABLES FIRST PROGRAM

First Auction Sale of Symphony Seats Occurs Next Monday.

Just as he was leaving Bremerhaven for New York last Tuesday, Dr. Muck cabled C. A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony orchestra, his first program, which will be played on Friday afternoon, Oct. 11, and Saturday evening, Oct. 12. It comprises the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz, the symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," of Liszt, and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nuremberg." His later programs will be announced after his arrival next week; also the names of the new works he intends to produce during the season.

The first of the auction sales of season tickets comes next Monday morning, when the $18 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold. The same rules will hold this year as in past years. The seats will be put up for auction in their regular order beginning with the first row on the floor and the premium at which they are bid in will be added to the upset price of $18, no more than four seats being sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be immediately resold.

For the benefit of those who wish to know about the progress of the auction it may be said that the sale of the floor seats will occupy the whole of the morning and the balcony will be reached some time between 2 and 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

Thursday morning, beginning at 10 o'clock with the same rules in force, the $18 seats for the 24 Saturday night concerts will be sold, the same number of seats as are sold for the rehearsals Monday. The last day of the sale will be Friday, the 4th. Then all the rest of the seats of the house will be sold with an upset price of $10, these seats being not only the last nine rows on the floor and the last five rows in the first balcony, but the entire second balcony.

SEPTEMBER 27,

TRANSCRIPT

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AND MAHLER'S MUSIC

Played the World Over, It Has Been Strangely and Undeservedly Neglected Here—Mr. Russell's Return—A Plan for Sunday-Afternoon Concerts at the Opera House — Mme. Calve at Hand — Leoncavallo's New Opera—Reger's Impending Pieces—Items as They Pass

ANNOUNCING, the other day, the proprogrammes of the Hallé Concerts at Manchester, in England, the Guardian praised the new conductor, Mr. Balling, for the inclusion in them of symphonies by Bruckner and Mahler, that his hidebound predecessors had ignored. "They are the most comprehensive of modern symphonists," said the Guardian, "and there is musical wealth in them." Here in Boston, for years past, we have not lacked Bruckner's music. Mr. Gericke, who had lived and worked in the midst of the controversies that Bruckner's symphonies raised in Vienna, made them known, one by one, to the public of the Symphony Concerts, though he professed no great personal admiration for them. Dr. Muck, who had more individual inclination toward them, played at least one in each year of his conductorship. Mr. Fiedler was like-minded, and a symphony of Bruckner is now an established item in the annual scheme of the Symphony Concerts. So heard, his music steadily wins increasing understanding, appreciation, sympathy.

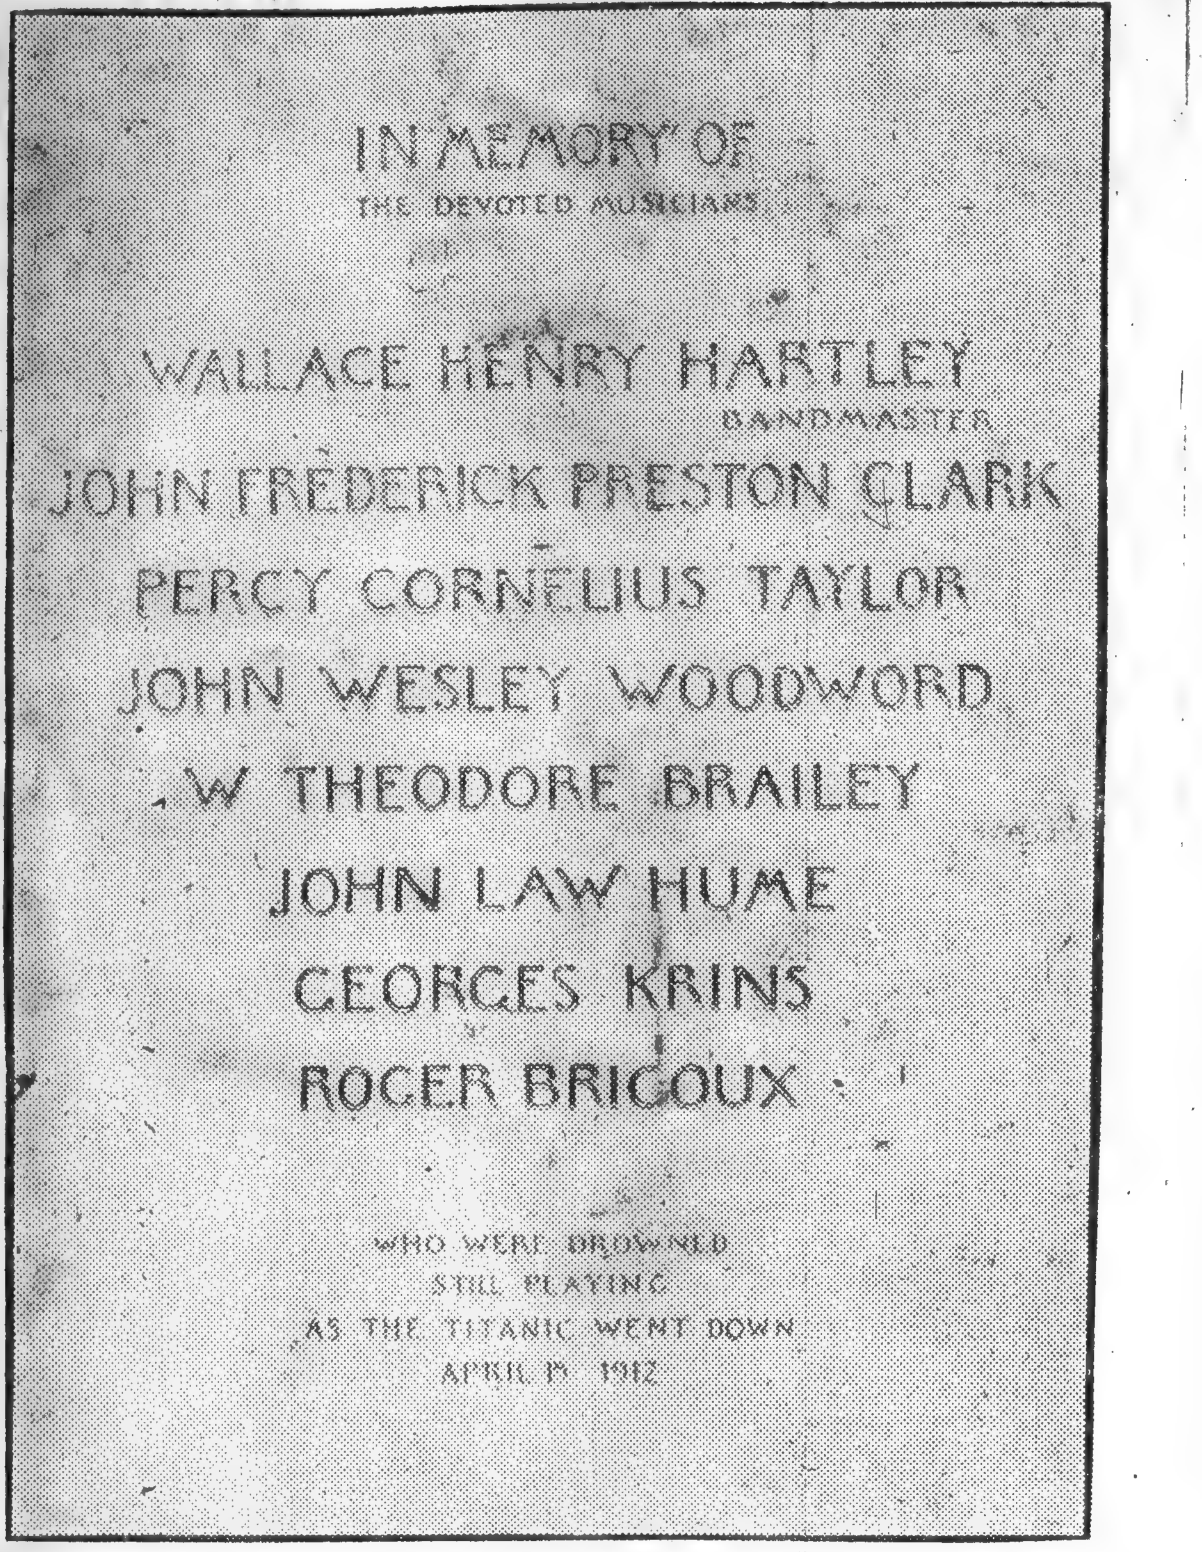
Mahler's symphonies, on the other hand, have been strangely and undeservedly ignored by the successive conductors of the Symphony Orchestra. For ten years and more, Mahler has been a composer whose established rank—to say nothing of the intrinsic interest of his music or of informed curiosity about it—warranted the performance of his symphonies here. Yet in all that time, a single one of them has been played in Boston—the fifth produced by Mr. Gericke in his final year, eagerly received, and repeated "by general request" at another pair of concerts. Dr. Muck seemed to ignore Mahler's music; Mr. Fiedler announced one or another symphony from year to year, but never played it. The excuse was that the chosen piece required a chorus or solo singers, difficult to assemble and rehearse.

It is quite true that some of Mahler's symphonies do demand s [illegible] unusual, costly and complex forces, [illegible] that conductors, in prudent fear of [illegible] exactions, are wary of them. On [illegible] other hand, more of Mahler's music [illegible] only the large orchestra that sits [illegible] in and week out in Symphony Hall [illegible] eminently fitted to play it. There [illegible] no sound reason why the sympho[illegible] so written should not, one by one, [illegible] made known here. In many a trait of [illegible] and style, Mahler is the mus[illegible] continuator of Bruckner. If Bruckne[illegible] music deserves annual performances [illegible] Bosto[illegible] by the same token Mahler's [illegible] a rig[illegible] to occasional hearing. His sy[illegible] have their shortcomings; they ha[illegible] also [illegible] individual and significant [illegible]. They have qualities that are uniqu[illegible] the music of our time. Like Bruckne[illegible] they can, on occasion, rise impressiv[illegible] hig[illegible] in scope and power of imagina[illegible] and expression. Few audiences an[illegible] have heard them uninterested a[illegible] unmoved. They gain in prestige, they [illegible] upon programmes the world over[illegible] There was no need of the interest [illegible] untimely death awakens to establish [illegible] among the eminent composers of [illegible] day. Not often has the Symphony Orc[illegible] been so neglectful. It is a blot upo[illegible] its just repute for catholicity that it s[illegible] so long and persistently have igno[illegible] Mahler's music. It is high time to h[illegible] his symphonies in Boston. We may b[illegible] belated over them, but we need not be stu[illegible] in the pride of error.

H. T. P.

SEPTEMBER 23, 1912 POST.

Marble Memorial Tablet to Musicians of Titanic



IN MEMORY OF
THE DEVOTED MUSICIANS

WALLACE HENRY HARTLEY
BANDMASTER
JOHN FREDERICK PRESTON CLARK
PERCY CORNELIUS TAYLOR
JOHN WESLEY WOODWORD
W THEODORE BRAILEY
JOHN LAW HUME
GEORGES KRINS
ROGER BRICOUX

WHO WERE DROWNED
STILL PLAYING
AS THE TITANIC WENT DOWN
APRIL 15 1912

MARBLE MEMORIAL TABLET PLACED IN THE WALL OF MASSACHUSETTS CORRIDOR AT SYMPHONY HALL, IN HONOR OF THE BRAVE MUSICIANS, WHO KEPT PLAYING WHEN THE TITANIC WENT DOWN APRIL 15.

A handsome marble tablet has been placed in Symphony Hall as a memorial to the musicians of the White Star steamship Titanic, who continued to play while the ship was sinking.

It is to set in the wall of the Massachusetts corridor. The donor prefers to remain anonymous.

Three feet, four inches long, by two feet, four inches wide, the white marble of the tablet is inscribed in letters of gold:

"In Memory of the Devoted Musicians, Wallace Henry Hartley, Bandmaster; John Frederick Preston Clark, Percy Cornelius Taylor, John Wesley Woodword, W. Theodore Brailey, John Law Hume, Georges Krins, Roger Bricoux, Who Were Drowned Still Playing as the Titanic Went Down, April 15, 1912."

The tablet is the work of John Evans & Co., of Boston.

SEPTEMBER 28, 1912 MONITOR,

DR. MUCK TO PLAY "EROICA"

New Symphony Conductor Will Open Season With Beethoven Work

Just as he was leaving Bremerhaven for New York last Tuesday, Dr. Muck cabled C. A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony orchestra, his first program which will be played on Friday afternoon, Oct. 11, and Saturday evening, Oct. 12. It comprises the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz, the symphonic poem, "Mazeppa" of Liszt and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" of Wagner. His later programs will be announced after his arrival next week, also the names of the new works he intends to produce during the season.

The first of the auction sales of season tickets to the Symphony concerts comes on next Monday morning, Sept. 30, when the $18 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold. The seats will be put up for auction in their regular order beginning with the first row on the floor and the premium at which they are bid in will be added to the upset price of $18, no more than four seats being sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be immediately resold.

The sale of the floor seats will occupy the whole morning and the balcony sale will be reached sometime between 2 and 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

The seats to be sold Monday comprise the entire floor, excepting the last nine rows, which are under the balcony; and the entire first balcony, except the last five rows, which are under the second balcony. These two lots of seats, the upset price of which is $10, will be sold on Tuesday. The second balcony is not sold for the public rehearsals, as this is held out for the 25-cent "rush" tickets sold on the day of the rehearsal.

Thursday morning beginning at 10 o'clock the $18 seats for the 24 Saturday night concerts will be sold.

The last day of the sale will be Friday, Oct. 4. Then all the rest of the seats of the house will be sold with an upset price of $10, these seats being not only the last nine rows on the floor and the last five rows in the first bal-

---

RECORD, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1912

BRILLIANT SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SEASON EXPECTED UNDER DR. MUCK'S LEADERSHIP

DR. KARL MUCK.

The opening of the 32d season of the Symphony orchestra is but three weeks away, the first rehearsal coming Oct. 11, the first concert on the following evening. The annual auction sales of season tickets will be held Sept. 30, Oct. 1, 3 and 4, at 10 a. m. On Monday the first day the $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold, on Tuesday the $10 seats. On Thursday the $18 seats for the concerts will be sold and on Friday the $10 seats. Between Oct. 11, the opening, and May 3, the orchestra will give 110 concerts exclusive of its pension fund benefits, of which there are always two. Boston will have its usual 24 public rehearsals on successive Friday afternoons and its 24 concerts on successive Saturday evenings excepting those weeks when the orchestra is out of town: Nov. 8 and 9, Dec. 6 and 7, Jan. 10, 11 and 31, Feb. 1, 21 and 22 and March 21 and 22.

Dr. Muck's Return.

Interest in the season naturally centers in the return of Dr. Muck as conductor. No man who has held this important post since the organization of the orchestra made so profound an impression on the orchestra itself and on the patrons as he did.

Soloists.

The management announces that 14 artists have been engaged to assist at as many concerts during the season. There will be five singers, Julia Culp, Marie Rappold, Elena Gerhardt, Maggie Teyte and Herbert Witherspoon; five pianists, Germaine Schnitzer, Leopold Godowsky, Max Pauer, George Proctor and Norman Wilks; three violinists, Fritz Kreisler, Anton Witek and Eugene Ysaye; one 'cellist, Otto Urack, the successor of Alwin Schroeder. The engagements of these artists have so been arranged that they will alternate as far as possible with the concerts which are purely orchestral.

Of the singers the only one who will be new to Boston is Julia Culp. Miss Culp is Dutch by birth and for several years has held a very high place among the concert singers of Europe. She is described as a mezzo soprano of unusual beauty of voice and as an artist of first rank. This will be her first season in America.

The Pianists.

A pianist whose coming has long been eagerly looked forward to by the musical public is Leopold Godowsky. He has been made the head of the piano school in the Vienna Conservatory and is today one of the leading figures in European music. His engagement with the Symphony orchestra will bring him here in the first half of the season.

A name new to Boston is that of Norman Wilks. Mr. Wilks is an English pianist, the greater part of whose career has been spent in Germany and he comes to America very highly recommended.

Another newcomer in the list if pianists is Max Pauer. He is coming to America for the first time and has been engaged by the Boston Symphony orchestra for several of its concerts.

SEPTEMBER 28, 1912

TRANSCRIPT,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Dr. Muck Makes Known His First Programme—Beethoven and Wagner, Liszt and Berlioz Upon It—The Arrangements for the Auctions of the Tickets Next Week

DR. MUCK has at last settled and forwarded the programme of the first pair of Symphony Concerts, on Friday afternoon, Oct. 11, and Saturday afternoon, Oct. 12, in which he will reappear as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. The chosen pieces are: Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Lizt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival" and, out of Wagner, the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," which Dr. Muck put on his first and his final programme in his earlier service here. Except "Mazeppa," all these are familiar pieces that suit occasions when the audiences will be more mindful of the returning conductor than of the music they are hearing under his hand. "Mazeppa," in Boston and elsewhere, is less frequently played than some other of Liszt's symphonic poems. Not Byron's familiar poem, but a passage in Hugo's "Les Orientales" suggested the subject to the composer. The verse pictures the horse to which Mazeppa has been bound, bearing him in agony over hill and plain, by night and day, among wild peoples and wild beasts and birds. Like to this ride is the ride of a mortal, upon the steed of Genius. In the music Liszt would illustrate—as the analysts say—both the realistic and the idealistic sides of the poem. Other programmes for the succeeding concerts and a list of new pieces likely to be performed through the season are expected from Dr. Muck soon after he arrives in Boston next week.

The Auctions of the Seats

The annual sales by auction of the seats for the concerts begins next Monday in Symphony Hall and about them the management makes the following announcements and explanations:

On Monday, commencing at ten o'clock, the $18 seats for the afternoon concerts will be sold. The same rules will hold this year as in past years. The seats will be put up for auction in their regular order, beginning with the first row on the floor and the premium, at which they are bid in, will be added to the upset price of $18. No more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold. The sale of the seats on the floor will occupy the whole of the morning and the seats in the first balcony will be reached between two and three o'clock in the afternoon. The seats to be sold Monday comprise the entire floor, except the last nine rows, which are under the balcony, and the entire first balcony except the last five rows, which are under the second balcony. These two lots of seats, the upset price of which is $10, will be sold for the afternoon concerts on Tuesday, beginning at ten o'clock. The second balcony is not sold for the afternoon, as this is held out for the twenty-five cent "Rush" tickets purchasable on the day of the concert.

Thursday morning, at ten o'clock, with the same rules in force, the $18 seats for the twenty-four Saturday evening concerts will be sold. They comprise the entire floor, except the nine rows of seats under the first balcony, and the entire first balcony, except the last five rows, which are under the second balcony. These seats, and the whole second balcony, which is available for the Saturday evening concerts, will be sold on Friday at an upset price of $10.

THE BOSTON TRAVELER AND EVENING HERALD, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1912.

SYMPHONY SEASON IS TO OPEN OCT. 11

Auction Sale of Seats Begins Sept. 30—Fourteen Soloists Are Engaged.

The coming season of Symphony concerts, the 32d, will open with promise of many good things with the public rehearsal on Oct. 11 and concert on Oct. 12. The prospectus issued by the orchestra shows an exceedingly attractive list of soloists and announces the return of Dr. Karl Muck, which has been looked forward to with eagerness by all lovers of music since he left Boston in 1908, after the two very memorable seasons in which he was conductor.

The annual auction sales of seats will be held on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Sept. 30, Oct. 1, 3 and 4, in Symphony Hall, at 10 A. M. On Monday the $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold, and on Tuesday the $10 seats. On Thursday the $18 seats for the concerts will be sold, and on Friday the $10 seats. While it is impossible to gauge accurately in advance the sale the orchestra will have here, there is every indication that there is more interest in the concerts this year than there has been since Dr. Muck left and that the patronage will be larger than ever.

The names of 14 soloists in all are announced. They are five singers, Julia Culp, Marie Rappold, Elena Gerhardt, Maggie Teyte and Herbert Witherspoon; five pianists, Germaine Schnitzer, Leopold Godowsky, Max Pauer, George Proctor and Norman Wilks; three violinists, Fritz Kreisler, Anton Witek and Eugene Ysaye; and one 'cellist, Otto Urack, the successor of Alwin Schroeder.

Of the singers the only one who will be new to Boston is Julia Culp. Miss Culp is Dutch by birth and for the past several years has held a very high place among the concert singers of Europe. She is described as a mezzo-soprano, of unusual beauty of voice and as an artist of first rank. This will be her first season in America.

Mme. Marie Rappold, who will be the first soloist of the season, is the well known soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, who has already appeared in Boston with the Symphony orchestra. She is an American by birth and training and she had the singular distinction of making her debut in one of the principal parts of Goldmark's "The Queen of Sheba," namely Sulamith. Since then she has taken important roles in the repertoire of the Metropolitan opera company and has become one of the favorite concert singers of this country.

Elena Gerhardt now needs no introduction in Boston, for last season, her first in America, brought her to this city several times in recital, in the Symphony concerts and at the second Pension Fund concert. Few singers have won so quickly a public here, and it is owing to that that Miss Gerhardt has been engaged to sing with the orchestra, not only in Boston, but in several other cities which it will visit.

One of the most interesting afternoons of music of last year was the recital of Debussy songs given by Miss Maggie Teyte of the Chicago Opera Company. Miss Teyte, a young Scotchwoman, first made her reputation as the successor to Mary Garden in the role of Melisande at the Opera Comique in Paris. Last year she came to this country as a member of the Chicago Grand Opera Company.

Herbert Witherspoon has appeared several times in concert here. He is, however, to make this year his first appearance here as soloist at a Symphony concert. Mr. Witherspoon is one of the leading concert bassos of this country and is a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

A pianist whose coming is looked forward to by the musical public is Leopold Godowsky. A good many years ago Godowsky was teaching in a musical college in Chicago and incidentally gave a number of recitals. He was famous then chiefly for his extraordinar technique. For the last few years h has had great success in Europe.

Miss Germaine Schnitzer, who re turns to America after an absence o several years, has been favorably re ceived in Boston and is reported to hav grown greatly in her art since leavin this country.

A name new to Boston is that of No man Wilks. Mr. Wilks is an Englis pianist, the greater part of whose ca reer has been spent in Germany and h comes to America very highly recom mended.

Another newcomer is Max Paue Pauer's father was the famous piani and pedagogue and Pauer himself is r garded in Germany as a great classic player. He is coming to America f the first time.

The fifth pianist, George Proctor, too well known in Boston to need a comment.

Of the violinists, Ysaye has not be heard in America for eight years a it is four since Kreisler was last he Kreisler is coming to America un contract with the Symphony orches which gives the orchestra his exclus services in the East. He will give recital in Boston and New York, b otherwise his only appearances will with the Boston Symphony.

Anton Witek has proved in the last t years that he is well able to mainta a place in such distinguished company.

The only 'cellist announced is the new member of the orchestra, Otto Urack, who succeeds Alwin Schroeder, sharing the first desk of the 'cellos with Heinrich Warnke. Mr. Urack, a young man still in his 20s, for the past several years has been solo 'cellist and leader of the 'cello section in the Bayreuth Festival orchestra.

Noted Singers Symphony Soloists

THREE ARTISTES TO BE HEARD THIS SEASON.

At the Left Is Julia Culp, a Mezzo-Soprano Who Is Making Her First Visit to America. At the Right, Above, Is Elena Gerhardt, Whose Success Last Season Is Still Remembered. Below Is Maggie Teyte, Who First Made Her Reputation as Mary Garden's Successor in "Melisande" at the Opera Comique in Paris.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT,

SEPTEMBER 30,

SINGLE SEAT BRINGS $61

That Is Highest for Symphony Rehearsals

This Price $17 Below Last Year's Figure

Auction Sale Likely to Average Well

Liveliest Competition for Places in Row J

Sixty-one dollars was the highest price paid at the auction sale this morning for the Friday-afternoon Symphony rehearsal seats. This price is $17 lower than was paid last year. It was bid for a single seat, J 19, while the seat sold just before this one, J 18, brought $60.

The auction was conducted in Symphony Hall by Walter Jackson. At times the bidding was spirited, competition often coming at unexpected periods, and in most cases it occurred in the case of two seats that had been occupied by the bidder several seasons.

The first seats sold were 1 and 2, at the extreme right of the hall. These brought $16.50, the same as a year ago. The next seat went at $23, and throughout the row the prices fluctuated only slightly.

Row B showed an increase, and each succeeding row of the first twelve showed a higher price than the one in front of it. The highest price paid in B was $41 for two aisle seats in the centre. The corresponding seats on the opposite side brought only $32. In row C a higher average was maintained. In D the price averaged $35 and E the figure was run up to $44 for a single seat on the aisle. Other prices were $42 which was paid for three seats on one side of the aisle, and one on the other side, $41, $39 and down to $27.

Beginning at the right of row F the first four seats brought $31, two aisle seats brought $36 and as the centre was reached the prices advanced until $54 was paid for two opposite aisle seats, 18 and 19.

Prices got for places in row G ran from $29 up to $54.50, the latter price being paid for 19, 20 and 21 at the left of the centre aisle. Row H showed a rapidly increasing scale for the high price there was $58 for three seats, two on one side of the centre aisle and one opposite. The next three places to this brought only $40. The lowest price in this row was $24. One seat, 18 in [illegible] on the aisle brought [illegible]

The record prices came in row J. Seats 1, 2, 3 and 4 brought $31, and an adjoining group of three sittings brought $35, $40 was paid for the next single seat, then $36.50 for two, $36 for the next two, $46 for four places, then $60 for the single sitting with a dollar better for the adjoining seat, 19. Other prices paid in this same row were $55, $57, $36, $35, $43, $51, $34.50 and $34 as the places were disposed off to the left.

The highest price that was paid in row K was $56 for an aisle seat. The lowest price was $27.50, showing a wide range of prices. Prices in row I ran from $28 to $49, in M from $28 to $42, as usual the high price being paid for centre aisle seats. In N they ran from $32 to $53, in O from $32.50 to $55 and this average was maintained to the end of the morning session of the auction sale.

Tomorrow forenoon at ten o'clock the $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold.

SEPTEMBER 30,

GLOBE—

SYMPHONY SEAT SALES.

Auction of Season Tickets for the Concerts Begins This Morning at the Hall at 10 O'Clock.

The first of the auction sales of season tickets for the Symphony Concerts will begin at Symphony Hall this morning at 10 o'clock. The sale includes all the seats in the hall which have the upset price of $18. These are the seats on the floor back to the balcony line; the seats on the sides of the first balcony and those in the center of the first balcony back to the second balcony line.

The sale will begin with the seats in the front of the floor and they will be sold in order. It will take at least to the intermission for luncheon at 12:30 to sell back to the broad aisle on the floor and the sale of the balcony seats, beginning with those on the right side, followed by those on the left side, and finally those in the center will begin about 2 o'clock.

The premiums bid today will be added in every case to $18 for each seat. Only four seats may be bought on one bid.

ADVERTISER.

SEPTEMBER 28,

Symphony Orchestra.

Just as he was leaving Bremerhaven for New York Tuesday Dr. Muck cabled C. A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony Orchestra, his first programme which will be played Oct. 11 and Oct. 12. It comprises the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, the Symphonic Poem, "Mazeppa" of Liszt and the prelude to Die Meistersinger.

The first of the auction sales of season tickets comes on next Monday morning, Sept. 30, when the $18 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold.

The seats to be sold Monday comprise the entire floor excepting the last nine rows, which are under the balcony, and the entire first balcony except the last five rows which are under the second balcony. These two lots of seats, the upset price of which is $10, will be sold on Tuesday.

Thursday morning the $18 seats for the 24 Saturday night concerts will be sold, the same number of seats as are sold for the rehearsals Monday. The last day of the sale will be Friday, Oct. 4. Then all the rest of the seats of the house will be sold.

TRANSCRIPT.

OCTOBER 2, 1912

DR. MUCK'S PLANS

THE CLASSICS TO MAKE HIS PROGRAMMES WHILE HE IS TUNING UP THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA—NEW PIECES BY REGER AND LESS-KNOWN COMPOSERS IN PROSPECT

This morning, at the Somerset, where Dr. Muck is living until the apartment he has taken is ready for him, the conductor added what little he could to previous announcements of his plans for the Symphony Concerts. "My first programme," he said, "is already known—the 'Eroica' symphony of Beethoven, Berlioz's 'Carneval Romain, Liszt's symphonic poem 'Mazeppa' and the Prelude to 'The Meistersinger.' All these are well-tried favorites except 'Mazeppa' which, as I understand it, has been played but once in the Symphony Concerts and that a good many years ago."

"It is possible that at my second concert—and this I shall not decide for two or three days—I shall bring out a symphony by Lenlvai, one of the younger composers of whom I think very highly. At an early concert also I shall bring out Reger's latest piece, which he calls 'A Concerto in Ancient Form,' modelled after the music of the eighteenth century. Another novelty which I shall play shortly is a Humoresque for orchestra by the Czech composer Mrazek, suggested by the 'Max und Moritz' pictures in Fliegende Blätter. It is an exceedingly entertaining bit. I have some new Russian music also in mind. My first work is to get back in touch with the orchestra, work in the new [illegible] old

THE BOSTON AMERICAN—SEPTEMBER 22, 1912

Expect Great Progress Under Conductor Carl Muck's Baton

◆◆◆ ◆◆◆ ◆◆◆

Noted Soloists Coming for Symphony Concerts This Season

Auction Sale of Seats for Boston Season to Open Sept. 30.

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

CONDUCTOR AND SOME BOSTON SYMPHONY SOLOISTS

JULIA CULP.
GARO PHOTO
DR KARL MUCH
MARIE RAPPOLD
ELENA GERHARDT
MAGGIE TEYTE

THE return of Dr. Karl Muck overshadows everything in the prospectus of the coming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, despite the announcement of a wonderful group of soloists.

Dr. Muck was a great man when he left our orchestra five years ago and went to Berlin. Today, after four years of musical leadership in Europe, he ranks as one of the very greatest of conductors. Nikisch, Muck, and Weingartner are the most famous names abroad today and of the three Muck is perhaps the greatest in solid achievement.

His return to Boston means progress for the orchestra, which many think stood still during the four years of Max Fiedler. It is practically self-supporting and enjoys a popularity throughout the United States that is amazing.

He will be called upon to give 110 concerts, exclusive of the Pension Fund benefits. Boston will have its twenty-four rehearsals and twenty-four concerts, Cambridge eight, New York ten; Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Providence five each; Hartford, Worcester and New Bedford three each, and several New England cities a single concert. Concerts will also be given in Albany, Toronto, Buffalo, Cleveland, Ann Arbor and Detroit.

The auction sale of seats begins Monday, September 30, for the Boston concerts.

Soloists Announced.

The names of fourteen soloists are announced at this time. It is possible that there may be more, for it rarely happens that a season passes without the unexpected coming of some artist who deserves a hearing with the orchestra. The engagements of these fourteen have been so made that they will very nearly alternate with the concerts which will be purely orchestral. The list consists of five singers, Julia Culp, Elena Gerhardt, Marie Rappold, Maggie Teyte and Herbert Witherspoon; five pianists, Leopold Godowsky, Max Pauer, George Proctor, Norman Wilks and Germaine Schnitzer; three violinists, Fritz Kreisler, Eugene Ysaye and Anton Witek, and one 'cellist, Otto Urack, the successor of Alwin Schroeder.

Of the singers, the only one who will be new to Boston is Julia Culp. Miss Culp is Dutch by birth, and for the past several years has held a very high place among the concert singers of Europe. She is described as a mezzo-soprano of unusual beauty of voice and as an artist of first rank. This will be her first season in America.

Elena Gerhardt now needs no introduction in Boston, for last season, her first in America, brought her to this city several times in recital, in the Symphony concerts and at the second pension fund concert.

Mme. Marie Rappold, who will be the first soloist of the season, is the well-known soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, who has already, a few years ago, appeared in Boston with the Symphony Orchestra. Mme. Rappold is an American by birth and training.

Maggie Teyte Returns.

One of the most interesting afternoons of music of last year was the recital of Debussy songs given by Miss Maggie Teyte of the Chicago Opera Company. Miss Teyte's history is fairly familiar to the musical public of this city. A young Scotchwoman, she went to Paris and first made her reputation as the successor to Mary Garden in the role of Melisande at the Opera Comique. Last year she came to this country as a member of the Chicago Grand Opera Company.

The other singer on the list, Herbert Witherspoon, has many admirers in this city through his several appearances in concert here. He is, however, to make this year his first appearance here as soloist at a Symphony Concert. Mr. Witherspoon in addition to being one of the leading concert bassos of this country is a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

A pianist whose coming has long been eagerly looked forward to by the musical public is Leopold Godowsky. A good many years ago Godowsky was teaching in a musical college in Chicago and incidentally gave throughout this country a number of recitals. He was famous then, chiefly for his extraordinary technique. Godowsky returned to Europe and for the last several years has had merely to announce a concert in Berlin, Vienna and other principal cities, to be assured of a sold-out house.

Miss Germaine Schnitzer, who returns to America after an absence of several years, will be remembered as an attractive young woman with all the technique necessary in her [illegible] rather uncommon musical perception. Few young woman pianists have been more favorably received in Boston.

A name new to Boston is that of Norman Wilks. Mr. Wilks is an English pianist, the greater part of whose career has been spent in Germany and he comes to America very highly recommended.

Another newcomer in the list of pianists is Max Pauer. Pauer's father was the famous pianist and pedagogue and Pauer himself is regarded in Germany as the greatest classical player of our time. The fifth pianist, Mr. George Proctor, is too well known in Boston to need any comment.

Ysaye and Kreisler undoubtedly today stand disputed at the head of their branch of the art of music. Ysaye has not been heard in America for eight years and it is four since Kreisler was last here. Kreisler incidentally is coming to America under contract with the Symphony Orchestra which gives the orchestra his exclusive services in the East.

Anton Witek has proved in the last two years that he is well able to maintain a place in such distinguished company.

The only cellist announced is the new member of the orchestra, Mr. Frank Urack, who succeeds Alwin Schroeder, sharing the first desk of the cellos with Heinrich Warnke. It is expected that in Mr. Urack a most valuable addition to the orchestra has been found. He is a young man, still in his twenties, for the past several years has been solo cellist and leader of the cello section in the Bayreuth Festival Orchestra.

OCTOBER 1,
TRANSCRIPT.

GOOD PRICES FOR $10 SEATS

Symphony Orchestra Rehearsal Tickets Average Better Than the Figures of Last Season's Sale

It was a comparatively small but an earnest assembly which gathered in Symphony Hall this morning for the auction sale of $10 seats for the Friday rehearsals. The business was conducted with despatch. Everybody there had a "purpose," a characteristic of all Boston women, as a stranger once said. Only nine rows on the floor and five in the balcony come within this price and from the moment Walter Jackson stationed himself before the enlarged plan he held the attention of everyone. As the bids were closed, each purchaser with the few exception of the few agents, found their way to the specified places and sat awhile, filled with happy thoughts, no doubt, of the enjoyment which is to come from hearing twenty-four superlatively fine programmes for such a comparatively small sum of money. The last four seats in S S, the half rows at the extreme back of the hall, went for $8 each. The highest price was $9.

Comparisons always come to the mind of those who attend these sales year after year. This morning, a single seat in LL, directly in the centre of the floor, brought $28. The highest in the row in front of that brought $26.50 last season, while the same seat brought a dollar less today. Altogether, the average price was slightly above last year's figures. A few aisle seats brought $25, but there were not many above $20. The six seats on each side of the balcony doors brought from $11.50 to $12.50. Next in front they went from $10.50 to $16.50. In E, the front row, the prices ranged from $25.50 to $18. These fluctuations did not always indicate more or less desirable locations, but were governed more by the mood of those who were bidding. One woman stayed after the business of the morning was concluded to ask one of the busy clerks "how it happened" that some seats, often side by side, varied so much in price. Very politely he informed her that he could not explain such a complex human problem.

There was considerable excitement in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon when Walter Jackson, the auctioneer, reached A 12, 13 and 14 on his diagram of the balcony, during the sale of $18 seats for the season. These seats are among the most desirable in the front row at the right. The premium on each finally reached $93—the record price up to that hour. Aisle seats 5, 6 and 7 brought $68; 16, 17 and 18 went at $80; 19 and 20 at $70; 25 and 26 at $81; 29, a middle seat, at $69, and the next four seats at $70.

The decrease in prices as the seats went farther away from the stage, was slight. Seat 45 brought $53, and the last seat in this row, together with the first three seats in row B, brought $81 each. 10, 11, 12 on this row cost $78. Four inside seats cost $51; the two seats adjoining $68, and number 22, $69. 23 and 24 cost $60; 26 and 27, inside seats, $50; 32, a seat well down toward the back of the hall, with 33 and 34, $55. The lowest-priced seat in this row, an inside seat, went for $45,50, and the last seats $47.50. The same price opened the sale of the seats on the back row on the right and the last seat in this row went at $40.

The left side of the balcony is considered less desirable, but the prices ranged from $43 to $67 in the front row. The front row at the back of the balcony, facing the stage, brought prices ranging from $47.50 to $50.50. The last seats on this row sold at prices ranging from $17.50 to $25.

MONITOR,
OCTOBER 2,

KARL MUCK IN BOSTON FOR SYMPHONY YEAR

Back to the English language and to an exclusively concert routine, Dr. Karl Muck, former director of the Royal opera in Berlin and present conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, expressed himself on his arrival at the Back Bay station Tuesday night as pleased with his exchange of hemispheres and as glad to be released from the responsibility that goes with directing the music of an opera house.

"I am happy to be with the orchestra again," he said, "and to have a winter of symphony interpretation. I shall conduct no opera in America. I have left opera behind me in Germany and the release from it is one of my great pleasures in coming to America."

Mrs. Muck came with Dr. Muck. They will live at the hotel Somerset.

The new Symphony leader said he expected soon to bring out new works by Lendvai and Reger.

MONITOR,

BOSTON, MASS., MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 191

MAXIMUM BID OF $60 IN THE SYMPHONY SALE

Prices slightly higher than those of last year marked the first of the auction sales of the Symphony orchestra public rehearsal seats in Symphony hall this morning, when the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals were disposed of. Bids advanced steadily row by row until the center of the hall was reached shortly before the adjournment of the auction for the luncheon period, when a maximum of $60 had been made. The highest premium paid last year was $78 and the year before $73.

The sale of $18 seats this morning included all seats on the floor except those in the last nine rows, and all in the first balcony except those in the last five rows. These make up the $10 seats and will be sold tomorrow.

[illegible] Thursday morning the $18 seats [illegible] Saturday evening concerts will [illegible] on Friday morning the $10 seats for [illegible] evening.

Seat [illegible] sale at promptly 10 [illegible] almost about 10 minutes being needed to sell an entire row.

As is usual at the Symphony hall auctions, the attendance is a shifting one, people coming and going all through the day, it being generally known when the seats in each part of the hall will go in sale. A half-hour after the first seat had been auctioned off, however, some 400 people were in attendance. Many of the audience were women.

Starting with an average of $30 for the first few rows, the selling advanced until the favorite rows, those in the center of the hall were reached, when several of the seats in the center of row J were sold at a premium of $60. Rows K, L, and M, averaged slightly lower than those figures, although they were the favorite rows last year.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, MASS., SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1912

Orchestral Programs Frequent This Year

DR. MUCK TO PRESENT 14 SOLOISTS

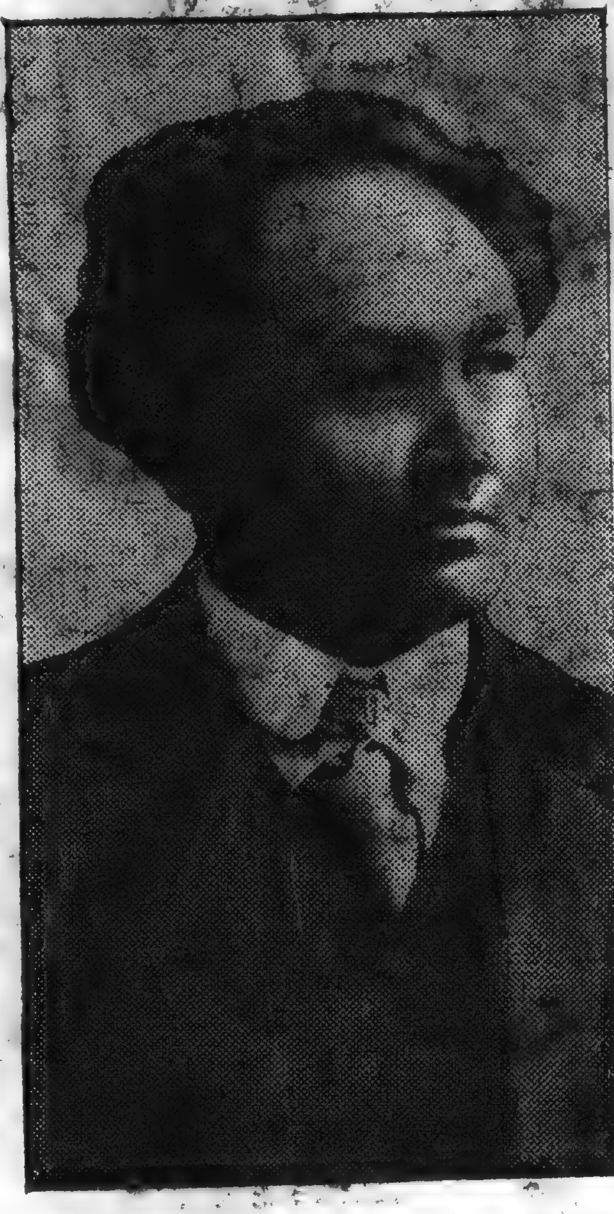
Conductor of Coming Symphony Season Has Distinguished Assisting Artists, but Will Have Large Proportion of Purely Orchestral Concerts

EACH department of solo activity in the Boston Symphony concerts this season will be freshened by the appearance of a European artist who is either new or is returning to America after a considerable absence. A new representative of the singing art is Miss Julia Culp, whose mezzo-soprano tone is said to have unusual beauty. Bringing new ideas of piano interpretation, is Leopold Godowsky, head of the piano school in the Vienna conservatory and one of the leading figures in European music. His engagement with the Symphony orchestra will bring him here in the first half of the season. Representing a style of violin playing not recently heard in the United States, comes Eugene Ysaye.

The names of 14 artists in all are announced and these represent the best in the art available in America this year. There are five singers, Julia Culp, Marie Rappold, Elena Gerhardt, Maggie Teyte and Herbert Witherspoon; five pianists, Germaine Schnitzer, Leopold Godowsky, Max Pauer, George Proctor and Norman Wilks; three violinists, Fritz Kreisler, Anton Witek and Eugene Ysaye, and one 'cellist, Otto Urack, the successsor of Alwin Schroeder in the orchestra. The programs have been arranged so that the concerts with soloist and those for orchestra alone will, as far as possible, alternate. The distinction which Dr. Muck holds as conductor makes him to all American concert purposes a soloist himself.

The Singers

Of the singers, the only one who will be new to Boston is Miss Julia Culp.



(Reproduced by permission of R. E. Johnston)
LEOPOLD GODOWSKY

(Copyright by A. Dupont, New York)
EUGENE YSAYE

Mme. Marie Rappold, who will be the first soloist of the season, is a well known soprano of the Metropolitan opera house, who has appeared before in Boston with the Symphony orchestra. Mme. Rappold is an American. She has taken important roles in the repertory of American opera and has become one of the favorite concert singers of the country. Miss Elena Gerhardt has been engaged to sing with the orchestra not only in Boston but in other cities which it will visit.

Soprano Who Presents Works of French School Appears With Orchestra

MISS MAGGIE TEYTE

Miss Maggie Teyte, a Scotch singer, went to Paris and first made her reputation in the role of Melisande at the Opera Comique. Last year she came to this country as a member of the Chicago Opera Company and gave a number of recitals. This year she will again be a member of the Chicago opera and will do much concert work. Herbert Witherspoon makes this year his first appearance here as soloist at a Symphony concert.

The Pianists

A pianist whose coming has long been looked forward to by the musical public is Leopold Godowsky. A good many years ago Mr. Godowsky was teaching in a musical college in Chicago and then he gave throughout the country a number of recitals.

Miss Germaine Schnitzer returns to Boston to appear with the orchestra and in recital.

A name new to Boston is that of Norman Wilks. Mr. Wilks is an English pianist, the greater part of whose career has been spent in Germany.

Another newcomer in the list of pianists is Max Pauer. Mr. Pauer is said to be regarded in Germany as the greatest classical player of the time. He has been engaged by the Symphony management for concerts of the tours as well as for Boston. George Proctor, the Boston pianist, is again announced.

The Violinists

The names of three violinists are announced in the prospectus. Mr. Ysaye has not been heard in America for eight years. Mr. Kreisler is coming to America under a contract which gives the orchestra his exclusive servces in the East. He will give recitals in Boston and New York, but otherwise his only appearance will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Anton Witek, the concertmaster, will play once as soloist.

The only 'cellist announced is the new member of the orchestra, Otto Urack, who succeeds Alwin Schroeder, sharing the first desk of the 'cellos with Heinrich Warnke.

New Song Interpreter Will Be Heard in Concert Halls of American Cities oto by Apeda Studio, New York)

ULIA CULP

Pianist Returning to United States to Play in Musical Centers

(Photo by Gessford, New York)
MISS GERMAINE SCHNITZER

HERALD.
OCTOBER 1.

BIDDING STEADY AT SYMPHONY

Average Higher Than Last Year —Highest Bid for Any Seat $60, Plus $18.

The sale of the $18 seats for the Symphony rehearsals took place yesterday at Symphony Hall, and lasted all day. While there were no sensational bids as there have been in previous years, the directors of the hall say that the average was higher than last year. Sixty dollars was the highest bid for any seat yesterday, which, added to the fixed price of $18, made the price of the seat $78. That was in the most popular section of the orchestra, ten or twelve rows back from the stage.

All the floor seats except the last nine rows and all the first balcony seats except the last five rows, were sold. All the other seats in the hall come under the $10 section.

While some of the seats went as low as a $21 premium, the average bid was about $30, making the price of the average seat $48. As usual the bidding was capricious. Sometimes bids on adjoining seats, which were equally desirable, varied greatly and the less desirable places occasionally brought the highest prices. In general the middle of the orchestra section in front of the transverse aisle and the balcony seats nearest the stage are considered the most desirable. The highest bid for a balcony seat was $50, in the right hand section.

The sale began promptly at 10 A. M., and 1600 seats were sold during the day. All in the orchestra brought a premium of $16.50. The audience at the opening of the sale numbered about 400, but thinned out considerably, purchasers coming and going all day. Many regular patrons of the concerts, instead of coming to the sales themselves, now buy their seats through agents, who bid for them in the usual way, so that the identity of the buyers is often not known to officials of the hall.

Today the $10 seats for the Friday rehearsals will be sold; on Thursday, the $18 seats for Saturday evening, and on Friday morning the $10 seats for the Saturday evening concerts.

, OCTOBER 3,

OURNAL-

DR. MUCK PROMISES NOVELTIES FOR PATRONS OF THE SYMPHONY

Leader Arrives in Boston and Discusses Season's Plans.

The arrival of Dr. Karl Muck in Boston and the sale beginning today of the season tickets for the Saturday evening concerts make the preliminary work of the Symphony Orchestra complete and with the rehearsals which begin next Monday, the thirty-second season will have begun.

"My plans for the season," said Dr. Muck, "are in a sense vague and indefinite, or at any rate they are not so crystallized that I care to discuss them at length. We shall have novelties, of course, but it is a fact that there are few new works of importance that Boston has not heard. This applies to works of the French composers as well as it does to those of the German School..

"I do not believe in presenting a novelty because it is new. It is not worth while to waste the time of the orchestra and try the patience of the audience on much of the new music that is being published.

Three New Works

"I have three works in mind which I will bring out in the early part of the season. One is a symphony by Lendvai, whose music, I believe, is unknown to Boston. On the other side he is held in growing esteem. I shall bring out a new Reger work which he calls "A Concerto in Ancient Style," and the third that I can mention now is a humoresque by the composer Mrazek. Readers of the principal comic paper of Germany, the Fliegende Blaetter, have for many years been familiar with the antics of "Max and Moritz" and it is on this theme that Mrazek has written his piece. I have also some Russian music which I shall play.

Well-Tried Favorites

"My first program, which is alrea announced, comprises for the most pa well tried favorites—the "Eroica" Beethoven, the 'Roman Carnival' Berlioz and the 'Meistersinger' Vorspel The other work, the symphonic poen 'Mazeppa,' I am told, has been playe only once at a Symphony concert a that a good many years ago."

DR. KARL MUCK.
Symphony Orchestra leader who arr in Boston yesterday.

"In getting the orchestra up to concert pitch, so to say, at the beginning of the season and especially at the beginning of this season, there is nothing so good as working it in the great classics. Much of the complicated modern music sounds well even when it is badly played but Beethoven, Schumann, Brahms and Mozart must be played accurately and are, therefore, outside of their value as works of art, of inestimable worth in drill."

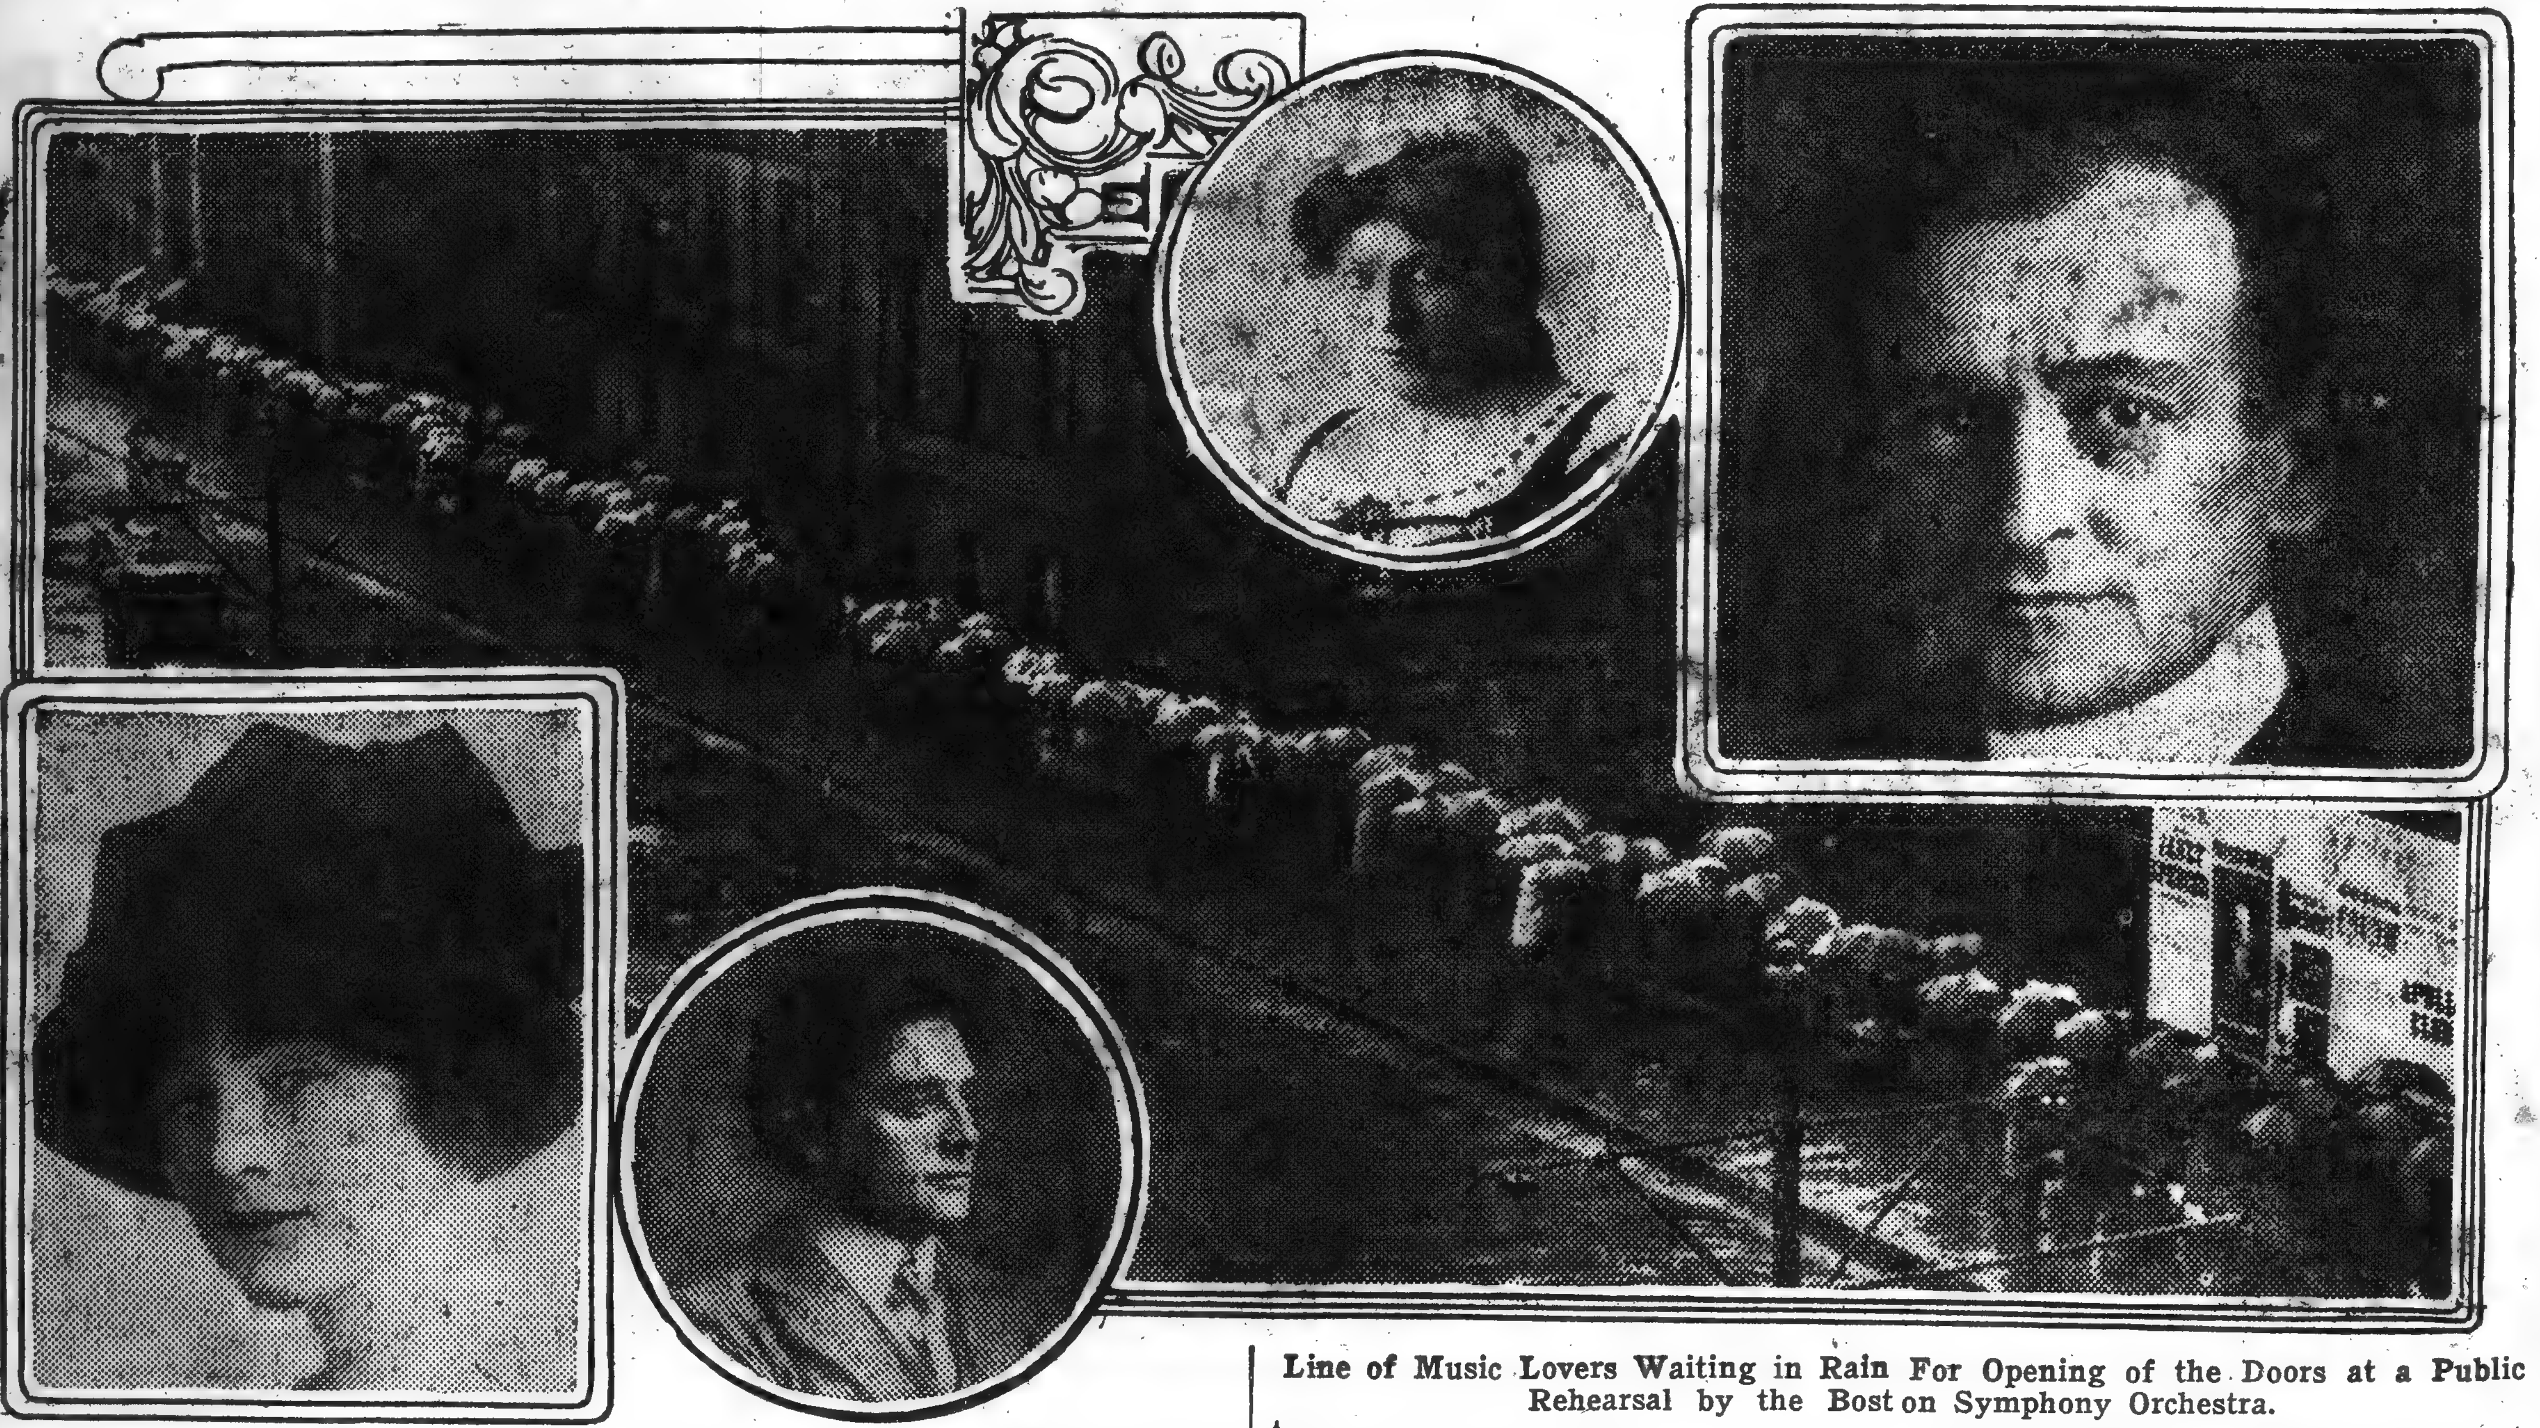
HERALD. BOSTON. SEPTEMBER 22. 1912.

DR. MUCK'S RETURN THE CHIEF FEATURE OF INTEREST IN SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SEASON

LEADER OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AND THREE OF 14 SOLOISTS ALREADY ENGAGED FOR THIS SEASON'S SERIES OF CONCERTS

Marie Rappold.

Dr. Karl Muck, Conductor.



Maggie Teyte, Soprano.

George Proctor, Pianist.

Line of Music Lovers Waiting in Rain For Opening of the Doors at a Public Rehearsal by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Appearances of Notable Soloists Also Adds Importance.

Never has a season opened with brighter promise for the Symphony orchestra than the present one. Between Oct. 11, when the first public rehearsal is given and May 3, when the last concert is given, it is planned that the orchestra shall give 110 concerts, exclusive of its pension fund concerts. Boston will have its usual allotment of 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts; Cambridge its eight concerts; New York its two series of five each; Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Brooklyn and Providence the usual series of five each; Hartford, Worcester and New Bedford, three each; with single concerts in several New England cities and the annual trip to the West in the last week of January, when six concerts will be given in Albany, Toronto, Buffalo, Cleveland, Ann Arbor and Detroit.

The public rehearsals will be given on successive Friday afternoons from Oct. 11 to May 2, omitting Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan 10 and 31, Feb. 21 and March 21, when the orchestra will be out of town. The concerts will be given on the following Saturday evenings, omitting the dates corresponding to those of the rehearsals, namely: Nov. 9, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 1 and 22 and March 22.

Dr. Muck's Return.

The chief interest in the season naturally centres in the return of Dr. Muck. It seems to be the consensus of opinion that of all the distinguished musicians who have been at the head of the Symphony orchestra since its organization, Dr. Muck showed himself more nearly the ideal man for the post of conductor than any other. Certain it was that under Dr. Muck the orchestra reached its highest point of material prosperity, a factor not to be ignored in the management of such an institution, and artistically it never rose to greater heights than during the two years of his incumbency, from the fall of 1906 to the spring of 1908. Aside from his rare endowments as a musician and conductor, the extraordinary personality of the man went far toward establishing him in the favor not merely of the public of Boston, but of the audiences in whatever cities the orchestra visited.

Those who have seen Dr. Muck during the past four years have learned that the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its welfare have always been uppermost in his mind. The changes in the personnel, which have been already noted, have been made with the single view of increasing the efficiency of the orchestra. Great care has been taken in the choice of the men to take the places of those members who have left.

Soloists of the Season.

In arranging for a series of 24 Symphony concerts to be given in one season the question of soloists has always been one of the most difficult to solve. The problem which confronts the management is to get the most representative artists and at the same time to distribute them so that there will be a constant variety to keep the attention of the patrons of the concerts. Moreover, there is a growing clientele among the patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which demands a certain number of concerts without soloists and in arranging the list for the coming season it has been the effort of the management so to make its engagements that the concerts with and without soloists will fairly alternate.

At present 14 assisting artists can be announced: Five singers, five pianists, three violinists and one 'cellist. The singers are Julia Culp, Elena Gerhardt, Marie Rappold, Maggie Teyte and Herbert Witherspoon. The pianists are Germaine Schnitzer, Leopold Godowsky, Max Pauer, George Proctor and Norman Wilks. The violinists are Fritz Kreisler, Anton Witek and Eugene Ysaye, while Otto Urack is the 'cellist. It is possible that this list may be added to before the end of the season for it usually happens that after all arrangements have been made some artist worth hearing comes to America and is given an engagement.

The Singers Engaged.

Of the singers the only one new to Boston is Julia Culp. Miss Culp is Dutch by birth and for the past several years has held a high place among the concert singers of Europe. She is a mezzo-soprano of unusual beauty of voice. This will be her first season in America.

Elena Gerhardt now needs no introduction in Boston. Few singers have won so quickly a public in this city. Miss Gerhardt has been engaged to sing with the orchestra not only in Boston but in several other cities which it will visit.

One of the most interesting vocal recitals of last year was that of songs by Debussy and other composers given by Miss Maggie Teyte of the Chicago Opera Company. The daughter of a London innkeeper, she studied in London but first made her reputation as the successor to Mary Garden in the role of Melisande at the Opera Comique, Paris. Last year she came to this country as a member of the Chicago Grand Opera Company and incidentally gave a number of recitals. This year she will again be a member of the Chicago company, but expects to do much more concert work.

Herbert Witherspoon has many admirers in this city through his concert and operatic work. In addition to being a leading concert bass he is a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company and in the last three years has created parts in Converse's "Pipe of Desire" and Parker's "Mona."

Madame Marie Rappold, who will be the first soloist of the season, is the well known soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House who a few years ago appeared in Boston with the Symphony Orchestra. Madame Rappold is an American by birth and training and she had the singular distinction of making her debut in one of the principal parts of Goldmark's "The Queen of Sheba," namely, Sulamith. Since then she has taken important roles in the repertoire of the Metropolitan Opera and has become one of the favorite concert singers of this country.

Five Pianists.

A good many years ago, Leopold Godowsky was teaching in Chicago and he gave recitals throughout this country. He was famous then chiefly for his extraordinary technique. Godowsky returned to Europe and for the last several years has had merely to announce a concert in Berlin, Vienna and other principal cities, to be assured of a sold-out house. He has been made the head of the piano school in the Vienna Conservatory. His engagement with the Symphony Orchestra will bring him here in the first half of the season.

Miss Germaine Schnitzer, who returns to America after an absence of several years, will be remembered as an attractive young woman with all the technique necessary in her art and a rather uncommon musical perception. Few young women pianists have been more favorably received in Boston and according to reports she has grown greatly in her art since leaving this country.

Norman Wilks is an English pianist, the greater part of whose career has been spent in Germany. He comes highly recommended.

Another newcomer is Max Pauer, whose father was a famous pianist and pedagogue. Pauer himself is regarded in Germany as one of the greatest classical players of our time. He is coming to America for the first time and has been engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for several concerts.

The fifth pianist, George Proctor, is too well known in Boston to need any comment.

The Violinists.

While the names of only three violinists are announced in the prospectus, these three are of extraordinary importance and it is not without pride that the Symphony Orchestra counts one of them as its concert-master. Ysaye and Kreisler undoubtedly today stand undisputed at the head of violinists. Ysaye has not been heard in America for eight years and it is four since Kreisler was last here. Kreisler is coming to America under contract with the Symphony Orchestra which gives the orchestra his exclusive services in the East. He will give a recital in Boston and one in New York, but otherwise his only appearance will be with the Boston Symphony. Anton Witek has proved that he is well able to maintain a place in such distinguished company.

The only 'cellist announced is the new member of the orchestra, Otto Urack, who succeeds Alwin Schroeder, and shares the first desk of the 'cellos with Heinrich Warnke. He is a young man, still in his twenties. For several years he has been solo 'cellist and leader of the 'cello section in the Bayreuth Festival Orchestra and is famous in Germany and Austria as a virtuoso. He also is esteemed as a conductor.

VOCAL AND INSTRUMENTAL SOLOISTS WHO WILL APPEAR WITH SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA THIS SEASON

Julia Culp, Mezzo Soprano.
Elena Gerhardt
Maggie Teyte
Marie Rappold, Soprano.
Herbert Witherspoon, Bass.
Fritz Kreisler, Violin.
Anton Witek, Violin.
Eugene Ysaye, Violin.
Otto Urack, 'Cello.
Miss Germaine Schnitzer, Piano.
Leopold Godowsky, Piano.
Max Pauer, Piano.
George Proctor, Piano.
Norman Wilks, Piano.

OCTOBER 1.
JOURNAL—

$60 PREMIUM FOR SYMPHONY SEAT

High Record Yesterday, However, Was Lowest in Years at Auction.

It is evident from the opening sale of Boston Symphony Orchestra season tickets yesterday morning that music lovers his year expect more light, sweet strains and less of the boisterous in the programs during the winter. Whereas the most popular tickets in the house for the Friday afternoon rehearsals have formerly been in L, M, N or P, this year the center of attraction, judged by the premiums offered at the auction, has advanced three or four rows toward the orchestra.

The highest premium bid yesterday morning, when only the $18 floor seats for Friday afternoons were on sale, was $60 for a single seat in row J on the center aisle. This high record is the lowest in years, that last year being $78 for a seat a row farther back. Far from disconcerting the management this lack of extremely high bids was welcomed, for the average was, they said, slightly higher than last year. Fantastically high bids, they declare, scare away people from the auctions.

There was no hesitation in the bids from the opening, when the first seat, A1, went for the greatest bargain price of the morning, at $16.50 premium. This ideal row for persons slightly affected as to hearing, and with beautiful gowns to show, went for premiums of from the first price to $23, the highest.

The women folk, who were in the majority at Symphony Hall, where the seats were sold from diagram, went afer the second row as if bargain hunting. Sentiment evidently counted to the possessors of two seats on the center aisle, for when they went on sale there was spirited bidding that shot the price up to $40 bid on each seat. Four seats a little farther along went for $25 premium each.

During the sale of row C there was a slight calm and the seats averaged about $27 each premium and in D about $35. The prices crept up on the center aisle seats in E with $44 premium bid on a single seat. The more desirable seats in F, which evidently had sentimental value to those that have had them for several seasons, went at $54 premium each for two seats in the center, making a total of $72 for each seat, actual cost.

The sale of the balcony seats, which are proving more popular even than the floor, went on sale yesterday afternoon, and today the sale of the Saturday afternoon and evening performance tickets will take place.

Four Women Among Aliens

OCTOBER 1,
GLOBE—

ONE SEAT AT $60 PREMIUM.

First Day of Symphony Sale Shows Two New Forces at Work Among Bidders.

It was evident at the opening sale of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season tickets at Symphony Hall yesterday, that lovers of music expect more light, sweet strains and less of the boisterous in the Winter's programs, and that monied women, not exactly content with the rule that forces them to remove their hats in the concert hall, are willing to pay fancy prices for seats where, although somewhat obscure, they may keep on their headgear.

What have been previously the most popular rows in the hall have had to give way this time to rows much farther forward. In price even these once favorite seats in the house average little more than those in the third row of the side balconies, up against the wall.

The highest premium bid for a seat yesterday when only the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals were on sale, was $60, making a total price of $78 for a single seat in row J on the floor, well forward. This figure is much lower than the record of other years, but the management says the average premiums this year is rather higher than usual.

Women were in the majority throughout yesterday's sales and the satisfaction of some when they succeeded in getting balcony seats was particularly evident, for almost as soon as the hammer fell, giving a party of women seats, a procession as of a conquering army started for the balcony, where the seats were found and tested. Hands were waved in exultation by the fair conquerors at their friends on the floor below.

The auction was a thoroughly business-like performance, bids pouring in in lively fashion from the stroke of 10 in the morning until the last seat was sold at 6 in the evening, with only a short recess at 1 o'clock.

The first seat put up and pointed on the huge diagram on the stage, A 1, proved the bargain seat of the day, going at $16.50 premium. The first row in the floor, the ideal one for persons afflicted as to hearing and with beautiful gowns to show, went at premiums from this first low figure up to $23.

The women in the audience went after the second row like bargain hunters, and prices advanced. There was evidently sentiment connected with two seats in the center on the aisle, for there was a battle between two bidders which ran the premiums up to $44 on each seat, while the seats next to them went for $25 each. Prices kept advancing as the distance from the orchestra increased until the high water mark was reached in J, where the $60 premium was offered.

Rows L, M, N and O have in previous years been the highest [illegible]

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1912

The Year at the Symphonies

Dr. Muck's Season

By H. T. P.

ABOVE all else, in the prospectus issued today for the Symphony Concerts of next winter, stands the return of Dr. Muck as conductor. Under him, in his two years of service from the autumn of 1906 through the spring of 1908, the Symphony Orchestra, at home and abroad, reached its highest pitch of artistic excellence and material prosperity. Never before had it played with such fulness of technical attainment, beauty and euphony of tone, and variety and sensitiveness of expression. Never before had its audiences seemed to find such pleasure in its concerts. With his work little more than begun, with many an ambition unfulfilled, the obligations of contract compelled the return of Dr. Muck to the opera house at Berlin. Last spring the contract that bound him there expired and a fortnight hence he will come back to Boston to the post that he prefers above any other and in which he expects to spend at least five years of his present maturity.

With a conductor that interests and holds his hearers as does Dr. Muck, there are likely to be more concerts without assisting soloists than there have been in recent seasons. For the present, fourteen are announced for the twenty-four pairs of concerts in Boston, with the prospect of an addition or two from the distinguished singers and virtuosi that the course of the season may bring. The singers engaged are Mmes. Culp and Gerhardt, of the first rank in the concert-rooms of Europe; Miss Teyte of the Chicago-Philadelphia Opera Company; and Mme. Rappold and Mr. Witherspoon of the Metropolitan Opera House. The pianists comprise Mr. Godowsky, returning at last to America with accumulated years of European celebrity; Miss Schnitzer, one of the few women who are virtuose of distinction; Mr. Pauer, of high reputation in German concert-halls; Mr. Proctor, whose appearance was deferred last winter and Mr. Norman Wilks, a young Englishman who is making his way in London. Two of the violinists are of the first flight—the long-absent Ysaye and Mr. Kreisler. From the orchestra itself for soloists will come Mr. Witek, the concert-master and Mr. Urack, the new first 'cellist. Finally, the arrangements for the concerts of the orchestra, here and elsewhere, remain much as they have been in previous years.

The Work of the Season

In all, the orchestra will undertake 110 concerts between next October and next May—a few less than it gave last season, because one of the two "trips" that it then made into the Middle West, has been abandoned. As usual, twenty-four pairs will make the series in Boston, half on Friday afternoons and half on Saturday evenings, with two additional concerts, on Sunday evenings, for the Pension Fund of the orchestra. The afternoon concerts will begin, on Friday, Oct. 11 and end on Friday, May 2; but the journeys of the orchestra to New York and to the West will break the series on Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Jan. 31, Feb. 21 and March 21. The evening concerts will begin on Saturday, Oct. 12 and continue through Saturday, May 3, with corresponding breaks on Nov. 9, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 1, Feb. 22 and March 22. As it happens, there will be no necessity this season to shift the concert that would fall on the afternoon of Good Friday, March 21, as the orchestra will then be absent on a journey to New York. Nor will Christmas Day, which falls on a Wednesday, trouble the course of the concerts. The hours of beginning—2.30 in the afternoon and eight in the evening—remain unchanged, in spite of some desire for fifteen minutes more grace at night. If Dr. Muck orders his programmes, as he did five and six years ago, the concerts will run for the hour and three-quarters that he and Mr. Fiedler gradually established as the standard of length.

Outside of Boston, the orchestra will give the usual ten concerts of previous years in New York, and the usual five in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn, with the "trips" to these cities falling at monthly intervals from November through March. In the last week of January it will journey westward for concerts in Albany, Toronto, Buffalo, Cleveland, Ann Arbor and Detroit. In New England it will undertake five concerts in Providence, three in Hartford, Worcester and New Bedford respectively, and pay occasional visits to other cities. In Cambridge, of course, there will be the usual eight concerts in Sanders Theatre under the auspices of the university.

The New Players

The players in the orchestra will number 101 and most of the changes in the personnel of the band were specified a week ago in this place. They will bring to the orchestra sundry new violinists and violoncellists among the strings, and new players for flute, oboe, horn and bassoon in the wind-choir. Some of the retiring players have withdrawn to go elsewhere or to follow other occupations. The rest have completed the term of service that entitles them to leisure and a pension. Dr. Muck has himself engaged the incoming men. The new flutist and the new oboist are Frenchmen, since Paris best schools players upon wind instruments and seems to nurture a natural aptitude for them. The rest of the newcomers are Germans and two of them, Mr. Urack, the first 'cellist and Mr. Habernichl, the leader of the second violins, are men of high individual reputation. Dr. Muck's standards are exacting and nearly all of the new blood is young blood. By both circumstances the orchestra should be the gainer. Unfortunately from some points of view, a second harp, now usual in symphonic and operatic orchestras of the first rank, the world over, has not been added to the band, and when two harps are necessary to a modern score, it will rely, as hitherto, upon chance assistance.

The Coming Singers

Well-known and well-liked singers from established opera houses are presumed to add zest to a symphony concert, and they are engaged accordingly. But it is still more incumbent upon a symphony orchestra to encourage the relatively few singers of note, who confine themselves to the concert-room. Of such are Miss Culp and Miss Gerhardt, who are to appear at the Symphony Concerts at the middle of the season. Both are distinguished singers of their kind in Europe; Miss Gerhardt has already paid one visit to America; and Miss Culp will come next winter for her first tour. At song recitals and at Symphony Concerts our public appreciated last winter the richness of Miss Gerhardt's voice, her skill in clear and significant diction, and her ability to impart the mood and atmosphere, the picture or the passion of her pieces. Miss Gerhardt succeeded best with songs of static mood and reflective emotion. Miss Culp, though she confines herself to the concert room, is of more dramatic temper. Her voice is a mezza-soprano, long of range and varied of color. She is mistress alike of the older Italian and French opera and of classical and contemporary German songs. Her musical intelligence goes hand in hand with keen poetic and dramatizing imagination, and she is able to make effects—as the phrase is—yet to keep them simple and sincere. Altogether, she is the notable new comer to the Symphony Concerts.

From the opera houses come the other three singers: Mmes. Teyte and Rappold and Mr. Witherspoon. Miss Teyte is of the youngest generation and she is known here at first hand only by her recitals of French songs last winter. She seemed then a curious and vivid personality, with an unusual and sometimes a fascinating voice, and with no little understanding and sense of style in the singing of ultra-modern French music. Presumably in an orchestral concert she will sing music of larger dimensions, as befits her experience and reputation in the opera houses of Paris, London and Chicago. Mr. Witherspoon will be that rarity at the Symphony Concerts, a singer of the male sex. Apparently there is not the smallest reason in the world why deserving "men singers" should not appear there. It is a fact, none the less, that of recent years they have been few and far between. Better still from the point of view of rarity. Mr. Witherspoon is not a tenor or a baritone, but a bass. Long before he joined the Metropolitan Company he had won his place as an able concert-singer. From the Metropolitan also comes Mme. Rappold. Called hastily to the Symphony Concerts to meet an emergency two or three years ago, she pleased her audiences. To the second pair of concerts of the new season, she can now come unhastened and well prepared.

Elder Violinists

After the youthful Elman and Zimbalist of recent years, the elder generation of violinists will now return to the Symphony Concerts. Comparatively early in the season. Mr. Kreisler will play at them; comparatively late will come Ysaye. Mr. Kreisler, who has remained in Europe for two or three seasons, returns for a brief visit, which he will devote largely to the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in Boston and in other cities. He stands now in the maturity of powers that unite fineness and brilliance, beauty of tone and grave intensity of expression. It is long since Ysaye has visited America. It is easy to believe that he may never again revisit it after his impending tour. He is now, as he was in the past, a master of the larger power and the more glowing beauty of his instrument, rich in sensuous feeling, and a picturesque personality withal. From the orchestra itself will come the other solo violinist—Mr. Witek, the concert-master, but the proved virtuoso and musician under such exacting tests as the concertos of Beethoven and Brahms.

Pianists A-Plenty

As Ysaye, among the violinists, returns after long absence, so does Mr. Godowsky among the pianists. He made his first reputation in America; he departed into Europe to increase it. There it has risen high. As a technician, only Rosenthal among contemporary pianists is comparable with him. He excels in finely graduated tonal color and in the felicity of touch that lies behind these shadings. He is luminous in exposition of his music. He has increased with the ripening years in poetic sensibility. As an unusually young and unheralded pianist, Miss Schnitzer played in Boston a few years ago for the first time in America, and her audience was quick to discover in her an unusual warmth of temperament, a corresponding ardor of expression and a power that was neither masculine nor feminine, but of a born musician and a born pianist. Miss Schnitzer returned once to America, and added new poise and perception to the old ardor and power. Once more, presumably, she will come back ripened. Mr. Pauer, in turn, who will come to America for the first time, has made high and characteristic reputation in Germany—the "classical" reputation dear to Teutonic audiences and Teutonic pianists. It is not his technique, his intensity or his individuality of expression that his German audiences have praised, but the just understanding, the just expression and the sufficient resource of every sort that he brings to the classic concertos and sonatas. For the rest, Mr. Proctor, prevented by circumstance from his announced appearance with the orchestra last year, will play with it this season and so resident musicians will have their place among the soloists. From London, blessed with much approval in high places, comes Mr. Norman Wilks, a young Englishman. Sir Henry Wood, the conductor, who does not love pianists as a musical species, though he endures them in his concerts, has warmly recommended him.

The Dominating Muck

In the end, as in the beginning, it is upon Dr. Muck that the concerts will depend. His return restores the orchestra to a conductor of the first rank such as its prestige deserves and requires. It sets over the band an exacting and also an appreciative master at a time when it needs such a guiding hand. Dr. Muck will not rest until he has gained the quality of tone, the euphonious and significant balance of parts, the elegance or the intensity of phrase, the precision of accent, the swing of rhythm, the suspensive climax that his sensitive ear and his musical perception demand. Yet he has the faculty, in the puzzling psychology of conducting, that persuades his orchestra to these virtues rather than drives it to them.

From Dr. Muck, too, they will receive the finely differentiating sense of style and expression that gives to each sort of music its characteristic voice and quality. Dr. Muck not only chooses pieces with a catholic and wide-ranging choice; but he appreciates and reveals them with as catholic an understanding and expression. The music speaks through him as through a transparent medium, yet in the process it has felt the finesse and the power, the just understanding and the emotional response, the musically sensuous ear, the musically discriminating mind, the polished aptitude and the tireless vitality that are singularly united in him. Speak as the music may with its own voice, yet in its intonations is Dr. Muck's personality—unique and uniquely controlled among the conductors of our time. We who "sit under him" may have our reservations about his programmes ordered according to that reasoned but somewhat mysterious "unification" that he used to follow. For the personality and for the conductor most of us have only admiration.

ADVERTISER.

OCTOBER 3.

MANY NOVELTIES ONLY WASTE OF TIME

Dr. Muck, Back for Symphony Work, Says There Are Few Musical Productions of Importance Not Already Heard Here.

The arrival of Dr. Karl Muck in Boston and the sale beginning today of the season tickets for the Saturday evening concerts make the preliminary work of the Symphony orchestra complete, and with the rehearsals which begin next Monday the 32d season will have begun.

Dr. Muck arrived in Boston very tired after an unusually stormy voyage across in the Kronprinzessin Cecilie. Dr. and Mrs. Muck are temporarily at the Hotel Somerset, but they are expecting the arrival of their furniture from Germany in a few days and hope to be permanently settled in their new apartment in Commonwealth ave. within the next week or 10 days.

Dr. Muck expressed himself as being unwilling at this time to say much about his plans for the coming season. As he puts it, his first work is to get again in touch with the orchestra and, with the numerous new members that have joined it this season, there must necessarily be a large amount of preliminary drill to get the [illegible] running order.

"My plans for the season," said Dr. Muck, "are in a sense vague and indefinite, or, at any rate, they are not so crystallized that I care to discuss them at length. We shall have novelties, of course, but it is a fact that there are few new works of importance that Boston has not heard. This applies to works of the French composers as well as it does to those of the German school.

"I do not believe in presenting a novelty simply because it is new. It is not worth while to waste the time of the orchestra and try the patience of the audience on much of the new music that is being published.

"I have three works in mind which I will bring out in the early part of the season. One is a symphony by Lendvai, whose music, I believe, is unknown to Boston. On the other side he is held in growing esteem. I shall bring out a new Reger work which he calls 'A Concerto in Ancient Style,' and the third that I can mention now is a Humoresque by the composer Mrazek. I have also some Russian music which I shall play."

Dr. Muck was asked if he purposed bringing out any music by Schoenberg, who is the reigning sensation of Germany. He smiled blandly and said that he personally could not understand such music.

The auction sale today will dispose of the $18 seats for the concerts and will begin promptly at 10 a.m.

OCTOBER 2, HERALD,

MUCK'S ENGLISH FLUENT NOW

Symphony Conductor and Wife Express Pleasure on Return to Boston.

Dr. Karl Muck of the Boston Symphony orchestra and Mrs. Muck arrived at the Trinity Court station at 9:55 last evening from New York, after a trying journey from Germany. They were met by a group of friends, including G. W. Chadwick, director of the New England Conservatory of Music; Mrs. Chadwick, Charles E. Ellis, W. E. Walter and Carl Stasny.

"I am glad to be back," said Dr. Muck to a Herald reporter, in much more fluent English than he spoke when in Boston several years ago. "We had a bad journey"—he gesticulated with a cigarette in one hand and a travelling rug under the other arm—"rough! Yes, I am very glad to be back in Boston."

Dressed in a rough travelling coat and a soft felt hat, and laughing as he greeted one after the other of his friends, Dr. Muck looked looked like a happy-go-lucky boy out of school—a very different figure from the grave and distinguished personage whom his audiences see on the stage of Symphony Hall.

Mrs. Muck was radiant, and charmed to be back, and charmed with everything. "But we are tired!" she admitted.

OCTOBER 2,
TRANSCRIPT,

MUSIC AND MUSICIA

A UNIQUE GOAL FOR A UNI ORCHESTRA

A Word About Dr. Muck's Standards— Course with "Novelties"—The Pieces Prospect—Rosenthal, the Pianist, to R visit America—More Particulars of t Season at the Metropolitan — A To Poem in Travesty—Items About Ope

LAST evening, after a troubled voyag Dr. Muck returned to Boston ar when a week hence he resumes h work as the conductor of th Symphony Orchestra, he will set about with a naturally unspoken, but no le easily inferred ambition. In the two seasons of 1906 and 1907 that he first spe here, the orchestra and his work with more and more interested him. He believed that he saw unrealized possibilitie in the band and in the position it ha come to occupy in America and in Europe He made the most of them in his firs term of service. He has thought much about them during the four intervening years, and he has come back now, with a long and undisturbed future before him to bring these unspoken but much pondered ideals as near to fulfilment as he may. It is not enough for him that the Symphony Orchestra should rank with the foremost orchestras of Europe or even outrank them. He would have it a unique orchestra, playing under every test and in every quality, perhaps as no orchestra has played before. It should be its own standard.

All this may be only the dream and vision, the spurring ideal, under which most fine-spirited men work, but the opportunity for fulfilment is as unique as the goal. The conductor of the Symphony Orchestra chooses his own players with thought only of its needs and with the prestige of the band to strengthen his call and to kindle their zeal. He is unquestioned and free-handed master at rehearsals and in concerts. His voice decides every material matter of artistic policy. Behind him is sufficient financial resource. Before him is an established and attuned public. No orchestra in the world enjoys such a unique position. No wonder that it stimulates in its conductor as unique an ambition. H. T. P.

NEWS OF MUSIC

Dr. Muck's Programmes

DR. MUCK has found little time as yet to consider the scope of his programmes for the Symphony Concerts and the new or the novel pieces with which he will intersperse them. For two months in the summer he was at work at Baireuth and elsewhere. Rightly he kept his month's holiday a holiday, and before he left Berlin a week ago, he was busy with the necessary adjustment of his affairs to a long absence. Moreover, before he arranges a considerable number of programmes and determines the new music upon them, he has to weigh various matters of which he could learn only after his arrival here. Naturally, his first concern is with the orchestra itself. Almost a sixth of the players this year are new to it; and the conductor himself returns after an interval of four years. He has, then, first to adjust and smooth the band into a precisely working machine and then to make it sensitive to his hand in qualities of tone and expression. "For purposes of this kind," as he justly says, "there is nothing to compare with the classics. A modern piece can be played very carelessly and yet make an impression, but with Beethoven, Schumann, Brahms and Mozart every part tells and no slip goes unnoticed."

Accordingly, during this "tuning-up" process, Dr. Muck will make his programmes chiefly of familiar music. Already, however, he has three new pieces in mind for early performance. One is a symphony by Lendvai, a rising young composer, whose music has been well received in Germany and of whom Dr. Muck thinks highly. Another is Reger's "Concerto" for small orchestra, written in the eighteenth-century form, and the third is a "Humoresque" by the Bohemian, Mrazek. According to Dr. Muck, it is exceedingly amusing music, and by way of a new source for composers' inspiration, it was suggested by the comical "Max und Moritz" pictures in "Der Fliegende Blätter," of the wiles and whims of two playful German urchins. There are new Russian pieces in prospect, too, but Dr. Muck finds that most of the interesting new music by French and German composers has already been heard here while no more than in the past does he believe in producing "novelties" because they happen to be new —and dull.

, OCTOBER 2, HERALD,

DR. MUCK TALKS OF SEASON'S PLANS

Has Two Novelties Scheduled He Believes of Special Merit.

Dr. Karl Muck and Mrs. Muck are in Boston today at the Somerset Hotel, where they will live until their apartment in Commonwealth avenue is ready.

Regarding his plans for the season Dr. Muck said that he had not yet got them so in shape that he cared to make any formal announcement.

"In the matter of novelties," he said, "Boston seems to have heard every new work of any great value whether it is French or German. I do not believe in giving novelties simply because they are novelties, but I have some which I shall play during the season.

"You must understand that I have been away from the orchestra for four years, and that this year there is a considerable number of new members and the first work of a conductor under such conditions is to get things working smoothly.

"My first program is already announced—the "Eroica" of Beethoven, Berlioz's "Carneval Romain," Liszt's Symphonic Poem "Mazeppa" and the prelude to "The Meistersinger." All of these are well-tried favorites, except the "Mazeppa," which, as I understand it, has been played but once in the Symphony concerts and that a good many years ago.

"It is possible that at my second concert—and this, I shall not decide for two or three days—I shall bring out a symphony by Lendvai, one of the younger composers of whom I think very highly. At an early concert also, I shall bring out Reger's latest work which he calls "A Concerto in Ancient Form," modelled after the music of the 18th century. Another novelty which I shall bring out shortly is a Humoresque for orchestra by the Czech composer Mrazek."

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY SALE

The general sale of tickets for the eight symphony concerts in Cambridge will open tomorrow morning at Kent's University book store, Harvard square. The concerts will come on Thursday evenings, as in the past, the dates being Oct. 17, Nov. 14, Dec. 12, Jan. 16, Feb. 6 and 27, March 27 and April 24.

SEPTEMBER 30,
ADVERTISER,

BOSTON SYMPHONY SALES.

The first of the auction sales of season tickets for the Symphony concerts will begin at Symphony hall this morning at 10 a.m. The sale includes all the seats in the hall which have the upset price of $18. These are the seats on the floor back to the balcony line; the seats on the sides of the balcony and those in the centre of the first balcony back to the second balcony line. The sale will begin with the seats in the front of the floor and they will be sold in order. It will take at least to the intermission for luncheon at 12.30 p.m. to sell back to the broad aisle on the floor and the sale of the balcony seats, beginning with those on the right side followed by those on the left side, and finally those in the centre will begin about 2 p.m.

SEPTEMBER 11, 1912
TRANSCRIPT,

Items of the Day

By common report among the ticket brokers of the city, present orders to them for seats for the new series of Symphony Concerts are more numerous than those of any previous season. They authorize besides higher premiums at the approaching auctions. Meanwhile, in New York, Carnegie Hall has been almost entirely taken by subscription for the ten concerts that the orchestra announces there. So much for the return of Dr. Muck.

According to Le Temps in Paris, when "La Foret Bleue" is produced at the Boston Opera House next winter, Aubert, the composer of the piece, will come hither to supervise the rehearsals and to be present at the first performance. Mr. Caplet, however, will prepare the opera and conduct in it.

OCTOBER 3,
POST,

DR. KARL MUCK REACHES HUB

Rehearsals at Symphony to Begin Monday

The arrival of Dr. Karl Muck in Boston and the sale beginning today of season tickets for the Saturday evening concerts make the preliminary work of the Symphony Orchestra complete, and with the rehearsals, which begin Monday, the 32d season will have begun.

Dr. Muck arrived in Boston very tired after an unusually stormy voyage across on the Kronprinzessin Cecelie. With him came Mrs. Muck and the little Boston terrier which he took from this city four years ago and since that time has been a most important member of his household.

Dr. and Mrs. Muck are temporarily at the Hotel Somerset, but they are expecting the arrival of their furniture from Germany in a few days and hope to be permanently settled in their new apartment on Commonwealth avenue within the next week or 10 days.

Dr. Muck expressed himself as being unwilling at this time to say much about his plans for the coming season. As he put it, his first work is to get again in touch with the orchestra and with the numerous new members that have joined it this season.

HERALD,
OCTOBER 2,

DR. KARL MUCK.

Dr. Karl Muck returns at last to the city that already holds him in high honor. As the true eminence of a town does not consist in ships, warehouses, commercial wealth, ever increasing traffic, although these are to be desired as means to an end, but in the character of the leading citizens the return is doubly welcome.

The present conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who will surely hold the position for several years, and it is to be hoped for a longer period, is ranked by universal consent among the few great orchestral leaders of the world. His reputation has been honestly earned and spotlessly maintained. He never put his trust in too personal and egoistic interpretation of composers' works. He did not win the easily acquired fame that follows the exhibition of mannerisms, eccentricity, or laboriously planned sensationalism. His individuality is marked; it is fascinating; it is dominating; but it has always been exerted nobly in the service of art.

A born leader of men, magnetic, Dr. Muck is more than master of orchestra and audiences; he is master of himself. Whether the paradox of Diderot may be applied to an orchestral conductor, is a subject for academic discussion. It will be readily granted, however, that a conductor should not himself be tempest-tossed. Though he ride in the whirlwind, he must direct the storm.

Dr. Muck is more than a brilliant and poetic conductor, a wise disciplinarian, a musician of most catholic taste, not blinded by prejudice of school or nationality. He would have adorned any profession. His native qualities, his unflagging industry, his indomitable will, would have led him to success in the learned professions or in governmental office. That such a man is to be counted again among the dwellers in Boston is a cause for civic rejoicing; and as the Symphony Orchestra is also a national glory, the lovers of music throughout the land may well be glad and clap their hands.

OCTOBER 4,
MONITOR,

SEASON SEATS FOR SYMPHONY ARE ALL SOLD

Sales of Symphony orchestra season seats closed today with the disposal of the $10 seats for the Saturday evening concerts in Symphony hall. Beginning with an everage premium of $7 for the row directly back of the $18 seats, the bidding ranged to $3 and $4 in the last rows and those in the balconies.

The highest premium paid yesterday was $42.50 each for two seats in K on the center aisle. They went to a buyer who has had the same seats for years.

Seats in row N were started at $25 and ran up to $40, and others in the same row went for all the way from $16 to $21. Seats farther forward, as F, G, and H, brought premiums ranging from $14.50 to $16.

Back in row P seats brought premiums from $17 to $30. A side aisle seat in R brought $33.50. Manw seats as near the stage as E, F and G went for $5.50 premium, and many others brought from $10 to $20.

Prices for seats have been slightly higher for all the sales this year, due largely to the added interest lent by the presence of Dr. Karl Muck as conductor.

, OCTOBER 5,

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR,

* * *

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, gives the first public rehearsal and the first concert of its thirty-second season Friday afternoon, Oct. 11 at 2:30 o'clock and Saturday evening, Oct. 12, at 8 o'clock. Dr. Muck begins his practise work with the orchestra Monday morning. For the first concert Dr. Muck sticks closely for the most part to well-tried favorites. The first part will be given to the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven and the second part will be devoted to three works—the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz, the symphonic poem "Mazappa" of Liszt and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg" of Wagner. The "Mazeppa," one of the least well known of the Liszt symphonic poems, was played here but once, in 1900, under Gericke.

There are still available at Symphony hall a number of season tickets for the Saturday evening concerts, which the management announces may be obtained by application to F. G. Roby, treasurer.

Eight concerts will be given during the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Sanders theater, Harvard university. Subscribers of last season have until next Monday, Oct. 7, in which to renew their subscriptions and secure their old seats. Seats that are unclaimed will be offered for sale at George H. Kent's book store, Harvard square, on Thursday, Oct. 10. The concerts will come as usual on Thursday evenings, the dates being Oct. 17, Nov. 14, Dec. 12, Jan. 16, Feb. 6, Feb. 27, March 27 and April 24.

For these concerts seven soloists have been engaged. At the first concert, when Dr. Muck makes his first appearance, after four years, there will be no soloist. The soloist at the second concert will be Miss Florence Hinkle, soprano. At the third concert Leopold Godowsky, the pianist, will make his first appearance in this neighborhood after an absence of many years. He is soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts on the following Friday and Saturday. The fourth concert brings Miss Elena Gerhardt, the German singer, and then comes Gertrude Marshall, violinist. The other soloists will be Mrs. Truman Aldrich, pianist, Norman Wilks, the English pianist, who comes to America for the first time and Vera Barstow, violinist.

* * *

OCTOBER 5,
POST,

HOLD FINAL SALE OF SYMPHONY TICKETS

The final sale of season tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held in Symphony Hall yesterday when the rear part of the floor and first balcony and the entire second balcony were sold. The prices secured for the seats showed a general increase over last year although there were some excellent bargains picked up as there always are. There is still at Symphony Hall a limited number of season tickets for the Saturday concerts which are now on sale. Applications should be made direct to Mr. F. G. Roby, treasurer.

GLOBE—THURSDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1912.

DR MUCK ARRIVES.

Symphony Conductor Here for Season's Work.

Announces Several Novelties by Unfamiliar Composers.

Dr Karl Muck arrived in Boston yesterday to take up rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, preliminary to the first season of his return as its conductor. With him came Mrs Muck and the little Boston terrie which he took from this city four years go and which has since been an im- rtant member of his household.

Dr and Mrs Muck are temporarily the Somerset, but they expect the ival of their furniture from Ger- y in a few days. They hope to be anently settled in their new apartment on Commonwealth av within a or 10 days.

plans for the season," said Dr "are in a sense vague and in- e, or at any rate they are not so lized that I can discuss them at We shall have novelties, of but it is a fact that there are w works of importance that has not heard. This applies to French composers as well as of the German school. I do ve in presenting a novelty cause it is new. It is not worth while to waste the time of the orchestra and try the patience of the audience on much of the new music that is being published.

Photo by GARO

DR KARL MUCK,
Who Returns to Be Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"I have three works in mind which I will bring out in the early part of the season. One is a symphony by Lendvai, whose music, I believe, is unknown to Boston. On the other side he is held in growing esteem. I shall bring out a new Reger work which he calls 'A Concerto in Ancient Style' and the third that I can mention now is a Humoresque by the composer Mrazek. Readers of the principal comic paper of Germany, the Fliegende Blaetter, have for many years been familiar with the antics of 'Max and Moritz' and it is on this theme that Mrazek has written his piece. I have also some Russian music which I shall play."

Dr Muck was asked if he purposed bringing out any music by Schoenberg, who is the reigning sensation of Germany. He smiled blandly and said that he personally could not understand such music.

Both Dr and Mrs Muck had a good rest after the Summer season at Bayreuth. They spent several weeks in their country home in the south of Austria, and were in Berlin the last week before sailing. On the ship with them were a number of musical notabilities, including Mr Gatti-Casazza, director of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and his wife, Mme Alda and Mme Gadski.

The auction sale today will dispose of the $18 seats for the concerts and will begin promptly at 10 o'clock.

THE BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—OCT

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Symphony Concerts Begin Friday.

Dr Muck Will Open Season With Orchestral Program.

Other Musical Offerings---Recital Notes.

The 32d season of the Symphony Orchestra begins with the first public rehearsal next Friday afternoon at 2:30 and the first concert Saturday evening, at 8 o'clock. The year begins auspiciously for the orchestra in every respect. The auction sales for both the rehearsals and the concerts were exceedingly satisfactory and while there were few sensational prices, the general average was higher than last year. Dr Muck begins his work with the orchestra tomorrow morning and in general the routine of the season may be said to have begun.

There will be much interest in looking over the orchestra and seeing the new faces in it. All the members of the personnel have returned and the new men have made a most favorable impression on their colleagues.

The first concert will comprise for the most part well-tried favorites. The first part will be given to the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven and the second part will be devoted to three works—the "Roman Carnival Overture" of Berlioz, the symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," of Liszt, and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The "Mazeppa" is one of the least well known of the Liszt symphonic poems and was played here but once, in 1900 under Mr Gericke.

Boston Symphony Concert Season in Cambridge

The usual series of eight Symphony concerts will be given Thursday evenings in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, this coming Winter, the dates being Oct 17, Nov 14, Dec 12, Jan 16, Feb 6, Feb 27, March 27 and April 24. Tomorrow is the last day in which subscribers of last year may renew their subscriptions and secure their former seats. The general sale of unclaimed seats will begin at the University Book Store next Thursday morning at 8 o'clock.

Seven artists have been engaged as soloists for these concerts. The sopranos are Miss Florence Hinkle and Miss Elena Gerhardt. Miss Florence Hinkle is an American woman who has made several appearances in Boston and last year was soloist in the excerpt from the "Manzoni" requiem of Verdi with the Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto.

Elena Gerhardt, although she is to appear this Winter in Cambridge for the first time, is known to the musical public through her appearances in concert here last Winter.

The pianists are Leopold Godowsky, Norman Wilks and Mrs Truman Aldrich. Leopold Godowsky is one of the most eminent pianists of our time. Norman Wilks is an English pianist who brings to this country a very considerable reputation as an artist, and Mrs Truman Aldrich is one of the younger American woman pianists, who has had much success in the Middle West. The violinists are Miss Gertrude Marshall of Boston, a pupil of Charles Martin Loeffler, and Miss Vera Barstow

---

THE BOSTON AMERICAN -

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 2

DR. MUCK HERE, TALKS OF PLANS

Dr. Karl Muck, the famous conductor and new leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is in Boston. He landed in New York yesterday from the Kronprinzessin Cecilie and arrived here this morning. The doctor was accompanied by his wife. They are stopping at the Somerset, although they have taken an apartment in Commonwealth avenue, which they will occupy as soon as it is ready.

Dr. Muck expressed his delight at being again in Boston, a city he had learned to love during his two years of residence here in '06 and '07.

Dr. Muck was one of the conductors at the Bayreuth Festival this Summer, and spent his holidays in the south of Austria. He put in a week in Berlin settling up his affairs, and he announced that his transatlantic passage had been marred by bad weather.

Novelties for Season.

Regarding his plans for the season Dr. Muck said that he had not yet got them so in shape that he cared to make any formal announcement. There were so many factors to be considered before doing anything of this kind.

"In the matter of novelties," he said, "Boston seems to have heard every new work of any great value, whether it is French or German. I do not believe in giving novelties simply because they are novelties, but I have some which I shall play during the season."

"You must understand that I have been away from the orchestra for four years and that this year there is a considerable number of new members and the first work of a conductor under such conditions is to get things working smoothly. For a purpose of this kind there is nothing to compare with the classics of musical literature. A modern work can be played very carelessly and yet make an impression, but Beethoven, Schumann, Brahms and Mozart must be played accurately, for every part tells and no mistake can go unnoticed."

"My first program is already announced—the 'Eroica' by Beethoven, Berlioz's 'Carneval Romain,' Liszt's Symphonic Poem, 'Mazeppa' and the prelude to 'The Meistersinger.' All of these are well-tried favortes except the 'Mazeppa,' which, as I understand it, has been played but once in the Symphony Concerts, and that a good many years ago."

Symphony by Lendvai.

"It is possible that at my second concert—and this I shall not decide for two or three days—I shall bring out a symphony by Lendvai, one of the younger composers, of whom I think very highly. At an early concert also I shall bring out Roger's latest work, which he calls 'A Concerto in Ancient Form,' modelled after the music of the eighteenth century.

"Another novelty which I shall bring out shortly is a Humoresque for orchestra by the Czech composer Mrazek. I believe that this is a name entierly new to Boston. The readers of the Fliegende Blaetter will remember the series of amusing pictures of 'Max and Moritz," which for many years were a feature of the paper's humor. Mrazek has built this Humoresque on this idea and it is an exceedingly entertaining bit.

"I have some new Russian works in mind, but at this time do not care to talk about them. My first work is to get back in touch with the Orchestra, work in the new numbers with the old and make it a smoothly running machine."

Delighted With Boston.

"It is hardly necessary for me to say," he added, "that I am glad to be back in Boston again. It was not any easy task to decide finally to break away from Berlin, where I had worked for twenty years, and what induced me was the knowledge of the conditions in which a man in my position works in this city, the orchestra he has under him and the freedom to carry out his ideas unhampered."

"Mr. Ellis informs me that the prospects for a prosperous season have never been better. That, of course, is encouraging to begin with. I have called the first rehearsal for next Monday and there will be no question about my being kept fully occupied for the next seven months."

Journal

OCTOBER 5, 1912.

SYMPHONY SEASON DUE NEXT WEEK

Dr. Muck Re-enters With a Classic Program and No Soloist.

The thirty-second season of the Symphony Orchestra begins with the first public rehearsal next Friday afternoon and the first concert on Saturday evening.

Dr. Muck begins his work with the orchestra Monday morning. There will be much interest in looking over the orchestra and seeing the new faces in it. All the members of the personnel have returned and the new men have made a most favorable impression upon their colleagues.

For the first concert Dr. Muck offers mostly well-tried favorites. The first part will be given to the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven and the second part will be devoted to three works—the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz, the symphonic poem "Mazeppa" of Liszt and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The "Mazeppa" was played here but once, in 1900, under Gericke.

Cambridge Symphony Concerts Begin Oct. 17

Arrangements are now complete for the eight concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give during the coming winter in Sanders Theater, Harvard University. Subscribers of last season have until next Monday, Oct. 7, to renew their subscriptions and secure the'r old seats, and such seats as are unclaimed will be offered for sale at the George H. Kent bookstore, Harvard square, on Thursday, Oct. 10.

The concerts will come on Thursday evenings, Oct. 17, Nov. 14, Dec. 12, Jan. 16, Feb. 6, Feb. 27, March 27 and April 24. At the first concert, when Dr. Muck makes his first appearance after four years, there will be no soloist. The soloist at the second concert will be Florence Hinkle. At the third concert Leopold Godowsky, the great pianist, will make his first appearance after an absence of many years. The fourth concert brings Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German singer, and then comes Gertrude Marshall, a violinist of this city and a pupil of Charles Martin Loeffler. The other soloists will be Mrs. Truman Aldrich and Norman Wilks, pianists, and Vera Barstow, violinist.

OCTOBER 6, 1912.

THE BOSTON AMERICAN-

SYMPHONY SEASON ON.

First Rehearsal Friday and First Concert Saturday.

The thirty-second season of the Symphony Orchestra begins with the first public rehearsal on next Friday afternoon at 2:30, and the first concert on Saturday evening at 8 o'clock. The year begins most auspiciously for the orchestra in every respect. The auction sales for rehearsals and concerts were satisfactory, and while there were few sensational prices the general average was higher than last year.

Dr. Muck begins his work with the orchestra tomorrow, and in general the routine of the season may be said to have begun. There will be much interest in looking over the orchestra and seeing the new faces in it. All the members of the personnel have returned and the new men have made a most favorable impression on their colleagues.

For the first concert Dr. Muir sticks closely for the most part to well-tried favorites. The first part will be given to the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven and the second part will be devoted to three works—the "Roman Carnival Overture" of Berlioz, the symphonic poem "Mazeppa" of Liszt and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

[15]

BOSTON HERALD, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 3,

DR. MUCK PROMISES THREE NEW WORKS

(Photograph by Garo.)
DR. KARL MUCK.
Conductor of Symphony Orchestra Who Talks of Program-Making and New Compositions to Be Given During Coming Season.

Talks of Program-Making and Conductor's Duty to Audience.

By PHILIP HALE.

Dr. Muck talked yesterday afternoon in an entertaining and illuminating manner about musical conditions in Europe, the theory and practice of program-making, and the duty of a conductor toward his audience.

He was in the best of spirits, and looked younger than when he first came to Boston. It was not easy to believe that he began his career as a conductor 32 years ago, when he was the chorus leader at the Stadt Theatre in Zurich, and that since 1892 he has filled the important position of conductor at the Berlin Royal Opera House, one of the most coveted chairs in the operatic world. He was reported last June as having said that during this engagement he had conducted 1701 performances and had rehearsed and brought out 103 different operas, of which 35 were new to Berlin.

Not without regret has he left the orchestra of the Berlin Royal Opera House. Many of the players have grown up under him, and the ensemble, which is justly famous, is almost wholly the result of his labors lightened by the devotion of the men to the leader whom they will sorely miss. He realizes, however, the unique advantages of the position in Boston; the absolute freedom given to his wishes, musical judgment and taste.

There are many in Boston who, like the Athenians of old, are eager in concerts to hear some new thing. Dr. Muck had little to say that will whet their curiosity. Few of the orchestral works published recently for the first time appeal to him, nor does he find among the younger or little known composers any that demand close attention by reason of originality in musical thought or expression. He paid Boston the compliment of saying that there are few new works of importance that have not been performed here. Yet conducted by Dr. Muck some of these works would probably seem wholly new.

"I do not believe in presenting a work simply because it is new, for it is not worth while to waste the time of the orchestra and tax the patience of the audience by performing much of the music recently published."

Yet he mentioned three compositions which he purposes to produce early in the season. One of them is a symphony by Erwin Lendvai, a young Hungarian now living in Berlin. Performed at Bonn, later in Berlin, Dantzic and other cities, it excited hot discussion, though critics that were perplexed by the originality of the work admitted the creative ability of the composer. Lendvai has also written an orchestral Scherzo, a Festival March for orchestra, and smaller compositions, among them a group of five piano pieces, op. 12, with suggestive titles. It was said some months ago that he was at work on music for Hauptmann's "Elga."

Another work unknown here is a "Humoresque" by Jos. Gust. Mraczek, a Bohemian composer, author of "Der Traum ein Leben" and a piano quintet in E flat major. Many remember joy[illegible] pictures of Max and Moritz. [illegible] ures of Busch suggest the [illegible] ue" to Mraczek.

[illegible] also become acquainted with [illegible] hall [illegible] r's "Concerto in the Ancient Style," [illegible] might be loosely described as a [illegible] of violin concerto. Dr. Muck will also bring out some Russian music that is unfamiliar.

[illegible] my first program," he said, "includes [illegible] ica,' the overture 'The Carnival at Rome' by Berlioz, the prelude to 'Die Meistersinger'; and I am informed that Liszt's 'Mazeppa' has been played only once at a Symphony concert and that was a dozen years ago." (Liszt's symphonic poem, by the way, was first performed here as a whole at a Philharmonic concert in 1881, though Theodore Thomas's orchestra played the march that is the final section as early as 1869.)

"For securing plasticity and elasticity at the beginning of a season," said Dr. Muck, "and especially at the beginning of this season when there are many new members of the orchestra, there is nothing so good as work on the great classics. Much of the complex modern music sounds well even when it is badly performed, but the music of Mozart, Beethoven, Schumann, Brahms, must be played accurately, and outside of its artistic value is of inestimable worth for drilling the players."

Some time ago it was reported that Richard Strauss had nearly completed an Alpine symphony, and the scheme of it was described in detail. Strauss made a curious confession to his late colleague, Dr. Muck. He said that since he has had much to do in the opera house, his invention has flagged when he has set himself to work on absolute music. "When I read a libretto and am able to see in my mind the characters and the situations on the stage, then my mind is active and ideas readily come. It is wholly the contrary if there be question of a symphonic work. I have completed the first movement of the 'Alpine' symphony. I may turn it into a symphonic poem, for at present I cannot continue it, and have no thoughts for the other movements."

"There are many imitators at present," continued Dr. Muck, "and I loathe the imitators of Debussy and Franck and Richard Strauss as I loathed in past years the composers that aped Wagner and Brahms. Debussy is original and sincere. He writes as he feels and hears. To my mind Ravel and others of the ultra-modern French school compose after the manner of Debussy as they understand it, and have little or nothing to say on their own account. In like manner Cesar Franck has his imitators—a boresome, uninventive lot."

The Herald has already recorded the fact that music by Arnold Schoeneberg was recently hissed in London when it was produced by Sir Henry Wood. Dr. Muck said that he cannot understand Schoeneberg's music. "He puts C major, D major, E major in juxtaposition, without any harmonic pretext known to even radicals, and the result is to me—well, I do not understand it, and it is hard for me to believe that the composer is sincere. Now, Debussy's harmonic scheme, while it is highly original, is logical and effective."

Neither in Scandinavia, Russia, the Netherlands, France or Germany does Dr. Muck know of young composers that give genuine promise. Bischoff's second symphony is not equal to his first. Glazovnoff writes a symphony at least every six months and is a victim to routine; the younger Scandinavians ape Grieg—and their music is Grieg and water, or rather water with a tincture of Grieg. Dr. Muck has not heard of Mr. Joseph Holbrooke, the Englishman who maintains stoutly that he is a gifted composer. If Mr. Holbrooke were informed of Dr. Muck's ignorance he would no doubt be deeply grieved, or he might insist that Dr. Muck is surely [illegible] that [illegible]

There was talk concerning the arrangement of programs. Dr. Muck firmly believes that there should be consistency in the arrangement, that the strictly classical and the frankly romantic should not be flung together; that "Contrasts" thus obtained are disconcerting; that the works suffer thereby. No one, for example, arranging a room in an art museum would hang pictures in the classic and formal taste on the wall with examples of impressionism. No one selecting examples of statuary would put the works of Thorwaldsen and Rodin side by side. If one should say: "Yes, but take your first program. There is Beethoven in company with Berlioz, Liszt, and Wagner." The answer would be: "You forget that the Beethoven of the 'Eroica' symphony is also a romantic. The prevailing spirit of the program is that of romanticism."

"No," said Dr. Muck, "it is not the first duty of the conductor of a great musical institution like the Boston Symphony orchestra to provide his audience with new works, simply because they are new, and without regard to their inherent worth. It is not his chief duty to see how many 'first performances' he can secure in the course of a season. He should steadily choose the best works, the best as they seem to him, whether they be new or old. He should perform them in the best possible manner, according to his ability, and thus infuse into the audience the desire to hear nothing but the best; to find new beauties in familiar compositions; to recognize the beautiful in works heard for the first time, although that which is beautiful in the composer's thought may be expressed in an unusual, unanticipated manner."

And Dr. Muck said more to this effect, speaking nobly of the art to which he has devoted his life, the art that he himself adorns.

SUNDAY POST, OCTOBER 6, 1912 ties.

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The usual series of eight Symphony Concerts will be given on Thursday evenings in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, during the coming winter, the dates being Oct. 17, Nov. 14, Dec. 12, Jan. 16, Feb. 6, Feb. 27, March 27 and April 24. Tomorrow (Monday) is the last day in which subscribers of last year may renew their subscriptions and secure their former seats. The general sale of unclaimed seats will begin at the George H. Kent University Book Store next Thursday morning, Oct. 10, at 8 o'clock. Seven artists have been engaged as soloists for these concerts. At the first concert there will be no soloist. The soloists for the other concerts will comprise two sopranos, three pianists, and two violinists. The sopranos are Miss Florence Hinkle and Miss Elena Gerhardt. Miss Florence Hinkle is an American woman who has made several appearances in Boston, and who, last year when she appeared as soloist in Symphony Hall with the Mendelssohn choir of Toronto, made an excellent impression by her singing. Elena Gerhardt, although she is to appear this winter in Cambridge for the first time, is known to the musical public through her several appearances in Boston last season. She is one of the foremost concert singers of Germany and her success in America has been remarkable. The pianists are Leopold Godowsky, Norman Wilks and Mrs. Truman Aldrich. Leopold Godowsky is one of the most eminent pianists of our time, who is returning to America after an absence of many years, and his first appearance in this neighborhood will be at the third Cambridge concert. Norman Wilks is an English pianist who brings to this country an estimable reputation as an artist, while Mrs. Truman Aldrich is one of the younger American women pianists, who has had much success in the Middle West. The two violinists are Miss Gertrude Marshall of Boston, a pupil of Charles Martin Loeffler, and Miss Vera Barstow. Both of them belong to the younger generation of violinists, of whom much can be expected.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Dr. Karl Muck, Conductor—First Public Rehearsal and Concert

The 32d season of the Symphony Orchestra begins with the first public rehearsal next Friday afternoon at 2:30, and the first concert on Saturday evening at 8 o'clock. The year begins most auspiciously for the orchestra in every respect. The auction sales for both the rehearsals and the concerts were exceedingly satisfactory, and while there were few sensational prices the general average was higher than last year. Dr. Muck begins his work with the orchestra tomorrow (Monday) morning, and in general the routine of the season may be said to have begun. There will be much interest in looking over the orchestra and seeing the new faces in it. All the members of the personnel have returned and the new men have made a most favorable impression on their colleagues.

With one exception Dr. Muck has chosen standard orchestral pieces for the programme of the opening concert: The "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz, Liszt's symphonic poem "Mazeppa" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The "Mazeppa" is one of the least well known of the Liszt symphonic poems, and was played here but once in 1900 under Gericke.

OCTOBER 6.

HERALD.

SYMPHONY SEASON OPENS THIS WEEK

First Public Rehearsal Friday and Concert Saturday Night.

The 32d season of the Symphony Orchestra begins with the first public rehearsal next Friday afternoon at 2:30, and the first concert on Saturday evening at 8 o'clock.

The year begins auspiciously in every respect. The auction sales for both the rehearsals and the concerts were exceedingly satisfactory, and while there were few sensational prices the general average was higher than last year.

Dr. Muck will begin his work with the orchestra tomorrow morning. There will be much interest in looking over the orchestra and seeing the new faces. All the members have returned and the new ones have made a favorable impression on their colleagues.

For the first concert Dr. Muck sticks closely for the most part to well tried favorites. The first part will be given to the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, and the second part will be devoted to three works—the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz, Liszt's symphonic poem "Mazeppa" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The "Mazeppa" is one of the least well known of the Liszt symphonic poems and has been played only once at these concerts.

OCTOBER 5,

HERALD,

SYMPHONY SEATS FOR CAMBRIDGE

Arrangements Complete for Course of Concerts in Sanders Theatre.

Arrangements are now complete for the eight concerts which the Boston Symphony orchestra will give during the coming winter in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University. Subscribers of last season have until next Monday, Oct. 7, in which to renew their subscriptions and secure their old seats and such seats as are unclaimed will be offered for sale at the George H. Kent book store, Harvard square, on Thursday, Oct. 10.

The concerts will come as usual on Thursday evenings, the date being Oct. 17, Nov. 14, Dec. 12, Jan. 16, Feb. 6, Feb. 27, March 27 and April 24.

For the coming series of concerts seven soloists have been engaged. At the first concert when Dr. Muck makes his first appearance after four years there will be no soloist. The soloist at the second concert will be Miss Florence Hinkle, soprano. At the third concert, Leopold Godowsky, the great pianist; fourth concert, Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German singer; then comes Gertrude Marshall, a violinist of this city, and a pupil of Charles Martin Loeffler. The other soloists will be Mrs. Truman Aldrich, one of the young pianists who has won much reputation in recent years; Norman Wilks, the English pianist, who comes to America for the first time, and Vera Barstow, the violinist.

The 32d season of the Symphony Orchestra in Boston begins with the first public rehearsal on next Friday afternoon at 2:30, and the first concert on Saturday evening at 8 o'clock. The auction sales for both the rehearsals and the concerts were exceedingly satisfactory, and while there were few sensational prices, the general average was higher than last year. Dr. Muck begins his work with the orchestra Monday morning, and in general the routine of the season may be said to have begun.

For the first concert Dr. Muck sticks closely for the most part to well-tried favorites. The first part will be given to the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, and the second part will be devoted to three works—the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz, the symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," of Liszt, and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The "Mazeppa" is one of the least well known of the Liszt symphonic poems, and was played here but once, in 1900, under Gericke.

ADVERTISER,

OCTOBER 5, 1912

Music Notes.

The 32d season of the Symphony Orchestra begins with the first public rehearsal on Friday and the first concert on Saturday. For the first concert Dr. Muck sticks closely to well-tried favorites. The first part will be given to the "Eroica" Symphony, Beethoven, and the second part will be devoted to the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz, "Mazeppa" of Liszt and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

It will be welcome news to her many admirers that Mme. Calve will be heard at Symphony Hall on Oct. 20.

OCTOBER 10, 19

THE BOSTON AMERICAN

Symphony Opens Its 32d Season With Program Tomorrow

The formal opening of Boston's musical season and the beginning of the thirty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes tomorrow afternoon with the first public rehearsal in Symphony Hall and the first concert on the following evening. It is fair to assume that an unusually warm welcome will be extended to Dr. Muck on his reappearance in Boston after an absence of four years. His assumption of the conductorship of the orchestra for the next five years has been a matter of congratulation to all the friends of the institution.

In this first concert the orchestra and Dr. Muck will be responsible for the whole program. The symphony will be Beethoven's "Eroica," which will make the first half of the program. The second half will comprise the "Roman Carnival" of Berlioz, the rarely heard symphonic poem "Mazeppa" of Liszt and finally the prelude to "The Meistersingers of Nuremberg" of Wagner.

The soloist at the second concert will be Madame Marie Rappold of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York.

JOURNAL–

OCTOBER 10.

The thirty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open tomorrow (Friday) afternoon with the public rehearsal and the first concert on Saturday evening. The return of Dr. Muck has greatly stimulated the interest of the general public in the Symphony concerts. The program this week comprises the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz, the almost unknown symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," of Liszt, and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The soloist at the second concert will be Mme. Marie Rappold of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The general sale of tickets for the concerts the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Sanders Theater this season, will open today at the University Bookstore, Harvard squar-

POST, FRIDAY, OCTOBER 11, 1912

Mrs. Muck Guest at Somerset of Professional Women's Club

DR. CARL MUCK AND HIS WIFE, MRS. MUCK, THE LATTER OF WHOM WAS YESTERDAY A GUEST OF THE PROFESSIONAL WOMAN'S CLUB.

Mrs. Carl Muck, wife of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made her first public appearance in Boston as the guest of honor at a luncheon of the Professional Women's Club at the Hotel Somerset yesterday.

Though a speech was eagerly solicited, Mrs. Muck arose only to plead that she knew no English. She was invited to speak in German, but declined. She looked charming and interesting in her soft, clinging black, set off by white lace and her black plumed hat, her dark face glowing like the autumn leaves which were the decoration of the day.

Mrs. Frank Young, social worker and [redacted] public meeting in the [redacted] forum. "We have left 'women's [redacted] the name," she said, "because we want the co-operation of the men's organizations if they [redacted]

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 5, 1912

ning Concerts company do justice to Lionel Monckton's pretty and graceful music. Percival Knight makes the attaché a figure that is both plausibly human and diverting. Well staged and pleasantly amusing.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Dr. Muck's Reappearance at the Symphony Concerts with Liszt's "Mazeppa" on His First Programme—An Operatic Concert Besides

FOR the thirty-first year, the Symphony Concerts will begin once more next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall. The orchestra wi return to them with sixteen newcomer scattered through the string, the wind an the brass choirs. Returning after an inte val of four years and with a long term service before him, Dr. Muck will again the conductor. He resumes the post th he left reluctantly, in the noon of his po ers, ambitious to make the orchest unique in its kind. How ample and fi those powers are, alike on the technical a the interpretative side, in the attainment sensuous musical beauty and of characte izing and revealing expression, there is n need now to recall. Even in this first pa of concerts, the orchestra and Dr. Muc will speak for themselves. The establishe public of the concerts awaits them and als those whose admiration for the conducto has drawn them anew to them.

Appropriately to such a beginning thr of the items in the programme are very f miliar: Beethoven's "Eroica" symphon Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carniva and the prelude to Wagner's opera, "T Mastersingers." The fourth is relative novel, Liszt's tone-poem, "Mazeppa," hea only once before in the thirty years of t Symphony Concerts and none too often pe formed elsewhere. At present there is on to say of it that a fragment of Vict Hugo's "Les Orientales," and not Byro tale in verse, suggested the music to Lis The poem first pictures the ride of the c demned Mazeppa bound to the wild ho that bears him over the wild country, w the night wind, trees, rocks, plains rush Therein may Liszt be descriptive. Like this ride, continues the poem, is the ride the soul of Genius through the world a the verse goes forward in rhetorical par lel. Here Liszt may be idealistic—and rh torical, too.

NEWS OF MUSIC

The Result of the Symphony Sales—"The Kneisels'" Concerts Here

AS the outcome of the auctions has usually been in recent years, not all the seats for the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra were bought for the season. Those that remain are now in the hands of F. G. Roby, the treasurer of Symphony Hall, for private sale. Every seat for the afternoon concerts is taken.

The four concerts that the Kneisel Quartet will undertake in Boston this season will befall on the evenings of Tuesdays, Nov. 5, Dec. 3, Jan. 7 and March 18 in Steinert Hall. The list of pieces from which Mr. Kneisel will make his programmes comprises a double concerto for two violins and string orchestra out of Bach; early, middle and late quartets by Beethoven; far fewer pieces by Brahms than the prospectus has usually named; quartets by Grieg, Franck and Reger; Schumann's quintet in E-flat and his quartet in A minor; a quintet from Mozart, a quartet by Schubert; Svendsen's octet for strings, Mr. Loeffler's quintet and Tschaikowsky's sextet. Subscribers to the Kneisel concerts last season may retain their seats for the new series by application to L. H. Mudgett at Symphony Hall before Oct. 19. From Oct. 21 to Nov. 1, he will receive new subscriptions.

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 9, 1912

MONITOR,

CALVE CONCERT PROGRAM

Mme. Emma Calve and her husband, Galileo Gasparri, the tenor, will sing duets from Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana" and Bizet's "Carmen" at their concert in Symphony hall Sunday afternoon, Oct. 20. Mme. Calve's solos will include selections from Gounod's "Sapho" and Gluck's "Armide." Mr. Gasparri's pieces will include the tenor arias from the first and third acts of Puccini's "Tosca." The pianist at the concert will be Emiliano Renaud.

NOTES

The general sale of season tickets for the Cambridge concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is announced by the managers to begin Thursday morning at the University Book store, Harvard square. The greater part of last year's patrons are said to have subscribed for the coming season in the preliminary sale of the last 10 days. There are eight concerts in the Cambridge series, every fourth or fifth Thursday night occurring through the season. Karl Muck, the new conductor, will have the opening concert of Oct. 17 to himself. He has included a soloist in the programs of the other seven concerts.

The string section of the Boston Symphony orchestra was put through practise this morning under Karl Muck, the new conductor. The players are all said to be zealous for the year's work, submitting graciously to a discipline which though military in its exactions, is conceived with an understanding of the instrumental individualities. Dr. Muck i praised professionally for distributin the burden of rehearsal on the various departments, so that each one of them goes into action drilled according to the special demands of the program.

The orchestra in rehearsal, in other words, is two or three independent choirs. In performance it is a single instrument with coordinated divisions. Players say that treated in this way the orchestra holds together and does brilliantly in concert, whereas treated the other way, as a unit in practise, it is likely to fall apart on the day of the concert and show the gaps between the different choirs.

* * *

HERALD, OCTOBER 10,

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY

The general sale of season tickets for the Symphony concerts in Cambridge opens this morning at Kent's University Book Store in Harvard square. There will be the usual series of eight Thursday evening concerts the dates being: Oct. 7, Nov. 14, Dec. 12, Jan. 16, Feb. 6, Feb. 27, March 27 and April 24.

The assisting solo artists will be: Miss Florence Hinckle, soprano; Mr. Leopold Godowsky, pianist; Miss Elena Gerhardt, soprano; Miss Gertrude Marshall, violinist; Mrs. Truman Aldrich, pianist; Mr. Norman Wilks, pianist and Miss Vera Barstow, violinist.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The 32d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open with the public rehearsal tomorrow afternoon and the first concert on Saturday evening. The return of Dr. Muck has stimulated the interest of the general public in the Symphony concerts and the reception given to him will be warm and hearty. There will be no soloist this week.

The program includes Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz, Liszt's "Mazeppa," and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," which was on Dr. Muck's first program six years ago.

The soloist at the second concert will be Marie Rappold of the Metropolitan Opera company, New York.

OCTOB[illegible] 10,

POST,

YMPHONY'S SEASON OPEN

First Rehearsal of 32d Year Tomorrow

The 32d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open with the public rehearsal tomorrow afternoon and the first concert on Saturday evening. The return of Dr. Muck has unquestionably stimulated the interest of the general public in the Symphony concerts and unquestionably the reception given to him will be very warm and hearty. There will be no soloist this week.

The programme comprises the Eroica Symphony of Beethoven, which forms the first half of the concert; the Roman Carnival Overture of Berlioz, the almost unknown symphonic poem Mazeppa of Liszt and finally the prelude to The Meistersingers of Nuremberg of Wagner, which happened to be on Dr. Muck's first programme six years ago. the second concert will

---

OCTOBER 9.

TRANSCRIPT.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

LISZT'S "MAZEPPA" TO BE HEARD AGAIN

The Impending Revival at the Symphony Concerts—A Singular Piece in Its Kind, and an Embattled Piece in Its Time—"The Kneisels'" New Departure—Saving the London Opera House—An Invention for Violins—News, Opinion and Wit

LISZT'S "Mazeppa," the symphonic poem which Dr. Muck is to revive at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday, will be virtually a new piece to audiences of 1912. Only once before, under Mr. Gericke, late in the nineties, has it stood on a programme for the Symphony Concerts, and then no audience in Boston had heard it since the beginning of the eighties. At that time, here and abroad, Liszt's music was new, strange and suspicious, and many a reviewer on both sides of the Atlantic found "Mazeppa," which has its singularities, a particularly inscrutable and irritating example of the intruding species of "symphonic poems." One reviewer put scornful quotation marks about the word music, whenever he applied it to "Mazeppa." Another called the tone-poem a "stunning piece of jargon," and a third rejoiced that Liszt could probably make "no more incoherent a mess of ravings." In this town, only Mr. Apthorp, writing in the Transcript, much appreciated "Mazeppa." "There is not a dull moment in it," he says, "and much that stirs the deepest feelings."

Those were the embattled days of Liszt's music, and to hearers of 1912 "Mazeppa" will hardly seem more than a vividly imagined and expressively scored piece of highly romantic music. Certainly they will not think it "impracticable to play," as did their fathers in the eighties, because "in one place eleven different instrumental parts were going at once." Only eleven, the new brood of composers would probably retort with lifted high-brows. No more in these days of sharp orchestral delineation are they likely to "sit up" at the flick of the cymbals with which "Mazeppa" begins, as with the snap of the whip that sends the wild horse away. The music speeds him forward furiously; the world whirls by—as the analysts imagine in certain passages for the violins sus tained by swelling and diminishing chor in the wind choir; the trombones foret for an instant the ride of the Valkyrs Wagner's music-drama; the melody "Mazeppa," repeated in many transform tions, sounds in anguish and torture of the galloping frenzy of the ride. full orchestra proclaims it, and then se to leap to the catastrophe. The steed d dead—he well might after three days three nights of such whirling race zeppa lies stunned and broken. Fate, h ever, reserves him for further mus glories, and in the resounding and colo panoply of a Cossack march, "we hear voice of glory and greatness attai through suffering and adversity."

All this is very much of Hugo's po which "inspired" Liszt to the music, the composer's own checkered imaginatio and of their common romantic tim "'Mazeppa' is frightfully beautiful," Wagner wrote back, when Liszt sent him th manuscript. "I was out of breath when had read it through only once. I pity th poor horse. Nature and the world a often terrible." But he remembered t trombones until he needed them for own Valkyrs. Nobody, unless it is t brass choir of the orchestra, is likely be out of breath in Symphony Hall, a the timidest mouse among reviewers n adays would hardly find "Mazeppa" fri ful.

Items of the Day

Dr. Muck is reported in Musical America as saying when he landed the other day in New York: "There is, unfortunately, too much composition being done by little men in Germany today. They are all copyists of the greater men, and follow blindly in their tracks, with the result that they lack all individuality."

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT

OCTOBER 7,

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

THE MORALS OF THE SYMPHONY SALES

The Auctions and the Public, the Settling Into Average Prices and the "Left-Over" Tickets for the Saturday Concerts—"The Kneisels'" Programmes — Mme. Sembrich's and Mme. Gadski's Sisterly Debate Over Singing and Acting — Miss Farrar's Health Improves—News of Many Sorts

IN the general outcome of the ticket sales for the Symphony Concerts, there is a sign or two of the musical times in Boston worth the heeding. In the first place, the selling of the seats by auction continues with no audible objection, or even hint of a desire for change, from the public of the concerts. It is the ancient, and so honorable, custom, just as the afternoon concerts are still officially "public rehearsals," though they differ not a whit from the actual "concerts" of Saturday evening. No other symphony orchestra in America and none in Europe within easy recollection, sells its tickets at auction. If the Chicago Orchestra or the Philadelphia Orchestra or the Philharmonic Society in New York proposed such a method of distribution, their publics would probably resent it. They are used to another way. Now and then faint and private murmurs rise in Boston about the inability of regular subscribers to retain their seats at the Symphony Concerts from year to year without the competition and the burden of attendance or expense in brokers' commissions that the auctions impose. Some expert opinion avers that the concerts would yield more revenue were the tickets sold at flat prices. Other judgment, no less wise approves the present method. The management, meanwhile, seems content. So, also, does the public, and there is no more sign of change than there is of a shifting of the hour for beginning the evening concerts. All other metropolitan audiences in America may go to their concerts at 8.15, but to the Symphony Concerts we in Boston shall go at eight, though we speed our dinners and dress "catch-as-catch-can." So also shall we take our tickets by auction, though all other symphony orchestras sell theirs at the box office—our own like the rest with its series in other cities.

On the other hand, while the auctions persist the average of the premiums does not much rise. This year, if ever, with the prestige of the return of Dr. Muck, it should have risen. It did by a degree by the testimony of expert computing observers at the sales, but not to such an extent as those observers had anticipated. There were few "record prices," and the general level was only a little higher than it was a year ago. The moral is clear: The average purchaser has discovered that he can obtain his tickets annually for "about so much," and whoever the conductor, whoever the "soloists," he will bid no more, even for the coveted afternoon concerts. Thus the income of the orchestra at home tends to become a fixed quantity, though the cost of conductor, orchestra and "assisting artists" steadily rises.

As usual, all the tickets for the afternoon concerts were sold at the auctions; but, as in recent years there were more seats than bidders for the evening concerts. Once more a "limited number" of these seats remain to be sold at a flat price for the season or for single concerts. As some say, the evening concerts have gradually declined in social prestige while the afternoon concerts have waxed in it. As others believe, a part of the old public of Saturday evenings has changed its way of life and now spends its "week-ends" at suburban houses. A third point of view sees a younger generation of men taking other pleasures on Saturday nights, whereas its fathers and uncles went to the Symphony Concerts. And so speculation goes, even to the occasional suggestion of a shifting of the concerts to Thursday evenings and Friday afternoons (as the Philharmonic Concerts in New York were shifted) or to Friday evenings and Saturday afternoons. But custom is custom, after one-and-thirty years, and not easily altered in Boston, especially when the results of the change are largely conjectural. A better way, perhaps, would be the spreading of the knowledge, especially among the new and increasing public for serious music here, that the Symphony Concerts on Saturday evenings are no longer the exclusive possession of a self-perpetuating public that annually returns to them. They are open now, and there is room for all and sundry.

H. T. P.

OCTOBER 10, 1912

DAILY ADVERTISER,

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The general sale of season tickets for the Symphony concerts in Cambridge opens this morning at Kent's University book store in Harvard sq. There will be the usual series of eight Thursday evening concerts, the dates being: Oct. 7, Nov. 14, Dec. 12, Jan. 16, Feb. 6, Feb. 27, March 27, [illegible]

DR KARL MUCK ARRIVES HERE

Symphony Conductor Glad to Return.

"Not an Easy Task to Break Away Finally From Berlin."

Novelties Which He Will Give This Season.

Dr Karl Muck and Mrs Muck arrived in New York yesterday, after a very stormy and generally unpleasant crossing, in the steamship Kronprinzessin Cecille, which brought other musical celebrities, including Mr Gatti-Casazza, Mme Alda and Mme Gadski of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

Dr and Mrs Muck came directly to Boston and went to the Somerset Hotel, where they will live until their apartment in Commonwealth av is ready for them. Both Dr Muck and his wife expressed themselves as being very glad to return to Boston, Dr Muck especially looking forward to five years of great pleasure with what he has been freely saying for the last four years is the finest orchestra in the world. After leaving Bayreuth in August, he went to his Summer home in the south of Austria, and before sailing he spent a week in Berlin, settling up various business affairs in that city.

DR KARL MUCK,
Who Returns to Be Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Regarding his plans for the season Dr Muck said that he had not yet got them so in shape that he cared to make any formal announcement. Many factors must be considered before doing anything of this kind. I do not believe in giving novelties simply because they are novelties, but I have some which I shall play during the season.

"You must understand that I have been away from the orchestra for four years and that this year there is a considerable number of new members. The first work of a conductor under such conditions is to get things working smoothly. For a purpose of this kind there is nothing to compare with the classics of musical literature. A modern work can be played very carelessly and yet make an impression, but Beethoven, Schumann, Brahms and Mozart must be played accurately, for every part tells and no mistake can go unnoticed.

Programs He Has Prepared.

"My first program is already announced—the 'Eroica' of Beethoven, Berlioz' 'Carneval Romain,' Liszt's symphonic poem 'Mazeppa,' and the prelude to 'Die Meistersinger.' All of these are well tried favorites except the 'Mazeppa,' which, as I understand it, has been played but once in the Symphony concerts, and that a good many years ago.

"It is possible that at my second concert—and this I shall not decide for two or three days—I shall bring out a symphony by Lendvai, one of the younger composers, of whom I think very highly. At an early concert also I shall bring out Reger's latest work, which he calls 'A Concerto in Ancient Form,' modeled after the music of the 18th century.

"Another novelty which I shall bring out shortly is a humoresque for orchestra by the Czech composer, Mrazek. I believe that this is a name entirely new to Boston. The readers of the Fliegende Blaetter will remember the series of amusing pictures of 'Max and Moritz,' which for many years were a feature of the paper's humor. Mrazek has built this humoresque on this idea, and it is an exceedingly entertaining bit. I have some new Russian works in mind, but at this time do not care to talk about them. My first work is to get back in touch with the orchestra, work in the new members with the old and make it a smoothly running machine.

"It is hardly necessary for me to say," he added, "that I am glad to be back in Boston again. It was not an easy task to decide finally to break away from Berlin, where I had worked for 20 years, and what induced me was the knowledge of the conditions in which a man in my position works in this city, the orchestra he has under him and the freedom to carry out his ideas unhampered.

"Mr Ellis informs me that the prospects for a prosperous season have never been better. That, of course, is encouraging to begin with. I have called the first rehearsal for next Monday, and there will be no question about my being kept fully occupied for the next seven months

---

TRANSCRIPT,

OCTOBER 12,

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

A Symphony by Sgambati and a Curious Overture by Pfitzner at the Symphony Concerts—Dr. Muck's First Programme in Cambridge

AS usual in October, the season lags and the only concerts to announce for next week are the second pair by the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall on Friday afternon and Saturday evening, and the first in its annual series at Cambridge, in Sanders Theatre, on Thursday evening. For the concerts in Symphony Hall, Dr. Muck has chosen pieces that suggest his announced resolution to restore to the working repertory of the orchestra music that it has performed once and that has thereafter lain neglected on its shelves. Thus he will revive next week, the symphony in D of the Italian, Sgambati, last heard here under Mr. Paur in 1898. Sgambati, who is now nearly seventy years old, is one of the few Italian composers that has written no operas and no music for the theatre. Wherefore though he is not unhonored in Italy, he is as well known and esteemed in Germany. He has written symphonies and other orchestral pieces, chamber music, songs, services for the church, and pianoforte pieces that unite a lively and felicitous imagination to no little feeling for the peculiar qualities of the instrument. In his orchestral pieces, like the symphony that Dr. Muck will revive, he makes the orthodox form bear musical ideas that have clear individualty and that he develops and adorns with agreeable imagination and an apt sense of orchestral color. Being Italian, he feels in melody; being also the friend and disciple of Liszt, he courts warmth.

For another revived piece, Dr. Muck has chosen the overture to the fairy tale, "The Little Christ-Elf," that he himself first performed here in 1907. Hans Pfitzner, the singular, much discussed, seldom heard, and rather combative composer of Munich, wrote it. Though the overture had its individuality, it is safe to say that it has slipped from the memories of those that heard it here five years ago. The third orchestral number is Brahms's familiar set of variations on Haydn's theme of the "Choral St. Anthony." Dr. Muck put it on one of his programmes during his first term of service in Boston, fell ill, and Mr. Hess—if memory does not slip—led the orchestra in it. Between whiles, Mme. Rappold of the Metropolitan Opera House, the first soloist of the year, and an accomplished singer in concerts, will be heard in Elisabeth's greeting to the Hall of Song in the second act of "Tannhäuser" and in two songs with orchestral accompaniments by the Italian, dell' Acqua and the German-American, van der Stucken.

At the concert in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge on Thursday evening, for the return of the conductor to the university, Dr. Muck and the orchestra will repeat the programme of their first pair of concerts in Boston, viz:

Symphony, No. 3, "Eroica"	Beethoven
Overture, "The Roman Carnival"	Berlioz
Symphonic Poem, "Mazeppa"	Liszt
Prelude to the Opera, "The Master-singers of Nuremberg"	Wagner

---

AMERICAN OCTOBER 12, 1912.

DR. MUCK WELCOMED BACK TO SYMPHONY

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

Doctor Karl Muck made his reappearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and opened the thirty-second season of that organization yesterday afternoon. The entrance of the great musician was the signal for the entire audience to rise, and the orchestra also arose and played a mighty chord which was sustained for nearly a minute.

The welcome was brief, but very impressive. Dr. Muck smiled joyfully, bowed from the waist in Prussian manner, and then the concert began.

The Heroic Symphony of Beethoven, labeled No. 3 in E flat major, had been chosen to open the season, and the audience settled back contentedly to hear Muck read Beethoven.

There is nothing showy about the bearing of the doctor upon the conductor's stand. He is not a man of vociferous gesture, of fury and passion. He is still in the midst of alarm. He is economical of motion, but his slightest stir has significance.

His calm figure oozes magnetism. His personality is irresistible, and his control absolute.

Festival of Melody.

And when there is a climax, Dr. Muck is able to excite his players the more readily because he has not exhausted them by continual exhortation.

Yesterday's program included Berlioz's "Le Carnaval Romain." Liszt's tone poem "Mazeppa," which has not been played here for twelve years and is practically a novelty, and Wagner's prelude to the Master-singers of Nuremburg.

The concert was a festival of melody, and I for one hope that the good Herr Doctor will continue to regale us with this sort of music, leaving boilershop compositions and squeaky novelties for infrequent performances.

It is late in the day to comment upon the "Eroica," save to wonder why critics and musicians are not content to accept it as absolute music in memory of a great man, instead of writing preposterous programs for it. It was a great pleasure to hear the marvelous funeral march and the dainty tripping scherzo, as well as the imposing finale, played with the clarity and sympathy of Doctor Muck.

And if there were little roughnesses in the orchestra, they were not important, and were entirely due to the long vacation just completed.

Dozen New Members.

I don't know why Liszt's "Mazeppa" doesn't figure more frequently upon these programs. Probably it is too frankly melodious and too conventionally descriptive to suit the symbolists. Certainly it is thoroughly exciting to accompany Mazeppa in the orchestra upon his awful ride, bound upon the back of a wild horse of Tartary, to sympathize with his suffering, and return with him to one of the most pompous triumphal marches ever written.

Berlioz's Roman Carnival is always charming, and the prelude to the Mastersingers completely satisfying

Since last season nearly a dozen members of the orchestra have resigned or been retired and their places filled by the new conductor. The changes have not noticeably affected the quality of tone produced by the band, and the acquisitions have apparently been thoroughly assimilated.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, MASS OCTOBER 12,

Beethoven's Music at Symphony

CONCERT YEAR IS OPENED

With Karl Muck back at the conductor's desk after an absence of four years, the Boston Symphony orchestra opened its thirty-second season on Friday afternoon before a capacity subscription house, presenting a program of works by familiar repertory composers as follows: Beethoven, symphony No. 3, in E flat major, "Eroica," op. 55; Berlioz, overture, "Roman Carnival"; Liszt, "Mazeppa," symphonic poem No. 6; Wagner, prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

In one week the Boston Symphony orchestra has been brought back to its best state of virtuoso perfection. It gave a performance at its first public rehearsal that in respect to technique was flawless. Rhythmically the orchestra was a regiment of picked soldiers from the prime military nation of the world on drill. Melodically its choirs of strings, wood and brass were a trio of the most brilliant toned, most exquisitely styled voices that ever delivered a musical phrase.

There has not been so much joy expressed in an orchestral concert in Boston since the Domestic symphony of Richard Strauss had its first production in Dr. Muck's first engagement. The joy did not, as on the earlier occasion, diffuse itself equally over audience and performers. The production of the symphony on that former day meant that the twentieth century was holding its own in a field of art wherein the nineteenth century seemed to have won the final laurels. The virtuoso perfection of the opening concert of Dr. Muck's second period, the flawless technique, the military rhythm, the matchless phrasing only meant that a sculptor was sharpening his chisels, trying his wrist on marble from a half forgotten quarry.

This concert was an occasion for the audience to rejoice only because it has the purchasing power to call to itself the services of the highest talent of the musical world. The greater joy was naturally enough with the men of the orchestra itself, sojourners, a good proportion of them, in a raw though hopefully artistic land. And their especial pleasure was that at last they could do their best for the people who have summoned them from over the seas and that they could give the great American purchasing power a fair return for its sacrifices.

The men could not but be glad that they were restoring Beethoven to Bostonians. They could not help being overjoyed that their instruments could again tell of the sentiment and whim of Berlioz, and could make the exuberance of the Lisztian age compare acceptably with the exaggeration of our own.

The time will come when public and players and new conductor will work together for orchestral interpretations which will define the character of the community to itself and to the rest of the country. But even from the first concert, which was more an expression of the performers as artists than of the city which they serve, some idea of the direction that orchestral interpretation will take in Boston in the next five years could be gained. Dr. Muck would have to be accepted more unreservedly as a Beethoven authority than he will be if Arthur Nikisch had not made his American tour last spring.

In point of technique Dr. Muck has the advantage of Mr. Nikisch, for his command of the phrasing is never in the slightest point forgetful. For maintaining the independence of any choir of the orchestra or of any group of instruments of the same kind, Dr. Muck is unsurpassed. The continuity of the melody is never lost, no matter how insignificant for the time being the melody may become. The massing of the harmonies and their logical sequence never fails to have effect. As soon as one phrase is finished by the choir that carries it the next phrase is started in another instrumental group, and the composition is kept firmly together at the joinings. Anything that can be accomplished by changes in intensity of tone to make the phrases clear is done. Anything that a sudden, irregular impulse in the middle of a phrase by way of left handed emphasis can accomplish, is done too.

The whole intent of the reading is to keep the rhythmic details apparent. Effects of larger rhythm are not sought at all by Dr. Muck in Beethoven and little in the later composers. There is greater command of the music in the Muck than in the Nikisch conducting, but there is not such daring; neither is there such impressiveness. Dr. Muck puts twentieth century technical mastery into making Beethoven better understood as of his own epoch. Mr. Nikisch compels Beethoven to respond to the actual thinking of our own time. Beethoven will be more himself under Dr. Muck. He would be a means of revealing the moods and the temper of men of today, if Mr. Nikisch were to be the Symphony conductor in the coming years.

There are vast possibilities for discussion on the question whether an interpreter ought to treat Beethoven as a contemporary of Strauss, making the "Eroica" symphony of the one composer and the "Hero's Life" of the other tell the same story, or whether he ought to have a chronological conscience in his work and put the third symphony in its period, allowing it to show its relation to the classicism that preceded it and the romanticism that followed it. With a Nikisch the whole historic idea may be thrown to the winds, and the "Leonora" overture may reveal thought which Beethoven never could have entertained, because it is of today. With a conductor of Dr. Muck's inclinations the first movement of the "Eroica" enlightens the modern man not by telling him something about himself, but by letting him compare himself with the man of a century ago.

It is one of the remarkable qualities of music, and one only discovered in all its significance in recent times, that it lends itself either to a descriptive view of life, emphasizing historic processes, or to an absolute view, regarding all the triumphs of men as permanent and contemporaneous. An interpreter holding the descriptive view, like Dr. Muck, gets the more picturesque results. An interpreter holding the absolute view makes an impression, when he does make one, that abides.

RECORD, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1912

Boston Gives Hearty Welcome to Dr. Muck

DR. KARL MUCK.

HENRY L. HIGGINSON.

Boston is again running a-Muck, and it was effusively applausive when the celebrated doctor came to the conductor's stand. The orchestra blew a "Tusch" and the musicians and many of the public rose as the conductor entered. We can felicitate ourselves upon the possession of one of the great conductors of the present age, and, even though this was a first concert, when points of ensemble are not at their very best, one could not but see that the conductor led as one having authority, that he had a fixed ideal in his mind and that he could transmit that ideal to his men, says Louis C. Elson in his review in The Advertiser of the opening of the Symphony season.

There were new faces in the band, the most marked change being in the violoncellos, where the great artist Alwyn Schroeder was replaced by a new comer, whose work we shall watch with interest, but who had no important obbligato to judge by in this first concert. But the orchestra as a whole is the same great organization as of old. One may wonder whether the present generation of symphony-goers ever think of the man to whom they owe the artistic traditions of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

There are busts and memorials in Symphony hall, and we hope yet to see there a portrait of the man to whom the present orchestra of the present owes its being; the man to whose drill-mastership the technique, which went beyond anything that America had possessed before, owes its foundation; the artistic founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as Henry L. Higginson is its financial founder,—Wilhelm Gericke.

From

Address

Date R. I., SATURDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1912

Established

HERALD,

OCTOBER 17,

CONCERT NOTES

Mme. Calve, assisted by Mr. Gasparri, tenor, and Mr. [redacted] afternoon at 3:30 o'clock.

The program of the Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will include Sgambati's symphony No. 1, Pfitzner's overture to "The Little Christ Elf," and Brahms's Variations on a theme by Haydn. Mme. Rappold will sing an air from "Tannhaeuser" and songs by Van der Stucken and Dell' Acqua.

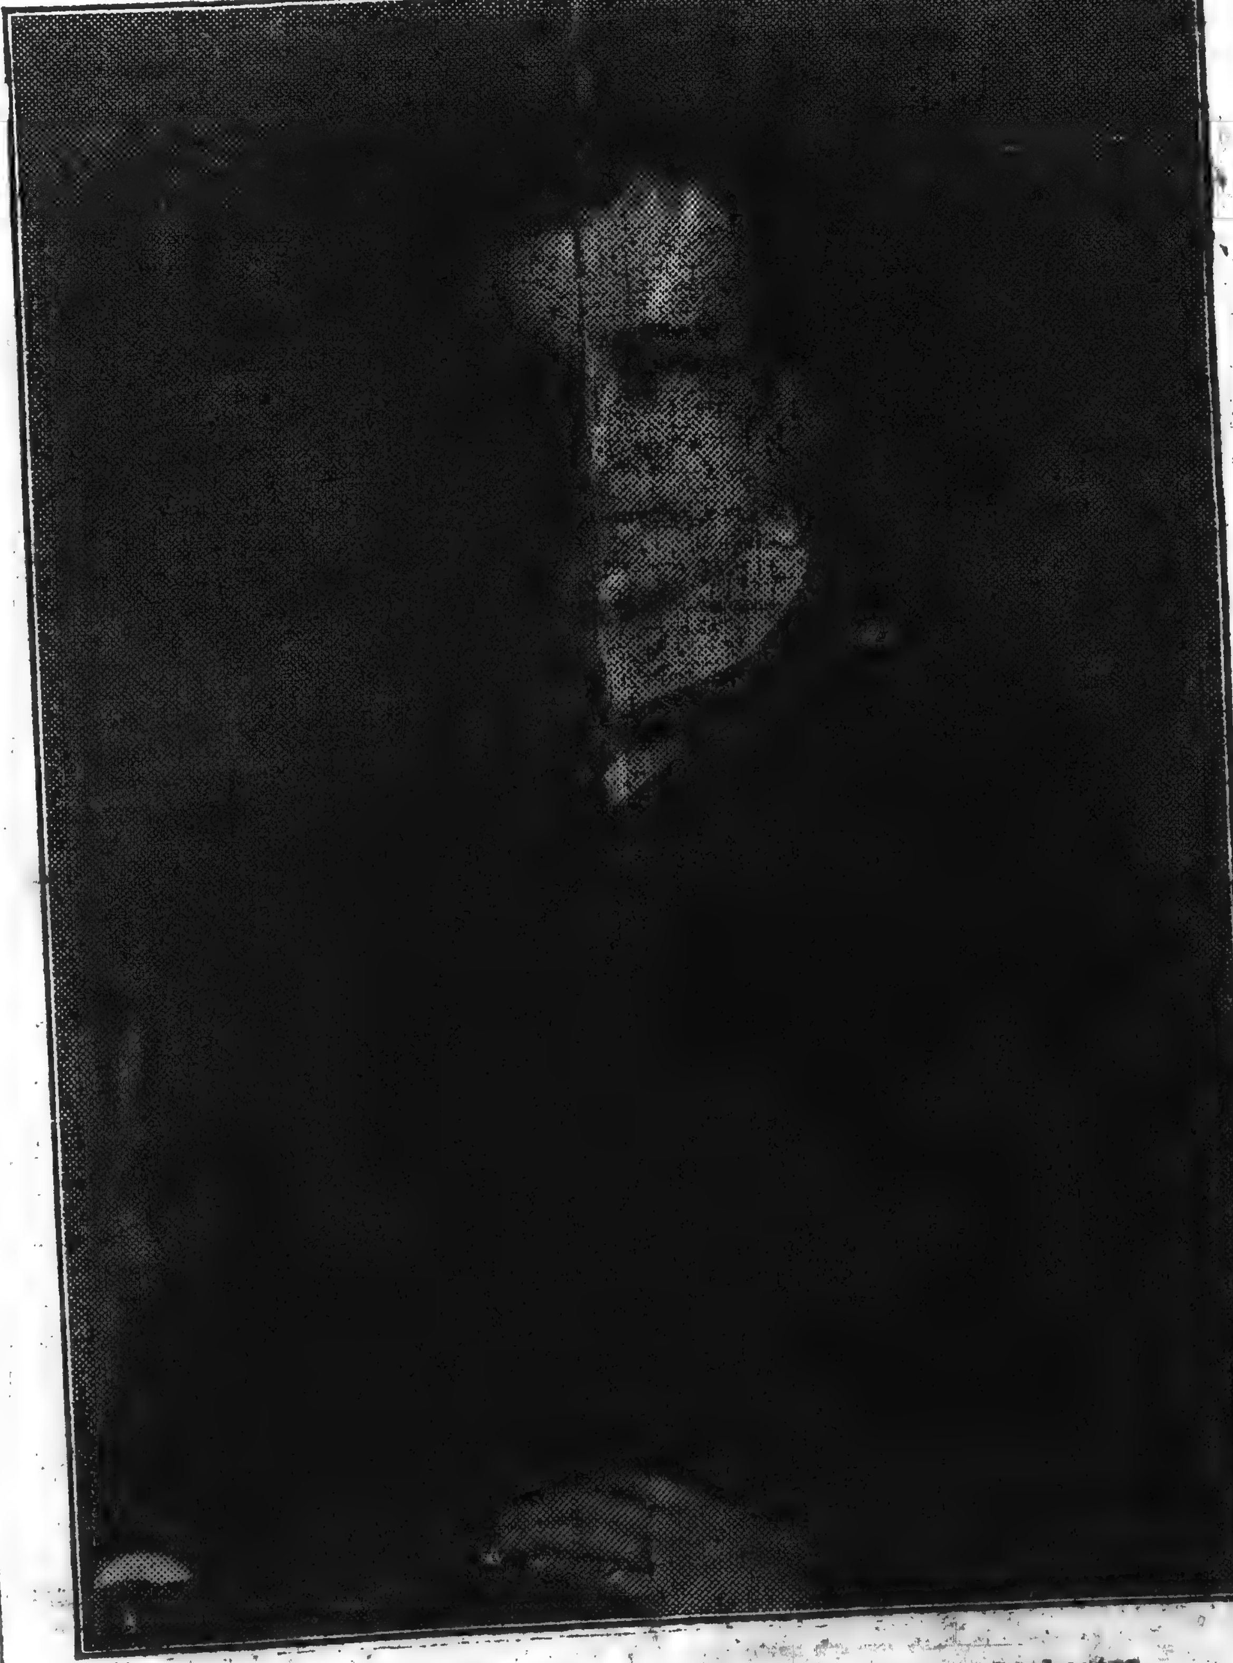
The first of the Boston Symphony orchestral concerts in Cambridge will take place tonight at the Sanders Theatre. The program will be as follows: Beethoven, "Eroica" symphony; Berlioz, overture "Roman Carnival"; Liszt, "Mazeppa"; Wagner, prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

OCTOBER 17,

JOURNAL-

Mme. Marie Rappold will be the soloist at this week's Symphony concerts. The orchestra, under Dr. Muck, will play Pfitzner's "Little Christ Child" overture, Brahms' "Variations on a Theme of Joseph Haydn," and a Sgambati overture.

[19]



Dr. Muck, Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Three singers of international reputation, one of the greatest violinists of our time, and an English pianist who is expected to be the sensation of the coming season are announced as the soloists for the five concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Providence during the coming season. The concerts will be given, as usual, in Infantry hall, on Tuesday evenings, the dates being Oct. 22, Nov. 19, Dec. 31, Feb. 4 and April 1.

The three singers announced are Madame Marie Rappold for the first concert; Miss Elena Gerhardt for the third concert, and Miss Julia Culp for the fifth. Madame Rappold is one of the principal sopranos of the Metropolitan opera house of New York, and her career has been almost in the nature of a fairy tale. Without any stage experience, in fact, without ever having appeared in public, she was cast for the very important part of Sulamith in Goldmark's "The Queen of Sheba," four years ago, and won an astounding success from the beginning.

Madame Rappold had never to undergo the long apprenticeship of the European opera house. In fact, she was a famous singer before she ever appeared in Europe, the whole of her training being in this country.

Miss Elena Gerhardt, the famous German concert singer, made her first appearance in America last year, and was in many respects the great feature of the season. The possessor of a more than usually beautiful voice, she unites with this a keen musical perception and flawless taste, and while she makes a specialty of song recitals, her appearance with orchestra in the greater arias are always memorable events.

Miss Julia Culp, the third singer, is a newcomer to America, for this will be her first season on this side of the Atlantic. Miss Culp is a native of Holland and her career has been principally on the continent, although she has in the last two or three years become a great favorite in London. She is said to have a mezzo-soprano voice of great beauty and is regarded as one of the gr[illegible]tists of our time.

The violinist, Fritz Kreisler, has been unrivalled among men of our time and generation. He comes to America this year under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony orchestra, and his only appearance in the East will be with that organization.

Finally, Norman Wilks, the English pianist, who is preceded by a most enviable reputation. His playing has been for the past two years one of the sensations of Berlin and his appearance in London always mean overflowing houses. It is expected that he will be a most valuable addition to the musical season of 1912-1913.

The prospects of the orchestra in Providence have never been better. The number of renewals has been unusually large and it is almost certain that there will be very few seats left for sale for the individual concerts.

The Concerts of 1912-13: A Detailed Forecast

Sunday Sessions the New Departure

By H. T. P.

THE Symphony Concerts have begun and thereby the season for music in Boston has formally opened. Yet for a month to come Dr. Muck and his men will have that same season almost wholly to themselves. Exactly why October is an "impossible" month for the visiting singer, orchestra or virtuoso, no one has ever satisfactorily explained. The public of concerts, unless it lingers very long in the country, is back in town, and if it does so tarry, it will not return until December, however many concerts the approved November may bring. October weather—as this very Friday witnesses—is not unfavorable for indoor pleasure and nobody outside Cambridge goes to a football game more than once a week. Tradition and precedent, however, affirm that concerts in October are a perilous adventure hardly within the unwritten law to which the managers and the givers of them move. November is "different," and as soon as election day is past—and for that matter on the very evening of it—the concerts will begin to come thick and fast until the pause of the Christmas holidays. The beginning of January will set them in motion again; they will "slack off," as the farmers say, through March; regain a little life at the beginning of April; and leave the Symphony Orchestra to end the season in the solitary state with which it begins it. We in Boston, as in the other capitals of music in America, live fast and full through our concert season and especially through the first two months of it, when the wandering singers, pianists and violinists are beginning their tours in the East. This year, the living will be faster and fuller than ever by reason of the innovation of concerts of serious music on Sundays.

Taking Over Sundays

As present plans go, there will be frequent concerts on Sunday afternoons in Symphony Hall, and scarcely less frequent ones, as soon as the season has begun, at the Opera House. Already it is announced that the Philharmonic Orchestra of New York, with Mr. Stransky conducting and Mr. Elman for the assisting violinist will undertake a concert at Symphony Hall on Sunday, Nov. 10. On Sunday, Nov. 24, Mme. Schumann-Heink will have a song recital there. For like purpose on Sunday, Dec. 8, comes Mme. Sembrich. Mr. Elman, the violinist, follows on Dec. 15. Then, there will be pause over Christmas, with Mme. Butt and Mr. Rumford, the English singers, to begin the Sunday concerts anew on Jan. 5 and Miss Gerhardt to follow on Jan. 19, with still other successors, like Miss Culp, through the winter and the early spring. All these concerts are appointed for the afternoons of Sunday. Five Sunday evenings, besides, will fall to the three concerts of the Händel and Haydn Society and the two that the Symphony Orchestra undertakes annually for the profit of its Pension Fund.

At the Opera House, moreover, Mr. Caplet is planning a series of afternoon concerts on Sundays, at which he purposes to make known serious and interesting music to more or less seriously minded audiences. The programme will not be a hodge-podge of the favorite and showy operatic airs of favorite singers, with an act—"in concert form"—of a popular and hackneyed opera to eke out the vocal miscellany. Instead, Mr. Caplet will set orchestra, chorus and solo singers to the performance of little known choral pieces, like Debussy's "Blessed Damozel," with Rossetti's poem for its text; Chabrier's "Ode to Music"; and Franck's "Redemption." Now and then, he will venture his own version of more familiar choral music like "Händel's "Alexander's Feast" and Verdi's "Manzoni Requiem." Symphonic pieces, like Liszt's tone-poems, Dukas's Scherzo of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" and the overtures and fantasies of the Russians will have their place in his programmes. Classical and modern songs of the German and the French composers will diversify them; and there may even be time and opportunity for whole acts of Russian and German operas that will bear not too severely transfer to "concert form."

The Causes of the Change

Sunday will thus become, for the first time, one of the concert-giving and concert-going days in Boston—and for two or three obvious reasons. In general, it is so established in New York, in Chicago and in other cities in America to the satisfaction of all concerned from the public to the managers. In particular, the experimental ventures with concerts here on Sunday afternoons succeeded last spring beyond expectation. They attracted audiences that filled, or almost filled, Symphony Hall. In them were every element of the concert-going public from the socially elect to those that have no free day, or even a free evening, except on Sundays; from the adepts of music to the seekers of easy entertainment and all the social and the musical grades between. Especially numerous and eager was the new public of no fixed place in the social or the musical hierarchy, which is becoming the main support of concerts here because it goes to them out of intelligent and discriminating liking for the pleasure that they yield. For it, Sunday is usually the most convenient day for such pleasure-seeking. On Sunday afternoons many a man is free from office, store or shop, as he is on no other day, and incredible as it may seem, there are men who crave to hear music and are curious about eminent practitioners of it. Some observers have even dared to surmise that those practitioners feel a certain stimulus when there is a considerable masculine element in their audiences. Sunday in Boston has not been exactly an interesting or profitable day for those who have little mind to churches, to domesticity, or to mere wandering and loafing about. Concerts on Sundays open the wide and pleasurable field of music to them. Seemingly, the use of Sunday for concerts has come at last in Boston because a considerable public desires it. The test of the coming season will affirm or clearly negative what has hitherto been interesting experiment.

The Well-Filled Weeks

Concerts on Sundays, however, imply little neglect of the other days and nights of the week. The season is the season, and while the number and the quality of visiting orchestras, wandering singers and ambulant virtuosi may vary, there are always sufficient of them for many a recital in Boston. Though the violinist comes from remotest Hungary, though the singer may know the capitals of Europe far better than those of America, though the orchestra is not without honor in its own city, yet have all of them heard of this town—more or less explicitly—and are resolved to have their concert here. They may assemble no very large audience and not all of that audience may have paid money at the door. The reviewers may have written with the warmth of admiration or the chill of doubting detachment. But the singer and the virtuoso, the orchestra and the conductor have "appeared in Boston" and accepted whatever befell them there.

Impending Orchestras

For example, it is a maxim of management that a city with a symphony orchestra of its own, giving many concerts, will rarely go to hear its neighbors' orchestra, however noted that intruding band may be. Here in Boston last winter, for example, we were relatively few in numbers when the Thomas Orchestra came from Chicago to prove its quality. We ought to have been curious; but we were not — until those that had dared to hear Mr. Stock and his men spread good report of them. Then, of course, it was too late. Yet for the new season as for the old, the orchestras of the outer world remain undaunted. They still insist upon their visits to Boston—and the more because of the prestige of the town as the orchestral capital of musical America. Mr. Stransky, the robust and straightforward, will again lead the sturdy Philharmonic Society at a concert here and this time without any "Wagner Programme" to aid. In February, again, out of the Middle West will come the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra in quest of more of the "Eastern" approval that it won in New York last year. Mr. Oberhoffer conducts it and its concert-master is the blonde Mr. Czerwonky that once sat at the first desk here in Boston. Finally, if rumor runs truly, the young and ambitious Mr. Stokowski of the Philadelphia Orchestra is eager to prove his new mettle and the mettle of his men, this very season, upon a Bostonian audience.

Many Violinists

For the virtuosi, as preliminary announcements go, the season will abound in violinists and run scantily in pianists. For the first time in many years, Ysaye will revisit the United States for what may easily prove his final tour. He is well advanced in middle age; he makes fewer and fewer journeys in Europe; more and more his orchestral concerts and his conducting in Brussels absorb him; season after season he has deferred a return to America. There for greeting and leave-taking he will find a public that remembers well his bulky and muscular presence; his absorbed face and his swaying body as he plays; his magnificent breadth and depth of his tone; his mastery of great curves and sweeps of melody and of rhapsodic ornament; and his pervading warmth and largeness of interpretation. Here in Boston he will play first in a concert of his own at Symphony Hall on Jan. 12 and later in the season with the Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Kreisler for another of the elder violinists of the first rank will return also to America, but only for a few weeks and almost wholly to appear with the Boston Orchestra. He will undertake no recitals of his own, and Boston, like New York and other cities, will hear him only in the Symphony Concerts early in December. At them, he will play either Beethoven's or Brahms's concerto. He so comes back, after two seasons, in th prime of the fineness of his tone, th tice of his musical feeling and the tiveness of his response to the poet emotional content of his music. M man of the younger violinists of lished place, purposes to spend the in America. In Boston, he will no with the Symphony Orchestra, bu the Philharmonic Society of New its concert here in November an recital of his own at Symphony Sunday afternoon, Dec. 15. By a report his tone keeps its richnes songfulness, and his virtuosity it while he has lost none of the matur tinence of feeling that distinguishe when he last played here. Mr. Zim too, of the younger violinists, will season in America and play at le one recital in Boston. As Elman sense is the continuator of the Ysaye, so Zimbalist, in the fine his musical sense and in the adroitness of all he does, is the hei style of Kreisler.

Few Pianists

By unique exception in our prow son, only one pianist of the first r visit America this year, the long
Mr. Godowsky. Though he on and played in the United States settled in Europe, he will come most to a new musical generat knows him only by his great re for technical mastery of his instr for refinement of touch, for a clarity and adroit response to the and the spirit of his music. In Bo will play in the Symphony Concerts a recital or two of his own. Next Godowsky stand the two women wh back to renew the agreeable memori left behind them. One is Miss Sc whose largeness of style, warmth ing and general musical energy used tinguish her from other pianists of The other is the comely Mme. Lern has ripened from the promise and c youth into an ampler, firmer but s sitive artistry. Both will have th tals here—Mme. Lerner's is alrea pointed for Nov. 14—and Miss S will appear also at the Symphony
Two men, again, end the brief lis pending pianists—Max Pauer, the virtuoso of sober style and just und ing, and Norman Wilks, a young man, who has made his way in cert-rooms and also the drawing-r London.

The Singers

The schedules of the concerts on afternoons has already disclosed the eminent singers who will visit
Mme. Sembrich, clear of opera hou will return with an artistry that the years more refine than dim. The public that has long admired the ample tones, the ample emotions and the ample humanity of Mme. Schumann-Heink will again welcome her. Miss Gerhardt, quick to confirm the reputation that she gained here last winter as a singer of songs with warmth of voice, discriminating skill and much mastery of varied mood will appear both in the Symphony Concerts and in recitals of her own. It is the custom in Europe to associate Julia Culp with Miss Gerhardt as the most distinguished singer of her sex in the younger generation of the concert-room. For the first time, she will come to America at mid-winter, and she is announced both for the Symphony Concerts and recitals of her own in Boston. Her voice is a rich and expressive mezzo-soprano; she is mistress of the finer arts of song; her responsive range in many sorts of music is wide and discriminating. She sings with clear and significant feeling and with yet more sense of appropriate style. There is reason to expect much of her. From England, after long absence, Mme. Clara Butt, the very tall and very deep-voiced alto will come back to sing her airs and ballads again and to bring with her Mr. Rumford, her husband, and an English singer like to her in style and choice of pieces.

The opera houses, finally, promise to yield less than usual in concerts or song recitals by their eminent singers. Miss Hempel, the new coloratura soprano, whose services the three companies are to divide, has made her concert tours in Germany and the Netherlands, but for a while at least she will have no time for such ventures in America. Mme. Gadski comes seldom nowadays to Boston. Mme. Tetrazzini we are likely to hear only in opera; but there is a chance that Miss Garden will be the singer at one of Mr. Caplet's concerts on a Sunday afternoon. As the "prospective arrangements" of the season now stand, we may expect only two opera singers in recitals of their own—Mr. Clément, the tenor, in the French songs, old and new, simple and sophisticated, that he sings with refined distinction of style, and Miss Teyte of the singular voice and the play of melancholy or fantastic mood that suit the music of "advanced" Parisian composers.

The Choral Concerts

Choral music flourishes none too well in Boston in these days of opera and Symphony Concerts, eminent singers and distinguished virtuosi. If the general public for it has declined in numbers and interest, its particular public keeps its old likings and loyalties. Last year the tranquil routine of the Händel and Haydn Society and the more diversified course of the Cecilia were broken by the visit of the Mendelssohn Choir from Toronto that seemed to set new standards and open new possibilities in the performance of choral music. This season there will be no such illustrious intruder. The Händel and Haydn Society will keep its revolving course through the unquestioned but not altogether unhackneyed classics of oratorio—"The Messiah" at its concerts of Dec. 22 and 23; "Elijah" at its concert on Easter Day; and Rossini's "Stabat Mater" at the concert of Feb. 9. With it, happily, Mr. Chadwick's setting of the mediæval Latin poem, "Phœnix Expirans" will be revived. Mr. Chadwick's music aside, Mr. Mollenhauer, who will again conduct the Händel and Haydn concerts, must apply his abilities and ambition to pieces that he almost has by rote. Mr. Mees will again conduct in the two concerts of the Cecilia in December and April respectively, but as yet he and the directors have not ordered their programmes. On one or the other of them Wolf-Ferrari's eloquent and beautiful setting of fragments of Dante's "New Life" is almost sure to stand.

Chamber Music

Once more the two string quartets will renew the artistic rivalry that for two or three years past has keenly interested the observers of the musical life of this town. Intrenched behind the social and the musical prestige that it has now conquered, the Flonzaley Quartet has taken Jordan Hall for three concerts on Thursdays, Dec. 12, Feb. 6 and March 13. In turn, the long-established Kneisel Quartet announces four concerts in Steinert Hall, on Tuesdays, Nov. 5, Dec. 3, Jan. 7 and March 18. "The Flonzaleys" return unchanged and so masters of the exquisitely shaded and blended tone and the subtle and elegant qualities of expression that have won them their following here. To "The Kneisels" comes a new second violinist to succeed the departed Röntgen—Hans Letz, once concert master of the Chicago Orchestra, and now fused by a summer of practice into the warm, grave, earnest style of his new associates. While the string quartets

---

HERALD.
OCTOBER 13.

CAMBRIDGE CONCERTS.

The Symphony Orchestra will give the first of its regular series of concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, next Thursday evening, with nearly every seat sold for the season. Dr. Muck has selected to play at Cambridge the program which he has just played in Boston. It includes the "Eroica" symphony, Beethoven; "Roman Carnival" overture, Berlioz; "Mazeppa," symphonic poem, Liszt, and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The second pair of Symphony concerts, to be played on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week, will bring as soloist Mme. Marie Rappold of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. Mme. Rappold has already appeared with the Symphony Orchestra here, having sung at a concert in the fall of 1908. She is one of the principal sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera House, the lighter dramatic roles falling to her lot. Here she will sing Elisabeth's greeting, from the second act of "Tannhauser," and two short pieces, one, "Chanson Provencale," by del'Acqua, and the other, "Fruhlingsnacht," by Frank van der Stucken.

Dr. Muck will revive at this concert Sgambati's first symphony. Mr. Paur gave a performance of it in Boston in the fall of 1894 and repeated it in January, 1898, since which time it has not been heard. Sgambati is one of the few Italians of talent who have devoted themselves to absolute music rather than the opera.

On the programme will also be Pfitzner's overture to "The Little Christ Elf," which Dr. Muck played in Boston in the fall of 1907. The third orchestral number will be Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn. The Symphony will close the programme.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CAMBRIDGE CONCERTS

The Symphony Orchestra will give the first of its regular series of concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, next Thursday evening with nearly every seat sold for the season. Dr. Muck has elected to play at Cambridge the programme which he has just played in Boston; the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz, "Mazeppa" symphonic poem of Liszt and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

POST, OCTOBER 13,

DR. MUCK'S WELCOME

His First Programme—The Question of Novelties—Hans Pfitzner's Overture—New Composers Who Attract Attention—Coming Concerts

The welcome accorded Dr. Muck when he walked on the stage last Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall was the welcome of friends glad to behold him again in the flesh and of an audience eager to find out fo themselves wherein Dr. Muck had changed since he left us last, with others who had yet to hear him conduct.

Dr. Muck has expressed himself on the subject of programmes; he believes that the standard masterpieces should form the food of the orchestra until, with its new men and after the relaxation of a summer season, it has recovered its finish. He does not believe, and neither does anyone else, that the aim of a conductor of an orchestra such as the Boston Symphony should be to perform as many novelties as possible in a season, irrespective of the inherent worth of these new pieces. But Dr. Muck himself introduced novelties during his previous stay in Boston not invariably of the highest worth, and which will never gain a stable and permanent position in the repertoire of the orchestra. Among them is Pfitzner's overture, to be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. On the other hand, Dr. Muck is now spending the greater part of his days in the library of the Boston Symphony. He is working busily there, acquainting himself with the additions to the library made since his departure from Boston in the spring of 1909, examining parts, etc. It is not likely that he, a man who is by nature unlavish with words or prophecies, has told the newspapers what is necessary for a present sop to Cerberus; and, within a few weeks, we may expect programmes of a considerably more eclectic variety than the one to which we now look forward.

The case of Hans Pfitzner is a strange one that cannot be easily explained by those on this side, who know him in Boston only by an odd song or two, and the overture that will be played this week. His operas have had curious and changing fortunes in Germany. He himself has been widely discussed, championed and abused i that country. Has he been more widely discussed than would have been th case in America? We saw some page of the opera "Der Rose von Liebesgarten" some time ago, and thes pages bore witness to a melodic vei of unusual fertility, to distinctio without eccentricity of harmonic styl and a close regard for dramatic decla mation and other necessities of th lyric stage. Yet it could not be sai that this music was revolutionary i the sense that some admirers of Pfitz ner would have us believe—certainl not in the sense that Debussy, or eve Strauss, who is far from a revolutionist, standing firm on the shoulders o his predecessors, Wagner and Liszt or even such a personal and individual note as that of Sibelius of Fin land, is revolutionary.

May not the comparative lack of at tention given Pfitzner be due to th fact that he is rather an importan member of the German school today than a man who offers something so new and vital that the world must stop and listen, whether it will or not?

The Frenchmen admire Florent Schmitt highly, though a work played here by the Orchestral Club last season was not nearly as promising to as other music on the same pro-

---

MME. RAPPOLD TO SING AT SYMPHONY

Noted Opera Star Will Be Heard as Soloist Next Week.

The second pair of Symphony concerts, to be played on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week, will bring as soloist Mme. Marie Rappold of the Metropolitan Opera House. She will sing Elizabeth's greeting from the second act of "Tannhauser" and two short pieces, "Chanson provencale," by del'Acqua, and "Fruhlingsnacht," by Frank Van der Stucken.

Dr. Muck will revive at this concert Sgambati's first symphony. Mr. Paur gave its first performance in Boston in the fall of 1894 and repeated it in January, 1898, since which time it has not been heard. Sgambati is among the foremost Italian composers.

Another revival by Dr. Muck will be Pritzner's charming overture to "The Little Christ Elf," which Dr. Muck played in Boston in the fall of 1907. The third orchestral number will be Brahms's "Variations on a Theme by Haydn."

OCTOBER 12. GLOBE

DR MUCK HEARD AS CONDUCTOR

Leads Again With His Quiet Mastery

Beethoven's Third Symphony Notably Performed.

Orchestra in Fine Form at Opening of Season.

Dr Karl Muck, after an absence of four years, returned yesterday afternoon as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its first public rehearsal of the season. When he appeared upon the platform at 2:30 the players arose and remained standing while the tympanist and the double quartet of horns sounded a military fanfare of welcome. The audience joined in the tribute with a cordial demonstration of applause, after which the conductor turned to his desk and to the "Eroica" symphony, which was to begin the program and indeed the new musical season both in Boston and in America.

It was good to hear this superb orchestra play again, inspired to feel deeply, to express eloquently and to be at peace with itself and its environment. The first movement of the symphony had not progressed far when the hearer was conscious of a presence.

It was not that the conductor transgressed his bounds and stepped before the composer, for Beethoven spoke as with the voice of a great poet, in whose words are found noble and impressive thoughts, wise counsel for the living, grave and reverent tribute to the dead, the outcry of the heart's passion, hope, despair; the laughter of little children, the tenderness of woman, the eternal song of humanity and the play of spirits of the air. One heard all these things in their beauty and in the greatness of their simplicity, but before them and in them as their interpreter stood a man.

The art of conducting is a strange, a fearful thing. It is built upon a foundation laid by the laws of music as a science, but it rears its crest into the clouds where no man dares measure or define the sweep of its vision, or its approach to those things unknown, save by the imagination.

Quietude and Elegance of Style.

This morning memory visualizes the concert of yesterday, and almost gives tangibility to the golden beauty of tone, the unanimity, the sensitiveness and the virtuosity of the orchestra. From their midst come up before the eye the clearly drawn outlines of the conductor who called them forth; a figure from which emanates so much of the spirit world, and which takes no little note of the forces that are material; a silhouette bathed in repose, the profile of a man who communicates his desires to his men and controls them by the transmission of thought rather than by the lusty and incessant churning or arms.

Here is the bearing and mien of a scholar, but with no hint of pedantry, a man pervaded by sensibility to the finger tips of the reserved yet imperious left hand, but enveloped in a repression, a withholding of himself, possibly akin to the mysticism of the East, as though he would hold sway by some subtle and interior magic which suggests, rather than by external force which compels.

His is still a figure of true distinction—erect, lithe and sinewy; teeming, vital and propulsive with nervous energy, which he keeps suppressed under a beat that barely stirs the slender, tapering baton, until at some climatic or accented point he calls both arms into play in a gesture of quickening, dominating, emphasizing almost impatient insistence, which sends the orchestra again before him sailing easily upon its own momentum.

There were many points of musicianship expounded yesterday afternoon, and likely to be brought forth again tonight, that should engage the music colony for a considerable time. There were tempi yesterday which pressed the skill of the violinists, which compelled some of them to play passages in the orchestra better than they may be able to do alone. But with this lightning speed, as in the whirling measures of introduction for the violins in Liszt's "Mazeppa," a repose went along. So perfect was the poise and security which Dr Muck established by the incisiveness of his rhythm that the hearer might have imagined the players comfortable even in a faster tempo.

Beethoven Impressive.

When has such an orchestral demonstration been made in Boston as the scherzo of the Symphony yesterday, particularly the opening measures beginning like whispering fairies and racing madly into bolder laughter, measures that for exquisite lightness and delicacy, for bewildering and breath-taking fleetness, were a marvel in technic and a transport of delight in their appreciation of the spirit of the music?

What a noble breadth and compassion in the funeral march, a grief truly elegiac, yet with all sincerity, devoid of the pomp and pageantry of the passing funeral train. The entire symphony observed the same beauty of proportion, a symmetry which rose as in an imposing piece of architecture, unmarred to the eye by any excrescence of personal fancy which asks the indulgence of the general design.

If it be a liberty to humanize Beethoven, then at times liberties were taken, as in the elasticity which marked the reading, the rhythmic ebb and flow which brought into their due relief the points of stress and of repose. There was a wealth of emotional nuances which kept the pulse of the heartbeat, and a scrupulous regard for accentuation. It was good to hear even in the softest passages an incisive stroke upon a salient beat which, not by loudness, but by intensity, pointed and italicized it.

Liszt's "Mazeppa" deserves respect for the form of the tone poem for which it aided to pave the way, rather than for its intrinsic merits. Whereas Byron narrates the facts, Hugo adds an allegorical conceit symbolical of genius, and Liszt in following the apotheosis has left pages laden with circus bombast in defence of the Cossack chief who paid the price of his intrigue with a Polish noble woman by his wild horseback ride.

Dr Muck let the music sound the furies it was intended to sound and it was played brilliantly.

In the same way, even as Beethoven had been permitted to speak in his own manner as a man capable of great passions and of a deep and beautiful tenderness, Berlioz, the colorist and bold-stroked fantasist, was interpreted in kind in his kaleidoscopic overture "Le Carnaval Romain." The brasses finished superbly.

The program for next week will be as follows: Pfitzner, overture to "The Little Christ Child"; Wagner, Elisabeth's greeting from "Tannhauser" (Mme Rappold); Brahms, variations on a theme of Josef Haydn; songs by Dell'Acqua and Van der Stucken, Sgambati, symphony in D major.

OCTOBER 12.
ADVERTISER,

CORDIAL WELCOME TO CONDUCTOR MUCK

SYMPHONY SEASON OPENS BRILLIANTLY

New Faces in the Ensemble, but the Same High Grade of Artistic Excellence Is Maintained.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven. Heroic Symphony.
Berlioz. Carnaval Romaine Overture.
Liszt. Symphonic Poem—"Mazeppa."
Wagner. Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

Boston is again running a-Muck, and it was effusively applausive when the celebrated doctor came to the conductor's stand. The orchestra blew a "Tusch" and the musicians and many of the public rose as the conductor entered. We can felicitate ourselves upon the possession of one of the great conductors of the present age, and, even though this was a first concert, when points of ensemble are not at their very best, one could not but see that the conductor led as one having authority, that he had a fixed ideal in his mind and that he could transmit that ideal to his men.

There were new faces in the band, the most marked change being in the violoncellos, where the great artist Alwyn Schroeder was replaced by a new comer, whose work we shall watch with interest, but who had no important obbligato to judge by in this first concert. But the orchestra as a whole is the same great organization as of old. One may wonder whether the present generation of symphony-goers ever think of the man to whom they owe the artistic traditions of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

There are busts and memorials in Symphony hall, and we hope yet to see there a portrait of the man to whose prevision the orchestra of the present owes its being; the man to whose drill-mastership the technique, which went beyond anything that America had possessed before, owes its foundation; the artistic founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as Henry L. Higginson is its financial founder,—Wilhelm Gericke.

Thanks to him each new conductor has from the start an instrument to play on which is of the greatest excellence. Dr. Muck was entirely worthy of such an instrument. The Heroic Symphony was read with a vigor and a dignity that made it effective from first to last. Of course, this is a different hero from the gentleman who lauds himself (quite a la Roosevelt) for an hour in Richard Strauss's "Heldenleben." Beethoven once said that "Even in the most terrifying pictures, music must never offend the ear." Therefore his hero may have gusts of fierce passion in the first movement, and there may be the shock of battle in development, but there is nothing repellently discordant, even in the midst of the carnage. The most that Beethoven allows himself is to superimpose the tonic chord upon the dominant at the end of the development, and even that the modern conductors soften down so that the trouble is almost inaudible. One would think that in these days when composers think nothing of mixing three or four ir-

The over-long funeral march was not dawdled. Dr. Muck gave virility even in the grief of what Coleridge called "A funeral in purple." Yet the tender oboe passages gave the feminine touch in beautiful contrast to the masculine brooding of the violoncellos. Beethoven uses the oboe effectively, but sparingly; he gives feminine tears, but not a Mrs. Gummidge. The oboe was delightfully played. At times, too, there was the turbulence of vengeful vikings.

The Scherzo was taken at a reasonable pace, and the orchestra gave it clearly. Dr. Muck avoided the furious whipping-up of the orchestra to any impossible prestissimo. The horns had their work to do in the Trio of this and were without breaks. The rush of pizzicato effects in the finale was also commendably done, although this finale does not sustain the high standard of the rest of the symphony. There was no repeat of exposition in the first movement. Altogether it was a sane and artistic interpretation of a great work, without objectionable "individualization."

Now came some selections of more modern vein, yet not of latterday radicalism; they were rather representative of what the French would call the "left-centre." The love-song in the "Carnaval Romaine" was sung by the English horns with amatory sweetness, the whistling wind chromaticized with much intensity, and the Salterello skipped bravely along. We veterans of musical reviewing can easily remember when Berlioz, Liszt and Wagner were looked on by Dwightian Boston as the world, the flesh and the devil, and now the procession has got away beyond them, and we are impatiently waiting for Schoenberg to go beyond Strauss and Reger. There are tunes to be found in Berlioz, although we do not find him an inspired melodist such as Liszt and Wagner sometimes were. But Berlioz and Liszt were pioneers and they opened the path for the whole modern school.

It may have been because of familiarity that we found the "Carnaval" overture less astonishing than Liszt's "Mazeppa." Although Byron's "Mazeppa" is not followed in this tone-poem, one can nevertheless follow the gallopings of the "Tartar of the Ukraine breed," a horse that can go into the same stable with Grane, the Walkyrian cavalry, Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust" trotters, Raff's Frau Holle mare, and the rest of the musical racing stud. "Mazeppa" is a fine bit of musical excitement and Dr. Muck worked up its climax with true dramatic power. The piccolo player certainly earned his pay in this work, and the final march was given with a truly barbaric splendor.

Of Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude there is little new to say. It is easily the greatest work in prelude form, Wagner's best prelude, as "Parsifal" is his weakest. But, after all, the "Tannhauser" overture stands firm and prevents the Wagnerian prelude from abolishing the overture form, as the composer intended. We must not forget that almost all our conductors have made great play with this prelude (Fiedler being quite successful with it), and it was practically impossible for the great conductor to do anything novel with it, nor was this desired, only it is impossible to hang any new critical thoughts upon this particular peg, in spite of the fact that it received a noble interpretation.

Perhaps, this week, in speaking of Wagner, it may be necessary to state which one we mean. We are speaking of the Bayreuth Wagner, in the above, not of the greater Wagner who is short-stop at Fen-

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1912

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

DR. MUCK AGAIN AND A RESTORED ORCHESTRA

A Brilliant and Exciting Beginning of the Season—The Return of the Orchestra to Its Old Powers and Virtues—The Conductor and a Diversified Programme—The Rare Qualities That Shone in Him—A Remarkable Performance of the "Eroica" Symphony

DESERVEDLY Dr. Muck and the orchestra had the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon to themselves. It was the first concert of the thirty-second season, and the orchestra and its conductors, and not the "assisting artists," have made possible these three decades of rich existence. It brought back to the band and to its audience the conductor who in two years of service raised it to its highest pitch of tonal quality, mingled power and finesse and imparting and characterizing force. He had returned now for a longer term, with even larger and keener ambition, to a public that has kept him in admiring memory and that testified alike to recollection, anticipation and accomplishment when it applauded him as soon as he came into view on the stage and at every pause in the course of the concert; and when it would not depart at the end until it had recalled him to stand in the midst of his men.

Dr. Muck, as his way is, made as light as he courteously might of this welcoming and approving applause. He cut short the greeting by the promptness with which he turned to his score and the orchestra. When the audience clapped long and loudly at the end of the "Eroica" symphony, his gesture seemed to shift the plaudits to the players. They had risen and sounded a tusch when he came to his place and so at the end of the concert, as if in reciprocal courtesy and liking, he had them rise again when the lingering listeners recalled him. The men too had their just right to the particular interest of the audience. Fifteen or sixteen—a sixth part of the band—have departed and some had been for years familiar figures to their weekly hearers. Fifteen or sixteen newcomers had succeeded them; the string choir in particular had been reseated and so the aspect of the orchestra was a little new and strange and obviously more youthful.

A new conductor, especially when he is of Dr. Muck's personal force and exacting standards, implies new ways for the men and raises lively interest in the results of even a week of rehearsals. With the conductor and the orchestra so to be scrutinized and tested, familiar music inevitably made the largest part of the programme—the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven aforesaid, Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carneval," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," out of Wagner. The fourth piece, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," was so unfamiliar as to seem wholly new. Dating though it does from 1854, only once before has it been played at the Symphony Concerts, and few musical memories reach over the ten years that have since elapsed.

As a conductor Mr. Muck has changed not at all. As a band the Symphony Orchestra has already become another thing, perceptibly wrought in his own image. When the long-lacking treatise on the psychology of conducting is at last written it may cite few more vivid examples of the transforming power of a conductor upon his men than the change that Dr. Muck accomplished in four days of rehearsal and through three of the pieces of his first programme. There he stood, still and erect as of old. He was as reticent of gesture as ever, and while his right hand beat the measure clearly, he raised his left with the peculiar sidelong motion oftener to subdue than to stimulate his band. There was no lashing of his orchestra to precipitate speed or bursting sonorities; no pouncing upon separate choirs; no writing of melodies upon the air; no outward and visible signs of a conductor's inner stress. Even Theodore Thomas's conducting, as an elder generation remembers it, was not quieter. Like him Dr. Muck does his work at rehearsal and lets the results underscore the power of his personality.

Yet, until the orchestra entered upon the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," it seemed transformed. Therein by some curious and excited psychological reaction, it fell back into coarseness and mere loudness of tone, into lack of balance and euphony, into the slurring of some details and the overemphasis of others. Dr. Muck's pace with the Prelude is faster than some conductors choose, and here and there the orchestra blurred the music in the fashion of last year. He himself was obviously and anxiously restraining it, but if he averted over-big sonorities, he could not maintain the clear interplay of melodies, the transparent detail, the elasticity of tone that he sought.

In all the rest, however, and in particular in the "Eroica" symphony, the orchestra rose to new virtues—or rather revived old. The tonal mass was beautifully flowing, plastic, songful. It was always duly sonorous, yet never once merely big and loud. It was adjusted, especially in the details of the symphony, with a polished euphony and a revealing precision. Contrasts told, yet not one seemed calculated or forced. Each was merely the strand or the knot that for the moment shone out of the whole web of the music. It is hard to remember when the "Eroica" has been played with such sensuous beauty of tone, with such illumination of the music, with such richness and suppleness of responsive feeling, as though the orchestra understood and imparted as with one mind and one temperament. In large and moving mass, the string tone was full, warm and cleanly. In subdued or highly individualized passages it was transparency itself. The horns were rich; the woodwinds penetrating and colorful but not shrill or thin; the brass full-throated but not over-blown in its declamation. The whole orchestra moved tinglingly up crescendo to climax, interwove melodies with nearly flawless light and shadow, made each stroke of contending, exalted, anguished or exuberant mood as though it were a part of a drama of the emotions written in tones such as Mr. d'Indy has dreamed for great symphonies.

And so, no less, with Berlioz's overture and Liszt's symphonic poem. The players summoned the full, impassioned, longing voice of Latin song in the melody that almost begins the overture. They played not only the song that Berlioz wrote, but the song that he felt, too. The dancing tune crept into the tonal mass as out of the distant air. The instrumental colors that Berlioz saw clearer in his imagination than in his notes on music-paper flashed through the saltarello. It was Berlioz with his lips unsealed and his imagination opened by Dr. Muck and the men. Of course, the orchestra was capable of the rushing pace of Mazeppa's ride. Of course the world whirled vividly by in the broken and tortured rhythms and the hollow progressions. Of course the dolorous or the heroic voice of Mazeppa's melody pierced or mastered this tumult. Pomp of tone, large advance, barbaric tang were not lacking in the Cossack march of triumphant climax.

Afer the work of the orchestra in the "Eroica" and Berlioz's overture, all these things lay easily within its power when it was thus "on edge." What it did more remarkably—and what Dr. Muck had brought it to do—was to give Liszt's music its romantic plausibility, its superficial magnitude of idea and picture, its pervading magnificence of voice, its air—to shift the figure—of an heroic fresco in tones. Overplayed, the "poem" becomes theatrical in the baser sense of the word. Under-played, it may seem mere jugglery with melodies, figures, instrumental colors and an idea or two behind. The golden mean makes it at least gilded romance. So, through three-quarters of the concert and more, the orchestra was a band of virtuosi again—musicians, poets, dramatists all at once. So has Dr. Muck restored it—for a beginning.

So to remake even an expectant and susceptible orchestra in a single week was proof enough of the singular, the unexplainable, but the very obvious power that dwells in such a conductor as Dr. Muck. It is easy to say that work and will accomplish such a change since he is one of the most industrious and conscientious of conductors and since he has the faculty that readily and penetratingly imposes his intentions, ideas and imaginings upon his men. Work and will, however, do not suffice without the qualities of mind and spirit and taste that shone in him throughout the concert. A conductor may strive for sensuous beauty of tone and yet not have the ear that largely or delicately perceives and maintains it. He may strive for the justest of euphony and yet not have the proportioning and harmonizing faculty that can attain it. He may dream his dreams of a plasticity that shall answer to every turn of musical and emotional content, to every flicker of tonal light and shade and yet toil in vain to make his orchestra supple to him. He may long and labor for that songfulness, that sense of pervading melody which is the beauty, the passion, the creating and the expressing soul of music, and yet find it beyond his reach. Dr. Muck designs, imagines, feels, wills and attains. It is a process, in that perversely fascinating psychology of conducting, of both mind and spirit, imagination and achievement.

Still clearer were these qualities in Dr. Muck's conception and consequent ordering on every side of the music that he played upon the orchestra as upon a glorified and responsive human instrument. Could he have made the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger' sound as he would have it, Wagner's music would have seemed like some great and glowing kaleidoscope of beautiful interwoven tones, now turning one and now another face of the opera to those that saw as they heard, ever expanding in warmth of happy mood and intensity of songful utterance. By his very quickness of pace, Dr. Muck would fling it off as in the heat of creation out of a released and smiling imagination. The sunshine that transfigures the church when the curtain rises is the answer and the complement to this prelude. Middle-aged and bourgeois the Master-Singers—and their themes—may be; but yet in all the Prelude, as Dr. Muck conceives it, is the music of youth and romance.

Different, indeed, is "Mazeppa," and as just in its diversity was Dr. Muck's understanding of it. Most of Liszt's symphonic poems must sound magnificently or there is no vitality in them. The performance must persuade the hearer to surrender himself to them, must transport him as do the showy speeches of romantic drama in golden mouths. He must not have time to reflect upon what he is hearing or fall out of its romantic glamor. Liszt's music, to ear and imagination, is music of illusion. A step too short or a step too long and the illusion breaks. Not once did Dr. Muck even strain it. Concert overture as "The Roman Carnival" is, it is operatic music set on the stage of Berlioz's mind, which was a far more vivid, impassioned and picturesque place than any theatre that produced his poor "Benvenuto Cellini." Under Dr. Muck's hand it sounded operatic. Berlioz's music is sometimes not altogether articulate of the passion and the picture behind. Dr. Muck loosens its tongue.

It is the way of conductors nowadays to dwell upon the details of their classic symphonies. In spite of much counsel and reproof from an elder generation, they will not let them "run." For in their openings of secret and sealed places, in their new emphases and modulations lies the proof of their imagination and individuality. What, for example, have they not found in that much-enduring first symphony of Brahms, whether or not the composer put it there? Dissect and imagine as they may, their real problem is to make their discoveries and responses seem part and parcel of the songful flow of the music, the momentary flowering in light or shadow of its pervading song. Now, it was precisely this result—this fitting of etched detail into large and flowing design that Dr. Muck achieved in the "Eroica." Not within recollection has the symphony been "read" with such a wealth of illuminating detail, such sense of the conflicting moods of the music, such imaginative suggestion in modulations of pace and turnings of phrase. Seldom has it seemed of so many interwoven voices, making passion and poetry and drama in tones along their way. Seldom in suspense and climax, in returns and anticipations of melodies, has it seemed of such exciting voice and imagination. So Dr. Muck wrought it in his individual discernment of Beethoven's music and response to it. Yet all this was but the modulation, the shading, the enhancing of the great and onflowing voice of orchestral song, that makes it heroic, epic almost, of a high and noble spirit. Not once did a detail stay the flow of this song or a shadow of idiosyncrasy cloud it. If the hand was Dr. Muck's, the voice was Beethoven's.

H. T. P.

AMERICAN-
OCTOBER 13,

MADAME RAPPOLD, SYMPHONY SOLOIST

The Symphony concerts to be played on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week will bring as soloist Madame Marie Rappold of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. Madame Rappold has appeared with the Symphony Orchestra here, having sung at a concert in the Fall of 1908.

Since then Madame Rappold has grown greatly in her art and in the esteem of the musical public. She is one of the principal sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera House, the lighter dramatic roles falling to her lot. Here she will sing Elizabeth's greeting from the second act of "Tannhauser" and two short pieces, one, "Chanson Provencale," by del'Acqua, and the other, "Fruhlingsnacht," by Frank Van der Stucken.

Dr. Muck will revive at this concert Sgambati's first symphony, which was a great favorite with Mr. Paur. Mr. Paur, in fact, gave it its first performance in Boston in the Fall of 1894, and repeated it in January, 1898, since which time it has not been heard. Sgambati is the foremost of modern Italian composers, one of the few Italians of talent who have devoted themselves to absolute music rather than the opera.

Another revival by Dr. Muck will be Pritzner's charming overture to "The Little Christ Elf," which Dr. Muck played in Boston in the Fall of 1907. The third orchestral number will be Brahms' Variations on a Theme, by Haydn. The Symphony will close the program.

OCTOBER [illegible]
GLOBE-

Mme Rappold This Week's Symphony Soloist

The second pair of Symphony concerts to be played on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week will bring as soloist Mme Marie Rappold of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, who has already appeared with the orchestra here at a concert in the Fall of 1908. She is one of the principal sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera House, the lighter dramatic roles falling to her lot. Here she will sing Elizabeth's air from the second act of "Tannhauser" and two short pieces, one, "Chanson Provencale," by del Acqua, and the other, "Fruhlingsnacht," by Frank Van der Stucken.

Dr Muck will revive at this concert Sgambati's first symphony, which was a great favorite with Mr Paur. Mr Paur, in fact, gave it its first performance in Boston in the Fall of 1894 and repeated it in January, 1898, since which time it has not been heard. Sgambati is the foremost of modern Italian composers, one of the few Italians of talent who have devoted themselves to absolute music rather than the opera.

Another revival by Dr Muck will be Pritzner's overture to "The Little Christ Elf," which Dr Muck played in Boston in the Fall of 1907. The third orchestral number will be Brahms' variations on a theme by Haydn. The Symphony will close the program.

Dr Muck's First Symphony Concert in Cambridge

The Symphony Orchestra will give the first of its regular series of concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, next Thursday evening, with nearly every seat sold for the season. Dr Muck has elected to play at Cambridge the program which he has just played in Boston. It comprises the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz; "Mazeppa," symphonic Poem by Liszt and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

People's Choral Union and Singing

JOURNAL—
OCTOBER 12, 1912.

HONOR DR. MUCK WITH OVATION

First Symphony Concert Marks Radical Changes in Orchestra.

With the opening of the thirty-second Symphony sea on yesterday came into effect an epoch-marking change in the career of America's premier orchestra. First and foremost, Dr. Karl Muck resumed his place as conductor after an absence of four years, and he is to remain at least five. Again, no less than fifteen new members, marking the most radical change of all in the personnel of the orchestra, made their first appearance—most of them their American debut.

Of the various sections, only the basses remain as they were last season. Most prominent among the newcomers is Otto Urack, who comes to share the first 'cello desk with Heinrich Warnke. Mr. Urack has been 'cello soloist of the Bayreuth Festival Orchestra and he has also made a name for himself in Germany as a conductor. He is a young man with an energetic manner—evidently a musician who is bound to keep in the front rank.

Only two members of the original orchestra are left, Daniel Kuntz, first violin, and Vincent Akeroyd, second violin. The two who dropped out during the summer were Paul Fox, the flute player, and Carl Schumann, one of the horn players.

Conductor Modest.

Dr. Muck was honored with an ovation when he came out. The orchestra stood up, and so did many in the audience; in fact everyone would have risen if the modest conductor had not cut the reception short with a few sharp nods. The brasses burst forth in a fanfare of welcome and the applause spread quickly all over the hall. The famous leader has not changed appreciably during his absence. Some would have it that he really looked younger. He certainly lost none of his vigor and magnetism. In the very first number, Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony, he revived the same impressions he made here during the seasons of 1906-7 and 1907-8—clear and complete understanding of the program and the born conductor's gift of making an orchestra respond accurately and sympathetically to his beat and gesture.

This first program of the season included, besides the symphony, Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," a tone painting descriptive of the wild ride of the Russian adventurer, and the prelude to Wagner's "Mastersingers." The performance of each number was a pleasure almost without alloy. It was a hard day on the strings, and two violinists, one on each side of the orchestra, came to grief in two of the most affecting passages in the Beethoven funeral march. Also there were several instances of nervous entrances. But the concert as a whole was distinguished, as Dr. Muck's devoted admirers have predicted it would be, by splendid musicianship, shared in by conductor and players alike.

Shadings Clearer.

The rejuvenation of the orchestra was signalized chiefly by surer attack and clearer shadings. The better balance sought by Dr. Muck was app yesterday in the livelier w

TRANSCRIPT
OCTOBER 11,

DR. MUCK AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

HE REAPPEARS WITH HEARTY GREETING FROM AUDIENCE AND ORCHESTRA—OLD SCENES AND NEW FACES

Dr. Muck, long expected and long tarrying, reappeared this afternoon as the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, and the thirty-second series of the Symphony Concerts began in appropriate celebration of his return. At the auctions every seat on the floor and in the first balcony had been sold for the afternoon concerts. There remained only the "rush seats" of the second balcony, and by ten o'clock, the line of the expectant had begun to form on Huntington avenue. At noon it was still lengthening and by one o'clock it stretched to the neighboring hospital. As the public of these "rush seats" came early, so, too, comparatively, did the other public of parquet and balcony. It had for object its social interchanges, for the beginning of the Symphony Concerts is the beginning of the autumn season in town and Symphony Hall the first approved meeting-place for it.

Both publics were equally expectant of the conductor, and in their eagerness over him seemed scarcely to notice the many new faces in the orchestra. Yet they must have remembered the gray-haired and gentle-faced Mr. Schroeder, gone from the violoncellos; the robust Krafft, disappeared from the first violins; and the familiar aspect of Mr. Sautet and Mr. Fox, who sat so many years in the wind choir. The new faces were usually the faces of young men, and they lessen the impression, of which strangers used sometimes to speak, of a middle-aged orchestra.

With the old springing step and the familiar air of looking straight before him, Dr. Muck came to his place, to the plaudits of both orchestra and audience. The applause was short and hearty. The band stood to receive him, and sounded a Tusch, and many in the audience were on their feet. The conductor had scarcely changed in appearance. Perhaps he seemed younger than he did six years ago. He is as slight of body, erect of carriage, bright of eye, and commanding of aspect as ever. The balconies, seeing from their angle, recognized the familiar aquiline profile; the parquet saw once more the familiar square-set shoulders and the sharp, clear gesture. At length, the applause subsided and the conductor, evidently stirred by so good-willed a welcome, turned to the symphony, Beethoven's "Eroica," with which his programme began. Before it was done, it was plain that the orchestra is the better instrument for the changes in it and that Dr. Muck has returned in the full prime of his powers.

OCTOBER 12,
HERALD,

WARM GREETING FOR DR. MUCK

Audience Enthusiastic at Opening of Symphony's 32d Season.

PROGRAM IS ALL ROMANTIC

Beethoven's 'Eroica' and Liszt's 'Mazeppa' Features of Afternoon.

By PHILIP HALE.

The program of the public rehearsal that opened the 32d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall was as follows:

Symphony No. 3 "Eroica"	Beethoven
Overture "Roman Carnival"	Berlioz
Symphonic poem No 6 "Mazeppa"	Liszt
Prelude to "The Mastersingers"	Wagner

The 32d season opened brilliantly. As soon as Dr. Muck came upon the stage, after an absence of four years, the great audience paid him heartfelt and flattering tribute; nor need he doubt for a moment the sincerity of this welcome; an exhibition of respect and admiration for him as conductor and as man; nor was in this instance the fanfare of the orchestra merely traditional and perfunctory. Dr. Muck acknowledged the welcome with grace and dignity, as is his wont.

> He nothing common did, or mean,
> Upon that memorable scene.

In view of the conditions that attended this concert—a conductor whose methods are unfamiliar to some in the orchestra, the limited acquaintanceship established by a few rehearsals, the presence of new players—the performance was unusually brilliant. The program was a romantic one throughout, for the Beethoven of the "Eroica" is still to be reckoned with as a roman-

Liszt's "Mazeppa" was practically unknown to the audience, either in its original version as a piano etude or as a symphonic poem for orchestra. The whole poem was performed here at a Philharmonic concert in 1881, and Mr. Gericke revived it in 1900. Liszt was moved to the composition of it by Hugo's poem, which is in the bard's most fulgurant and sonorous manner. Mr. George Moore peevishly described "Les Orientales," which includes "Mazeppa," as "an East of painted cardboard, tin daggers and a military band playing the 'Turkish Patrol' in the Palais Royal," but he immediately added: "The verse is grand, noble, tremendous."

The music of Liszt is something more than a portrayal in tones of Mazeppa's wild ride; it is much more than imitative music, or else it might be classed with George William Warren's "Tam o' Shanter," a piano piece that was played con amore by our maiden aunts in the late Sixties and early Seventies. It is evident from Liszt's own explanatory note that, while Hugo likened Mazeppa to a mortal bound alive upon "thy fatal croup, O Genius, thou fiery steed", and arising king only when he seems to fall forever, the composer thought of genius persecuted by an ignoble world ignorant that at the last this genius would break the fetters and stand revealed lord and master.

Liszt's argument is not wholly free from bombast, as it seems to us now dwelling in a materialistic period, nor does the symphonic poem utterly escape the reproach of a certain vulgarity in the pompous declamation of the chief motive and the first section of the march—apotheosis; yet on the whole the music is imaginative and idealistic. The lurking bathos in some of Liszt's compositions may easily be brought out so that it dominates by a conductor who believes that "effect" lies in speed and sound and fury. Dr. Muck, with his admirable sense of proportion, kept this fantastic composition from becoming a flamboyant Hungarian rhapsody, although the passages in the march which are characteristically Hungarian and in Liszt's finer manner, were read with the appropriate delicacy and in the national vein.

And yet the overture of Berlioz, a few years older than Liszt's transcription of his piano piece, and well known to audiences, is by far the fresher work. The more the music of Berlioz is heard, the more contemporaneous it seems—that is, when it is performed with understanding and gusto—and wonder over the prodigious genius of the ill-regulated and unfortunate man grows and will not end.

The feature of the concert, however, was the performance of the "Eroica"—especially of the Scherzo and Variations. Some might say that the opening of the Funeral March was taken at a pace so slow that the music lost a little in emotional quality; on the other hand others found that this pace enlarged the solemn, impersonal lamentation. To dwell on this point is unnecessary, nor is it too much to say that the performance of the symphony was one long to be remembered. Seldom is there in the reading such nicety and elasticity in treatment of the detail, such a sense of proportion, contrasts, and euphony, such significant rhetorical emphasis, such a pervading spirit of romanticism, classic in its beauty and its nobility.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Pfitzner, overture to "The Little Christ-Child"; Brahms, Variations on a theme of Haydn; Sgambati, Symphony No. 1. Mme. Rappold will sing Elisabeth's "Greeting" from "Tannhaeuser" and these songs with orchestra: Dell'Acqua, Chanson Provencale; Van der Stucken, "O Komm mi mir in die Fruehlingsnacht."

OCTOBER 14,
TRANSCRIPT,

ulated ey are ist be ress on ries,

An-ably sent its rough s re-

ule 6.

r his amed er of to be some
B.

pt. 9, yself,
The Mr.
ss.
Y.
M. A. chil-enoni
Eliza-

S OF MUSIC

cident at the Symphony aturday—More Announce-
New Season—Ida Ruben-ne, to Come to America?—
Makes His Debut as Con-Philadelphia Orchestra—
nion

y, before the audience of g concerts, Dr. Muck made reappearance, so to say, or of the Symphony Or-Symphony Hall was filled st seat; again a consider-the listeners rose when place, in the midst of brief d hearty applause; and ose of the concert, the con-lled—to summon in his turn o its feet. The exceptional ond the recollection of the e, befell at the end of the phony. When Dr. Muck and had finished the most illumimpressive performance that received in Boston in our ginson rose from his seat in the hall, walked slowly up e his hand to Dr. Muck, who stage to shake it, and then of his arm seemed to inhestra in a comprehensive roval—an unusual action well the unusual emotion of the the "Eroica" had sounded fternoon, so it sounded on ening, while Berlioz's over-oman Carnival," and Liszt's
"Mazeppa," received equally nance at both concerts. On wever, with the Prelude to singer," Dr. Muck seemed to ll upon his men more fully d on Friday afternoon.

OCTOBER 12,
POST,

DR. MUCK HEARTILY WELCOMED

Audience and Orchestra Unite in Cordial Greeting

BY OLIN DOWNES

In at least one respect the ceremonies were historic when Dr. Carl Muck came upon the stage yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, to conduct the first public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of the present season, and resume the musical direction of that body for at least several years to come.

He was well remembered. It is said that he had returned to Boston, resolved to do his utmost to add new records to the history of the orchestra, and the already enviable reputation which he made here for himself in the seasons of '07,-'08 and '08-'09. On the steps the patrons of the rush seats had been waiting since 10 o'clock that morning. For the first time in the history of the Boston Symphony, the players rose to their feet when the conductor appeared, and saluted him with a "Tusch," a fanfare of the brass and rolling of drums, a greeting which must have warmed the heart of the conductor, a fine custom, prevalent in Europe, but too seldom observed here, when musicians of high reputation come to take command of such an organization as the Boston orchestra.

AUDIENCE RISES

Few men, indeed, have come upon a concert platform in this city with a great purpose showing so clearly in every feature and every inch of the figure. Always an uncommon personality, Dr. Muck had seldom, if ever, made such an impressive appearance in this city. It was not only the characteristic distinction of his bearing and his commanding presence; these have always contributed to his successes. It was the thought of what he was now to do, showing in his face and felt by all, which caused many of the members of the audience to rise to their feet, with the orchestra on the stage.

The concert, aside from the occasion, was memorable. For the eloquence of the interpretations and the splendid appreciation which gave to each composition the voice characteristic of its composer and its period; for the wonderful beauty and clarity of the orchestral tone, its resonance and living fire; above all, for the informing individuality and the immense creative force of the quiet and conservatively mannered gentleman in charge, who made very few, but very decisive and unmistakable gestures, who was obeyed to the utmost, in the letter and the spirit, for he projected his very will into those who obeyed him.

Authority Absolute

Dr. Muck's programme consisted of the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven; Berlioz, overture, "Le Carnaval Romain"; Liszt's symphonic poem, little known in its orchestral version, "Mazeppa," and Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude.

It was seen at once that the conductor's control over the men was remarkable even thus early in the season. When he entered, Dr. Muck bowed quickly, waited an instant for silence in the hall, lifted his baton, and the Symphony had commenced. It was as though he did not wish to be delayed or distracted in the performance of the task he had undertaken. It was as though he were conceiving, willing the music, in spirit, rather than conducting in the flesh, his concentration was so obvious, and felt so strongly, alike by players and listeners. The rapport which he had established with his men must always remain a mystery to the amateur; this faithful and almost perfect response to the slightest wish, even thought, of the leader, by instruments and players of instruments. Dr. Muck's beat is as a rock for everything to rest upon, it is so firm, and yet is so subtly elastic and responsive to the inherent musical impulse.

Carefully Designed

It was seen, too, that the programme had been very carefully designed. Rightly was the Beethoven symphony, as someone advised, placed first. It is one of the most complex and important of all Beethoven's orchestral works. It is the grandest possible example of a classic masterpiece, and yet is sown thick with the seeds of that revolt which was fostered so furiously by other composers who figured on yesterday's programme. But how admirably was the difference in the scope of this work, and its period, and the greatness of its thought, distinguished from the later music. The scale of dynamics was another thing from the dynamic scale of the other works.

The orchestral tone was marvellously transparent and singing. The long first movement was so carefully arranged and graduated in its development, that you were instinctively aware of its proportions, and would have been, probably, even if unacquainted with the piece. The emotional effect, as the composer intended, was cumulative, and grew from climax to climax. There were real Beethoven fortissimi, and those suddon and nightily characteristic features—the explosive accents on naturally unaccented beats of the measures. Yet the sound was never hard or ugly—anything but beautiful. There was the most remarkable freedom, yet stability of pace and rhythms. Again, the slow movement was read with a simplicity and breadth hat made it all a tremendous ament. This was epic, Homeric, and again collossal in its heroic stride and ulfillment. Dr. Muck was equally forunate in the two following movements, n the mysterious rustlings that ushr in the scherzo, and the poetic horn alls of the middle section, and finally, a tour de force that made the conducor only second in his artistic achievement to the composer—the final variations, during which one hears, as it were, the blows of the hammer of the mightiest blacksmith, fashioning his metal in shapes ever new, and greater.

A Marked Contrast

The Berlioz overture was an entire contrast to this, yet there was not an insurmountable chasm between the two works. But here was carnival madness running amuck, a riot of color and wild, intoxicating rhythms. Yet again, there was the distinction between the spirit of this piece and of the thundering, rushing tone poem of Liszt. Never did war-horse of 1830 shake its mane and gallop more magnificently. In spite of the passages which are simply piano figures transcribed for instruments, in spite of the glaring vulgarity and pompousness of the trombones shouting Mazeppa's theme, the piece told tremendously. Dr. Muck had revivified it. He had not attempted to bring this relic of Byronism up to today, either to refine or vulgarize it. He had simply brought back, large as life, the romantic feeling which gave it birth, with no apologies to the 20th century, and this performance, like the others, carried such conviction with it that it was impossible to resist its melodramatic appeal, and the effect of the flamboyant conclusion.

Through it all, through the vulgarest, the most commonplace passages of it, there ran a vein of true Promethean fire, and listening to that performance, we now know more about Liszt, the man and the artist, than could be found out about him in all the biographies that have been published.

The performance of the Meistersinger prelude was rougher than those which had preceded. This was due partly, no doubt, to the excitement which had been gradually growing upon players and audience; and partly to the unadvanced state of the season. After this, when Dr. Muck was recalled, he turned to his orchestra applauding them himself, bade them rise and then only turned in their midst to acknowledge the approval of his hearers.

When Dr. Muck visited this city for the first time he was a great conductor. Today he is greater than that with a future in store for himself and the orchestra that he is conducting.

TRANSCRIPT
OCTOBER 11,

DR. MUCK AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

HE REAPPEARS WITH HEARTY GREETING FROM AUDIENCE AND ORCHESTRA—OLD SCENES AND NEW FACES

Dr. Muck, long expected and long tarrying, reappeared this afternoon as the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, and the thirty-second series of the Symphony Concerts began in appropriate celebration of his return. At the auctions every seat on the floor and in the first balcony had been sold for the afternoon concerts. There remained only the "rush seats' of the second balcony, and by ten o'clock, the line of the expectant had begun to form on Huntington avenue. At noon it was still lengthening and by one o'clock it stretched to the neighboring hospital. As the public of these "rush seats" came early, so, too, comparatively, did the other public of parquet and balcony. It had for object its social interchanges, for the beginning of the Symphony Concerts is the beginning of the autumn season in town and Symphony Hall the first approved meeting-place for it.

Both publics were equally expectant of the conductor, and in their eagerness over him seemed scarcely to notice the many new faces in the orchestra. Yet they must have remembered the gray-haired and gentle-faced Mr. Schroeder, gone from the violoncellos; the robust Krafft, disappeared from the first violins; and the familiar aspect of Mr. Sautet and Mr. Fox, who sat so many years in the wind choir. The new faces were usually the faces of young men, and they lessen the impression, of which strangers used sometimes to speak, of a middle-aged orchestra.

With the old springing step and the familiar air of looking straight before him, Dr. Muck came to his place, to the plaudits of both orchestra and audience. The applause was short and hearty. The band stood to receive him, and sounded a Tusch, and many in the audience were on their feet. The conductor had scarcely changed in appearance. Perhaps he seemed younger than he did six years ago. He is as slight of body, erect of carriage, bright of eye, and commanding of aspect as ever. The balconies, seeing from their angle, recognized the familiar aquiline profile; the parquet saw once more the familiar square-set shoulders and the sharp, clear gesture. At length, the applause subsided and the conductor, evidently stirred by so good-willed a welcome, turned to the symphony, Beethoven's "Eroica," with which his programme began. Before it was done, it was plain that the orchestra is the better instrument for the changes in it and that Dr. Muck has returned in the full prime of his powers.

Liszt's "Mazeppa" was practically unknown to the audience, either in its original version as a piano etude or as a symphonic poem for orchestra. The whole poem was performed here at a Philharmonic concert in 1881, and Mr. Gericke revived it in 1900. Liszt was moved to the composition of it by Hugo's poem, which is in the bard's most fulgurant and sonorous manner. Mr. George Moore peevishly described "Les Orientales," which includes "Mazeppa," as "an East of painted cardboard, tin daggers and a military band playing the 'Turkish Patrol' in the Palais Royal," but he immediately added: "The verse is grand, noble, tremendous."

The music of Liszt is something more than a portrayal in tones of Mazeppa's wild ride; it is much more than imitative music, or else it might be classed with George William Warren's "Tam o' Shanter," a piano piece that was played con amore by our maiden aunts in the late Sixties and early Seventies. It is evident from Liszt's own explanatory note that, while Hugo likened Mazeppa to a mortal bound alive upon "thy fatal croup, O Genius, thou fiery steed", and arising king only when he seems to fall forever, the composer thought of genius persecuted by an ignoble world ignorant that at the last this genius would break the fetters and stand revealed lord and master.

Liszt's argument is not wholly free from bombast, as it seems to us now dwelling in a materialistic period, nor does the symphonic poem utterly escape the reproach of a certain vulgarity in the pompous declamation of the chief motive and the first section of the march—apotheosis; yet on the whole the music is imaginative and idealistic. The lurking bathos in some of Liszt's compositions may easily be brought out so that it dominates by a conductor who believes that "effect" lies in speed and sound and fury. Dr. Muck, with his admirable sense of proportion, kept this fantastic composition from becoming a flamboyant Hungarian rhapsody, although the passages in the march which are characteristically Hungarian and in Liszt's finer manner, were read with the appropriate delicacy and in the national vein.

And yet the overture of Berlioz, a few years older than Liszt's transcription of his piano piece, and well known to audiences, is by far the fresher work. The more the music of Berlioz is heard, the more contemporaneous it seems—that is, when it is performed with understanding and gusto—and wonder over the prodigious genius of the ill-regulated and unfortunate man grows and will not end.

The feature of the concert, however, was the performance of the "Eroica"—especially of the Scherzo and Variations. Some might say that the opening of the Funeral March was taken at a pace so slow that the music lost a little in emotional quality; on the other hand others found that this pace enlarged the solemn, impersonal lamentation. To dwell on this point is unnecessary, nor is it too much to say that the performance of the symphony was one long to be remembered. Seldom is there in the reading such nicety and elasticity in treatment of the detail, such a sense of proportion, contrasts, and euphony, such significant rhetorical emphasis, such a pervading spirit of romanticism, classic in its beauty and its nobility.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Pfitzner, overture to "The Little Christ-Child"; Brahms, Variations on a theme of Haydn; Sgambati, Symphony No. 1. Mme. Rappold will sing Elisabeth's "Greeting" from "Tannhaeuser" and these songs with orchestra: Dell'Acqua, Chanson Provençale; Van der Stucken, "O Komm mi mir in die Fruehlingsnacht."

OCTOBER 12,
HERALD,

WARM GREETING FOR DR. MUCK

Audience Enthusiastic at Opening of Symphony's 32d Season.

PROGRAM IS ALL ROMANT

Beethoven's 'Eroica' and Lisz 'Mazeppa' Features of Afternoon.

By PHILIP HALE.

The program of the public rehea that opened the 32d season of the ton Symphony Orchestra yeste afternoon in Symphony Hall was as lows:

Symphony No. 3 "Eroica"............Beet
Overture "Roman Carnival"............B
Symphonic poem No 6 "Mazeppa"..........
Prelude to "The Mastersingers".......W

The 32d season opened brilliantly soon as Dr. Muck came upon the s after an absence of four years, great audience paid him heartfelt flattering tribute; nor need he d for a moment the sincerity of this come; an exhibition of respect and miration for him as conductor an man; nor was in this instance the fare of the orchestra merely tradit and perfunctory. Dr. Muck ackn edged the welcome with grace and nity, as is his wont.

> He nothing common did, or mea
> Upon that memorable scene.

In view of the conditions that at ed this concert—a conductor w methods are unfamiliar to some i orchestra, the limited acquaintanc established by a few rehearsals presence of new players—the per ance was unusually brilliant. The gram was a romantic one throu for the Beethoven of the "Eroic still to be reckoned with as a r

---

OCTOBER 14,
TRANSCRIPT,

NEWS OF MUSIC

An Unusual Incident at the Symphony Concert of Saturday—More Announcements for the New Season—Ida Rubenstein, the Mime, to Come to America?—Mr. Stokowski Makes His Debut as Conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra—News and Opinion

ON Saturday, before the audience of the evening concerts, Dr. Muck made his second reappearance, so to say, as the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. Again Symphony Hall was filled almost to the last seat; again a considerable number of the listeners rose when he came to his place, in the midst of brief but general and hearty applause; and again, at the close of the concert, the conductor was recalled—to summon in his turn the orchestra to its feet. The exceptional incident, beyond the recollection of the oldest habitué, befell at the end of the "Eroica" symphony. When Dr. Muck and the orchestra had finished the most illuminating and impressive performance that the music has received in Boston in our time, Mr. Higginson rose from his seat in the middle of the hall, walked slowly up the aisle, gave his hand to Dr. Muck, who bent over the stage to shake it, and then with a wave of his arm seemed to include the orchestra in a comprehensive gesture of approval—an unusual action well warranted by the unusual emotion of the audience. As the "Eroica" had sounded on Friday afternoon, so it sounded on Saturday evening, while Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," and Liszt's tone-poem, "Mazeppa," received equally vivid performance at both concerts. On Saturday, however, with the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Dr. Muck seemed to work his will upon his men more fully than he could on Friday afternoon.

OCTOBER 12,
POST,

DR. MUCK HEARTILY WELCOMED

Audience and Orchestra Unite in Cordial Greeting

BY OLIN DOWNES

In at least one respect the ceremonies were historic when Dr. Carl Muck came upon the stage yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, to conduct the first public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of the present season, and resume the musical direction of that body for at least several years to come.

He was well remembered. It is said that he had returned to Boston, resolved to do his utmost to add new records to the history of the orchestra, and the already enviable reputation which he made here for himself in the seasons of '07,-'08 and '08-'09. On the steps the patrons of the rush seats had been waiting since 10 o'clock that morning. For the first time in the history of the Boston Symphony, the players rose to their feet when the conductor appeared, and saluted him with a "Tusch," a fanfare of the brass and rolling of drums, a greeting which must have warmed the heart of the conductor, a fine custom, prevalent in Europe, but too seldom observed here, when musicians of high reputation come to take command of such an organization as the Boston orchestra.

AUDIENCE RISES

Few men, indeed, have come upon a concert platform in this city with a great purpose showing so clearly in every feature and every inch of the figure. Always an uncommon personality, Dr. Muck had seldom, if ever, made such an impressive appearance in this city. It was not only the characteristic distinction of his bearing and his commanding presence; these have always contributed to his successes. It was the thought of what he was now to do, showing in his face and felt by all, which caused many of the members of the audience to rise to their feet, with the orchestra on the stage.

The concert, aside from the occasion, was memorable. For the eloquence of the interpretations and the splendid appreciation which gave to each composition the voice characteristic of its composer and its period; for the wonderful beauty and clarity of the orchestral tone, its resonance and living fire; above all, for the informing individuality and the immense creative force the quiet and conservatively man red gentleman in charge, who made ry few, but very decisive and unmis kable gestures, who was obeyed to the utmost, in the letter and the spirit, for he projected his very will into those who obeyed him.

Authority Absolute

Dr. Muck's programme consisted of the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven; Berlioz, overture, "Le Carnaval Romain"; Liszt's symphonic poem, little known in its orchestral version, "Mazeppa," and Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude.

It w s seen at once that the conductor's ontrol over the men was remark- even thus early in the season. Wh n he entered, Dr. Muck bowed quickly, waited an instant for silence in e hall, lifted his baton, and the Syn ny had commenced. It was as thou he did not wish to be delayed or distracted in the performance of the task he had undertaken. It was as though he were conceiving, willing the music, in spirit, rather than conducting in the flesh, his concentration was so obvious. and felt so strongly, alike by players and listeners. The rapport which he had established with his men must always remain a mystery to the amateur; this faithful and almost perfect response to the slightest wish, even thought, of the leader, by instruments and players of instruments. Dr. Muck's beat is as a rock for everything to rest upon, it is so firm, and yet is so subtly elastic and responsive to the inherent musical impulse.

Carefully Designed

It was seen, too, that the programme had been very carefully designed. Rightly was the Beethoven symphony, as someone advised, placed first. It is one of the most complex and important of all Beethoven's orchestral works. It is the grandest possible example of a classic masterpiece, and yet is sown thick with the seeds of that revolt which was fostered so furiously by other composers who figured on yesterday's programme. But how admirably was the difference in the scope of this work, and its period, and the greatness of its thought, distinguished from the later music. The scale of dynamics was another thing from the dynamic scale of the other works.

The orchestral tone was marvellously transparent and singing. The long first movement was so carefully arranged and graduated in its development, that you were instinctively aware of its proportions, and would have been, probably, even if unacquainted with the piece. The emotional effect, as the composer intended, was cumulative, and grew from climax to climax. There were real Beethoven fortissimi, and those suddon and nightily characteristic features—the explosive accents on naturally unaccented eats of the measures. Yet the sound was never hard or ugly—anything but eautiful. There was the most remark ble freedom, yet stability of pace and hythms. Again, the slow movement was ead with a simplicity and breadth hat made it all a tremendous ament. This was epic, Homeric, and gain collossal in its heroic stride and ulfillment. Dr. Muck was equally forunate in the two following movements, n the mysterious rustlings that ush-r in the scherzo, and the poetic horn alls of the middle section, and finally, n a tour de force that made the conducor only second in his artistic achievenent to the composer—the final variations, during which one hears, as it were, the blows of the hammer of the mightiest blacksmith, fashioning his metal in shapes ever new, and greater.

A Marked Contrast

The Berlioz overture was an entire contrast to this, yet there was not an insurmountable chasm between the two works. But here was carnival madness running amuck, a riot of color and wild, intoxicating rhythms. Yet again, there was the distinction between the spirit of this piece and of the thundering, rushing tone poem of Liszt. Never did war-horse of 1830 shake its mane and gallop more magnificently. In spite of the passages which are simply piano figures transcribed for instruments, in spite of the glaring vulgarity and pompousness of the trombones shouting Mazeppa's theme, the piece told tremendously. Dr. Muck had revivified it. He had not attempted to bring this relic of Byronism up to today, either to refine or vulgarize it. He had simply brought back, large as life, the romantic feeling which gave it birth, with no apologies to the 20th century, and this performance, like the others, carried such conviction with it that it was impossible to resist its melodramatic appeal, and the effect of the flamboyant conclusion.

Through it all, through the vulgarest, the most commonplace passages of it, there ran a vein of true Promethean fire, and listening to that performance, we now know more about Liszt, the man and the artist, than could be found out about him in all the biographies that have been published.

The performance of the Meistersinger prelude was rougher than those which had preceded. This was due partly, no doubt, to the excitement which had been gradually growing upon players and audience; and partly to the unadvanced state of the season. After this, when Dr. Muck was recalled, he turned to his orchestra applauding them himself, bade them rise and then only turned in their midst to acknowledge the approval of his hearers.

When Dr. Muck visited this city for the first time he was a great conductor. Today he is greater than that with a future in store for himself and the orchestra that he is conducting.

From PRESS

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

SEP 15 1912

Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes the preliminary announcement that it will give its usual series of five evening concerts in the Academy of Music during the coming season. The concerts will be given on Monday evenings, the dates being November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17. As already announced, Dr. Karl Muck will resume the post of conductor after an absence of four years, becoming the permanent conductor of the orchestra. The list of soloists will include Mme. Matzenauer, the eminent contralto, of the Metropolitan Opera, and Fritz Kreisler. Mr. Kreisler comes to America this season under an exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The general sale of season tickets to new subscribers will open at 1119 Chestnut Street, Monday morning, October 14.

Es 1884

From INQUIRER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date SEP 14 1912

is to it."

Muck Denies European Opera Offer

Special Cable to The Inquirer. Copyright, 1912, by the New York Herald Company.

BERLIN, Sept. 13.—In a telegram to the Lokal Anzeiger, Dr. Karl Muck states that there is no truth in the report that he has been approached again by the Munich royal opera to succeed the late Dr. Felix Mottl. Dr. Muck will leave soon for Boston to take up his duties as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra.

Establis 14

From TELEGRAPH

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

SEP 14

Date

tions.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes the preliminary announcement that it will give its usual series of five evening concerts in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, the dates being November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17. Dr. Karl Muck will resume the post of conductor after an absence of four years. The list of soloists will include Margarete Matzenauer, the contralto of the Metropolitan Opera, and Fritz Kreisler, the violinist.

Establis

From RECORD

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

SEP 15 1912

Date

MUSIC NOTES

—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual series of five evening concerts in the Academy of Music during the coming season on Monday evenings November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17. Dr. Karl Muck will resume the post of conductor after an absence of four years. The list of soloists includes Mme. Matzenauer, the eminent contralto of the Metropolitan Opera, and Fritz Kreisler, who comes to America this season under an exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The general sale of season tickets to new subscribers will open at Heppe's, Monday morning, October 14.

—The Settlement Music School, No. 429 Christian street, will reopen tomorrow

Establishe

From INQUIRER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date SEP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that it will give its usual series of five evening concerts in the Academy of Music during the coming season. The concerts will take place on Monday evenings, the dates being November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17. As already stated, Dr. Karl Muck will resume the post of conductor after an absence of four years, becoming the permanent conductor of the orchestra. The list of sololists will include Mme. Matzenauer, the eminent contralto of the Metropolitan Opera, and Fritz Kreisler. Mr. Kreisler comes to America this season under an exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The general sale of season tickets to new subscribers will open at Heppe's Monday morning, October 14.

Es 1884

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

SEP 15 1912

Date

Musical Notes

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes the preliminary announcement that it will give its usual series of five evening concerts in the Academy of Music during the coming season. The concerts will be given on Monday evenings, the dates being November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17. As already announced, Dr. Karl Muck will resume the post of conductor after an absence of four years, becoming the permanent conductor of the orchestra. The list of soloists will include Mme. Matzenauer, the eminent contralto of the Metropolitan Opera, and Fritz Kreisler. Mr. Kreisler comes to America this season under an exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The general sale of season tickets to new subscribers will open at Heppe's Monday

Establi

From NORTH AMERICAN

Address Philadelphia, P.

SEP 15 1912

Date

Establi

STOKOWSKI TO OFFER NOVELTIES THIS YEAR

New Orchestra Conductor Believes in Catholicity of Musical Taste

NEWS ABOUT THE OPERA

By H. T. Craven

As usual, the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has planned a series of five concerts for the musical season in Philadelphia. The organization will be heard in the Academy of Music on these Monday evenings: November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17.

Mr. Fielder's tenure of office having expired, the orchestra will be under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, the eminent German conductor, who has been out of America for several seasons. He returns to become permanent conductor. The list of soloists for the coming season is as yet incomplete, but it is good news that among the visiting stars will be Margarete Matzenauer, the superb contralto of the New York Metropolitan Opera Company, and Fritz Kreisler, the violinist. Mr. Kreisler comes to America this year under exclusive contract with the Boston orchestra.

The new director of the Philadelphia Orchestra, [illegible] Stokowski, is a firm believer in catholicity of musical taste. In addition to standard classical selections, he will offer at the Academy of Music this year nineteen orchestral novelties, including representative works of the Russian, Finnish, French, German, British and American schools.

Seeks to Keep Abreast

"I am convinced," said Mr. Stokowski recently, "that a series of concerts undoubtedly gains in interest and variety if the individual concerts bear certain relations to each other with regard to school and content. Therefore I always plan the entire season at one time. Moreover, I believe that a symphony orchestra should continually present the great classics and regard them as the solid foundation of its program scheme. After that every school and type of modern music should be equally presented. Finally, I believe it is the duty of every conductor to watch the output of living composers, sift their work and present the best of it, thus keeping abreast with the foremost wave of progress."

The director is expected here in the latter part of the month. Within the past week the orchestra management received a letter from him, dated in Munich, expressing his desire to get to work in Philadelphia as soon as possible. He had already completed his twenty-five programs for the twenty-five pairs of concerts to be offered here.

Biographies of the new artists in the Dippel organization are slowly filtering in. Past performances do not count for very much in the case of operatic artists. The public is ever the prompt tribunal of opinion regarding their merits or deficiencies. Still it is interesting to learn concerning Icilio Calleja, the new dramatic tenor, recently engaged by Andreas Dippel, that he was born in Greece twenty-eight years ago, and that after practicing law for a while in Alexandria he took up voice culture with a view to appearing on the operatic stage. Arturo Toscanini, the gifted musical director of the Metropolitan Opera House, selected him to sing the leading role in Catalini's 'La Wally' at La Scala, Milan, in 1907 and his success is said to have been emphatic.

He later appeared in Rome and other important cities, and in Paris his Samson attracted the attention of Saint-Saens. He is accredited with a marked triumph in Cairo, where he sang Radames in 'Aida' at the Khedival Theater. He is at present singing in Cremona, and on closing his engagement there he will come immediately to the United States.

Operatic Society Busy

The Philadelphia Operatic Society's first performance of the year, which will be given in the Academy of Music on the evening of October 24, promises to be one of the most interesting of its achievements. "Der Freischeutz," Carl Maria von Weber's romantic opera, which had not been heard in this city for many seasons, will be revived. Within the past two years this admirable work was heard at the New York Metropolitan Opera House, but the management did not see fit to carry the production to this city.

At that time Johanne Gadski was the Agnes. "Der Freischeutz" was the first grand opera ever sung in this city. It was given in English at the old Chestnut Street Theater, on March 18, 1825.

ICILIO CALLEJA—TENOR
FLORENCE HINKLE SOPRANO
TITTA RUFFO BARITONE

STARS IN MUSICAL FIELD

Icilio Calleja, the young Greek tenor, and Titta Ruffo, the barytone, will be newcomers in Mr. Dippel's company this season. Florence Hinkle, the Philadelphia soprano, will be heard as soloist at one of the Philadelphia Orchestra concerts.

There will be a chorus of 200 in the forthcoming production, a ballet of 48 and an orchestra of 60. Siegfried Behrens will be the musical director.

The cast will be as follows: Agnes, Cuno's daughter, Miss Alma Weisshaar; Annie, her cousin, Miss Jennie G. Kneedler; Max, a young forester, George Rothermel; Caspar, a forester, in Zamiel's power, Frederick Ayres; Cuno, the head ranger, Horace R. Hood; Prince Ottokar, Morris Ware; Killian, a peasant, Charles D. Cuzner; a hermit, Edwin C. Mitchell; Zamiel, "The Black Huntsman," Dr. Frank G. Ritter.

The society's second bill this season will be devoted to Verdi's "The Masked Ball," followed by Leo Delibes' delightful ballet of "Coppelia."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

SEP 22 1912

Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual series of five evening concerts in the Academy of Music during the coming season on Monday evenings, November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17. Dr. Karl Muck will resume the post of conductor after an absence of four years. The list of soloists includes Mme. Matzenauer, the eminent contralto of the Metropolitan Opera, and Fritz Kreisler, who comes to America this season under an exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Est

PRESS

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

SEP 22 1912

Date

Following what has now become its established habit of securing the exclusive services for a series of its concerts of one of the most eminent artists before the public, the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year brings to America, for a limited number of appearances, the eminent violinist, Fritz Kreisler. Aside from the recital which has been arranged for him in New York by the management of the orchestra, Mr. Kreisler's only appearance in the East will be at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. He will appear with the orchestra in Philadelphia at the December concert.

From RECORD

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

SEP 22 19

Date

—The Boston Symphony Orchestra this year brings to America, for a limited number of appearances, the eminent violinist, Fritz Kreisler. Aside from the recital which has been arranged for him in New York by the management of the orchestra, Kreisler's only appearances in the East will be at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. He will be heard with the orchestra here at the December concert.

Es

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

SEP 22 1912

Date

programmes.

* * *

Following what has now become established habit of securing the exclusive services for a series of its concerts of one of the most eminent artists before the public, the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year brings to America for a limited number of appearances, the eminent violinist, Fritz Kreisler. Aside from the recital which has been arranged for him in New York by the management of the orchestra, Mr. Kreisler's only appearances in the East will be at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. He will appear with the orchestra here in Philadelphia at the December concert.

* * *

Es

TELEGRAPH

From

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

SEP 28

Date

Following what has now become its established habit of securing the exclusive services for a series of its concerts of some eminent contemporary, the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year presents for a limited number of appearances, Fritz Kreisler, violinist. Aside from one recital Mr. Kreisler's only appearances in the East will be at the Boston Symphony concerts. He will appear at the December concert.

Establ

RECORD

s: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

manent endowment.

* * *

Dr. Karl Muck, who is coming to America to resume the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Bremen last Tuesday on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie and is due to arrive here on Tuesday. He is bringing with him three new members of the orchestra, Otto Urack, who succeeds Alwin Schroeder at the first desk of the 'cellist; Maurice Koessler, one of the new first violins, and Bruno Steinke, one of the new 'cellists.

Otto Urack has an enviable reputation as a 'cellist, musician and conductor. For the past few seasons he has been principal 'cellist of the Festival Orchestra of Bayreuth, and has done much operatic and concert conducting in the lower Rhenish cities.

Es 1884

PRESS

From

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Dr. Karl Muck, who is coming to America to resume the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Bremen last Tuesday on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie and is due to arrive here on Tuesday next. He is bringing with him three new members of the orchestra, Otto Urack, who succeeds Alwin Schroeder at the first desk of the 'cellist; Maurice Koessler, one of the new first violins, and Bruno Steinke, one of the new 'cellists.

Mr. Otto Urack brings to America with him an enviable reputation as a 'cellist, musician and conductor. For the past several seasons he has been principal 'cellist of the Festival Orchestra of Bayreuth and has done much operatic and concert conducting in the lower Rhenish cities. Among the new-comers that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have this year is Walther Habenichl, for the last three seasons concertmaster of the Keil Philharmonic Orchestra. Mr. Habenichl comes to Boston to be the leader of the second violins.

The wood-wind section will be strengthened through the coming from Paris of Albert Chevrot, flutist, and Pierre Fosse, oboeist. Both these musicians are young men and winners of the first prize in the Paris Conservatoire.

Subscribers to last year's concerts have until Wednesday, October 9, in which to renew their subscriptions for the coming season and secure the seats occupied by them in the past. The general public sale will open at Miss Harris' ticket office, at 1119 Chestnut Street, on Monday, October 14.

B

Among the newcomers that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have this year is Walther Habenichl, for the last three seasons concertmaster of the Keil Philharmonic Orchestra. Habenichl comes to Boston to be the leader of the second violins. The wood-wind section will be strengthened through the coming from Paris of Albert Chevrot, flautist, and Pierre Fosse, oboist. Both these musicians are young men and are winners of the first prize in the Paris Conservatoire.

The plans for the season of the Orchestra are now complete. The season begins in Boston with the first public rehearsal on Friday, October 11, and ends with the last concert on May 3. Between those two dates 110 concerts will be given—eight less than last year. The Orchestra is called together for its first rehearsal on Mond

Subscrib

From PRESS
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date SEP 15 1912

The Boston Symphony Orchestr makes the preliminary announcement that it will give its usual series of five evening concerts in the Academy of Music during the coming season. The concerts will be given on Monday evenings, the dates being November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17. As already announced, Dr. Karl Muck will resume the post of conductor after an absence of four years, becoming the permanent conductor of the orchestra. The list of soloists will include Mme. Matzenauer, the eminent contralto, of the Metropolitan Opera, and Fritz Kreisler. Mr. Kreisler comes to America this season under an exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The general sale of season tickets to new subscribers will open at 1119 Chestnut Street, Monday morning, October 14.

From INQUIRER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date SEP 14 1912

is to it."

Muck Denies European Opera Offer

Special Cable to The Inquirer. Copyright, 1912, by the New York Herald Company.

BERLIN, Sept. 13.—In a telegram to the Lokal Anzeiger, Dr. Karl Muck states that there is no truth in the report that he has been approached again by the Munich royal opera to succeed the late Dr. Felix Mottl. Dr. Muck will leave soon for Boston to take up his duties as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra.

From TELEGRAPH
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date SEP 14

tions.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes the preliminary announcement that it will give its usual series of five evening concerts in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, the dates being November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17. Dr. Karl Muck will resume the post of conductor after an absence of four years. The list of soloists will include Margarete Matzenauer, the contralto of the Metropolitan Opera, and Fritz Kreisler, the violinist.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date SEP 15 1912

MUSIC NOTES

—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual series of five evening concerts in the Academy of Music during the coming season on Monday evenings November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17. Dr. Karl Muck will resume the post of conductor after an absence of four years. The list of soloists includes Mme. Matzenauer, the eminent contralto of the Metropolitan Opera, and Fritz Kreisler, who comes to America this season under an exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The general sale of season tickets to new subscribers will open at Heppe's, Monday morning, October 14.

—The Settlement Music School, No. 429 Christian street, will reopen tomorrow.

From INQUIRER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date SEP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that it will give its usual series of five evening concerts in the Academy of Music during the coming season. The concerts will take place on Monday evenings, the dates being November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17. As already stated, Dr. Karl Muck will resume the post of conductor after an absence of four years, becoming the permanent conductor of the orchestra. The list of soloists will include Mme. Matzenauer, the eminent contralto of the Metropolitan Opera, and Fritz Kreisler. Mr. Kreisler comes to America this season under an exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The general sale of season tickets to new subscribers will open at Heppe's Monday morning, October 14.

Es 1884

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date SEP 15 1912

Musical Notes

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes the preliminary announcement that it will give its usual series of five evening concerts in the Academy of Music during the coming season. The concerts will be given on Monday evenings, the dates being November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17. As already announced, Dr. Karl Muck will resume the post of conductor after an absence of four years, becoming the permanent conductor of the orchestra. The list of soloists will include Mme. Matzenauer, the eminent contralto of the Metropolitan Opera, and Fritz Kreisler. Mr. Kreisler comes to America this season under an exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The general sale of season tickets to new subscribers will open at Heppe's Monday

---

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address Philadelphia,
Date SEP 15 191

STOKOWSKI TO OFFER NOVELTIES THIS YEAR

New Orchestra Conductor Believes in Catholicity of Musical Taste

NEWS ABOUT THE OPERA

By H. T. Craven

As usual, the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has planned a series of five concerts for the musical season in Philadelphia. The organization will be heard in the Academy of Music on these Monday evenings: November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17.

Mr. Fielder's tenure of office having expired, the orchestra will be under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, the eminent German conductor, who has been out of America for several seasons. He returns to become permanent conductor. The list of soloists for the coming season is as yet incomplete, but it is good news that among the visiting stars will be Margarete Matzenauer, the superb contralto of the New York Metropolitan Opera Company, and Fritz Kreisler, the violinist. Mr. Kreisler comes to America this year under exclusive contract with the Boston orchestra.

The new director of the Philadelphia Orchestra, [illegible] Stokowski, is a firm believer in catholicity of musical taste. In addition to standard classical selections, he will offer at the Academy of Music this year nineteen orchestral novelties, including representative works of the Russian, Finnish, French, German, British and American schools.

Seeks to Keep Abreast

"I am convinced," said Mr. Stokowski recently, "that a series of concerts undoubtedly gains in interest and variety if the individual concerts bear certain relations to each other with regard to school and content. Therefore, I always plan the entire season at one time. Moreover, I believe that a symphony orchestra should continually present the great classics and regard them as the solid foundation of its program scheme. After that every school and type of modern music should be equally presented. Finally, I believe it is the duty of every conductor to watch the output of living composers, sift their work and present the best of it, thus keeping abreast with the foremost wave of progress."

The director is expected here in the latter part of the month. Within the past week the orchestra management received a letter from him, dated in Munich, expressing his desire to get to work in Philadelphia as soon as possible. He had already completed his twenty-five programs for the twenty-five pairs of concerts to be offered here.

Biographies of the new artists in the Dippel organization are slowly filtering in. Past performances do not count for very much in the case of operatic artists. The public is ever the prompt tribunal of opinion regarding their merits or deficiencies. Still it is interesting to learn concerning Icilio Calleja, the new dramatic tenor, recently engaged by Andreas Dippel, that he was born in Greece twenty-eight years ago, and that after practicing law for a while in Alexandria he took up voice culture with a view to appearing on the operatic stage. Arturo Toscanini, the gifted musical director of the Metropolitan Opera House, selected him to sing the leading role in Catalini's "La Wally" at La Scala, Milan, in 1907, and his success is said to have been emphatic.

He later appeared in Rome and other important cities and in Paris his Samson attracted the attention of Saint-Saens. He is accredited with a marked triumph in Cairo, where he sang Radames in "Aida" at the Khedival Theater. He is at present singing in Cremona, and on closing his engagement there he will come immediately to the United States.

Operatic Society Busy

The Philadelphia Operatic Society's first performance of the year, which will be given in the Academy of Music on the evening of October 24, promises to be one of the most interesting of its achievements. "Der Freischeutz," Carl Maria von Weber's romantic opera, which had not been heard in this city for many seasons, will be revived. Within the past two years this admirable work was heard at the New York Metropolitan Opera House, but the management did not see fit to carry the production to this city.

At that time Johanne Gadski was the Agnes. "Der Freischeutz" was the first grand opera ever sung in this city. It was given in English at the old Chestnut Street Theater, on March 18, 1825.

ICILIO CALLEJA—TENOR

FLORENCE HINKLE SOPRANO

TITTA RUFFO BARITONE

STARS IN MUSICAL FIELD

Icilio Calleja, the young Greek tenor, and Titta Ruffo, the barytone, will be newcomers in Mr. [illegible] company this season. Florence Hinkle, the Philadelphia soprano, will be heard as soloist at one of the Philadelphia Orchestra concerts.

There will be a chorus of 200 in the forthcoming production, a ballet of 48 and an orchestra of 60. Siegfried Behrens will be the musical director.

The cast will be as follows: Agnes, Cuno's daughter, Miss Alma Weisshaar; Annie, her cousin, Miss Jennie G. Kneedler; Max, a young forester, George Rothermel; Caspar, a forester, in Zamiel's power, Frederick Ayres; Cuno, the head ranger, Horace R. Hood; Prince Ottokar, Morris Ware; Killian, a peasant, Charles D. Cuzner; a hermit, Edwin C. Mitchell; Zamiel, "The Black Huntsman," Dr. Frank G. Ritter.

The society's second bill this season will be devoted to Verdi's "The Masked Ball," followed by Leo Delibes' delightful ballet of "Coppelia."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From
Address
Date SEP 22 1912

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual series of five evening concerts in the Academy of Music during the coming season on Monday evenings, November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17. Dr. Karl Muck will resume the post of conductor after an absence of four years. The list of soloists includes Mme. Matzenauer, the eminent contralto of the Metropolitan Opera, and Fritz Kreisler, who comes to America this season under an exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From PRESS
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date SEP 22 191

Following what has now become its established habit of securing the exclusive services for a series of its concerts of one of the most eminent artists before the public, the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year brings to America, for a limited number of appearances, the eminent violinist, Fritz Kreisler. Aside from the recital which has been arranged for him in New York by the management of the orchestra, Mr. Kre ler's only appearance in the East wi be at the Boston Symphony Orchestr concerts. He will appear with the or chestra in Philadelphia at the Decemb concert.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date SEP 22 1912

programmes.

* * *

Following what has now become established habit of securing the e clusive services for a series of its co certs of one of the most eminent arti before the public, the Boston Sympho Orchestra this year brings to Ameri for a limited number of appearances, t eminent violinist, Fritz Kreisler. As from the recital which has been arrang for him in New York by the mana ment of the orchestra, Mr. Kreisler's only appearances in the East will be at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. He will appear with the orchestra here in Philadelphia at the December concert.

* * *

From TELEGRAPH
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date SEP 28 1912

Following what has now become its established habit of securing the exclusive services for a series of its concerts of some eminent contemporary, the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year presents for a limited number of appearances, Fritz Kreisler, violinist. Aside from one recital Mr. Kreisler's only appearances in the East will be at the Boston Symphony concerts. He will appear at the December concert.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date SEP 22 19

management.

—The Boston Symphony Orchestra thi year brings to America, for a limite number of appearances, the eminent vio linist, Fritz Kreisler. Aside from the re cital which has been arranged for him in New York by the management of the orchestra, Kreisler's only appearances in the East will be at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. He will be heard with the orchestra here at the December concert.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date 1912

manent endowment.

* * *

Dr. Karl Muck, who is coming to America to resume the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Bremen last Tuesday on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie and is due to arrive here on Tuesday. He is bringing with him three new members of the orchestra, Otto Urack, who succeeds Alwin Schroeder at the first desk of the 'cellist; Maurice Koessler, one of the new first violins, and Bruno Steinke, one of the new 'cellists.

Otto Urack has an enviable reputation as a 'cellist, musician and conductor. For the past few seasons he has been principal 'cellist of the Festival Orchestra of Bayreuth, and has done much operatic and concert conducting in the lower Rhenish cities.

Es 1884

From PRESS
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Dr. Karl Muck, who is coming to America to resume the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Bremen last Tuesday on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie and is due to arrive here on Tuesday next. He is bringing with him three new members of the orchestra, Otto Urack, who succeeds Alwin Schroeder at the first desk of the 'cellist; Maurice Koessler, one of the new first violins, and Bruno Steinke, one of the new 'cellists.

Mr. Otto Urack brings to America with him an enviable reputation as a 'cellist, musician and conductor. For the past several seasons he has been principal 'cellist of the Festival Orchestra of Bayreuth and has done much operatic and concert conducting in the lower Rhenish cities. Among the new-comers that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have this year is Walther Habenichl, for the last three seasons concertmaster of the Keil Philharmonic Orchestra. Mr. Habenichl comes to Boston to be the leader of the second violins.

The wood-wind section will be strengthened through the coming from Paris of Albert Chevrot, flutist, and Pierre Fosse, oboeist. Both these musicians are young men and winners of the first prize in the Paris Conservatoire.

Subscribers to last year's concerts have until Wednesday, October 9, in which to renew their subscriptions for the coming season and secure the seats occupied by them in the past. The general public sale will open at Miss Harris' ticket office, at 1119 Chestnut Street, on Monday, October 14.

Among the newcomers that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have this year is Walther Habenichl, for the last three seasons concertmaster of the Keil Philharmonic Orchestra. Habenichl comes to Boston to be the leader of the second violins. The wood-wind section will be strengthened through the coming from Paris of Albert Chevrot, flautist, and Pierre Fosse, oboist. Both these musicians are young men and are winners of the first prize in the Paris Conservatoire.

The plans for the season of the Orchestra are now complete. The season begins in Boston with the first public rehearsal on Friday, October 11, and ends with the last concert on May 3. Between those two dates 110 concerts will be given—eight less than last year. The Orchestra is called together for the first rehearsal on

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Address

Date SEP 28 1912

Opera and Orchestra

Mr. Dippel announces that the list of artists engaged for the Philadelphia-Chicago Opera Company this season includes the names of sixty-two singers, twenty-seven of whom have never sung with this organization and twenty-one of whom will make their debut before the American public. Among them are seventeen native-born Americans. One of these is Edna Darch, a soprano who was "discovered" by Mme. Calve and who has developed into a prima donna of some European reputation. Others are: Helen Stanley, a Chicago soprano; Elsa Garrett, from Portland, Oregon; Helen Warrum and Margaret Keyes, the last-named a contralto who has sung here successfully with the Philadelphia and Boston Symphony Orchestras. Those of past seasons are Mary Garden, Minnie Saltzman-Stevens, Carolina White, Jane Osborne-Hannah, Maggie Teyte, Eleanor de Cisneros, Marta Wittkowska, Mabel Riegelman, Marie Cavan, Agnes Berry, Alice Eversman, Clarence Whitehill, Henri Scott, George Hamlin, and Ellison van Hoose.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual series of five evening concerts in the Academy of Music during the coming season on Monday evenings, November 11, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17. Dr. Karl Muck will resume the post of conductor after an absence of four years. The list of soloists includes Mme. Matzenauer, the eminent contralto of the Metropolitan Opera, and Fritz Kreisler, who comes to America this season under an exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 9 1912

Zamiel, Frank G. Ritter.

* * *

Dr. Karl Muck, who is coming to America to resume the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Bremen last Tuesday on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie, and is due to arrive here on Tuesday next. He is bringing with him three new members of the orchestra, Otto Urack, who succeeds Alwin Schroeder at the first desk of the 'cellists; Maurice Koessler, one of the new first violins, and Bruno Steinke, one of the new 'cellists. Otto Urack brings to America with him an enviable reputation as a 'cellist, musician and conductor. For the past several seasons he has been principal 'cellist of the Festival Orchestra of Bayreuth, and has done much operatic and concert conducting in the lower Rhenish cities.

Among the new comers that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have this year is Walter Habenicht, for the last three seasons concertmaster of the Keil Philharmonic Orchestra. Mr. Habenicht comes to Boston to be the leader of the second violins. The wood-wind section will be strengthened through the coming from Paris of Albert Chevrot, flutist, and Pierre Fosse, oboist. Both these musicians are young men, and winners of the first prize in the Paris Conservatoire. The plans for the season of the orchestra are now complete. The season begins in Boston with the first public rehearsal on Friday, October 11, and ends with the last concert on May 3. Between those two dates 110 concerts will be given, eight less than last year. The orchestra is called together for its first rehearsal on Monday, October 7. Subscribers to last year's concerts have until Wednesday, October 9, in which to renew their subscriptions for the coming season, and secure the seats occupied by them in the past. The general public sale will open at Miss Harris' ticket office at Heppe's on Monday, October 14.

From INQUIRER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date SEP 29 1912

MADE A NOTE OF

Wassili Leps has been engaged to give a series of concerts at Pittsburgh with an orchestra of fifty musicians, all of whom are members of the Philadelphia Orchestra, in connection with the twenty-fourth annual exposition which is to be given in the former city beginning tomorrow. The Wassili Leps' Orchestra is to give four concerts daily for six days. There are to be three symphony concerts, at which the "Rustic Wedding," "New World" and "Pathetique" symphonies will be played. Four programs will be devoted to Wagner, Beethoven, Massenet and Mendelssohn and the rest will be of a miscellaneous character. Mr. Leps' ability and enthusiasm guarantees their artistic success.

Weber's opera of "Der Freischutz," which has not been given in this city since it was done by Gustav Hinrichs at the Grand Opera House twenty years ago, will be presented at the Academy of Music by the Philadelphia Operatic Society on October 24, under the direction of Mr. S. Behrens. It is now under rehearsal and a thoroughly adequate performance of it in every way is promised. The "Wolf's Glen" scene is to be made most spectacular and there is to be a handsome ballet danced to the music of the "Invitation to the Waltz" in the last act.

The Choral Society began its work for the season last Monday evening with the best attendance at a first rehearsal for many years. This was due, no doubt, to the splendid program arranged for the year, which included the Verdi "Requiem," "The Messiah" and Wolf-Ferrari's "New Life," a great work that is to be given here for the first time. Those who wish to take part in the first concert on December 5 must make application within two weeks. Anyone with a fair voice and some knowledge of music will be admitted on payment of the small yearly charge of $1. Henry Gordon Thunder, conductor, will hear applicants at 10 South Eighteenth street any date or at the rehearsal rooms, Delancy School, 1420 Pine street, at 7.30 P. M.

Dr. Karl Muck, who is coming to America to resume the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Bremen last Tuesday on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie and is due to arrive here on Tuesday next. He is bringing with him three new members of the orchestra, Otto Urack, who succeeds Alwin Schroeder as first 'cellist; Maurice Koessler, one of the new first violins, and Bruno Steinke, one of the new 'cellists. Subscribers to last year's concerts have until Wednesday, October 9, in which to renew their subscriptions for the coming season and secure the seats occupied by them in the past. The general public sale will open at Miss Harris' ticket office at Heppe's on Monday, October 14.

NORTH AMERICAN

From

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date SEP 29

ORCHESTRA HAS A LIST OF BRILLIANT SOLOISTS

Plans for the Entertainment of New Conductor Are Now in Progress

DIPPEL'S MANY STARS

By H. T. Craven

The orchestral conductors are heading this way. Leopold Stokowski, the new director of the Philadelphia Orchestra, and Dr. Karl Muck, who will resume his post as leader of the Boston Symphony, are expected in America the early part of this week. Mr. Stokowski will be in town either tomorrow or Tuesday, and he will immediately take up his preliminary work with the orchestra. He will live with his wife, Olga Samaroff, the distinguished pianist, at 2117 Locust street. Plans for entertaining the new conductor are now in progress, and already a reception has been arranged for him by the Musical Art Club.

The management of the Philadelphia Orchestra takes particular pride this season in the array of soloists engaged, believing that it will compare more than favorably with the galaxy scheduled for visits to the other large orchestras throughout the country, notably the Boston and Chicago organizations.

This is the complete Philadelphia list: Mme. Schumann-Heink, contralto; Louis Persinger, violinist; Florence Hinkle, soprano; Rudolph Ganz, pianist; Mme. Namara-Toye, soprano; Leopold Godowsky, pianist; Thaddeus Rich, violinist; Elena Gerhardt, lieder singer; Eugene Ysaye, violinist; Herman Sandby, cellist; Ernest Schelling, pianist; Yolanda Mero, pianist; Mischa Elman, violinist; Mme. Gerville-Reache, contralto.

The list which the Boston Orchestra will offer in the New England capital includes Julia Culp, Elena Gerhardt, Marie Rappold, Germaine Schnitzer, Maggie Teyte, Leopold Godowsky, Fritz Kreisler, Max Pauer, George Proctor, Otto Urach, Norman Wilks, Anton Witek, Herbert Witherspoon, Eugene Ysaye. This is, of course, an excellent assortment, but it may be seen at a glance that Philadelphia has nothing to fear when any comparison is made.

The changes in the personnel of the orchestra are very few. Benjamin Kohon, formerly with the New York Philharmonie, will be a newcomer to lead the bassoon choir, and Oscar Miller will be new to the cello group. There will be certain minor changes among the violins. The inaugural concerts will be in the Academy on the afternoon of October 11 and the evening of the following day.

Doctor Muck, who replaces Max Fiedler as director of the Boston Symphony, is bringing with him on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie, which is expected in America on Tuesday, three new members of his orchestra. They are Otto Urack, who succeeds Alwin Schroeder as first cellist; Maurice Koessler, one of the first violins, and Bruno Steinke, a cellist. Mr. Urack brings an excellent reputation from Europe. For several seasons he has been principal cellist in the festival orchestra at Bayreuth, and he has also conducted operas and concerts in the cities of the lower Rhine.

Among the new artists in the organization will be Walter Habenichl, concertmaster for three seasons of the Kiel Philharmonic, who will be the leader of the second violins; Albert Chevrot, the Paris flutist, and Pierre Fosse, the oboist, also from the French capital. The symphony will open its season in Boston on the same day that the Philadelphia Orchestra will inaugurate the new musical season here.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From POST,

Address Washington, D. C.

Date SEP 29 1912

Subscribers to last year's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have until Friday, October 6, in which to renew their subscriptions for the coming season and secure the seats occupied by them in the past. The general public sale will open at Droop's music store on Wednesday, October 16.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From POST,

Address Washington, D. C.

Date OCT 6 1912

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mrs. Katie Wilson-Greene, who has charge of the Washington concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, reports that the usual large subscriptions will mark the coming season. Nearly every one who was a subscriber last year has signified his intention of going to the concerts this year. The last day upon which subscriptions can be renewed is next Wednesday, October 9, and on the following Wednesday the general sale to new subscribers will begin.

Dr. Muck, who returns this year to be the conductor of the orchestra for at least the next five years, arrived in New York last Tuesday. He brought some new works which he will try in Boston, and very likely, if they meet with success there, he will include them in his Washington concerts. Among these is a symphony by Lendvai, a new piece by Reger, and a humoresque by the Bohemian Mrazek.

From EVG. STAR

Address: Washington, D. C.

Date OCT 6 1912

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mrs. Katie Wilson-Greene, who has charge of the Washington concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, reports the usual large subscription for the coming season. Wednesday is the last day upon which subscriptions can be renewed. The following Wednesday the general sale to new subscribers will begin.

Dr. Muck, who returns this year to be the conductor of the orchestra for at least the next five years, arrived in New York last Tuesday on the Kronprinzessin Cecelie. He went directly to Boston to arrange for his new home in that city.

Dr. Muck said he was not ready to make any definite announcements of his plans for the coming season; he had been away from the orchestra for four years, and his first work, he said, would be to get in touch with the men. Moreover, with sixteen new members there was a certain amount of preliminary work necessary to get the orchestra into smooth running order.

Dr. Muck was not enthusiastic on the subject of novelties. He said he failed to see the wisdom of wasting the time of the orchestra and trying the patience of the audiences with novelties, whose only merit consisted of the fact that they are novelties. This, he said, applies to a very considerable part of the music that is being published today. He has, however, some new works which he will try in Boston, and if they have success there he may include them in his Washington concerts. Among these is a symphony by Lendvai, a new piece by Reger and a humoresque by the Bohemian Mrazek.

From POST,

Address Washington, D. C.

Date SEP 29 1912

Dr. Karl Muck, who is coming to America to resume the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Bremen last Tuesday and is due to arrive here this week. He is bringing with him three new members of the orchestra—Otto Urack, who succeeds Alwin Schroeder at the first desk of the cellists; Maurice Koessler, one of the new first violins, and Bruno Steinke, one of the new cellists. The first public rehearsal of the orchestra will be given in Boston October 11. There will be 110 concerts this year.

From POST,

Address Washington, D. C.

Date SEP 22 1912

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its preliminary announcement of its regular series of five afternoon concerts which it will give in the New National during the course of the winter. The concerts will be given on Tuesday afternoons, at 4:30 o'clock, the dates being November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18, and March 18. As already announced, Dr. Karl Muck will resume his post of conductor, after an absence of four years, becoming the permanent conductor of the orchestra.

From INQUIRER
Address. Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

MADE A NOTE OF

Last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts which are to be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17, have until Wednesday, October 9, in which to renew their subscriptions at Miss Harris' ticket office, Heppe's piano rooms, and retain their old seats. The general sale to new subscribers will open at Miss Harris' ticket office on Monday morning, October 14.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
JOURNAL
From
Address
Date SEP 15 1912

Dr. Karl Muck's return to the post of director with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season is given a livelier interest than it otherwise would have—and in any case it would have been great—because of the turmoil in German political and musical circles on account of it. Debates in the Prussian Diet and the German Reichstag, which culminated in what amounted almost to an attack on the royal court itself, are not so commonly the sequel to the action of even a famous musician as to fail of attracting widespread attention.

Dr. Muck, it will be remembered, returned to Germany after two successful seasons in Boston to resume his position as conductor of the royal opera. At that time hopes were expressed that he might ultimately return to this country. Last winter, at the expiration of his contract with the royal opera, he signed contracts to become once more conductor of the Boston orchestra, and at once there were heated charges made that he had yielded to the lure of "American gold," regardless of artistic obligations to the Fatherland. These attacks were voiced by the newspaper organ of the Berlin court and by Count von Huelsen, an official of the opera. To which, in the height of the discussion, Representative Kopsch replied with a hearty speech, during the course of which he said:

"The imputation that Dr. Muck is leaving his distinguished position in Berlin because of the offer of a few thousand marks more is shattered on the rock-bound character of a musician who has fought so honorably, so unselfishly, for his artistic aims.

"Such an interpretation of Dr. Muck's departure is a convenient shelf for the censor of the Berlin Royal Opera. The truth itself comes home to that gentleman, Count von Huelsen, and his associates.

"The despotic authority of Prussian militarism, which extends even to the temples of the Muses, cannot be borne forever by the greatest artist of the day. There was a time when a great composer was content to be looked upon as a sort of house-servant by the reigning Prince.

"He composed symphonies 'to order,' wore a uniform upon request and did just as 'His Highness' desired, without demur. But times have changed, Count von Huelsen! An artist of international reputation is unable to imagine himself in the 17th century. Slavish submission to His Highness's will, year in and year out, has become an obsolete number in his repertoire. The opera conductor who has no voice in the selection of works to be performed, nor of the singers who appear in the various roles, who, in short, is deprived of liberty, is apt to emigrate. Why should this cause astonishment? Freedom is the alpha and the omega of the artistic nature. Dr. Muck merely followed the example of his intimate colleagues, Richard Strauss and Felix Weingartner.

"A musician of international celebrity cannot be expected to swallow the dictates of a royal puppet eternally."

Dr. Muck is expected to reach Boston about the first of October, bringing with him the scores of a number of novelties. Since leaving Berlin he has conducted the great Lower Rhenish festivals in Aachon and has prepared the performance of "Parsifal" in Bayreuth, conducting the greater part of them.

15 M

From
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date SEP 21 1912

Boston Symphony Orchestra

At its series of five concerts which the Boston Symphony orchestra is to give in Providence during the coming season, the dates being Oct. 22, Nov. 19, Dec. 31, Feb. 4 and April 1, three eminent singers have been engaged as soloists for as many of the concerts. These are Marie Rappold, one of the principal sopranos with the Metropolitan opera house; Elena Gerhardt, whose success with the orchestra and in song recitals a year ago was one of the sensations of the season, and finally Julia Culp, one of the most eminent concert singers of the time who is making her first visit to America during the coming season.

The management of the orchestra have never presented a more attractive prospectus for this season in Providence than that which will be announced in a few weeks.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TRIBUNE
From PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Address
Date SEP 15 1912

fresh clams, and the quality of the cooking is well known.

MUSICAL NOTES.

Boston Symphony to Give Five Concerts Here.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes a preliminary announcement of its season in Providence. Five concerts will be given on Tuesday evenings in Infantry Hall, the dates being Oct. 22, Nov. 19, Dec. 31, Feb. 4 and April 1. As already announced, Dr. Karl Muck will resume his post of conductor after an absence of four years, becoming the permanent conductor of the orchestra. The list of soloists engaged for these concerts comprises five most distinguished artists, Marie Rappold, Fritz Kreisler, Elena Gerhardt, Norman Wilks and Julia Culp, three singers, one violinist and one pianist.

The general sale of season tickets will open at Steinert's Monday morning, Oct. 14.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
JOURNAL
From
Address
Date SEP

tor—Signor G. Gilli.

* * *

There are a number of changes in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year. Of the older members that have retired are Paul Fox of the flute section and Carl Schumann of the horn section, both of whom have completed 31 years of continuous service. August Sautet of the oboes and Mr. Regestein of the bassoons and Mr. Rettberg of the percussion department have long and honorable years of service behind them. Mr. Krafft and Mr. Eichheim have resigned from their positions in the first violins, while Mr. Barleben, for many years the leader of the second violins, has retired on account of ill health. Mr. Schroeder has retired from the 'cellos in order to devote himself to concert work, while Arthur Hadley and Ralph Smalley have left this section, the first to become solo 'cellist of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, of which his brother is conductor, and the second to join the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra. There have been a few other changes in the rank and file.

In Mr. Schroeder's place, to share the first desk of the 'cello section with Mr. Warnke, will come Otto Urack of Berlin. Mr. Urack is regarded as one of the most brilliant 'cello virtuosi of Germany. He is a Bohemian by descent, but is a native of Berlin, and for the past several seasons has been 'cello soloist in the Bayreuth Festival Orchestra.

Special pains have been taken to make the second violin section stronger than ever, and to this end a distinguished violinist has been engaged as the leader of the section. This is Walther Habenichl, who for the past two years has been first concertmaster of the Kiel Philharmonic Orchestra. Mr. Habenichl has also undertaken several tours on the Continent as a virtuoso, and has met with flattering success. One of the new first violins will be Maurice Koessler of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and one of the new 'cellists will be Bruno Steinke, also of Berlin.

To take the place of Mr. Fox in the flute section Albert Chevrot of Paris has been engaged, and to take the place of Mr. Sautet in the oboe section Pierre Fosse of Paris.

The total strength of the orchestra, including the conductor, will this year be an even hundred, as compared with 101 a year ago, there being this year one less man in the percussion department.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. Muck on His Way to America for Leadership.

Dr. Karl Muck, who is coming to America to resume the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Bremen last Tuesday on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie and is due to arrive here on Tuesday next. He is bringing with him three new members of the orchestra, Otto Urack, who succeeds Alwin Schroeder at the first desk of the 'cellists; Maurice Koessler, one of the new first violins and Bruno Steinke, one of the new 'cellists.

Otto Urack brings to America with him an enviable reputation as a 'cellist, musician and conductor. For the past several seasons he has been principal 'cellist of the Festival Orchestra at Bayreuth and has done much operatic and concert conducting in the lower Rhenish cities.

Among the new comers that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have this year is Walther Habenichl, for the last three seasons concert-master of the Keil Philharmonic Orchestra. Mr. Habenichl comes to Boston to be the leader of the second violins.

The wood-wind section will be strengthened through the coming from Paris of Albert Chevrot, flutist, and Pierre Fosse, oboist. Both these musicians are young men and winners of the first prize in the Paris Conservatoire.

The plans for the season of the orchestra are now complete. The season begins in Boston with the first public rehearsal on Friday, Oct. 11 and ends with the last concert on May 3. Between those two dates 110 concerts will be given, eight less than last year. The orchestra is called together for its first rehearsal on Monday, Oct. 7.

Subscribers to last year's concerts in Providence have until Saturday, Oct. 12 in which to renew their subscriptions for the coming season and secure the seats occupied by them in the past. The general public sale will open at Steinert's new store, 506 Westminster street, on Monday, Oct. 14.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TRIBUNE
From
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date SEP 22 1912

MUSICAL NOTES.

Three Singers for This Year's Symphony Concerts Here.

At its series of five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in Providence during the coming season, the dates being Oct. 22, Nov. 19, Dec. 31, Feb. 4 and April 1, three eminent singers have been engaged as soloists for as many of the concerts. These are Marie Rappold, one of the principal sopranos with Metropolitan Opera House; Elena Gerhardt, whose success with the orchestra and in song recitals a year ago was one of the sensations of the season, and finally Julia Culp, one of the most eminent concert singers of our time, who is making her first visit to America during the coming season. The management of the orchestra have never presented a more attractive prospectus for this season in Providence than that which will be announced in a few weeks.

From EVENING SUN
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date

FIVE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Boston Orchestra Will Again Have Wednesdays At Lyric.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes the preliminary announcement that it will give its usual series of five concerts in the Lyric Theatre during the coming season. The concerts will be given on Wednesday evenings, the dates being November 6, December 4, January 8, February 19 and March 19.

As already announced, Dr. Karl Muck will resume his post of conductor after an absence of four years, becoming the permanent conductor of the orchestra. Distinguished soloists have been engaged, including Fritz Kreisler, whose only appearance in Baltimore will be with the orchestra. The Boston Symphony Orchestra brings him to America this season under an exclusive contract.

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

Concerts to Begin November 6.

The five concerts by the Boston Symphony are to be given this season on Wednesday evenings, the dates being November 6, December 4, January 8, February 10 and March 19. Among the prominent soloists will be Mr. Fritz Kreisler, who is brought over to America for the Boston Orchestra concerts exclusively. Dr. Karl Muck will resume his place as conductor after an absence of four years in Europe.

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes the preliminary announcement that it will give its usual series of five concerts in the Lyric Theater during the coming season. The concerts will be given on Wednesday evenings, the dates being November 6, December 4, January 8, February 19 and March 19. As already announced, Dr. Karl Muck will resume his post of conductor after an absence of four years, becoming permanent conductor of the orchestra. Distinguished soloists have been engaged, including Fritz Kreisler, whose only appearance here wil be with the orchestra.

EVG. NEWS
Baltimore, Md.

CONCERT DATES GIVEN BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Usual Series Of Five Will Be Rendered Wednesday Nights, Beginning November 6.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes the preliminary announcement that it will give its usual series of five concerts in the Lyric Theater during the coming season. The concerts will be given on Wednesday evenings, the dates being November 6, December 4, January 8, February 19 and March 19.

As already announced, Dr. Karl Muck will resume his post of conductor after an absence of four years, becoming the permanent conductor of the orchestra. Distinguished soloists have been engaged, including Fritz Kreisler, whose only appearance here will be with the Orchestra. The Boston Symphony Orchestra brings him to America this season under an ex-

From INQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

MADE A NOTE OF

Last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts which are to be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17, have until Wednesday, October 9, in which to renew their subscriptions at Miss Harris' ticket office, Heppe's piano rooms, and retain their old seats. The general sale to new subscribers will open at Miss Harris' ticket office on Monday morning, October 14.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
JOURNAL
From
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date SEP 15 1912

Dr. Karl Muck's return to the post of director with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season is given a livelier interest than it otherwise would have—and in any case it would have been great—because of the turmoil in German political and musical circles on account of it. Debates in the Prussian Diet and the German Reichstag, which culminated in what amounted almost to an attack on the royal court itself, are not so commonly the sequel to the action of even a famous musician as to fail of attracting widespread attention.

Dr. Muck, it will be remembered, returned to Germany after two successful seasons in Boston to resume his position as conductor of the royal opera. At that time hopes were expressed that he might ultimately return to this country. Last winter, at the expiration of his contract with the royal opera, he signed contracts to become once more conductor of the Boston orchestra, and at once there were heated charges made that he had yielded to the lure of "American gold," regardless of artistic obligations to the Fatherland. These attacks were voiced by the newspaper organ of the Berlin court and by Count von Huelsen, an official of the opera. To which, in the height of the discussion, Representative Kopsch replied with a hearty speech, during the course of which he said:

"The imputation that Dr. Muck is leaving his distinguished position in Berlin because of the offer of a few thousand marks more is shattered on the rock-bound character of a musician who has fought so honorably, so unselfishly, for his artistic aims.

"Such an interpretation of Dr. Muck's departure is a convenient shelf for the censor of the Berlin Royal Opera. The truth itself comes home to that gentleman, Count von Huelsen, and his associates.

"The despotic authority of Prussian militarism, which extends even to the temples of the Muses, cannot be borne forever by the greatest artist of the day. There was a time when a great composer was content to be looked upon as a sort of house-servant by the reigning Prince.

"He composed symphonies 'to order,' wore a uniform upon request and did just as 'His Highness' desired, without demur. But times have changed, Count von Huelsen! An artist of international reputation is unable to imagine himself in the 17th century. Slavish submission to His Highness's will, year in and year out, has become an obsolete number in his repertoire. The opera conductor who has no voice in the selection of works to be performed, nor of the singers who appear in the various roles, who, in short, is deprived of liberty, is apt to emigrate. Why should this cause astonishment? Freedom is the alpha and the omega of the artistic nature. Dr. Muck merely followed the example of his intimate colleagues, Richard Strauss and Felix Weingartner.

"A musician of international celebrity cannot be expected to swallow the dictates of a royal puppet eternally."

Dr. Muck is expected to reach Boston about the first of October, bringing with him the scores of a number of novelties. Since leaving Berlin he has conducted the great Lower Rhenish festivals in Aachon and has prepared the performance of "Parsifal" in Bayreuth, conducting the greater part of them.

From
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date SEP 21 1912

Boston Symphony Orchestra

At its series of five concerts which the Boston Symphony orchestra is to give in Providence during the coming season, the dates being Oct. 22, Nov. 19, Dec. 31, Feb. 4 and April 1, three eminent singers have been engaged as soloists for as many of the concerts. These are Marie Rappold, one of the principal sopranos with the Metropolitan opera house; Elena Gerhardt, whose success with the orchestra and in song recitals a year ago was one of the sensations of the season, and finally Julia Culp, one of the most eminent concert singers of the time who is making her first visit to America during the coming season.

The management of the orchestra have never presented a more attractive prospectus for this season in Providence than that which will be announced in a few weeks.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TRIBUNE
From
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date SEP 15 1912

fresh clams, and the quality of the cooking is well known.

MUSICAL NOTES.

Boston Symphony to Give Five Concerts Here.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes a preliminary announcement of its season in Providence. Five concerts will be given on Tuesday evenings in Infantry Hall, the dates being Oct. 22, Nov. 19, Dec. 31, Feb. 4 and April 1. As already announced, Dr. Karl Muck will resume his post of conductor after an absence of four years, becoming the permanent conductor of the orchestra. The list of soloists engaged for these concerts comprises five most distinguished artists, Marie Rappold, Fritz Kreisler, Elena Gerhardt, Norman Wilks and Julia Culp, three singers, one violinist and one pianist.

The general sale of season tickets will open at Steinert's Monday morning, Oct. 14.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
JOURNAL
From
Address
Date SEP [illegible]

tor—Signor G. Gilli.

* * *

There are a number of changes in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year. Of the older members that have retired are Paul Fox of the flute section and Carl Schumann of the horn section, both of whom have completed 31 years of continuous service. August Sautet of the oboes and Mr. Regestein of the bassoons and Mr. Rettberg of the percussion department have long and honorable years of service behind them. Mr. Krafft and Mr. Eichheim have resigned from their positions in the first violins, while Mr. Barleben, for many years the leader of the second violins, has retired on account of ill health. Mr. Schroeder has retired from the 'cellos in order to devote himself to concert work, while Arthur Hadley and Ralph Smalley have left this section, the first to become solo 'cellist of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, of which his brother is conductor, and the second to join the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra. There have been a few other changes in the rank and file.

In Mr. Schroeder's place, to share the first desk of the 'cello section with Mr. Warnke, will come Otto Urack of Berlin. Mr. Urack is regarded as one of the most brilliant 'cello virtuosi of Germany. He is a Bohemian by descent, but is a native of Berlin, and for the past several seasons has been 'cello soloist in the Bayreuth Festival Orchestra.

Special pains have been taken to make the second violin section stronger than ever, and to this end a distinguished violinist has been engaged as the leader of the section. This is Walther Habenichl, who for the past two years has been first concertmaster of the Kiel Philharmonic Orchestra. Mr. Habenichl has also undertaken several tours on the Continent as a virtuoso, and has met with flattering success. One of the new first violins will be Maurice Koessler of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and one of the new 'cellists will be Bruno Steinke, also of Berlin.

To take the place of Mr. Fox in the flute section Albert Chevrot of Paris has been engaged, and to take the place of Mr. Sautet in the oboe section Pierre Fosse of Paris.

The total strength of the orchestra, including the conductor, will this year be an even hundred, as compared with 101 a year ago, there being this year one less man in the percussion department.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. Muck on His Way to America for Leadership.

Dr. Karl Muck, who is coming to America to resume the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Bremen last Tuesday on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie and is due to arrive here on Tuesday next. He is bringing with him three new members of the orchestra, Otto Urack, who succeeds Alwin Schroeder at the first desk of the 'cellists; Maurice Koessler, one of the new first violins and Bruno Steinke, one of the new 'cellists.

Otto Urack brings to America with him an enviable reputation as a 'cellist, musician and conductor. For the past several seasons he has been principal 'cellist of the Festival Orchestra at Bayreuth and has done much operatic and concert conducting in the lower Rhenish cities.

Among the new comers that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have this year is Walther Habenichl, for the last three seasons concert-master of the Keil Philharmonic Orchestra. Mr. Habenichl comes to Boston to be the leader of the second violins.

The wood-wind section will be strengthened through the coming from Paris of Albert Chevrot, flutist, and Pierre Fosse, oboist. Both these musicians are young men and winners of the first prize in the Paris Conservatoire.

The plans for the season of the orchestra are now complete. The season begins in Boston with the first public rehearsal on Friday, Oct. 11 and ends with the last concert on May 3. Between those two dates 110 concerts will be given, eight less than last year. The orchestra is called together for its first rehearsal on Monday, Oct. 7.

Subscribers to last year's concerts in Providence have until Saturday, Oct. 12 in which to renew their subscriptions for the coming season and secure the seats occupied by them in the past. The general public sale will open at Steinert's new store, 505 Westminster street, on Monday, Oct. 14.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TRIBUNE
From
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date SEP 22 1912

MUSICAL NOTES.

Three Singers for This Year's Symphony Concerts Here.

At its series of five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in Providence during the coming season, the dates being Oct. 22, Nov. 19, Dec. 31, Feb. 4 and April 1, three eminent singers have been engaged as soloists for as many of the concerts. These are Marie Rappold, one of the principal sopranos with Metropolitan Opera House; Elena Gerhardt, whose success with the orchestra and in song recitals a year ago was one of the sensations of the season, and finally Julia Culp, one of the most eminent concert singers of our time, who is making her first visit to America during the coming season. The management of the orchestra have never presented a more attractive prospectus for this season in Providence than that which will be announced in a few weeks.

From EVENING SUN
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date

FIVE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Boston Orchestra Will Again Have Wednesdays At Lyric.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes the preliminary announcement that it will give its usual series of five concerts in the Lyric Theatre during the coming season. The concerts will be given on Wednesday evenings, the dates being November 6, December 4, January 8, February 19 and March 19.

As already announced, Dr. Karl Muck will resume his post of conductor after an absence of four years, becoming the permanent conductor of the orchestra. Distinguished soloists have been engaged, including Fritz Kreisler, whose only appearance in Baltimore will be with the orchestra. The Boston Symphony Orchestra brings him to America this season under an exclusive contract.

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

Concerts to Begin November 6.

The five concerts by the Boston Symphony are to be given this season on Wednesday evenings, the dates being November 6, December 4, January 8, February 10 and March 19. Among the prominent soloists will be Mr. Fritz Kreisler, who is brought over to America for the Boston Orchestra concerts exclusively. Dr. Karl Muck will resume his place as conductor after an absence of four years in Europe.

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes the preliminary announcement that it will give its usual series of five concerts in the Lyric Theater during the coming season. The concerts will be given on Wednesday evenings, the dates being November 6, December 4, January 8, February 19 and March 19. As already announced, Dr. Karl Muck will resume his post of conductor after an absence of four years, becoming permanent conductor of the orchestra. Distinguished soloists have been engaged, including Fritz Kreisler, whose only appearance here wil be with the orchestra.

From EVG. NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

CONCERT DATES GIVEN BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Usual Series Of Five Will Be Rendered Wednesday Nights, Beginning November 6.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes the preliminary announcement that it will give its usual series of five concerts in the Lyric Theater during the coming season. The concerts will be given on Wednesday evenings, the dates being November 6, December 4, January 8, February 19 and March 19.

As already announced, Dr. Karl Muck will resume his post of conductor after an absence of four years, becoming the permanent conductor of the orchestra. Distinguished soloists have been engaged, including Fritz Kreisler, whose only appearance here will be with the Orchestra. The Boston Symphony Orchestra brings him to America this season under an exclusive contract.

From EVENING SUN
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date SEP 21 1912

KREISLER WITH ORCHESTRA

Boston Symphony Will Bring Violinist Here In December.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra this year brings to America for a limited number of appearances the eminent violinist Fritz Kreisler. Aside from the recital which has been arranged for him in New York by the management of the orchestra, Mr. Kreisler's only appearances in the East will be at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. He will appear with the orchestra here in Baltimore at the December concert.

From EVG. SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date SEP 27

TO THE MUSICIANS OF THE TITANIC

A tablet bearing this inscription has been set up in Symphony Hall, Boston:

IN MEMORY OF
The Devoted Musicians
WALLACE HENRY HARTLEY
Bandmaster
JOHN FREDERICK PRESTON CLARK
PERCY CORNELIUS TAYLOR
JOHN WESLEY WOODWARD
W. THEODORE BRAILEY
JOHN LAW HUME
GEORGES KRINS
ROGER BRICOUX
Who Were Drowned
Still Playing
As the Titanic Went Down
April 15, 1912

A deserved tribute to men whose names should be remembered.

From EVG. NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date SEP 28 1912

DR. KARL MUCK ON HIS WAY TO AMERICA

Boston Symphony Leader Is Bringing New Members Of Orchestra.

Dr. Karl Muck, who is coming to America to resume the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Bremen last Tuesday on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie and is due to arrive here next Tuesday. He is bringing with him three new members of the Orchestra, Otto Urack, who succeeds Alwin Schroeder at the first desk of the cellists; Maurice Koessler, one of the new first violins, and Bruce Steinke, one of the new cellists.

Otto Urack brings to America with him an enviable reputation as a cellist, musician and conductor. For the last several seasons he has been principal cellist of the Festival Orchestra at Bayreuth and has done much operatic and concert conducting in the lower Rhenish cities.

Among the newcomers that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have this year is Walther Habenichl, for the last three seasons concertmaster of the Kiel Philharmonic Orchestra. Mr. Habenichl comes to Boston to be the leader of the second violins.

The wood-wind section will be strengthened through the coming from Paris of Albert Chevrot, flutist, and Pierre Fosse, oboist. Both these musicians are young men and winners of the first prize in the Paris Conservatoire.

The plans for the season of the Orchestra are now complete. The season begins in Boston with the first public rehearsal on Friday, October 11, and ends with the last concerts on May 3. Between those two dates 110 concerts will be given, eight less than last year. The Orchestra is called together for its first rehearsal on Monday, October 7.

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date SEP 29

Boston Symphony.

Dr. Karl Muck, who is coming to America to resume as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Bremen last Tuesday on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie and is due to arrive Tuesday next. He is bringing with him three new members of the orchestra—Otto Urack, who succeeds Alwin Schroeder at the first desk of the cellists; Maurice Koessler, one of the new first violins, and Bruno Steinke, one of the new cellists.

Mr. Urack for several seasons has been principal cellist of the Festival Orchestra at Bayreuth, and has done much operatic and concert conducting in the Lower Renish cities.

The season begins in Boston with the first public rehearsal October 11 and ends with the last concert May 3. Between those two dates 110 concerts will be given, eight less than last year.

From EVENING SUN
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 4

DR. MUCK TO PRESENT BUT FEW NOVELTIES

Resumes Charge Of Boston Symphony To Find Sixteen New Members.

Last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, which are to be given in the Lyric Theatre on Wednesday evenings, November 6, December 4, January 8, February 19 and March 19, have until next Thursday in which to renew their subscriptions at Albaugh's ticket office and retain their old seats. The general sale to new subscribers will open at Albaugh's on Monday morning, October 14.

Dr. Carl Muck, who returns this year to be the conductor of the orchestra for at least the next five years, arrived in New York last Tuesday on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie. He went directly to Boston, and his first care will be to settle his new home in that city. Dr. Muck said that he was not ready to make any definite announcement of his plans for the coming season. He has been away from the orchestra four years. He immediately got in touch with the men. With 16 new members there was a certain amount of preliminary work necessary to get it into smooth running order.

Dr. Muck is not particularly enthusiastic this year on the subject of novelties. He says he fails to see the wisdom of wasting the time of the orchestra and trying the patience of audiences with novelties whose only merit is the fact that they are novelties. He has, however, some new works which he will try in Boston, and if they have success there he will likely include them in his Baltimore concerts. Among them is a symphony by Lendvai, a new piece by Reger and a humoresque by the Bohemian Mrazek.

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes the preliminary announcement that it will give its usual series of five concerts in the Lyric Theater during the coming season. The concerts will be given on Wednesday evenings, the dates being November 6, December 4, January 8, February 19 and March 19. As already announced, Dr. Karl Muck will resume his post of conductor after an absence of four years, becoming permanent conductor of the orchestra. Distinguished soloists have been engaged, including Fritz Kreisler, whose only appearance here wil be with the orchestra.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address New York
Date SEP 18

Boston Symphony Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes announcement that it will give the usual two series of concerts in Carnegie Hall during the coming season on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons, respectively. The dates of the evening concerts are November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20. The dates of the afternoon concerts are November 9, December 7, January 11, February 22 and March 22. Dr. Karl Muck will resume the post of conductor after an absence of four years. He now becomes the permanent conductor of the orchestra. The list of soloists will include Miss Geraldine Farrar, Madame Matzenauer and Fritz Kreisler. Mr. Kreisler comes to America this season under an exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVE. POST.
Address New York City.
Date [illegible] 1912

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces the usual two series of concerts in Carnegie Hall during the coming season. The dates of the evening concerts are November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20, and March 20. The afternoon concerts will be on November 9, December 7, January 11, February 22, and March 22. Dr. Karl Muck will resume the post of conductor after an absence of four years. The soloists will include Geraldine Farrar, Mme. Matzenauer, and Fritz Kreisler.

From
Address
Date SEP [illegible] 1912

— Dr. aKrl Muck, der zukünftige Leiter des Boſtoner Symphonie Orcheſters, verwahrt ſich telegraphiſch gegen das Gerücht, daß er abermals von der Intendantur der Königlichen Oper in München angegangen, Felix Mottl's Stelle in München zu übernehmen. Dr. Muck wird ſich in dieſen Tagen auf die Reiſe nach Boſton begeben, wo ſeiner ein intereſſantes und reiches Wirkungsfeld harrt.

From TIMES
Address New York
Date SEP 15 1912

MUSIC HERE AND THERE

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra makes the preliminary announcement that it will give the usual series of concerts in Carnegie Hall during the coming season, on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons, respectively. The dates of the evening concerts are Nov. 7, Dec. 5, Jan. 9, Feb. 20 and March 20. The dates of the afternoon concerts are Nov. 9, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 22, and March 22.

As already announced, Dr. Karl Muck will resume the post of conductor after an absence of four years. The list of soloists will include Miss Geraldine Farrar, Mme. Matzenauer, and Fritz Kreisler. Mr. Kreisler comes to America this season under an exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The general sale of season tickets to new subscribers will open at the box office of Carnegie Hall on Monday morning, Oct.

From
Address New York
Date SEP 15

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's regular series of five concerts will be given in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, on Friday evenings, November 8, December 6, January 10, February 21 and March 21. Among the soloists engaged are Elena Gerhardt, the German lieder singer, and Fritz Kreisler, violinist. The last day for the renewal of subscriptions is Saturday, October 19. The sale of tickets to new subscribers will open October 25.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address New York SEP 15 1912

Date

Die Leitung des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters verlautbart, daß in der kommenden Saiſon in New York in Carnegie Hall die üblichen zwei Serien von Symphonie-Konzerten an Donnerstag-Nachmittagen, reſp. Samstag-Nachmittagen ſtattfinden werden. Und zwar fallen die Darbietungen der erſten Serie auf den 7. November, 5. Dezember, 9. Januar, 20. Februar und 20. März, und die der Samstag-Nachmittag-Konzerte auf den 9. November, 7. Dezember, 11. Januar, 22. Februar und 22. März. Bekanntlich wird Dr. Karl Muck in der kommenden Saiſon wieder an die Spitze des Boſtoner Orcheſters treten. Aus der Soliſten-Liſte werden vorläufig die Namen Geraldine Farrar, Margarethe Matzenauer und Fritz Kreisler bekannt gegeben.

* * *

From STANDARD UNION

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 1912

MUSICAL NOTES.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its preliminary announcement of its regular series of five concerts to be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evenings, the dates being Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Feb. 21 and March 21. As already announced, Dr. Karl Muck resumes his post of conductor, after an absence of four years, becoming the permanent conductor of the orchestra. Distinguished soloists have been engaged, including Elena Gerhardt, the great German lieder singer, and Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, who comes to America this winter for a limited number of appearances under an exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His only appearance in Brooklyn will be with the orchestra. The Institute of Arts and Sciences, under whose auspices these concerts are given, announces that the time limit for the renewal of subscriptions has been set for Saturday, Oct. 19. The general sale of tickets to new subscribers will open on Oct. 25.

From EAGLE

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its preliminary announcement of its regular series of five concerts to be given in the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday evenings, the dates being November 8, December 6, January 10, February 21 and March 21. As already announced, Dr. Karl Muck resumes his post of conductor after an absence of four years, becoming the permanent conductor of the orchestra. Distinguished soloists have been engaged, including Elena Gerhardt, the great German lieder singer, and Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, who comes to America this winter for a limited number of appearances under an exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His only appearance in Brooklyn will be with the Orchestra. The Institute of Arts and Sciences, under whose auspices these concerts are given, announces that the time limit for the renewal of subscriptions has been set for Saturday, October 19. The general sale of tickets to new subscribers will open on October 25.

From GLOBE

Address New York

Date 1912

Following what has now become its established custom of having each year the exclusive services of an artist of first rank as soloist at a series of its concerts the Boston Symphony Orchestra, during the coming session, has made an arrangement whereby it brings to America, for a limited number of concerts, Fritz Kreisler, the eminent violinist. He is to play with the orchestra in New York at both of its December concerts, and this will be his only appearance with the orchestra in this city. The management of the orchestra has arranged that he shall give a recital in Æolian Hall later in the season. Miss Geraldine Farrar, who is announced as one of the soloists, will make her only concert appearance in New York with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From CITIZENS

Address Brooklyn, N. Y. SEP 15 1912

Date

MUSIC NOTES OF INTEREST

Boston Symphony Dates for Brooklyn.

DR. KARL MUCK WILL BE SEEN AS ITS CONDUCTOR

Elena Gerhardt and Fritz Kreisler Will Appear as Soloists—Philharmonic Subscriptions Give Promise of a Successful Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced the dates for its regular series of five concerts to be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evenings. The dates are Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Feb. 21, and March 21.

As already announced, Dr. Karl Muck will resume his post as conductor after an absence of four years, becoming the permanent conductor of the orchestra.

Distinguished soloists have been engaged, including Elena Gerhardt, the Great German Lieder singer, and Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, who comes to America this winter for a limited number of appearances under an exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His only appearance in Brooklyn will be with the orchestra.

The Institute of Arts and Sciences, under whose auspices these concerts are given, announces that the time limit for the renewal of subscriptions has been set for Saturday, Oct. 19. The general sale of tickets to new subscribers will open on Oct. 25.

Felix F. Leifels, manager of the Philharmonic Society of New York, reports that the renewal subscriptions and new applications for seats received during the past week exceed in number all previous records of the society. Carnegie Hall, he believes, in the near future, will be entirely sold out to subscribers for the Friday Afternoon Series.

The increase of subscriptions for the Thursday evening and Sunday afternoon series is also large.

In Brooklyn, for the series of five concerts at the Academy of Music, which does not begin until the latter part of November, the upper sections of the house are almost completely subscribed, while parquet and box subscriptions show a large increase over last season.

From SUN

Address: New York

Date SEP

Music and

Boston Symphony Tuning Up
Philharmonic Still Firm in Goers—Carnegie Ha

From cool New England comes the first muttering of a new music season headed this way. The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes the preliminary announcement that it will give its usual two series of concerts in New York this winter at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons beginning Nov. 7 and 9. The later dates are Dec. 5 and 7, Jan. 9 and 11, Feb. 20 and 22 and March 20 and 22. As already announced last spring, Dr. Karl Muck will resume the post of conductor. The Kaiser's favorite returns from Berlin after an absence of four years, becoming—so the Hub hears—the "permanent conductor" of the orchestra.

Geraldine Farrar, Margarete Matzenauer and Fritz Kreisler are in the list of solo stars. Mr. Kreisler comes to America this season under contract with the Boston orchestra alone. The Brothers Heck announce that C. A. Ellis will come over to hold the general sale of season tickets to new subscribers at the box office of Carnegie Hall on Monday morning, Oct. 7, a fortnight from now.

From STANDARD UNION

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 1912

The opening concert at the Academy of Music will be given this year again by Mme. Schumann-Heink, whose absence from the United States for the larger part of last season prevented her from singing in Brooklyn except at the opening Philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. She will give a recital in the Opera House on Thursday evening, Oct. 17, and will, as usual, bring an entirely new programme.

From TIMES

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date SEP 21 1912

Weingartner's new concerto for violin will be played for the first time on October 28 in Vienna. To Fritz Kreisler has been accorded the privilege of the first performance. The composition will be given once at Amsterdam and once at the Hague. Following these, the work will have its first production in the United States, when Mr. Kreisler will play it in Boston.

Following what has now become its established habit of securing the exclusive services for a series of its concerts of one of the most eminent artists before the public, the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year brings to America, for a limited number of appearances, the eminent violinist, Fritz Kreisler. Aside from the recital which has been arranged for him in New York by the management of the orchestra, Mr. Kreisler's only appearance in the East will be at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. He will appear with the orchestra here in Brooklyn at the December concert.

From PRESS

Address: New York

Date SEP 22 1912

Following what has now become its established custom of having each year the exclusive services of an artist of first rank as soloist at a series of its concerts, the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming season has made an arrangement whereby it brings to America for a limited number of concerts Fritz Kreisler, violinist. He is to play with the orchestra in New York at both of its December concerts. The management has arranged that he shall give a recital in Aeolian Hall later in the season.

Miss Geraldine Farrar, who is announced as one of the soloists, will make her only concert appearance in New York with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From REVUE

Address New York

Date S 1912

Boſton Symphonie-Kapelle.

Das Boſton Symphonie-Orcheſter wird, wie im Vorjahre, wieder zwei Serien von je vier Concerten in New York veranſtalten, die am Donnerſtag Abend und Samſtag Nachmittag in der Carnegie Hall abgehalten werden. Das erſte am Donnerſtag findet am 7. November ſtatt. Wie öfters mitgetheilt, iſt Dr. Karl Muck auf's neue als Dirigent gewonnen worden, und es beſteht die Abſicht, ihn nicht nur vier Jahre hier feſtzuhalten, ſondern ihn zum permanenten Kapellmeiſter dieſes Orcheſters zu gewinnen. Als Soliſten für dieſe Concerte ſind ſoweit Miß Farrar, Madame Matzenauer und der Violiniſt Fritz Kreisler gewonnen worden. Dieſer Künſtler iſt für dieſe Saiſon ausſchließlich als Soliſt für die Boſtonians engagirt worden.

From STANDARD UNION

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

1912

Following what has now become its established habit of securing the exclusive services for a series of its concerts of one of the most eminent artists before the public, the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year brings to America, for a limited number of appearances, the eminent violinist, Fritz Kreisler. Aside from the recital which has been arranged for him in Manhattan by the management of the orchestra, Mr. Kreisler's only appearances in the East will be at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. He will appear with the orchestra here in Brooklyn at the December concert.

From HERALD

Address New York

Date SEP 22 1912

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays here in December under the baton of Dr. Karl Muck, Mr. Fritz Kreisler, violinist, will be the soloist at each concert. He will give a recital in Aeolian Hall later in the season. Miss Geraldine Farrar, soprano, also will be one of Dr. Muck's soloists.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address New York 1912

Date

Die Leitung der Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzerte theilt uns mit, daß der Soliſt der beiden im Dezember d. J. ſtattfindenden Konzerte der Boſtoner in Carnegie Hall Herr Fritz Kreisler ſein wird, der ſeine geſammte diesmalige Thätigkeit in den Ver. Staaten auf das Zuſammenſpiel mit dem berühmten Orcheſter beſchränken wird. Die Leitung des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters hat Arrangements getroffen zu einem ſpäter in der Saiſon in der Aeolian Hall ſtattfindenden Recital des berühmten Violiniſten. Auch Frl. Geraldine Farrar befindet ſich unter den Soliſten, und zwar wird ſie in der kommenden Saiſon nur bei dieſer Gelegenheit im Rahmen eines Symphonie-Konzertes [illegible] New York auftreten.

EVG. SUN
New York
SEP 23 1912

Music and Musicians

Alwin Schroeder Again Leaves the Boston Orchestra—New Publicity Plans for Oratorio Society of New York.

That Alwin Schroeder has retired from the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be a matter of regret to all patrons of that distinguished band. Once before Mr. Schroeder was missed, when he left with the Kneisels, after the big four had quit in a body, to establish themselves in New York. The 'cellist's subsequent retreat to Germany was brief. He found the Fatherland not at all what his youthful fancy had dreamed, and came back to his orchestra and found the audiences still ready to shout for Schroeder. There will be other changes when this season's first rehearsal is called at the Hub on Monday, Oct. 7.

Of the older members that have retired both Paul Fox of the flutes and Carl Schumann of the horns have completed thirty-one years of continuous service. Their service, in other words, covers the life of the orchestra since its beginning. August Sautet of the oboes, Regesttin of the bassoons and Rettberg of the drums, that polite Boston calls the "percussion department," have long and honorable years of service behind them. Krafft and Eichheim have resigned from the first violins, the one to take charge of the music in the Hub's newest hyphenated hotel and the other to devote himself to teaching, while Barleben, for years the leader of the second violins, has retired on account of ill health.

In addition to Schroeder, who plans to devote himself to concert work, two other 'cellists, Arthur Hadley and Ralph Smalley, have left this season, the first to become solo 'cellist of the San Francisco orchestra, of which his brother, Henry Hadley, is conductor, and the second to join the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra. So much for the missing men.

New faces are to be seen at the desks of the Boston Symphony veterans. The total strength of the orchestra, including the conductor, will be an even hundred men, as compared with 101 a year ago, there being this year one man less in the "percussion department."

In Schroeder's place to share the first desk of the 'cello section with Warnke, says a Boston chronicler to-day, will come Otto Urack of Berlin. Urack is a Bohemian by descent, but a native of Berlin, and for several seasons has been 'cello soloist in the Wagner festivals at Bayreuth. Still in his 20's, he has conducted opera in Barmen and Elberfeld and many concerts in cities of the lower Rhine.

A viola player, Spoor, is transferred to Boston's second violins, and in return one Werner goes from second violin to the violas, taking the place of Hoyer, whose illness compelled his retirement. A new viola player, Berliner, formerly was the leading viola of the Boston Opera House.

Every year the Athens of America allots its most cherished privileges of musical culture by means of a public auction sale. Season tickets at Symphony Hall go at a premium and all Boston gets pretty well excited over the event, which this year falls one week from now. It takes four days to determine just where the elect shall sit down to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The disturbance is the greater just now, because Boston is to have a favorite conductor back after four years' absence.

Dr. Carl Muck and Mrs. Muck sail for this country on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie next Tuesday, arriving in Boston a week later and intend going at once to housekeeping in an apartment they have leased in Commonwealth avenue, according to gossip at the Hub.

Since leaving the Kaiser's opera in Berlin, Dr. Muck has conducted the great Lower Rhenish Festivals and prepared the performances of "Parsifal" in Bayreuth. His German admirers everywhere have given him a great send-off.

From STANDARD UNION
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date SEP 1912

Mitchell May.

Dr. Karl Muck, who is coming to America to resume the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Bremen last Tuesday on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie, and is due to arrive here on Tuesday next. He is bringing with him three new members of the orchestra, Otto Urack, who succeeds Alwin Schroeder at the first desk of the 'cellists; Maurice Koessler, one of the new first violins, and Bruno Steinke, one of the new 'cellists. Otto Urack brings to America with him an enviable reputation as a 'cellist, musician and conductor. For the past several seasons he has been the principal 'cellist of the Festival Orchestra of Bayreuth, and has done much operative and concert conducting in the lower Rhenish cities. Among the new comers that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have this year is Walter Habenichl, for the last three seasons concertmaster of the Keil Philharmonic Orchestra. Mr. Habenichl comes to Boston to be leader of the second violins. The wood-wind section will be strengthened through the coming from Paris of Aibert Chevrot, flutist, and Pierre Fosse, oboeist. Both these musicians are young men and winners of the first prize in the Paris Conservatoire. The plans for the season of the orchestra are now complete. The season begins in Boston with the first public rehearsal on Friday, Oct. 11, and ends with the last concert on May 3. Between those two dates 110 concerts will be given, eight less than last year. The orchestra is called together for its first rehearsal on Monday, Oct. 7. Subscribers to last year's concerts have until Saturday, Oct. 19, in which to renew their subscriptions for the coming season and secure the seats occupied by them in the past. The general public sale will open at the box office, Academy of Music, on Friday, Oct. 25.

Address
Date

— Dr. Karl Muck, der neue Leiter des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters, hat ſich geſtern in Begleitung ſeiner Gattin mit dem Lloyddampfer „Kronprinzeſſin Cecilie" auf die Reiſe nach der Neuen Welt begeben und wird ſich von New York aus ſofort nach Boſton begeben.

— Seit ſeinem Austritt aus der Königlichen Oper in Berlin hat Dr. Muck die niederrheiniſchen Muſikfeſte geleitet und in Bayreuth die Aufführung des „Parſifal" vorbereitet.

— Alwin Schröder der berühmte Solocelliſt des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters hat dieſem vornehmen Orcheſter ſeine Reſignation zukommen laſſen und wird ſehr zum Bedauern der Muſikliebhaber in der Bohnenſtadt bereits in der kommenden Saiſon nicht mehr auftreten.

— Schröder hat ſich entſchloſſen, als Solokünſtler eigene Wege zu ziehen. Er hatte in früheren Jahren ſchon einmal ſeinen Austritt aus dem Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſtrr angemeldet, um ſich wieder in Deutſchland anzuſiedeln, doch fand er in der Heimath vieles ſo verändert, daß er der Heimath wieder Valet ſagte und zu den Boſtonern zurückkehrte.

— Dr. Karl Muck, der neue Leiter des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters, hat ſich geſtern in Begleitung ſeiner Gattin mit dem Lloyddampfer „Kronprinzeſſin Cecilie" auf die Reiſe nach der Neuen Welt begeben und wird ſich von New York aus ſofort nach Boſton begeben.

— Seit ſeinem Austritt aus der Königlichen Oper in Berlin hat Dr. Muck die niederrheiniſchen Muſikfeſte geleitet und in Bayreuth die Aufführung des „Parſifal" vorbereitet.

— Alwin Schröder der berühmte Solocelliſt des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters hat dieſem vornehmen Orcheſter ſeine Reſignation zukommen laſſen und wird ſehr zum Bedauern der Muſikliebhaber in der Bohnenſtadt bereits in der kommenden Saiſon nicht mehr auftreten.

— Schröder hat ſich entſchloſſen, als Solokünſtler eigene Wege zu ziehen. Er hatte in früheren Jahren ſchon einmal ſeinen Austritt aus dem Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſtrr angemeldet, um ſich wieder in Deutſchland anzuſiedeln, doch fand er in der Heimath vieles ſo verändert, daß er der Heimath wieder Valet ſagte und zu den Boſtonern zurückkehrte.

From
Address
Date

— Jene fröhliche Künſtlerſchaar, die ſich im Club der Zufälligen zuſammenfindet, hatte dieſer Tage das Vergnügen, in ihrer Mitte zwei liebe gute Freunde, die auf der „Pennſylvania" hier letzte Wochen eintrafen, begrüßen zu können. Es waren dies Herr Hübner, ein neuer Horniſt des Boſtoner Symphonie Orcheſters, und H. Dutſchke, der gleichfalls ein Meiſter des Hornes iſt. Das Wiederſehen wurde natürlich in Keber's Klauſe in gebührender Weiſe gefeiert, und Fritz Koch, der luſtige Präſident der Zufälligen, wußte aus dieſer Wiederſehensfeier ein rechtes Künſtlerfeſt zu machen, das einen ſehr vergnügten Verlauf nahm. Dutſchke und Hübner bethätigten ſich übrigens in hervorragender Weiſe während der Ueberfahrt als Soliſten bei einem an Bord des Dampfers veranſtalteten Wohlthätigkeitskonzert.

From
Address New York
Date

— Alwin Schroeder's Rücktritt vom Boſton Symphonie-Orcheſter wird im ganzen Reiche der Muſik mit großem Bedauern aufgenommen. Schon einmal hat man Schroeder's Abgang ſchmerzlich empfunden, als er den Kneiſel's Valet ſagte. Er war dann nach Deutſchland gegangen, kam aber bald wieder zurück zu einem geliebten Orcheſter. Jetzt geht er wieder.

— An Schroeder's Stelle, um ſich in das erſte Notenpult in der Cello-Abtheilung zu theilen, wird einem Boſtoner Chronologen zufolge Otto Urack aus Berlin kommen. Von den älteren Mitglie-dern des Orcheſters werden Paul Fox (Flöte) und Carl Schuman (Horn), in den Ruheſtand treten nachdem ſie 32
Jahre lang in der Muſe Dienſt waren.
Krafft und Eichheim, Primgeiger, haben reſignirt und noch viele andere Wechſel werden bemerkbar ſein, wenn am 7. Oktober die erſte Generalprobe ſtattfindet.

From CITIZENS
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

Dr. Karl Muck, who is coming to America to resume the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has sailed from Bremen on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie, and is due to arrive here on Tuesday next. He is bringing with him three new members of the orchestra—Otto Urack, who succeeds Alwin Schroeder at the first desk of the 'cellist; Maurice Koessler, one of the new first violins, and Bruno Steinke, one of the new 'cellists.

Otto Urack brings to America with him an enviable reputation as a 'cellist, musician and conductor. For the past several seasons he has been principal 'cellist of the Festival Orchestra of Bayreuth and has done much opera and concert conducting in the lower Rhenish cities.

Among the newcomers that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have this year is Walter Habenichl, for the last three seasons concertmaster of the Keil Philharmonic Orchestra. Mr. Habenichl comes to Boston to be the leader of the second violin.

The wood-wind section will be strength through the coming from Paris of Albert Chevrot, fluist, and Pierre Fosse, oboist. Both these musicians are young men and winners of the first prize in the Paris Conservatoire.

The plans for the season of the orchestra are now complete. The season will begin in Boston with the first public rehearsal on Friday, Oct. 11, and end with a concert on May 3. Between those two dates 110 concerts will be given, eight less than last year. The orchestra is called together for its first rehearsal on Monday, Oct. 7.

Subscribers to last year's concerts have until Saturday, Oct. 19, in which to renew their subscriptions for the coming season and secure the seats occupied by them in the past. The general public sale will open at the box office, Academy of Music, on Friday, Oct. 25.

From TIMES
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

Dr. Karl Muck, who is coming to America to resume the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Bremen last Tuesday on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie and is due to arrive here on Tuesday next. He is bringing with him three new members of the orchestra, Otto Urack, who succeeds Alwin Schroeder at the first desk of the 'cellists; Haurice Koessler, one of the new first violins, and Bruno Steinke, one of the new 'cellists.

Mr. Urack brings to America with him an enviable reputation as a 'cellist, musician and conductor. For the past several seasons he has been principal 'cellist of the Festival Orchestra of Bayreuth and has done much operativ and concert conducting in the lower Rhenish cities.

Among the new comers that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have this year is Walther Habenichl, for the last three seasons concert-master of the Kiel Philharmonic Orchestra. Mr. Habenichl comes to Boston to be the leader of the second violins.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address New York
Date SEP 26 1912

NEWCOMERS FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

1884

Germany and France Despoiled of Some of Their Best Young Musicians.

URACK OF BAYREUTH ENGAGED

Dr. Karl Muck, who is coming to America to resume the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Bremen last Tuesday on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie, and is due to arrive here on Tuesday next. He is bringing with him three new members of the orchestra—Otto Urack, who succeeds Alwin Schroeder at the first desk of the 'cellists; Maurice Koessler, one of the new first violins, and Bruno Steinke, one of the new 'cellists.

Mr. Otto Urack brings to America with him an enviable reputation as a 'cellist, musician and conductor. For the past several seasons he has been principal 'cellist of the Festival Orchestra of Bayreuth, and has done much operatic and concert conducting in the lower Rhenish cities.

Among the newcomers that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have this year is Mr. Walter Habenichl, for the last three seasons concert master of the Keil Philharmonic Orchestra. Mr. Habenichl comes to Boston to be the leader of the second violins.

The woodwind section will be strengthened through the coming from Paris of Albert Chevrot, flutist, and Pierre Fosse, oboist. Both these musicians are young men and winners of the first prize in the Paris Conservatoire.

The plans for the season of the orchestra are now complete. The season begins in Boston, with the first public rehearsal on Fr[illegible]day, October 11, and ends with the last concert on May [illegible]. Between those two dates 110 concerts will be given, eight less than last year. The orchestra is called together for its first rehearsal on Monday, October 7.

From EVG. SUN
Address: New York
Date SEP 29 1912

Music and Musicians

Gatti, Alda, Gadski and Muck All on Next Tuesday's Line From Europe—Calve Arrives for a Tour.

From the Metropolitan Opera House to-day, it was announced that the general manager of that instituti[illegible] Giulio Gatti-Casazza, and [illegible] wife, F[illegible]ces Alda, are passengers f[illegible] Europe [illegible] the Kronprinzessin Ce[illegible] due [illegible] Tuesday in New York. Mr [illegible]atti is t[illegible]en the grand opera season on [illegible]v. 11, [illegible] a revival of either "Flauto M[illegible]co" o[illegible]li Ugonotti," in honor of that ra[illegible] bird[illegible]ong the stars, a coloratura sopra[illegible]. It [illegible]ms probable now, that Meyerb[illegible] [illegible]ork, and not Mozart's will be ul[illegible]y chosen.

With the Gattis on [illegible]uesday's liner are both Johanna Gads[illegible]he opera, who returns largely for a c[illegible]rt tour, and Karl Muck, who comes [illegible] Berlin to be permanent conductor of [illegible]oston Symphony Orchestra. Mean[illegible]e another famous arrival was announ[illegible]to-day.

Emma Calvé, the great F[illegible]ch Carmen, with her husband, Signo[illegible] Galileo Gasparri, a young Italian tenor, [illegible]as due to-day aboard the Martha Washington.

It is the thirty-second season of Boston's famous orchestra that Dr. Karl Muck is coming to America to conduct. He sailed from Bremen, bringing three members of the band. They are Otto Urack, who succeeds Alwin Schroeder as first 'cellist; Bruno Steinke, another new 'cellist, and Maurice Koessler, one of the new first violins.

Boston's season of 110 concerts begins Oct. 11, and ends May 3. Subscribers to the New York concerts have until next Tuesday to retain their places at Carnegie Hall.

Besides a work by the latest lion of Paris, much other music is announced by Walter Damrosch fo[illegible] the New York Symphony Society's [illegible]enty-four concerts [illegible]he new Aeoli[illegible] Hall.

With [illegible]nelli's "T[illegible]ebes," the other novelties [illegible]lude "[illegible]Page from Homer," by Rimsky-[illegible]rsa[illegible]ff, the St. Cecilia women's choru[illegible]isting; a "Suite Enfantine" called "[illegible] Mere Oye" or "Mother Goose," by R[illegible] [illegible]nd a "Fairy Tale," by Victor Kol[illegible]or s[illegible]eral years a member of the D[illegible]rosch o[illegible]hestra. On Nov. 17, there [illegible] be a Ma[illegible]net memorial with Ed[illegible] Clement as [illegible]oist.

W. B. CHASE.

From EVENING POST,
Address New York City.
Date SEP 28 1912

Dr. Karl Muck, who is due to arrive in this country on Tuesday to resume the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is bringing with him three new members of the orchestra: Otto Urack, who succeeds Alwin Schroeder as first 'cellist; Maurice Koessler, one of the new first violins, and Bruno Steinke, one of the new 'cellists. Among the other newcomers will be Walther Habenichl, for the last three seasons concert master of the Kell Philharmonic Society, who will be the leader of the second violins. The wood wind will be strengthened through the coming from Paris of Albert Chevrot, flutist, and Peirre Fosse, oboeist.

The fifty-fifth annual festival of the Wor-

From AMERICAN
Address New York
Date

DR. MUCK HERE NEXT WEEK

Dr. Karl Muck, the new director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, after twenty years' activity as conductor of the Imperial Opera in Berlin, will leave for Boston at the end of September. The Berlin Royal Opera has granted Dr. Muck leave of absence for the last months of his contract.

From TIMES
Address: New York
Date

Dr. Muck on His Way to America.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BERLIN, Sept. 28.—Dr. Karl Muck, recently the conductor of the Kaiser's royal opera, arrives in New York on Tuesday aboard the Kronprincessin Cecilie to take up his duties as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn,
Date

New Players in Boston S Thirty-second Seaso

Dr. Karl Muck, who is to be of the Boston Symphony Orchest from Bremen on Tuesday last, Kronprinzessin Cecilie, and is du rive on Tuesday next, bringing thr members of the orchestra—Otto who succeeds Alwin Schroeder at first desk of the cellists; Maurice K sler, one of the n w first violins, Bruno Steinke, one of the new cellists. Mr. Urack has an enviable reputation as cellist, musician and conductor. For several seasons he has been principal cellist of the Festival Orchestra of Bayreuth, and has done much operatic and concert conducting in the lower Rhenish cities.

Among the new comers to the Boston Symphony will be Walther Habenichl, for the last three seasons concertmaster of the Keil Philharmonic Orchestra, and now to be the leader of the second violins. The wood-wind section will be strengthened through the coming, from Paris, of Albert Chevrot, flutist, and Pierre Fosse, oboist. They are young, and were winners of the first prize in the Paris Conservatoire.

The season begins in Boston, with the first public rehearsal on Friday, October 11, and ends with the last concert on May 3. Between those dates one hundred and ten concerts will be given; eight less than last year. Subscribers to last year's concerts have until Saturday, October 19, in which to renew their subscriptions for the coming season and secure the seats occupied by them in the past. The general public sale will open at the box office, Academy of Music, on Friday, October 25.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.
Date SEP 29 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Dr. Karl Muck, who is coming to America to resume the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Bremen on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie, and is due to arrive here on Tuesday. He is bringing with him three new members of the orchestra—Otto Urack, who succeeds Alwin Schroeder at the first desk of the 'cellists; Maurice Koessler, one of the new first violins, and Bruno Steinke, one of the new 'cellists.

Otto Urack brings to America with him an enviable reputation as a 'cellist, musician and conductor. For several seasons he has been principal 'cellist of the Festival Orchestra of Bayreuth, and has done much operatic and concert conducting in the lower Rhenish cities.

Among the newcomers that the orchestra will have this year is Walther Habenichl. Mr. Habenichl comes to Boston to be the leader of the second violins.

The wood wind section will be strengthened through the coming from Paris of Albert Chevrot, flutist, and Pierre Fossé, oboist. Both these musicians are young men and winners of the first prize in the Paris Conservatoire.

The plans for the season of the orchestra are now complete. The season begins in Boston with the first public rehearsal on Friday, October 11, and ends with the last concert on May 3. Between those two dates 110 concerts will be given, eight less than last year. The orchestra is called together for its first rehearsal on Monday, October 7.

Subscribers to the New York concerts who have not already paid for their tickets have until next Tuesday, October 1, in which to do so, the tickets now being at the box office of Carnegie Hall awaiting them. Such tickets as are not taken up by that date will be placed on public sale next Monday, October 7, at the box office of Carnegie Hall. There will be no soloists at the first pair of concerts in November.

From TIMES
Address: New York
Date SEP 29 1912

Dr. Carl Muck, who is coming to America to resume the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Bremen last Tuesday on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie and is due to arrive here on Tuesday next. He is bringing with him three new members of the orchestra—Otto Urack, who succeeds Alwin Schroeder at the first desk of the 'cellists; Maurice Koessler, one of the new first violins, and Bruno Steinke, one of the new 'cellists.

Otto Urack for several seasons has been principal 'cellist of the Festival Orchestra of Baireuth, and has done much operatic and concert conducting in the lower Rhenish cities. Among the newcomers that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have this year is Walter Habenichl, for the last three seasons concert master of the Keil Philharmonic Orchestra. Mr. Habenichl comes to Boston to be the leader of the second violins.

The wood-wind section will be strengthened through the coming from Paris of Albert Chevrot, flutist, and Pierre Fossé, oboeist. Both these musicians are young men and winners of the first prize in the Paris Conservatoire.

The plans for the season of the orchestra are now complete. The season begins in Boston with the first public rehearsal on Friday, Oct. 11, and ends with the last concert on May 3. Between those two dates 110 concerts will be given, eight less than last year. The orchestra is called together for its first rehearsal on Monday, Oct. 7.

Subscribers to the New York concerts who have not already paid for their tickets have until next Tuesday, Oct. 1, in which to do so, the tickets now being at the box office of Carnegie Hall awaiting them. Such tickets as are not taken up by that date will be placed on public sale next Monday, Oct. 7, at the box office of Carnegie Hall. There will be no soloists at the first pair of concerts in November.

_

From TIMES
Address: New York
Date [illegible]

Following what has now become its established custom of having each year the exclusive services of an ~~artist~~ of first rank as soloist at a series of its concerts, the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming season has made an arrangement whereby it brings to America, for a limited number of concerts, Fritz Kreisler, the violinist. He is to play with the orchestra in New York at both of its December concerts, and this will be his only appearance with orchestra in this city. The management of the orchestra has arranged that he shall give a recital in Aeolian Hall later in the season.

Miss Geraldine Farrar, who is announced as one of the soloists, will make her only concert appearance in New York with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address New York
Date SEP 26 1912

NEWCOMERS FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

Germany and France Despoiled of Some of Their Best Young Musicians.

URACK OF BAYREUTH ENGAGED

Dr. Karl Muck, who is coming t America to resume the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Bremen last Tuesday on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie, and is due to arrive here on Tuesday next. He is bringing with him three new members of the orchestra—Otto Urack, who succeed Alwin Schroeder at the first desk of the 'cellists; Maurice Koessler, one of the new first violins, and Bruno Steinke, one of the new 'cellists.

Mr. Otto Urack brings to America with him an enviable reputation as a 'cellist, musician and conductor. For the past several seasons he has been principal 'cellist of the Festival Orchestra of Bayreuth, and has done much operatic and concert conducting in the lower Rhenish cities.

Among the newcomers that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have this year is Mr. Walter Habenichl, for the last three seasons concert master of the Keil Philharmonic Orchestra. Mr. Habenichl comes to Boston to be the leader of the second violins.

The woodwind section will be strengthened through the coming from Paris of Albert Chevrot, flutist, and Pierre Fosse, oboist. Both these musicians are young men and winners of the first prize in the Paris Conservatoire.

The plans for the season of the orchestra are now complete. The season begins in Boston, with the first public rehearsal on Friday, October 11, and ends with the last concert on May '. Between those two dates 110 concerts will be given, eight less than last year. The orchestra is called together for its first rehearsal on Monday, October 7.

1884

From EVENING POST,
Address New York City.
Date SEP 28 1912

Dr. Karl Muck, who is due to arrive i this country on Tuesday to resume the pos of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is bringing with him three new members of the orchestra: Otto Urack, who succeeds Alwin Schroeder as first 'cellist; Maurice Koessler, one of the new first violins, and Bruno Steinke, one of the new 'cellists. Among the other newcomers will be Walther Habenichl, for the last three seasons concert master of the Keil Philharmonic Society, who will be the leader of the second violins. The wood wind will be strengthened through the coming from Paris of Albert Chevrot, flutist, and Peirre Fosse, oboeist.

The fifty-fifth annual festival of the Wor-

From AMERICAN
Address New York
Date

DR. MUCK HERE NEXT WEEK

Dr. Karl Muck, the new director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, after twenty years' activity as conductor of the Imperial Opera in Berlin, will leave for Boston at the end of September. The Berlin Royal Opera has granted Dr. Muck leave of absence for the last months of his contract.

From TIMES
Address: New York
Date

Dr. Muck on His Way to America.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BERLIN, Sept. 28.—Dr. Karl Muck, recently the conductor of the Kaiser's royal opera, arrives in New York on Tuesday aboard the Kronprincessin Cecilie to take up his duties as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.
Date SEP 29 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Dr. Karl Muck, who is coming to America to resume the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Bremen on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie, and is due to arrive here on Tuesday. He is bringing with him three new members of the orchestra—Otto Urack, who succeeds Alwin Schroeder at the first desk of the 'cellists; Maurice Koessler, one of the new first violins, and Bruno Steinke, one of the new 'cellists.

Otto Urack brings to America with him an enviable reputation as a 'cellist, musician and conductor. For several seasons he has been principal 'cellist of the Festival Orchestra of Bayreuth, and has done much operatic and concert conducting in the lower Rhenish cities.

Among the newcomers that the orchestra will have this year is Walther Habenichl. Mr. Habenichl comes to Boston to be the leader of the second violins.

The wood wind section will be strengthened through the coming from Paris of Albert Chevrot, flutist, and Pierre Fossé, oboist. Both these musicians are young men and winners of the first prize in the Paris Conservatoire.

The plans for the season of the orchestra are now complete. The season begins in Boston with the first public rehearsal on Friday, October 11, and ends with the last concert on May 3. Between those two dates 110 concerts will be given, eight less than last year. The orchestra is called together for its first rehearsal on Monday, October 7.

Subscribers to the New York concerts who have not already paid for their tickets have until next Tuesday, October 1, in which to do so, the tickets now being at the box office of Carnegie Hall awaiting them. Such tickets as are not taken up by that date will be placed on public sale next Monday, October 7, at the box office of Carnegie Hall. There will be no soloists at the first pair of concerts in November.

From TIMES
Address: New York
Date SEP 29 1912

Dr. Carl Muck, who is coming to America to resume the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Bremen last Tuesday on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie and is due to arrive here on Tuesday next. He is bringing with him ew members of the orchestra—Otto who succeeds Alwin Schroeder at st desk of the 'cellists; Maurice r, one of the new first violins, and Steinke, one of the new 'cellists. Jrack for several seasons has been l 'cellist of the Festival Orchestra uth, and has done much operatic ncert conducting in the lower cities. Among the newcomers Boston Symphony Orchestra will is year is Walter Habenichl, for three seasons concert master of l Philharmonic Orchestra. Mr. il comes to Boston to be the the second violins. ood-wind section will be strengthened through the coming from Paris of Albert Chevrot, flutist, and Pierre Fossé, oboeist. Both these musicians are young men and winners of the first prize in the Paris Conservatoire.

The plans for the season of the orchestra are now complete. The season begins in Boston with the first public rehearsal on Friday, Oct. 11, and ends with the last concert on May 3. Between those two dates 110 concerts will be given, eight less than last year. The orchestra is called together for its first rehearsal on Monday, Oct. 7.

Subscribers to the New York concerts who have not already paid for their tickets have until next Tuesday, Oct. 1, in which to do so, the tickets now being at the box office of Carnegie Hall awaiting them. Such tickets as are not taken up by that date will be placed on public sale next Monday, Oct. 7, at the box office of Carnegie Hall. There will be no soloists at the first pair of concerts in November.

* *

, 1884

From EVG. SUN
Address: New York
Date 28 1912

Music and Musicians

Gatti, Alda, Gadski and Muck All on Next Tuesday's Line From Europe—Calve Arrives for a Tour.

From the Metropolitan Opera House to-day, it was announced that the general manager of that instituti[illegible] Giulio Gatti-Casazza, and [illegible] wife, F[illegible]ces Alda, are passengers f[illegible] Europ[illegible]n the Kronprinzessin Cec[illegible] due n[illegible]t Tuesday in New York. Mr[illegible]atti is to[illegible]en the grand opera season on [illegible]v. 11, [illegible]h a revival of either "Flauto Ma[illegible]co" o[illegible]li Ugonotti," in honor of that ra[illegible]birds [illegible]ong the stars, a coloratura sopra[illegible] It[illegible]ms probable now, that Meyerb[illegible]s [illegible]ork, and not Mozart's will be ul[illegible]y chosen.

With the Gattis on [illegible]uesday's liner are both Johanna Gads[illegible]he opera, who returns largely for a c[illegible]rt tour, and Karl Muck, who comes [illegible] Berlin to be permanent conductor of [illegible]oston Symphony Orchestra. Mean[illegible]e another famous arrival was announ[illegible]to-day.

Emma Calvé, the great F[illegible]ch Carmen, with her husband, Sign[illegible]Galileo Gasparri, a young Italian tenor, was due to-day aboard the Martha Washington.

It is the thirty-second season of Boston's famous orchestra that Dr. Karl Muck is coming to America to conduct. He sailed from Bremen, bringing three members of the band. They are Otto Urack, who succeeds Alwin Schroeder as first 'cellist; Bruno Steinke, another new 'cellist, and Maurice Koessler, one of the new first violins.

Boston's season of 110 concerts begins Oct. 11, and ends May 3. Subscribers to the New York concerts have until next Tuesday to retain their places at Carnegie Hall.

Besides a work by the latest lion of Paris, much other music is announced by Walter Damrosch fo[illegible] the New York Symphony Society's [illegible]venty-four concerts [illegible]the new Aeoli[illegible] Hall. With [illegible]nelli's "[illegible]ebes," the other novelties [illegible]lude "[illegible]Page from Homer," by Rimsky-[illegible]orsa[illegible]ff, the St. Cecilia women's choru[illegible]isting; a "Suite Enfantine" called "[illegible] Mere Oye" or "Mother Goose," by R[illegible]d a "Fairy Tale," by Victor Kol[illegible]for s[illegible]eral years a member of the D[illegible]rosch o[illegible]estra. On Nov. 17, there [illegible] be a Ma[illegible]net memorial with Edm[illegible] Clement as [illegible]oist.

W. B. CHASE.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

New Players in Boston Symphony's Thirty-second Season.

Dr. Karl Muck, who is to be conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Bremen on Tuesday last, on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie, and is due to arrive on Tuesday next, bringing three new members of the orchestra—Otto Urack, who succeeds Alwin Schroeder at the first desk of the cellists; Maurice Koessler, one of the new first violins, and Bruno Steinke, one of the new cellists. Mr. Urack has an enviable reputation as cellist, musician and conductor. For several seasons he has been principal cellist of the Festival Orchestra of Bayreuth, and has done much operatic and concert conducting in the lower Rhenish cities.

Among the new comers to the Boston Symphony will be Walther Habenichl, for the last three seasons concertmaster of the Keil Philharmonic Orchestra, and now to be the leader of the second violins. The wood-wind section will be strengthened through the coming, from Paris, of Albert Chevrot, flutist, and Pierre Fosse, oboist. They are young, and were winners of the first prize in the Paris Conservatoire.

The season begins in Boston, with the first public rehearsal on Friday, October 11, and ends with the last concert on May 3. Between those dates one hundred and ten concerts will be given; eight less than last year. Subscribers to last year's concerts have until Saturday, October 19, in which to renew their subscriptions for the coming season and secure the seats occupied by them in the past. The general public sale will open at the box office, Academy of Music, on Friday, October 25.

From TIMES
Address: New York
Date Sept 29 1912

Following what has now become its established custom of having each year the exclusive services of an [illegible] of first rank as soloist at a series of its concerts, the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming season has made an arrangement whereby it brings to America, for a limited number of concerts, Fritz Kreisler, the violinist. He is to play with the orchestra in New York at both of its December concerts, and this will be his only appearance with orchestra in this city. The management of the orchestra has arranged that he shall give a recital in Aeolian Hall later in the season.

Miss Geraldine Farrar, who is announced as one of the soloists, will make her only concert appearance in New York with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

884

From SUN
Address: New York
Date SEP 29 1912

NOTES OF MUSIC EVENTS.

Dr. Karl Muck, who is coming to America to resume the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Bremen last Tuesday on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie and is due to arrive here on Tuesday next. He is bringing with him three new members of the orchestra, Otto Urack, who succeeds Alwin Schroeder at the first desk of the 'cellists; Maurice Koessler, one of the new first violins, and Bruno Steinke, one of the new 'cellists. Otto Urack brings to America an enviable reputation as a 'cellist, musician and conductor. For the past several seasons he has been principal 'cellist of the Festival Orchestra of Bayreuth and has done much operatic and concert conducting in the lower Rhenish cities. Among the newcomers that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have this year is Walther Habenicht, for the last three seasons concert master of the Kiel Philharmonic Orchestra. Mr. Habenicht comes to Boston to be the leader of the second violins. The woodwind section will be strengthened through the coming from Paris of Albert Chevrot, flutist, and Pierre Fossé, oboist. Both these musicians are young men and winners of the first prize in the Paris Conservatoire. The plans for the season of the orchestra are now complete. The season begins in Boston with the first public rehearsal on Friday, October 11, and ends with the last concert on May 3. Between those two dates 110 concerts will be given, eight less than last year. The orhestra is called together for its first rehearsal on Monday, October 7.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From
Address New York
Date

Established:

Die Mu

Von unſeren Symphonie-Ko
Marianne Brandt's „Kundry

Dr. Karl Muck, der Dirigent des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters, hat ſich auf dem letzten Dinstag von Bremen abgegangenen Dampfer „Kronprinzeſſin Cecilie“ eingeſchifft und wird kommenden Dinstag hier erwartet. Der berühmte Muſiker war ſchon früher zwei Jahre lang in Boſton thätig geweſen. In ſeiner Begleitung befinden ſich mehrere hervorragende neue Kräfte des Orcheſters, darunter der erſte Celliſt, Herr Otto Urack, der an Herrn Alwin Schröder's Stelle tritt. Herrn Urack geht der ſchmeichelhafteſte Ruf als Virtuoſe und Muſiker voran. Neu ſind ferner Herr Maurice Kößler, erſte Violine, und Bruno Steinke, Celliſt. Als Führer der zweiten Violinen wurde Herr Habenichl vom Münchener Keim-Orcheſter gewonnen. Als neue Holzbläſer wurden gewonnen die Herren Albert Chevrot, Flötiſt aus Paris, und Pierre Foſſe, Oboiſt.

Die Boſtoner Saiſon des Orcheſters beginnt am 11. Oktober und wird am 3. Mai daſelbſt zu Ende gehen. Es werden im Ganzen 110 Konzerte ſtattfinden, 8 weniger als im Vorjahr. Die alten Abonnenten der 10 New Yorker Konzerte haben bis zum 1. Oktober Zeit, ihre Sitze abholen zu laſſen. Von Montag, dem 7. Oktober, an werden die nicht abgeholten Billette an der Kaſſe von Carnegie Hall öffentlich verkauft werden. In den erſten Konzerten in New York im November werden keine Soliſten mitwirken.

From AMERICAN
Address New York
Date OCT 1 - 1912

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the usual two series of concerts in Carnegie Hall during the coming season on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons. The dates of the evening concerts are November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20. The dates of the afternoon concerts are November 9, December 7, January 11, February 22 and March 22.

The general sale of season tickets to new subscribers will open at the box office of Carnegie Hall on Monday morning, October 7.

Dr. Karl Muck, who will resume the post of conductor after an absence of four years, is due in New York tomorrow.

From EVG. SUN
Address: New York
Date [illegible]

Music and Musicians

Five Leading "Centres," and Why New York Is Two.

Speaking to the text of "The Coming Musical Season," the current bulletin of the Brooklyn Institute says this week that there is no other function in a large community which draws together a greater number of lovers of art and gives to a community a greater social solidarity than series of concerts by the best artists and by organizations giving the highest musical programmes. "Indeed," it exclaims, "the principal reason for residing in or near a large city is the opportunity to hear the best music." It goes on to declare that, both as city and borough, Brooklyn has during the past twenty-five years been one of the "five musical centres" of this country.

"When Theodore Thomas was conductor, Brooklyn supported the highest grade of orchestral concerts better than New York. Not until Major Henry L. Higginson established the Boston Symphony Orchestra a quarter of a century ago was the love of music so highly developed and attendance upon concerts so general in Boston as in either Brooklyn or New York. The removal of Thomas to Chicago twenty years ago was the means of giving to Chicago a musical standing comparable with that previously attained by New York, Boston and Brooklyn, and the establishment of a permanent orchestra in Philadelphia within the past decade has brought Philadelphia within the list of the five leading American musical centres."

It is to maintain a position among the musical centres of population that Brooklyn is urged to go forward with what she has begun in the past.

"She should continue to develop interest in music to an extent even greater than that which is possible in Boston, Manhattan or Philadelphia. We have twice the population of the metropolitan district of Boston, and the newly arrived citizens who make their home in Brooklyn are of more musical stock than those that settle in Boston. We have a larger population than Philadelphia and we have more music lovers, and more who attend first class concerts, in Brooklyn, than there are among those who reside in Manhattan."

It is added that not only do the people of Brooklyn and Long Island attend their own concerts that side of the East River, but they overflow into Manhattan, and to such an extent that the time has been that if it had not been for the Brooklyn contingent, the concerts by some veteran organizations of New York could not have been maintained.

The Philharmonic Society of New York will give two private concerts in the grand ballroom of the Waldorf-Astoria this season for members only. When Joseph Pulitzer bequeathed $1,000,000 to the oldest of America's symphony orchestras, one of the conditions of the bequest was that the organization must secure a membership of 1,000 persons paying annual dues.

It is for these members that the two private concerts are being arranged. The full strength of the orchestra will be used and a part of each programme will consist of symphonic compositions which will be heard for the first time in America.

Mme. Alda is announced as soloist of the first concert.

Johanna Gadski has been selected to open the new auditorium at Toronto on Oct. 8, which will mark the prima donna's ninth appearance in the Canadian city. The singer, who returns to America on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie, has in prospect a season more active than last year, when fifty concerts were added to her appearances at the Metropolitan. The months of October and November and three weeks of December will be required for the concert tour to California and back.

Another shorter trip is planned through the Maritime Provinces in midwinter.

W. B. CHASE.

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 5 - [illegible]

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, which are to be given in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evenings, November 6, December 4, January 8, February 17 and March 19, have until Thursday, October 10, in which to renew their subscriptions at W. A. Albaugh's ticket office, Charles and Fayette streets, and retain their old seats. The general sale to new subscribers will open at Mr. Albaugh's ticket office on Monday morning, October 14.

EVG. NEWS
ess: Baltimore, Md.
Sept 26-1912

Boston Symphony To Bring New Violinist

Following what has now become its established custom of securing the exclusive services for a series of its concerts of one of the most eminent artists before the public, the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year brings to America for a limited number of appearances, the eminent violinist, Fritz Kreisler. Aside from the recital which has been arranged for him in New York by the management of the orchestra Mr. Kreisler's only appearances in the East will be at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. He will appear with the orchestra here in Baltimore at the December concert.

From RECORD HERALD
Address: Chicago, Ill.
Date [illegible]

THE ORCHESTRA SOLOISTS.

The soloists which have been chosen to appear this season at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston include a number of those who will also appear under the direction of Mr. Stock at Orchestra Hall. Of these the most important will be Miss Culp, mezzo-soprano; Eugene Ysaye, violinist; Leopold Godowsky, pianist, and Miss Germaine Schnitzer, pianist. Among the visiting singers whose voices will be heard in Symphony Hall, Boston, will be Miss Maggie Teyte of the Chicago Opera Company. The last named artist will, however, not be making her first appearance in the eastern city, for Miss Teyte gave a recital of French songs in Boston last season. Mr. Parker, music critic of the Transcript, asserts that "at that time she seemed a curious and vivid personality, with an unusual and sometimes a fascinating voice, and with no little understanding and sense of style in the singing of ultra-modern French music."

The interest of the Boston soloists will, however, be discounted to a certain extent by the greater interest which will be centered in the reappearance of the conductor, Dr. Muck, who left America in 1908, and, his contract in Berlin having expired, now returns to it for a period of five years at least. It is rumored in Boston that his connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be made permanent.

From INQUIRER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date [illegible]

MADE A NOTE OF

The works to be sung this season by the Choral Society are: The Requiem Mass, Verdi; the Messiah, Haendel; the New Life, Wolf-Ferrari. One hundred more members are desired.

The Kneibel Quartet announces a series of three recitals during the winter to be given in Witherspoon Hall on Friday evening, November 1, and Thursday eveningss, January 30 and April 10.

Mrs. Helen Pulaski Innes during the coming season will direct the Matinee Musical Choral, the Choral Club, besides two amateur opera societies.

Following what has now become its established habit of securing the exclusive services for a series of its concerts of one of the most eminent artists before the public, the Boston Smyphony Orchestra this year brings to America, for a limited number of appearances, the eminent violinist, Mr. Fritz Kreisler. Aside from the recital which has been arranged for him in New York by the management of the orchestra, Mr. Kreisler's only appearances in the East will be at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. He will appear with the orchestra here in Philadelphia at the December concert.

The Philadelphia Boys' Orchestra, under the direction of John Curtis, Jr., resumed rehearsals last Thursday and about 45 boys repeated. Through the kindness of the Philadelphia Operatic Society the rehearsals are held in Opera Hall, eighth floor, Parkway Building, Broad and Cherry streets, on Friday evenings at 8 o'clock. The orchestra now numbers forty-five, but it is the desire of the conductor to increase it to sixty pieces. All boys under 19 years of age playing an instrument and desiring to join the orchestra should [illegible]

From EVG. MAIL
Address: New York.
Date OCT 3 -

By EMILIE

Establis

East and West the musical season is open, but New York's season is still a sealed book, not to be opened fully until November. Every steamer brings musical favorites from abroad, but these hurry to other cities, where they open their seasons.

Rudolf Ganz and Riccardo Martin, Swiss pianist and Metropolitan tenor, will give a series of concerts, opening in the far West. Mme. Gadski left Tuesday for the West for recitals, while Mme. Alda, who with her husband, Mr. Gatti-Casazza, arrived on the same boat, leaves at once on a concert tour which will keep her away until opera opens here.

Dr. Carl Muck arrived Tuesday and left at once for Boston, where he will resume direction of the Symphony Orchestra after several years spent in Berlin and Bayreuth. The orchestra's season opens October 11 in Boston and here in November. With Dr. Muck came Otto Urack, who succeeds Alwin Schroeder in the orchestra; Maurice Koessler, new violinist, and Bruno Steinke, new 'cellist.

Mr. Urack has been principal 'cellist of the Bayreuth orchestra and has done operatic and concert conducting in Rhenish cities. Walther Habeniehl, for three seasons concert master of the Keim Philharmonic Orchestra, goes to Boston, second violin leader. The woodwinds will be strengthened by Albert Chevrot, flute, and Pierre Fosse, oboe, both of Paris.

Walter Rothwell arrived this week and remained in New York to select several musicians for his St. Paul orchestra.

Leopold Stokovski and Mme. Samaroff-Stokovski arrived this week and went to Philadelphia, where Mr. Stokovski assumes direction of the symphony orchestra.

From EVG. SUN
Address: New York
Date OCT - 1912

1884

While the season sale of tickets for the Boston Symphony concerts in New York will open at the box office of Carnegie Hall next Monday morning, the town of Boston is already celebrating the return, after long absence, of its own favorite. Conductor Dr. Carl Muck came back aboard the Kronprinzesin Cecilie, where he was a fellow passenger with Mr. Gatti. The return of Dr. Muck as permanent conductor of the Hub's orchestra has been eagerly looked forward to since he left Boston in the spring of 1908.

Bostonians are saying that the two seasons under this distinguished musician were in many respects the most memorable in their history. When he came to Boston in the fall of 1906, he found, in the words of the first critics there, "a wonderful instrument which needed only the vivifying impulse of genius to make it perfect." This he brought to the orchestra, they declared, and the keen regret caused by his departure in the spring of 1908 was tempered by his promise to return at the end of his engagement with the Royal Opera of Berlin.

This time has come and for several years Boston will be his home and America the field of his artistic work.

From TIMES
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 5 1912

k, 1884

Dr. Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in Boston last Tuesday, and Monday the regular rehearsals of the orchestra begin, with the first concert next Saturday evening. The five dates of the orchestra in Brooklyn are: November 8, December 6, January 10, February 21 and March 21, and the soloists are Fritz Kreisler, Elena Gerhardt, Pauer and Otto Urack. Dr. Muck is not particularly enthusiastic on the subject of novelties. He said that he failed to see the wisdom of wasting the time of the orchestra, and trying the patience of the audiences with novelties whose only merit consisted in the fact that they were novelties. This, he said, applied to a very considerable part of the music which is being published today. He has, however, some new works which he will try in Boston, and very likely if they have success there he will include them in his Brooklyn concerts. Among them is a symphony by Landval, a new piece by Reger, and a Humoresque by the Bohemian Mrasek.

Mme. Marie Rappold, who has spent the summer in Italy, will begin her concert season at the Maine music festival the coming week. Mme. Rappold's Brooklyn friends will be glad to learn that she will be heard with the New York Philharmonic Society this winter

---

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From Address PHILADELPHIA
Date OCT 5

Music Notes

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Philadelphia concerts this season will be given at the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17. The orchestra will again be conducted by Dr. Muck, who returns after an absence of four years.

Establi ... New York, 1884

From EVG. SUN
Address: New York
Date OCT 5 1912

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Some Early Events of the Coming Concert Season.

1884

With a short month to spare before the first New York visits, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is opening a new season in its home town to-night. At a public rehearsal there yesterday an audience for the first time greeted the return of Conductor Karl Muck, whose popularity here in the years 1906-1908 has at last occasioned the famous "baton prima donna's" recall from the Kaiser's opera in Berlin.

Among other newcomers, the Boston Symphony men now have Walter Habenichl, for three years concertmaster at Kiel, who comes to Boston to be the leader of the second violins. To the woodwinds are added Albert Chevrot, flute, and Pierre Fossé, oboe, both prize winners of the Paris Conservatoire.

The Bostonians' season ticket sale for New York opens on Monday at Carnegie Hall.

The First Established
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From
Address [illegible]
Date [illegible]

Esta ... 884

The 32nd season of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin on Tuesday evening, Oct. 22, at 8:15 o'clock, with Dr. Karl Muck again conducting. The other concerts will be given on Tuesday evenings, Nov. 19, Dec. 31, Feb. 4 and April 1, and the assisting artists will be Madame Marie Rappold, soprano; Mr. Fritz Kreisler, violinist; Miss Elena Gerhardt, soprano; Mr. Norman Wilks, pianist, and Miss Julia Culp, mezzo-soprano.

From
Address [illegible]
Date OCT 5

Establis ... 4

Dr. Karl Muck, who this season resumes the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived last Tuesday on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie, after an absence of four years, bringing with him three new members of the orchestra, Otto Urack, who succeeds Alwin Schroeder at the first desk of the 'cellist; Maurice Koessler, one of the new first violins, and Bruno Steinke, one of the new 'cellists.

Otto Urack has an enviable reputation as a 'cellist, musician and conductor. For the past few seasons he has been principal 'cellist of the Festival Orchestra of Bayreuth, and has done much operatic and concert conducting in the lower Rhenish cities.

Among the newcomers that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have this year is Walther Habenichl, for the last three seasons concertmaster of the Keil Philharmonic Orchestra. Habenichl comes to Boston to be the leader of the second violins. The woodwind section will be strengthened through the coming from Paris of Albert Chevriot, flutist, and Pierre Fosse, oboist. Both these musicians are young men and are winners of the first prize in the Paris Conservatoire.

The plans for the season of the Orchestra are now complete. The season begins in Boston with the first public rehearsal on Friday, October 11, and ends with the last concert on May 3. Between those two dates 110 concerts will be given—eight less than last year. The Orchestra is called together for its first rehearsal on Monday, October 7.

The Orchestra will give its usual series of five evening concerts in this city at the Academy of Music during the coming season on Monday evenings, November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17. The list of soloists includes Mme. Matzenauer, the eminent contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The People's Choral Union will not

From NEWS
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date OCT 5 - 1912

Establishe

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony orchestra concerts, which are to be given in Infantry hall on Tuesday evenings, Oct. 22, Nov. 19, Dec. 31, Feb. 4, and April 1, have until Saturday, Oct. 12, in which to renew their subscriptions at Steinert's and retain their old seats. The general sale to new subscribers will open at M. Steinert & Sons, on Monday morning, Oct. 14.

Dr. Muck, who returns this year to be the conductor of the orchestra fr at least the next five years, arrived in New York on Tuesday. He went directly to Boston, where his first care will be to settle his new home in that city. Dr. Muck said that he was not ready to make any definite announcements of his plans for the coming season. He ... the orchestra for four years, and work was to get in touch with the Dr. Muck was not particularly ... astic on the subject of novelties ... that he failed to see the wisdom ... ing the time of the orchestra and the patience of the audiences with ... ties whose only merit consiste ... fact that they were novelties. ... said, applied to a very considera ... of the music which is being publi ... day.

He has, however, some new ... which he will try in Boston, and ... likely, if they have success there, ... include them in his Providence ... Among them is a symphony by Le ... new piece by Reger, and a humores ... the Bohemian, Mrazek.

From GLOBE
Address: New York
Date OCT 5 - 1912

Establis

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The general season sale of tickets for the two series of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall during the coming winter opens at the box office of Carnegie Hall Monday morning. As in the past, there will be five Thursday evening concerts and five Saturday matinées, the dates being Nov. 7 and 9, Dec. 5 and 7, Jan. 9 and 11, Feb. 20 and 22, and March 20 and 22.

The names of three soloists are announced in the New York prospectus of the orchestra—Miss Geraldine Farrar and Miss Matzenauer of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Fritz Kreisler. Miss Farrar's only concert appearance in New York, it is announced, will be with the orchestra, and Mr. Kreisler will be heard here only with the orchestra. This distinguished violinist comes to America this year under exclusive contract, which precludes his appearances under any other auspices than those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and, therefore, the only opportunity to hear him will be at the December concerts of this organization.

The return of Dr. Muck as permanent conductor of the orchestra has been eagerly looked forward to since he left Boston, in the spring of 1908. The keen regret caused by his departure was tempered by his promise to return at the end of his engagement with the Royal Opera of Berlin. That time has come, and for several years Boston will be his home and America the field of his artistic work.

A number of changes have been made in the personnel since last season. Several of the older members have retired for age; others have left to go to other fields of work. The engagement of musicians to fill these vacancies has been Dr. Muck's chief care since last spring, and as a result a number of eminent artists are being brought to America.

These include two for the first violin section Eduard Tak, who has been first concert master of the Pittsburgh Orchestra and of the San Francisco Orchestra, and Maurice Koessler, who comes from the Royal Orchestra of Berlin; a new leader of the second violins, Walther Habenicht, who for the past several years has been first concert master of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Kiel; a new 'cellist to share the first desk of the 'cello section with Heinrich Warnke—Otto Urack, solo 'cellist of the Festival Orchestra of Bayreuth; a new oboist, Pierre Fossé of Paris; a new flutist, Albert Chevrot of Paris; a new bassoonist, Max Fuhrmann. The other vacancies have been filled by musicians who are believed to be amply able to maintain the high traditions of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

So far as Dr. Muck's plans are concerned, it may be said that he proposes introducing a number of important novelties, but he will not by any means neglect the great classics of musical literature.

From TELEGRAPH
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 5 - 1912

Establi

Dr. Karl Muck, who is coming to America to resume the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is bringing three new members of the orchestra, Otto Urack, who succeeds Alwin Schroeder at the first desk of the 'cellists; Maurice Koessler, one of the new first violins, and Bruno Steinke, one of the new 'cellists. Mr. Urack for the past several seasons has been principal 'cellist of the Festival Orchestra of Bayreuth. Among newcomers to the organization is Walther Habenicht, for the last three seasons concertmaster of the Keil Philharmonic Orchestra, who comes as leader of the second violins. The wood-wind section will be strengthened through the coming from Paris of Albert Chevrot, flutist, and Pierre Fosse, oboist, both young men and winners of the first prize in the Conservatoire. Local subscribers to last year's concerts have until Wednesday, October 9, in which to renew their subscriptions for their accustomed

[32]

From EVG. NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 5 1912

Esta 1884

SYMPHONY PATRONS CAN GET OLD SEATS

Subscriptions To Be Opened To Them Before To The Public.

Last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, which are to be given this season in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evenings, November 6, December 4, January 8, February 17 and March 19, have until Thursday, October 10, to renew their subscriptions at W. A. Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette streets, and retain their old seats. The general sale to new subscribers will open Monday morning, October 14.

Dr. Muck, who returns this year to be the conductor of the orchestra for at least the next five years, arrived in New York last Tuesday. He went directly to Boston. Dr. Muck said that he was not ready to make any definite announcements of his plans for the coming season. He has been away from the Orchestra for four years, and his first work was to get in touch with the men. Moreover, with 16 new members there was a certain amount of preliminary work necessary to get it into smooth running order.

Dr. Muck was not particularly enthusiastic on the subject of novelties. He said that he failed to see the wisdom of wasting the time of the Orchestra and trying the patience of the audiences with novelties whose only merit consisted of the fact that they were novelties. This, he said, applied to a very considerable part of the music which is being published today. He has, however, some new works which he will try in Boston, and very likely if they have success there he will include them in his Baltimore concerts. Among them is a symphony by Lendvai, a new piece by Reger and a humoresque by the Bohemian Mrazek.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 6 1912

of the Caucasus at first hand.

* * *

Last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts which are to be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17 have until Wednesday, October 9, in which to renew their subscriptions at Miss Harris' ticket office, Heppe's Piano Rooms, and retain their old seats. The general sale to new subscribers will open at Miss Harris' ticket office on Monday morning, October 14.

Doctor Muck, who returns this year to be the conductor of the orchestra for at least the next five years, arrived in New York last Tuesday on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie. He went directly to Boston where his first care will be to settle his new home in that city. Doctor Muck said that he was not ready to make any definite announcements of his plans for the coming season; he had been away from the orchestra for four years, and his first work was to get in touch with the men. Moreover, with 16 new members, there was a certain amount of preliminary work necessary to get it into smooth running order.

Doctor Muck was not particularly en-enthusiastic on the subject of novelties. He said that he failed to see the wisdom of wasting the time of the orchestra and trying the patience of the audiences with novelties whose only merit consisted of the fact that they were novelties. This, he said, applied to a very considerable part of the music which is being published today. He has, however, some new works which he will try in Boston and probably if they have success there he will include them in his Philadelphia concerts. Among them is a symphony by Lendvai, a new work by Reger, and a humoresque by the Bohemian Mrazek.

Williams the well-known

E 884

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

TRIBUNE
From
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date OCT 6

Estab 4

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLANS.

Dr. Muck's Announcements for Providence Concerts.

Last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, which are to be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evenings, Oct. 22, Nov. 19, Dec. 31, Feb. 4. and April 1, have until Saturday, Oct. 12, in which to renew their subscriptions at M. Steinert's, 505 Westminster street, and retain their old seats. The general sale of new subscribers will open at M. Steinert & Sons on Monday morning, Oct. 14.

Dr. Muck, who returns this year to be the conductor of an orchestra for at least the next five years, arrived in New York last Tuesday on the Kronprinzessin Cecelia. He went directly to Boston, where his first care will be to settle his new home in that city. Dr. Muck said that he was not ready to make any definite announcements of his plans for the coming season; he had been away from the orchestra for four years, and his first work was to get in touch with the men. Moreover, with 16 new members there was a certain amount of preliminary work necessary to get it into smooth running order.

Dr. Muck was not particularly enthusiastic on the subject of novelties. He said he failed to see the wisdom of wasting the time of the orchestra and trying the patience of the audience with novelties. This, he said, applied to a very considerable part of the music which is being published to-day. He has, however, some new works which he will try in Boston and very likely if they have success there he will include them in his Providence concerts. Among them is a symphony by Lendvai, a new piece by Reger and a Humoresque by the Bohemian Mrazek.

PRESS
From
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 6 1912

* * *

Esta 1884

Last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, which are to be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17, and March 17, have until Wednesday, October 9, in which to renew their subscriptions at Miss Harris' Ticket Office, Heppe's Piano Rooms, and retain their old seats. The general sale to new subscribers will open at Miss Harris' Ticket Office, on Monday morning, October 14.

Dr. Muck, who returns this year to be the conductor of the orchestra, for at least the next five years, arrived in New York last Tuesday on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie. He went directly to Boston, where his first care will be settle his new home in that city. Dr. Muck said that he was not ready to make any definite announcements of his plans for the coming season.

Dr. Muck was not particularly enthusiastic on the subject of novelties. He said that he failed to see the wisdom of wasting the time of the orchestra and trying the patience of the audiences with novelties whose only merit consisted of the fact that they were novelties. This he said applied to a very considerable part of the music which is being published to-day. He has, however, some new works which he will try in Boston and very likely if they have success there he will include them in his Philadelphia concerts. Among them is a symphony by Lendvai, a new piece by Reger and a Humoresque by the Bohemian Mrazek.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 6 1912

Estal 884

Last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts which are to be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17, have until Wednesday, October 9, in which to renew subscriptions at Miss Harris' ticket office, No. 1117 Chestnut street. The general sale to new subscribers will open on Monday morning, October 14.

Dr. Karl Muck, who returns this year to be the conductor of the orchestra, for at least the next five years, arrived in New York last Tuesday. He went directly to Boston. He was not ready to make any definite announcements of his plans for the season. With 16 new members there is a certain amount of preliminary work necessary to get the orchestra into smooth running order. Dr. Muck was not particularly enthusiastic on the subject of novelties. He said that he failed to see the wisdom of wasting the time of the orchestra and trying the patience of audiences with novelties whose only merit consisted of the fact that they were novelties. He has, however, some new works which he will try in Boston and very likely if they have success there he will include them in his Philadelphia concerts. Among them is a symphony by Lendvai, a new piece by Reger and a humoresque by the Bohemian, Mrazek.

CITIZENS
From
Address Brooklyn, N. Y. OCT 5 1912
Date

rk 188

Dr. Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in Boston last Tuesday and Monday the regular rehearsals of the orchestra will begin, with the first concert next Saturday evening. The five dates of the orchestra in Brooklyn are Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan-10, Feb. 21 and March 21, and the soloists are to be Fritz Kreisler, Elena Gerhardt, Pauer and Otto Urack. Professor Hooper, of the Brooklyn Institute, has charge of these concerts, reports that the prospects are favorable for even a more successful season in Brooklyn than last year. Dr. Muck said Tuesday that he was not ready to make any definite announcements of his plans for the coming season, as he had to get in touch with the men. Moreover, and with sixteen new members there was a certain amount of preliminary work necessary to get it into smooth running order.

Dr. Muck was not particularly enthusiastic on the subject of novelties. He said that he failed to see the wisdom of wasting the time of the orchestra and trying the patience of the audiences with novelties whose only merit consistsed in the fact that they were novelties. This he said applied to a very considerable part of the music which is being published to-day. He has, however, some new works which he will try in Boston, and very likely if they have success there he will include them in his Brooklyn concerts. Among them is a symphony by Lendvai, a new piece by Roger and a humoresque by the Bohemian Mrazek.

From EVG. MAIL
Address: New York.
Date OCT 5 1912

Establ 4

As in the past there will be five Thursday evening concerts and five Saturday matinees by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. the dates being November 7 and 9, December 5 and 7, January 9 and 11, February 20 and 22 and March 20 and 22.

The soloists to be heard in New York are Miss Geraldine Farrar and Madame Matzenauer, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Fritz Kreisler. Miss Farrar's only concert appearance in New York will be with the orchestra, and Mr. Kreisler will be heard here only with the orchestra.

The return of Dr. Muck, as permanent conductor of the orchestra, has been eagerly looked forward to since he left Boston in the spring of 1908. The two seasons under this distinguished musician were in many respects the most memorable in its history.

A number of changes have been made in the personnel since last season.

The Philharmonic Society will pro-

Newspap

From
Address: New York City.
Date 1912

Es 884

Der allgemeine Billetverkauf für die zwei Serien der Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzerte in Carnegie Hall beginnt morgen Vormittag an den Kaſſen von Carnegie Hall. Es ſind wieder 5 Donnerstag-Abend- und fünf Samstag-Matinees. Die Namen von drei Soliſten wurden bisher bekannt gegeben, und zwar ſind es die Damen Farrar und Matzenauer und Herr Kreisler. Die Rückkehr von Dr. Carl Muck, der nach vierjähriger Abweſenheit wieder ſeinen Platz an der Spitze des berühmten Orcheſters einnehmen wird, iſt geeignet, alle Freunde dieſer Vereinigung auf das Höchſte zu intereſſiren. Dr. Muck ſtellt eine lange Reihe intereſſanter Novitäten in Ausſicht, wird jedoch die großen Klaſſiker der Muſikliteratur nicht vernachläſſigen. Im Perſonalbeſtand des Orcheſters ſind ziemlich bedeutende Veränderungen vor ſich gegangen, indem mehrere Mitglieder wegen vorgerückten Alters abgegangen ſind. Als Erſatzmänner wurde eine Reihe der hervorragendſten Künſtler gewonnen, und zwar hat Dr. Muck ſeit längerer Zeit dieſer Angelegenheit ſeine größte Aufmerkſamkeit gewidmet. Man iſt da ganz im Einklange mit den Ideen des verſtorbenen Gründers des Boſtoner Orcheſters nach dem Grundſatze vorgegangen, daß das Beſte gerade gut genug ſei, wenn es ſich um den Glanz der Boſtoner handelt.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address New York.
Date OCT 1 - 1912
Established:

Many Notables Arrive Here After Vacation in Europe

Mr. and Mrs. Daniel G. Reid and Mrs. George J. Gould and Family Among Them.

THREE GRAND OPERA STARS RETURN FOR THE SEASON

Dr. Carl Muck, Who Will Conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra on Board.

With many notable persons included in her full passenger list, the North German Lloyd steamship Kronprinzessin Cecilie arrived to-day at her Hoboken pier, bringing home prominent Americans who have spent the summer abroad and are returning to resume their social and business activities for the winter.

Among those on board was Mrs. George J. Gould, who was returning after being present at the christening of Lady Decies' daughter, her grandchild, in England.

There were several opera and concert singers on board the Kronprinzessin Cecilie. Mr. Giulio Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera House, returned on the same vessel with the song birds. Among the returning singers were Mme. Alda, Mme. Marie Rappold and Mme. Johanna Gadski.

Dr. and Mrs. Carl Muck were among other arrivals on board of interest to followers of the music world. He will go to Boston, where he will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra the coming season.

Mr. Arthur C. Train, the novelist and magazine writer, was another passenger. While he has been abroad with his wife he has collected material for several new novels.

Mr. Isaac Guggenheim, the financier and mine owner, was also among those to arrive. Others of note included Mr. and Mrs. Louis Gimbel, Mr. and Mrs. M. W. Baker, Mr. and Mrs. N. F. Brady, Mr. Eugene Delano, Mr. Walter J. M. Donovan, Mr. and Mrs. Eberhard Faber, Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Grunwald and Mr. and Mrs. J. S. Josephs.

Several well known Boston persons were also among the arrivals, among them being Mr. and Mrs. Albert C. Burrage, Miss Elizabeth Burrage, Mr. Albert C. Burrage, Jr., and Mrs. Francis Hathaway Burrage, Jr.

Mr. Daniel G. Reid, the well known financier, and Mrs. Reid were among the other passengers. They returned to take up their residence here again.

MME. MARIE RAPPOLD.

MRS. GEORGE JAY GOULD
FROM HER LATEST PORTRAIT
PHOTO COPYRIGHT 1908 BY MARCEAU

MME. JOHANNA GADSKI
COPYRIGHT 1911 BY AIMÉ DUPONT

MME. FRANCES ALDA
PHOTO BY BARON DE MEYER

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From REVUE
Address New York
Date

Dr. Carl Muck.

General = Muſikdirektor Dr. Karl Muck, der wieder als Leiter dem Boſton Symphonie Orcheſter vorſtehen wird, iſt in New York eingetroffen und hat ſich nach kurzem Aufenthalte nach Boſton begeben, wo ihm ein überaus herzlicher Empfang bereitet wurde. Die Boſtonians haben auch alle Urſache ſich über die Wiederkehr von Dr. Muck, der ſchon einmal in den Jahren 1906—1908, das Orcheſter dirigirte, geſchmeichelt zu fühlen, denn er erklärte ausdrücklich, daß ihn nicht etwa materieller Vortheil zur Annahme ſeiner Stellung in Boſton bewogen habe, ſondern daß für ihn nur künſtleriſche Rückſichten hierbei in Frage gekommen wären. Was er hier verdiene, das könnte er auch in Deutſchland, vielleicht ſogar noch mehr verdienen, aber es gäbe nur ein Boſton Symphonie Orcheſter, und an deſſen Spitze zu ſtehen, das hätte ihn allerdings gereizt, und ſo hat er die Einwendungen ſelbſt des Kaiſers unbeachtet gelaſſen. Man ſpricht davon, daß Dr. Karl Muck ein Jahresgehalt von $35,000 bezöge.

Dr. Muck hat ſeine Gattin mit herübergebracht, und führte an der Leine einen Bullterrier, der in Boſton geboren, dem berühmten Muſiker von einem ſeiner Verehrer geſchenkt wurde. Jetzt iſt das Thier zu einem ſtattlichen Exemplar ſeiner Raſſe herangewachſen, und kehrt als Ausgereifter in ſeine Vaterſtadt wieder zurück.

Esta 1884

From HERALD
Address: New York
Dat

Now that Dr. Karl Muck, this season's conductor of the Boston Symphony, has arrived in Boston, some details are made public of the concerts of that orchestra. It will give the usual ten concerts in New York at Carnegie Hall, five Thursday evenings and as many Saturday matinees. One of the features will be the appearance as soloist of Mr. Fritz Kreisler, violinist, who comes to America solely for a tournee with this orchestra and will be heard here December 5 and 7. Other soloists will be Miss Geraldine Farrar and Mme. Matzenauer, both of the Metropolitan Opera House.

Dr. Muck now becomes permanent conductor of this orchestra, having severed his connection with the Berlin Royal Opera, where he was conductor. He is not a stranger here, for he conducted the Boston Orchestra in 1906 and 1907. His programmes this season will not slight the classics, but will also include many important novelties.

Es 884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau
From AMERICAN
Address New York
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Announcements of the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra state that the New York series of five evening and five afternoon events will be given at Carnegie Hall, as heretofore, the first concert to take place on the evening of November 7. But three soloists are mentioned in the prospectus, Miss Geraldine Farrar, Mme. Margarete Matzenauer and Fritz Kreisler. Dr. Muck will return to the leader's desk after an absence of five years, and with the re-entrance of that able conductor many important changes in the personnel of the orchestra will be made. Several of the older members have been retired because of age, and almost every choir has been strengthened. Dr. Muck has devoted considerable time during the Summer seeking for worthy novelties, which he purposes presenting throughout the season.

E , 1884

From STANDARD UNION
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 6 1912
Estab

Dr. Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in Boston last Tuesday and to-morrow the regular rehearsals of the Orchestra begin, with the first concert next Saturday evening. The five dates of the Orchestra in Brooklyn are Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Feb. 21 and March 21, and the soloists are Fritz Kreisler, Elena Gerhardt, Pauer and Otto Urack. Prof. Hooper, of the Institute of Arts and Sciences, who has had charge of these concerts, reports that the prospects are favorable for even a more successful season in Brooklyn than last year. Dr. Muck went directly to Boston where his first care will be to settle his new home in that city. Dr. Muck said that he was not ready to make any definite announcements of his plans for the coming season; he had to get in touch with the men. Moreover, with sixteen new members there was a certain amount of preliminary work necessary to get it into smooth running order. He was not particularly enthusiastic on the subject of novelties. He said that he failed to see the wisdom of wasting the time of the orchestra and trying the patience of the audiences with novelties whose only merit consisted in the fact that they were novelties. This he said applied to a very considerable part of the music which is being published to-day. He has, however, some new works which he will try in Boston, and very likely if they have success there he will include them in his Brooklyn concerts. Among them is a symphony by Lendvai, a new piece by Reger, and a humoresque by the Bohemian,

---

From SUN
Address: New York
Date

NOTES OF MUSIC EVENTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in he thirty-second season of its career in Boston and the twenty-seventh season of its concerts in New York, will make its usual five monthly visits to this city during the coming winter, giving two concerts in Carnegie Hall each time. The dates of the concerts are November 7 and 9, December 5 and 7, January 9 and 11, February 20 and 22 and March 20 and 22, the evening concerts falling on Thursdays and the afternoon concerts on Saturdays. New York's steadily increasing patronage of these Boston Symphony concerts has been a source of great gratification, not merely to the orchestra itself but to its many friends and admirers. For the last five or six seasons there has hardly been a concert given here when every seat in Carnegie Hall was not sold, and this condition promises to hold during the coming winter, for the subscription is larger than ever, and from present indications there will be few if any tickets to be sold for the single concerts. The return of Dr. Karl Muck as conductor of the orchestra is an event which has been awaited with much eagerness. The general opinion seems to be that during the seasons of 1906 and 1907 and 1907 and 1908, when he was at the head of the orchestra, the Boston Symphony concerts reached the highest level of their history, and now that he is returning for a term of years even finer results may be looked for.

Est 84

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. OCT 7 1912
Date

MUSICAL MOMENTS

Dr. Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in Boston last Tuesday and was not enthusiastic on the subject of novelties. He said that he failed to see the wisdom of wasting the time of the orchestra and trying the patience of audiences with mere novelties. This he said applied to a very considerable part of the music now published. He has, however, new compositions which he will try in Boston and very likely, if they have success there, he will include them in his Brooklyn concerts. Among them is a symphony by Lendvai, a new piece by Reger and a Humoresque by the Bohemian, Mrazek.

rk, 1884

From EVG. JOURNAL
Address: New York
Date OCT 7 - 1912

The announcement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its New York concerts will gladden the eyes of the genuine music lover. The concerts will take place at Carnegie Hall, as heretofore, and the first pair are scheduled for November 7 and 9. Miss Geraldine Farrar, Fritz Kreisler and Mme. Mathilde Matzenauer are to be among the soloists. The orchestra this year will be conducted by Dr. Karl Muck, who has slightly changed its personnel, with younger men generally taking the vacant places.

Esta 1884

From EVG. SUN
Address: New York
Date OCT 8 - 1912

Established

Music and Musicians

The Brothers Heck Open Box Office for the Muses Nine and the Bluestockinged Yankees Leagues Away.

There was a difference between the two crowds that stood in line to buy tickets yesterday for the two most famous aggregations of Bostonians coming to give performances in New York. There was a reason, too. For while the wonderful "mile of fans" of a world's series at the baseball Olympus was not repeated where the musical fraternity rushed in at Carnegie Hall, the fact was that as far as the annual Boston Symphony subscription is concerned, there isn't any more space to sell from year to year than the few seats given up by Manhattan's most musical old families. Where few die and none resign, it's little enough is left to be handed to lucky new comers or transferred as heirlooms to the next of kin.

To descend neither from the sublime to the redsox nor from the bluestocking to the "mile of fans," some dusky guardian of Fifty-seventh street's artistic lobby doors might as well polish off the old "Standing Room Only" sign and have it ready in advance for the ten visits of the Boston Symphony season.

One applicant for symphony tickets came armed with a personal letter yesterday to the Brothers Heck, deans of New York's box office diplomatic corps.

"Yes, Mr. Heck is in, but he's very busy," was an assistant's reply to this particular summons. "But I'll do just as well."

"No, I've a personal letter which I wish to give to Mr. Heck personally," was the velvet voiced reiteration.

Another and ampler figure appeared in the box office depths.

"I'm one of the Heck brothers," the second man said reassuringly.

"I don't believe you're the one I want at all," the woman's voice emphasized by pitching a shade higher. "I want to see 'the' Mr. Heck personally."

"Al, you'll have to come, but everybody's been told there was nothing but the last rows left," shouted some one remoter yet in the hidden corridors, as a third figure did presently emerge, and Madame at the window explained she had fallen heir to Mrs. So-and-So and had come for her Boston Symphony tickets belonging to the So-and-So estate.

At which, the choice pair of seats which the So-and-So's have occupied for the last generation or two were officially signed, sealed and delivered to the new incumbent by Heck.

...t it will be; Mm... same institution, a...
...s Mr. Kreisler is coming t... this year under exclusive contra... the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his only appearances in New York will be at the December pair of concerts. There was some talk of his giving a recital here, but the plan has been changed, and he will confine himself to his appearances with the orchestra.

The general sale of season tickets opens at the box office of Carnegie Hall to-morrow morning. During the last several years, when Carnegie Hall has been crowded to its utmost capacity at the Boston Symphony concerts and many have been unable to secure seats, a considerable effort has been made to induce the management to put in a third series in New York, making fifteen concerts here instead of ten. The proposition was seriously considered, but owing to the work the orchestra has to do elsewhere it has been found impossible to make any such arrangement; and so in the future, as in the past, the appearances of Boston's orchestra will be limited to five Thursday evenings and five Saturday afternoons. The dates for this year's concerts are November 7 and 9, December 5 and 7, January 9 and 11, February 20 and 22 and March 20 and 22.

Interest in the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year centres chiefly in the return as its permanent conductor of Dr. Karl Muck, who, when he was in America in 1906-'07 and 1907-'08, on a leave of absence from Berlin, achieved such remarkable results. His success then was won under conditions not altogether favorable, because his appointment was not permanent, and he had hardly got in touch with the American public before it was necessary for him to return to Europe.

So far as Dr. Muck's plans are concerned, it may be said that he proposes

---

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 9 - 1912

Establis

Kitty took the chair and hit Burns as he lay on the floor. Then she ran out of the saloon."

Boston Symphony Tickets.

The time limit for the renewal of subscriptions to the series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Philadelphia expires today. Such seats as have not been taken up by last year's subscribers will be placed on public ... Miss Harris' ticket office, Hep- ... morn-

---

From POST
Address: New York

1884

Notes.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its thirty-second season in Boston last week. The programme presented by Dr. Muck consisted of the "Eroica" Symphony by Beethoven; the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz; Liszt's "Mazeppa symphonic poem and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers" of Wagner. The return of Dr. Muck to Boston was signalized by renewed interest in the Orchestra, and its auction sales made new records. The sale of season tickets for the New York concerts, which has been in progress at Carnegie Hall, has come up to expectations. It is to be hoped that Dr. Muck will include the "Mazeppa" in his New York programmes.

From PRESS
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The time limit for the renewal of subscriptions to the series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Philadelphia expires to-day. Such seats as have not been taken up by last year's subscribers will be placed on public sale at Miss Harris' ticket office, 1119 Chestnut Street, next Monday morning, October 14. The renewals have been very large and the orchestra bids fair to have one of its most successful seasons in this city.

◆

From GLOBE
Address: New York
Date

Establ

Musical Notes.

Dr. Karl Muck made his reappearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its first public rehearsal of the season last Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall. Boston. The programme consisted of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture. Liszt's symphonic poem "Mazeppa," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." Philip Hale comments thus in the Boston Herald on the return of Dr. Muck:

> The thirty-second season opened brilliantly. As soon as Dr. Muck came upon the stage, after an absence of four years, the great audience paid him heartfelt and flattering tribute; nor need he doubt for a moment the sincerity of this welcome; an exhibition of respect and admiration for him as conductor and as man; nor was in this instance the fanfare of the orchestra merely traditional and perfunctory. Dr. Muck acknowledged the welcome with grace and dignity, as is his wont.
>
> He nothing common did, or mean,
> Upon that memorable scene.
>
> In view of the conditions that attended this concert—a conductor whose methods are unfamiliar to some in the orchestra, the limited acquaintanceship established by a few rehearsals, the presence of new players—the performance was unusually brilliant. The programme was a romantic one throughout, for the Beethoven of the "Eroica" is still to be reckoned with as a romanticist.

After some critical remarks on the Liszt and the Berlioz compositions, Mr. Hale continues:

> The feature of the concert, however, was the performance of the "Eroica"—especially of the scherzo and variations. Some might say that the opening of the Funeral March was taken at a pace so slow that the music lost a little in emotional quality; on the other hand, others found that this pace enlarged the solemn, impersonal lamentation. To dwell on this point is unnecessary, nor is it too much to say that the performance of the symphony was one long to be remembered. Seldom is there in the reading such nicety and elasticity in treatment of the detail, such a sense of proportion, contrasts, and euphony, such significant rhetorical emphasis, such a pervading spirit of romanticism, classic in its beauty and its nobility.

This week Mme Rappold is singing with the orchestra (Elisabeth's "Greeting" from "Tannhäuser," and songs by Dell' Acqua and by Van der Stucken). The instrumental numbers announced are Pfitzner's overture to "The Little Christ Child," Brahms's variations on a theme by Haydn, and Sgambati's first symphony.

From INQUIRER
Address. Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Establish

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The time limit for the renewal of subscriptions to the series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Philadelphia expires today. Such seats as have not been taken up by last year's subscribers will be placed on public sale at Miss Harris' ticket office, Heppe's piano rooms next Monday morning, October 14. The renewals have been very large and the orchestra bids fair to have one of its most successful seasons in this city.

From AMERICAN
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 10 1912

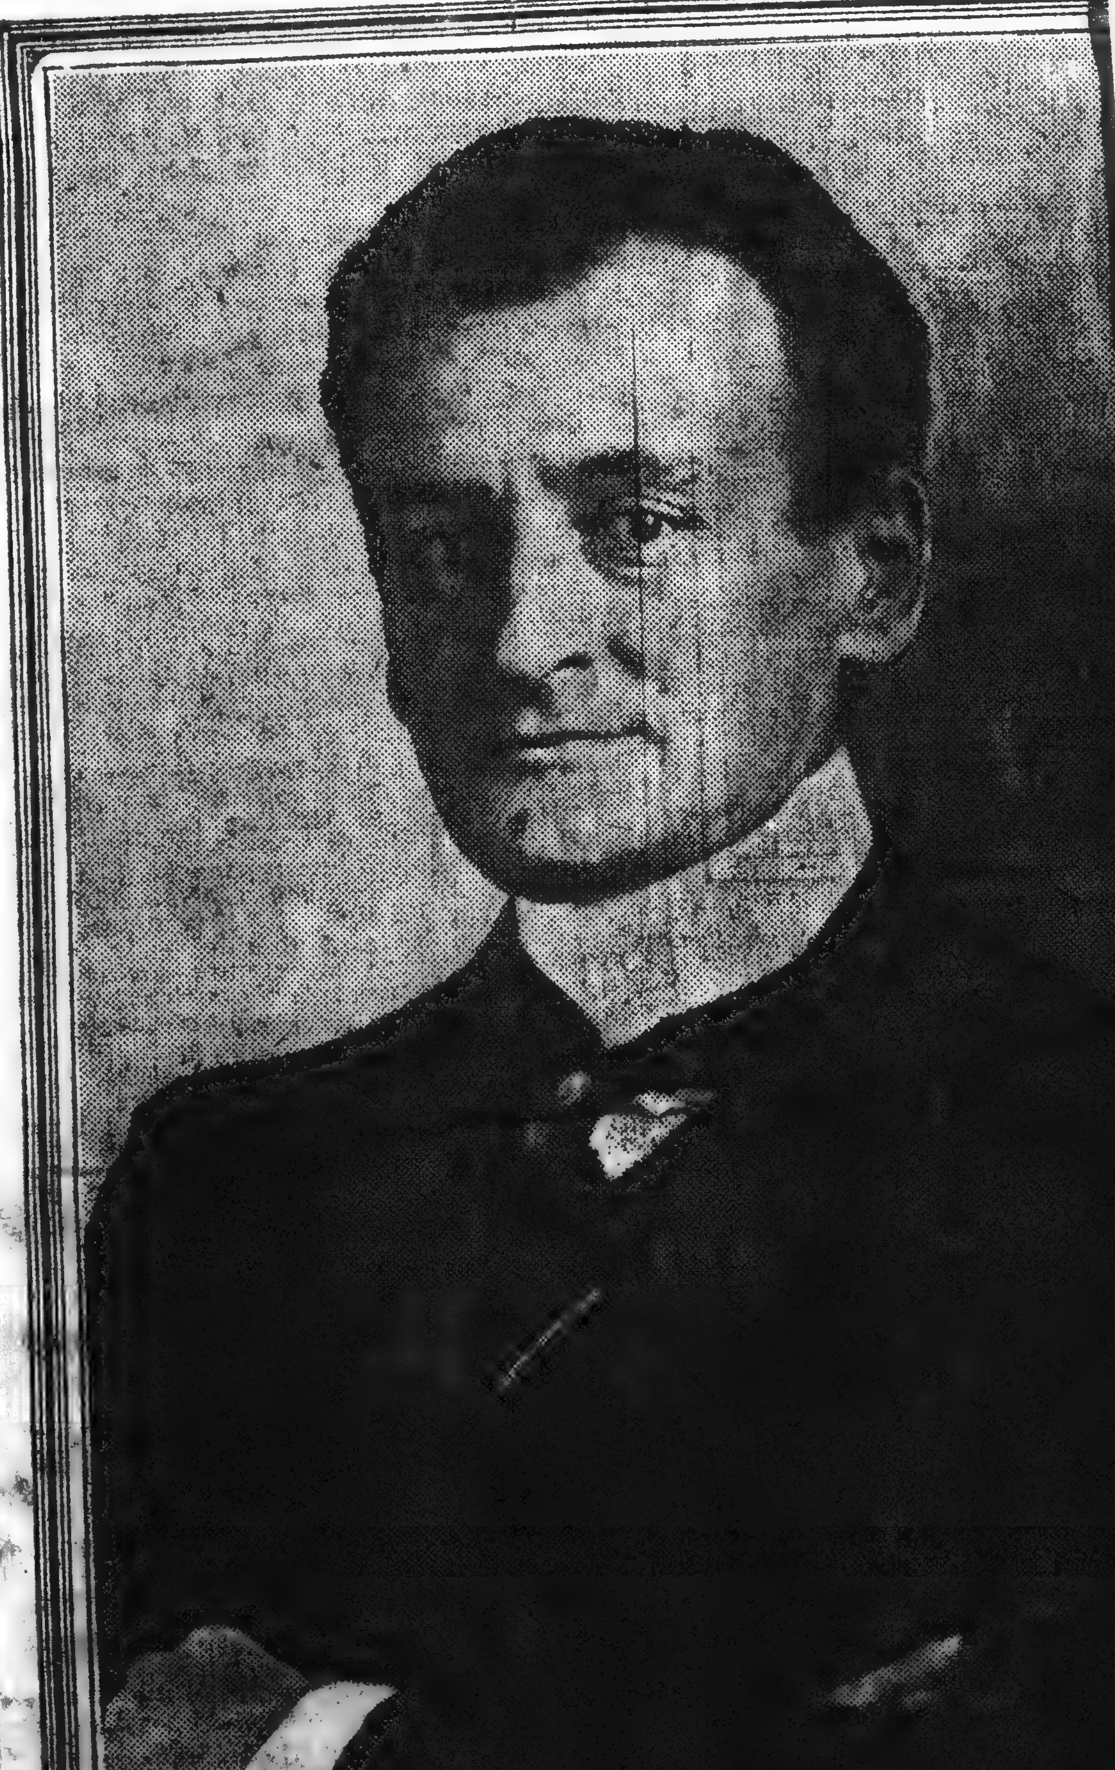
Est... 1884

The Baltimore season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra promises to be one of the best that famous organization has ever had in this city. The renewal of subscriptions has been in progress for the last week, and very few of last year's subscribers have failed to secure seats for the coming season. The last day on which this can be done is today.

From GLOBE
Address: New York
Date OCT 10 1912

Estab... 884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, once more under the direction of Dr. Muck, begins its thirty-second season to-morrow afternoon with the public rehearsal at Symphony Hall, Boston. The programme with which Dr. Muck makes his reappearance with the orchestra comprises Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."



DR. KARL MUCK.
Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

introducing a number of important novelties, but he will not by any means neglect the great classics of musical literature.

[35]

From EVO. SUN
Address: New York
Date OCT 8 - 1912

Established

Music and Musicians

The Brothers Heck Open Box Office for the Muses Nine and the Bluestockinged Yankees Leagues Away.

There was a difference bet two crowds that stood in lin tickets yesterday for the t famous aggregations of B coming to give performances
York. There was a reason, while the wonderful "mile of f world's series at the baseball was not repeated where the fraternity rushed in at Carne the fact was that as far as th
Boston Symphony subscription cerned, there isn't any mor sell from year to year than seats given up by Manhattan's most musical old families. Where few die and none resign, it's little enough is left to be handed to lucky new comers or transferred as heirlooms to the next of kin.

To descend neither from the sublime to the redsox nor from the bluestocking to the "mile of fans," some dusky guardian of Fifty-seventh street's artistic lobby doors might as well polish off the old "Standing Room Only" sign and have it ready in advance for the ten visits of the Boston Symphony season.

One applicant for symphony tickets came armed with a personal letter yesterday to the Brothers Heck, deans of New York's box office diplomatic corps.

"Yes, Mr. Heck is in, but he's very busy," was an assistant's reply to this particular summons. "But I'll do just as well."

"No, I've a personal letter which I wish to give to Mr. Heck personally," was the velvet voiced reiteration.

Another and ampler figure appeared in the box office depths.

"I'm one of the Heck brothers," the second man said reassuringly.

"I don't believe you're the one I want at all," the woman's voice emphasized by pitching a shade higher. "I want to see 'the' Mr. Heck personally."

"Al, you'll have to come, but everybody's been told there was nothing but the last rows left," shouted some one remoter yet in the hidden corridors, as a third figure did presently emerge, and Madame at the window explained she had fallen heir to Mrs. So-and-So and had come for her Boston Symphony tickets belonging to the So-and-So estate.

At which, the choice pair of seats

From INQUIRER
Address. Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Establish

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The time limit for the renewal of subscriptions to the series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Philadelphia expires today. Such seats as have not been taken up by last year's subscribers will be placed on public sale at Miss Harris' ticket office, Heppe's piano rooms next Monday morning, October 14. The renewals have been very large and the orchestra bids fair to have one of its most successful seasons in this city.

From AMERICAN
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 10 1912

Est 1884

The Baltimore season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra promises to be one of the best that famous organization has ever had in this city. The renewal of subscriptions has been in progress for the last week, and very few of last year's subscribers have failed to secure seats for the coming season. The last day on which this can be done is today.

From GLOBE
Address: New York
Date OCT 1 0 1912

Estab 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, once more under the direction of Dr. Muck, begins its thirty-second season to-morrow afternoon with the public rehearsal at Symphony Hall, Boston. The programme with which Dr. Muck makes his reappearance with the orchestra comprises Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz, Liszt's symphonic poem "Mazeppa," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.
Date OCT 6 - 1912

Establ

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The prospectus of the New York concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra calls for the appearance of three distinguished soloists—Miss Geraldine Farrar, of the Metropolitan Opera, whose only appearance in concert it will be; Mme. Matzenauer, of the same institution, and Fritz Kreisler. As Mr. Kreisler is coming to America this year under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his only appearances in New York will be at the December pair of concerts. There was some talk of his giving a recital here, but the plan has been changed, and he will confine himself to his appearances with the orchestra.

The general sale of season tickets opens at the box office of Carnegie Hall to-morrow morning. During the last several years, when Carnegie Hall has been crowded to its utmost capacity at the Boston Symphony concerts and many have been unable to secure seats, a considerable effort has been made to induce the management to put in a third series in New York, making fifteen concerts here instead of ten. The proposition was seriously considered, but owing to the work the orchestra has to do elsewhere it has been found impossible to make any such arrangement; and so in the future, as in the past, the appearances of Boston's orchestra will be limited to five Thursday evenings and five Saturday afternoons. The dates for this year's concerts are November 7 and 9, December 5 and 7, January 9 and 11, February 20 and 22 and March 20 and 22.

Interest in the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year centres chiefly in the return as its permanent conductor of Dr. Karl Muck, who, when he was in America in 1906-'07 and 1907-'08, on a leave of absence from Berlin, achieved such remarkable results. His success then was won under conditions not altogether favorable, because his appointment was not permanent, and he had hardly got in touch with the American public before it was necessary for him to return to Europe.

DR. KARL MUCK.
Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

So far as Dr. Muck's plans are concerned, it may be said that he proposes introducing a number of important novelties, but he will not by any means neglect the great classics of musical literature.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 9 - 1912

Establis

Kitty took the chair and hit Burns as he lay on the floor. Then she ran out of the saloon."

Boston Symphony Tickets.

The time limit for the renewal of subscriptions to the series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Philadelphia expires today. Such seats as have not been taken up by last year's subscribers will be placed on public
Miss Harris' ticket office, Hep-

From POST
Address: New York

1884

Notes.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its thirty-second season in Boston last week. The programme presented by Dr. Muck consisted of the "Eroica" Symphony by Beethoven; the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz; Liszt's "Mazeppa symphonic poem and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers" of Wagner. The return of Dr. Muck to Boston was signalized by renewed interest in the Orchestra, and its auction sales made new records. The sale of season tickets for the New York concerts, which has been in progress at Carnegie Hall, has come up to expectations. It is to be hoped that Dr. Muck will include the "Mazeppa" in his New York programmes.

From PRESS
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The time limit for the renewal of subscriptions to the series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Philadelphia expires to-day. Such seats as have not been taken up by last year's subscribers will be placed on public sale at Miss Harris' ticket office, 1119 Chestnut Street, next Monday morning, October 14. The renewals have been very large and the orchestra bids fair to have one of its most successful seasons in this city.

◆

From GLOBE
Address: New York
Date

Establ

Musical Notes.

Dr. Karl Muck made his reappearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its first public rehearsal of the season last Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall, Boston. The programme consisted of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, Liszt's symphonic poem "Mazeppa," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." Philip Hale comments thus in the Boston Herald on the return of Dr. Muck:

> The thirty-second season opened brilliantly. As soon as Dr. Muck came upon the stage, after an absence of four years, the great audience paid him heartfelt and flattering tribute; nor need he doubt for a moment the sincerity of this welcome; an exhibition of respect and admiration for him as conductor and as man; nor was in this instance the fanfare of the orchestra merely traditional and perfunctory. Dr. Muck acknowledged the welcome with grace and dignity, as is his wont.
>
> He nothing common did, or mean,
> Upon that memorable scene.
>
> In view of the conditions that attended this concert—a conductor whose methods are unfamiliar to some in the orchestra, the limited acquaintanceship established by a few rehearsals, the presence of new players—the performance was unusually brilliant. The programme was a romantic one throughout, for the Beethoven of the "Eroica" is still to be reckoned with as a romanticist.

After some critical remarks on the Liszt and the Berlioz compositions, Mr. Hale continues:

> The feature of the concert, however, was the performance of the "Eroica"—especially of the scherzo and variations. Some might say that the opening of the Funeral March was taken at a pace so slow that the music lost a little in emotional quality; on the other hand, others found that this pace enlarged the solemn, impersonal lamentation. To dwell on this point is unnecessary, nor is it too much to say that the performance of the symphony was one long to be remembered. Seldom is there in the reading such nicety and elasticity in treatment of the detail, such a sense of proportion, contrasts, and euphony, such significant rhetorical emphasis, such a pervading spirit of romanticism, classic in its beauty and its nobility.

This week Mme Rappold is singing with the orchestra (Elisabeth's "Greeting" from "Tannhäuser," and songs by Dell' Acqua and by Van der Stucken). The instrumental numbers announced are Pfitzner's overture to "The Little Christ Child," Brahms's variations on a theme by Haydn, and Sgambati's first symphony.

From JOURNAL
Address PROVIDENCE,
Date OCT 6 - 1912

Es 1884

DR. KARL MUCK returned to Boston last week to renew his work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In discussing his plans for the season, he spoke of three new compositions, which he plans to produce early in the year, but, he added: "I do not believe in presenting a work simply because it is new, for it is not worth while to waste the time of the orchestra and tax the patience of the audience by performing much of the music recently published.

"For securing plasticity and elasticity at the beginning of a season," he continued, "and especially at the beginning of this season, when there are many new members of the orchestra, there is nothing so good as work on the great classics. Much of the complex modern music sounds well, even when it is badly performed, but the music of Mozart, Beethoven, Schumann, Brahms, must be played accurately, and, outside of its artistic value, is of inestimable worth for drilling the players.

"It is not the first duty of the conductor of a great musical institution like the Boston Symphony Orchestra to provide his audience with new works, simply because they are new, and without regard to their inherent worth. It is not his chief duty to see how many 'first performances' he can secure in the course of a season.

"He should steadily choose the best works, the best as they seem to him, whether they be new or old. He should perform them in the best possible manner, according to his ability, and thus infuse into the audience the desire to hear nothing but the best; to find new beauties in familiar compositions; to recognize the beautiful in works heard for the first time, although that which is beautiful in the composer's thought may be expressed in an unusual, unanticipated manner."

Of modern composers, he said:

"There are many imitators at present, and I loathe the imitators of Debussy and Franck and Richard Strauss as I loathed in past years the composers that aped Wagner and Brahms. Debussy is original and sincere. He writes as he feels and hears. To my mind, Ravel and others of the ultra-modern French school compose after the manner of Debussy as they understand it, and have little or nothing to say on their own account. In like manner, Cesar Franck has his imitators—a boresome, uninventive lot."

NEWS
ALTIMORE, MD.
OCT 13 1912

MUSICAL SEASON TO EXCEL LAST YEAR'S

Dr. Karl Muck Will Return As Leader Of The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

CHICAGO OPERA CO. TO HAVE NEW STARS

Harold Randolph Will Have Excellent Schedule—Julia Culp Will Give Concert.

The promised musical features of the next six months in many ways excel last season's rather ample provisions in novelty and quality.

The most potent art event of the season will be the great Dr. Muck's return to the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and we are promised at least five years of his ministrations. Dr. Muck's quiet self-effacement in manner of conducting leaves his hearers to undisturbed contemplation of the results which he attains. His great virtues are subtle understanding and magnetic control of his orchestra. His refined personality and well-tempered modes of indicating his desires are entirely consonant with the spirit of noble music.

Many of our modern orchestral conductors seem to feel that audiences desire to see the wheels go round, and they therefore, actuated by this idea and perhaps somewhat by personal vanity, resort to unseemly pantomime, thus distracting the attention of both players and hearers from the concentration required in playing or listening to worthy music. Dr. Muck's presence between the orchestra and audience seems to furnish a focusing point, which concentrates the perceptions of everyone concerned in his readings.

The Chicago Opera Company is to give us six performances, four in November and two in February, and the managers promise some new singers of merit. Signor Campanini is again to be the general musical director, which fact insures good ensemble. "Carmen" is to be given on the first evening, and no better choice could have been made, for that opera, as the ripe fruit of Bizet's genius, is replete with enduring charm. It is to be hoped that the Chicago managers will have dropped some of the less efficient singers from their list, and in the meantime let us be thankful that they are to visit Baltimore.

Nothing definite seems to be known as to whether the new manager of the New York Philharmonic will show Mr. Charlton's enterprise. Mr. Stransky made such a deep impression on our music-lovers that the disappointment will be widespread should Baltimore be omitted from the New York Orchestra's tour. Dr. Muck and Mr. Stransky differ much in their manner of conducting, but each of them shows inspired insight in his readings, and the radical individuality which characterizes their conceptions yields new and interesting points of view. There is ample room, and there would doubtless be ample patronage, for both orchestras in our musical season.

Randolph's Schedule.

Mr. Randolph's schedule for 20 Friday afternoons is extremely rich. It includes eight solo artists and one ensemble organization, all of which will be new to Baltimore. Each and all of these newcomers have enviable reputations where they are known, but four of them—Leopold Gadowsky, Jaroslav Kocian, Ludwig Breitner and Julia Culp—have attained great prominence in the musical world. Leopold Gadowsky lived and taught for 10 years in Chicago, but had to go to Europe for the recognition which he won through his first recital in Berlin. Gadowsky is now without doubt the most popular living pianist, his engagements taking him into each and all of the European lands. Gadowsky's command of the keyboard is simply phenomenal.

Kocian has not been long in winning a high place among violinists, which would seem to imply his possession of extraordinary talent.

Ludwig Breitner's recital on January 17 will be anticipated with great interest, for he has been engaged to teach at the Peabody. Mr. Breitner has for some years taught at Stern's conservatory in Berlin, and he has been an important factor in the musical life of several of the European capitals at different times during his career.

Dutch Song-Singer.

The fourth pre-eminent stranger is Julia Culp, the great Dutch song-singer. Many critics place her at the head of concert vocalists. Should she prove to be a little less artistic than our own unique Susan Metcalfe there would perhaps still be sufficient merit in her singing to in a great measure justify the eulogies of her admirers. Julia Culp will undoubtedly give us a wonderful afternoon of good music, subtly interpreted.

Mr. Randolph gives the first recital of the series on November 1, and he will certainly receive a warm welcome from the host of music-lovers who have deeply regretted his temporary withdrawal from solo concert activity. Maud Powell and Bloomfield Zeisler have won such high regard in Baltimore that no season would seem fully complete without their appearance. They come to us on January [illegible] and March 14, Mme. Zeisler having the former date.

Among the other familiar and attractive names on Mr. Randolph's list are George F. Boyle, Adelin Fermin, J. C. Van Hulsteyn, Harold Phillips, Bart Wirtz, Alma Gluck, Clarence Whitehill, Theodor Hemberger and Emmanuel Wad. We are to have three string quartet organizations—viz, the Kneisels, the Flonzaley and the Olive Mead.

A comprehensive view of our musical prospects for 1912-13 is certainly assuring, and Baltimore's patronage of good art is no longer a source of anxiety to promoters of art enterprise.

O. B. B.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TOWN & COUNTRY.
From
Address: New York City.
Date OCT 12 1912

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Dr. Karl Muck, who has recently arrived in this country to resume the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, brought with him three new players for the orchestra, Otto Urack, who succeeds Alvin Schroeder, as first 'cellist; Maurice Koessler, one of the new first violins, and Bruno Steinke, one of the new 'cellists. Mr. Urack is well-known in Germany as a 'cellist and conductor. For several seasons past he has been the

---

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York.
1912
Date
Established:

Date
E N
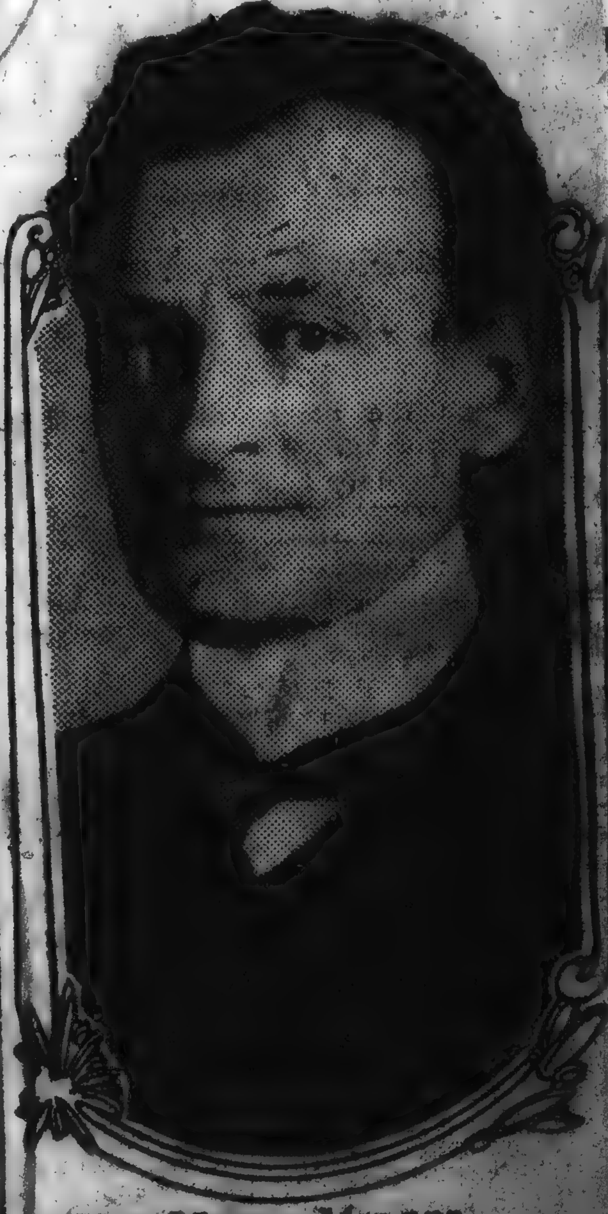
k, 1884

FAMOUS CONDUCTOR TO HEAD SYMPHONY



DR. KARL MUCK
PHOTO BY GARO

That Dr. Muck has finally abandoned Berlin and has came to Americ to make his home in Boston, and to be for at least five years at the hea of the Orchestra of that city, wil be considered a matter of congratulation to everybody interested in the cause of music in this country.

Dr. Muck is one of the really grea conductors of the world. Death and retirement have steadily lessened th number in the last two or thre years, but happily Dr. Muck in year is just in the prime of life and i spirits and feeling is much younge than his actual years indicate. H returns to America full of interes and his frankly expressed ambitio is to make the Boston Symphon Orchestra in every sense of the wor a unique organization.

In Dr. Muck are united all th qualities which go to make a grea conductor. He has an engagin personality. He has authority is a strict disciplinarian, but at same time a most

From JOURNAL
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date 1912

Es 1884

DR. KARL MUCK returned to Boston last week to renew his work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In discussing his plans for the season, he spoke of three new compositions, which he plans to produce early in the year, but, he added: "I do not believe in presenting a work simply because it is new, for it is not worth while to waste the time of the orchestra and tax the patience of the audience by performing much of the music recently published.

"For securing plasticity and elasticity at the beginning of a season," he continued, "and especially at the beginning of this season, when there are many new members of the orchestra, there is nothing so good as work on the great classics. Much of the complex modern music sounds well, even when it is badly performed, but the music of Mozart, Beethoven, Schumann, Brahms, must be played accurately, and, outside of its artistic value, is of inestimable worth for drilling the players.

"It is not the first duty of the conductor of a great musical institution like the Boston Symphony Orchestra to provide his audience with new works, simply because they are new, and without regard to their inherent worth. It is not his chief duty to see how many 'first performances' he can secure in the course of a season.

"He should steadily choose the best works, the best as they seem to him, whether they be new or old. He should perform them in the best possible manner, according to his ability, and thus infuse into the audience the desire to hear nothing but the best; to find new beauties in familiar compositions; to recognize the beautiful in works heard for the first time, although that which is beautiful in the composer's thought may be expressed in an unusual, unanticipated manner."

Of modern composers, he said:

"There are many imitators at present, and I loathe the imitators of Debussy and Franck and Richard Strauss as I loathed in past years the composers that aped Wagner and Brahms. Debussy is original and sincere. He writes as he feels and hears. To my mind, Ravel and others of the ultra-modern French school compose after the manner of Debussy as they understand it, and have little or nothing to say on their own account. In like manner, Cesar Franck has his imitators—a boresome, uninventive lot."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NEWS
BALTIMORE, MD.
OCT 13 1912

MUSICAL SEASON TO EXCEL LAST YEAR'S

Dr. Karl Muck Will Return As Leader Of The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

CHICAGO OPERA CO. TO HAVE NEW STARS

Harold Randolph Will Have Excellent Schedule—Julia Culp Will Give Concert.

The promised musical features of the next six months in many ways excel last season's rather ample provisions in novelty and quality.

The most potent art event of the season will be the great Dr. Muck's return to the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and we are promised at least five years of his ministrations. Dr. Muck's quiet self-effacement in manner of conducting leaves his hearers to undisturbed contemplation of the results which he attains. His great virtues are subtle understanding and magnetic control of his orchestra. His refined personality and well-tempered modes of indicating his desires are entirely consonant with the spirit of noble music.

Many of our modern orchestral conductors seem to feel that audiences desire to see the wheels go round, and they therefore, actuated by this idea and perhaps somewhat by personal vanity, resort to unseemly pantomime, thus distracting the attention of both players and hearers from the concentration required in playing or listening to worthy music. Dr. Muck's presence between the orchestra and audience seems to furnish a focusing point, which concentrates the perceptions of everyone concerned in his readings.

The Chicago Opera Company is to give us six performances, four in November and two in February, and the managers promise some new singers of merit. Signor Campanini is again to be the general musical director, which fact insures good ensemble. "Carmen" is to be given on the first evening, and no better choice could have been made, for that opera, as the ripe fruit of Bizet's genius, is replete with enduring charm. It is to be hoped that the Chicago managers will have dropped some of the less efficient singers from their list, and in the meantime let us be thankful that they are to visit Baltimore.

Nothing definite seems to be known as to whether the new manager of the New York Philharmonic will show Mr. Charlton's enterprise. Mr. Stransky made such a deep impression on our music-lovers that the disappointment will be widespread should Baltimore be omitted from the New York Orchestra's tour. Dr. Muck and Mr. Stransky differ much in their manner of conducting, but each of them shows inspired insight in his readings, and the radical individuality which characterizes their conceptions yields new and interesting points of view. There is ample room, and there would doubtless be ample patronage, for both orchestras in our musical season.

Randolph's Schedule.

Mr. Randolph's schedule for 20 Friday afternoons is extremely rich. It includes eight solo artists and one ensemble organization, all of which will be new to Baltimore. Each and all of these newcomers have enviable reputations where they are known, but four of them—Leopold Gadowsky, Jaroslav Kocian, Ludwig Breitner and Julia Culp—have attained great prominence in the musical world. Leopold Gadowsky lived and taught for 10 years in Chicago, but had to go to Europe for the recognition which he won through his first recital in Berlin. Gadowsky is now without doubt the most popular living pianist, his engagements taking him into each and all of the European lands. Gadowsky's command of the keyboard is simply phenomenal.

Kocian has not been long in winning a high place among violinists, which would seem to imply his possession of extraordinary talent.

Ludwig Breitner's recital on January 17 will be anticipated with great interest, for he has been engaged to teach at the Peabody. Mr. Breitner has for some years taught at Stern's conservatory in Berlin, and he has been an important factor in the musical life of several of the European capitals at different times during his career.

Dutch Song-Singer.

The fourth pre-eminent stranger is Julia Culp, the great Dutch song-singer. Many critics place her at the head of concert vocalists. Should she prove to be a little less artistic than our own unique Susan Metcalfe there would perhaps still be sufficient merit in her singing to in a great measure justify the eulogies of her admirers. Julia Culp will undoubtedly give us a wonderful afternoon of good music, subtly interpreted.

Mr. Randolph gives the first recital of the series on November 1, and he will certainly receive a warm welcome from the host of music-lovers who have deeply regretted his temporary withdrawal from solo concert activity. Maud Powell and Bloomfield-Zeisler have won such high regard in Baltimore that no season would seem fully complete without their appearance. They come to us on January 31 and March 14, Mme. Zeisler having the former date.

Among the other familiar and attractive names on Mr. Randolph's list are George F. Boyle, Adelin Fermin, J. C. Van Hulsteyn, Harold Phillips, Bart Wirtz, Alma Gluck, Clarence Whitehill, Theodor Hemberger and Emmanuel Wad. We are to have three string quartet organizations—viz, the Kneisels, the Flonzaley and the Olive Mead.

A comprehensive view of our musical prospects for 1912-13 is certainly assuring, and Baltimore's patronage of good art is no longer a source of anxiety to promoters of art enterprise.

O. B. B.

From
Address: New York City.
Date 12

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Dr. Karl Muck, who has recently arrived in this country to resume the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, brought with him three new players for the orchestra, Otto Urack, who succeeds Alvin Schroeder, as first 'cellist; Maurice Koessler, one of the new first violins, and Bruno Steinke, one of the new 'cellists. Mr. Urack is well-known in Germany as a 'cellist and conductor. For several seasons past he has been the

---

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York.
Date

Established:

Dr. Carl Muck.

Date

FAMOUS CONDUCTOR TO HEAD SYMPHONY

k, 1884

DR. KARL MUCK
PHOTO. BY GARO

That Dr. Muck has finally abandoned Berlin and has came to America to make his home in Boston, and to be for at least five years at the head of the Orchestra of that city, will be considered a matter of congratulation to everybody interested in the cause of music in this country.

Dr. Muck is one of the really great conductors of the world. Death and retirement have steadily lessened the number in the last two or three years, but happily Dr. Muck in years is just in the prime of life and in spirits and feeling is much younger than his actual years indicate. He returns to America full of interest and his frankly expressed ambition is to make the Boston Symphony Orchestra in every sense of the word a unique organization.

In Dr. Muck are united all the qualities which go to make a great conductor. He has an engaging personality. He has authority. He is a strict disciplinarian, but at the same time a most reasonable man. Of his musicianship there is no question. He is not a man of sensational habits, musically speaking,

From JOURNA
Address PROVIDENCE
Date CT 6

DR. KARL MUCK returned to B ton last week to renew his w with the Boston Symphony chestra. In discussing his plans for season, he spoke of three new compo tions, which he plans to produce early in the year, but, he added: "I do not believe in presenting a work simply because it is new, for it is not worth while to waste the time of the orchestra and tax the patience of the audience by performing much of the music recently published.

"For securing plasticity and elasticity at the beginning of a season," he continued, "and especially at the beginning of this season, when there are many new members of the orchestra, there is nothing so good as work on the great classics. Much of the complex modern music sounds well, even when it is badly performed, but the music of Mozart, Beethoven, Schumann, Brahms, must be played accurately, and, outside of its artistic value, is of inestimable worth for drilling the players.

"It is not the first duty of the conductor of a great musical institution like the Boston Symphony Orchestra to provide his audience with new works, simply because they are new, and without regard to their inherent worth. It is not his chief duty to see how many 'first performances' he can secure in the course of a season.

"He should steadily choose the best works, the best as they seem to him, whether they be new or old. He should perform them in the best possible manner, according to his ability, and thus infuse into the audience the desire to hear nothing but the best; to find new beauties in familiar compositions; to recognize the beautiful in works heard for the first time, although that which is beautiful in the composer's thought may be expressed in an unusual, unanticipated manner."

Of modern composers, he said:

"There are many imitators at present, and I loathe the imitators of Debussy and Franck and Richard Strauss as I loathed in past years the composers that aped Wagner and Brahms. Debussy is original and sincere. He writes as he feels and hears. To my mind, Ravel and others of the ultra-modern French school compose after the manner of Debussy as they understand it, and have little or nothing to say on their own account. In like manner, Cesar Franck has his imitators—a boresome, uninventive lot."

* * *

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NEWS
From BALTIMORE, MD.
Address
Date OCT 13 1912

Established 1884

MUSICAL SEASON TO EXCEL LAST YEAR'S

Dr. Karl Muck Will Return As Leader Of The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

CHICAGO OPERA CO. TO HAVE NEW STARS

Harold Randolph Will Have Excellent Schedule—Julia Culp Will Give Concert.

The promised musical features of the next six months in many ways excel last season's rather ample provisions in novelty and quality.

The most potent art event of the season will be the great Dr. Muck's return to the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and we are promised at least five years of his ministrations. Dr. Muck's quiet self-effacement in manner of conducting leaves his hearers to undisturbed contemplation of the results which he attains. His great virtues are subtle understanding and magnetic control of his orchestra. His refined personality and well-tempered modes of indicating his desires are entirely consonant with the spirit of noble music.

Many of our modern orchestral conductors seem to feel that audiences desire to see the wheels go round, and they therefore, actuated by this idea and perhaps somewhat by personal vanity, resort to unseemly pantomime, thus distracting the attention of both players and hearers from the concentration required in playing or listening to worthy music. Dr. Muck's presence between the orchestra and audience seems to furnish a focusing point, which concentrates the perceptions of everyone concerned in his readings.

The Chicago Opera Company is to give us six performances, four in November and two in February, and the managers promise some new singers of merit. Signor Campanini is again to be the general musical director, which fact insures good ensemble. "Carmen" is to be given on the first evening, and no better choice could have been made, for that opera, as the ripe fruit of Bizet's genius, is replete with enduring charm. It is to be hoped that the Chicago managers will have dropped some of the less efficient singers from their list, and in the meantime let us be thankful that they are to visit Baltimore.

Nothing definite seems to be known as to whether the new manager of the New York Philharmonic will show Mr. Charlton's enterprise. Mr. Stransky made such a deep impression on our music-lovers that the disappointment will be widespread should Baltimore be omitted from the New York Orchestra's tour. Dr. Muck and Mr. Stransky differ much in their manner of conducting, but each of them shows inspired insight in his readings, and the radical individuality which characterizes their conceptions yields new and interesting points of view. There is ample room, and there would doubtless be ample patronage, for both orchestras in our musical season.

Randolph's Schedule.

Mr. Randolph's schedule for 20 Friday afternoons is extremely rich. It includes eight solo artists and one ensemble organization, all of which will be new to Baltimore. Each and all of these newcomers have enviable reputations where they are known, but four of them—Leopold Gadowsky, Jaroslav Kocian, Ludwig Breitner and Julia Culp—have attained great prominence in the musical world. Leopold Gadowsky lived and taught for 10 years in Chicago, but had to go to Europe for the recognition which he won through his first recital in Berlin. Gadowsky is now doubt the most popular living his engagements taking him into each and all of the European lands. Gadowsky's command of the keyboard is simply phenomenal.

Kocian has not been long in winning a high place among violinists, which would seem to imply his possession of extraordinary talent.

Ludwig Breitner's recital on January 17 will be anticipated with great interest, for he has been engaged to teach at the Peabody. Mr. Breitner has for some years taught at Stern's conservatory in Berlin, and he has been an important factor in the musical life of several of the European capitals at different times during his career.

Dutch Song-Singer.

The fourth pre-eminent stranger is Julia Culp, the great Dutch song-singer. Many critics place her at the head of concert vocalists. Should she prove to be a little less artistic than our own unique Susan Metcalfe there would perhaps still be sufficient merit in her singing to in a great measure justify the eulogies of her admirers. Julia Culp will undoubtedly give us a wonderful afternoon of good music, subtly interpreted.

Mr. Randolph gives the first recital of the series on November 1, and he will certainly receive a warm welcome from the host of music-lovers who have deeply regretted his temporary withdrawal from solo concert activity. Maud Powell and Bloomfield-Zeisler have won such high regard in Baltimore that no season would seem fully complete without their appearance. They come to us on January 31 and March 14, Mme. Zeisler having the former date.

Among the other familiar and attractive names on Mr. Randolph's list are George F. Boyle, Adelin Fermin, J. C. Van Hulsteyn, Harold Phillips, Bart Wirtz, Alma Gluck, Clarence Whitehill, Theodor Hemberger and Emmanuel Wad. We are to have three string quartet organizations—viz, the Kneisels, the Flonzaley and the Olive Mead.

A comprehensive view of our musical prospects for 1912-13 is certainly assuring, and Baltimore's patronage

---

From
Address: New York City.
Date

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Dr. Karl Muck, who has recently arrived in this country to resume the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, brought with him three new players for the orchestra, Otto Urack, who succeeds Alvin Schroeder, as first 'cellist; Maurice Koessler, one of the new first violins, and Bruno Steinke, one of the new 'cellists. Mr. Urack is well-known in Germany as a 'cellist and conductor. For several seasons past he has been the

---

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York.
Date

Established:

Dr. Karl Muck.

From BALTIMORE, MD. NEWS
Address
Date OCT 13 1912

k, 1884

FAMOUS CONDUCTOR TO HEAD SYMPHONY

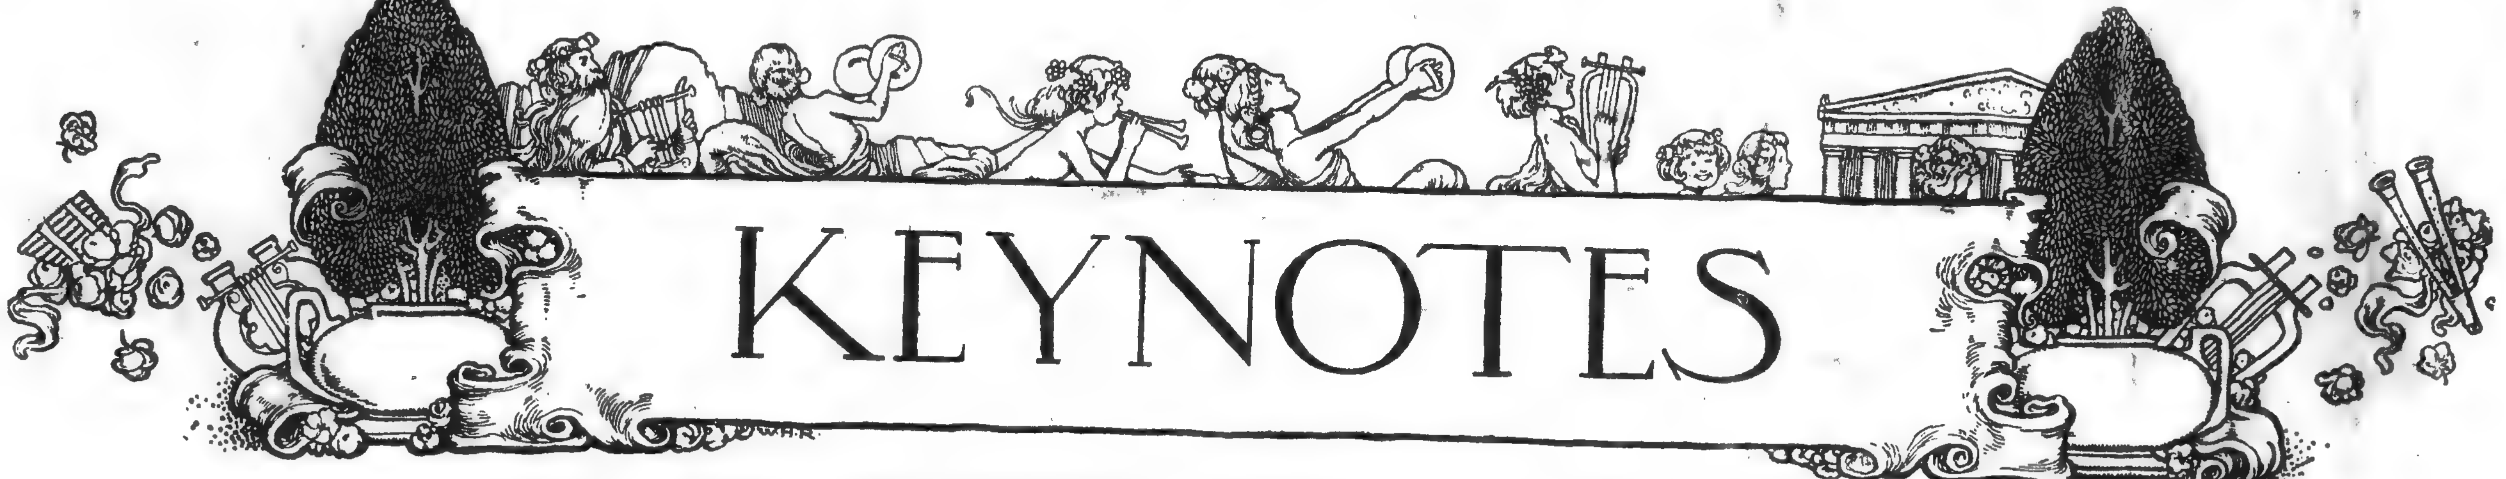
DR. KARL MUCK
PHOTO. BY GARO

That Dr. Muck has finally abandoned Berlin and has came to America to make his home in Boston, and to be for at least five years at the head of the Orchestra of that city, will be considered a matter of congratulation to everybody interested in the cause of music in this country.

Dr. Muck is one of the really great conductors of the world. Death and retirement have steadily lessened the number in the last two or three years, but happily Dr. Muck in years is just in the prime of life and in spirits and feeling is much younger than his actual years indicate. He returns to America full of interest and his frankly expressed ambition is to make the Boston Symphony Orchestra in every sense of the word a unique organization.

In Dr. Muck are united all the qualities which go to make a great conductor. He has an engaging personality. He has authority. He is a strict disciplinarian, but at the same time a most reasonable man. Of his muscianship there is no question. He is not a man of sensational habits, musically speaking.

Address
Date
Established:



KEYNOTES

MUSIC ACROSS THE ATLANTIC: PROSPECTS OF THE BOSTON SEASON.

THERE is much pleasant anticipation of a great musical season in Boston, where Dr. Karl Muck is coming to direct the fortunes of the famous Symphony Orchestra in succession to Max Fiedler, who has held the baton throughout the past four seasons. In order to return to Boston—he was there from 1906 to 1908—Dr. Muck has resigned the high office of General Music Director to the Royal Opera House in Berlin, where his loss will be severely felt, for not only has he directed the important Wagner operas there, but he had the honour of producing Dr. Richard Strauss's successful work, "Der Rosenkavalier." In addition to his labours in Berlin, Dr. Muck has conducted the performances of "Parsifal" at Bayreuth, and in June last he presided over the Lower Rhenish Music Festival at Aachen. In connection with his departure from Germany, there will be two gala performances at the Berlin Opera House next month.

The seats for the Symphony Concerts are put up to auction in Boston, and there will be a four-days' sale at the end of September and beginning of October. The Symphony Concerts are preceded by a public rehearsal—a practice that, while it cannot be very useful financially, in view of the low price charged, has a certain educational value which, we may be sure, is not overlooked. The fine concert hall, one of the best public buildings in Boston, is undoubtedly the Mecca of serious American musicians between October and May.

RETIRING WITH HONOUR: MR. OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN, OF THE LONDON OPERA HOUSE.

Thanks to contradictory cables, Mr. Oscar Hammerstein was for some time a puzzle to those interested in the future of the London Opera House. His decision to abandon the production of grand opera in London has now been made known. "I have decided," he said to a Central News representative, "that there is nothing left for me but to withdraw, making room for one of more English nationality. With the deepest regret, therefore, I withdraw from a musically virgin, but subtle ground. Yet I am glad to have illustrated the possibility of a permanent grand operatic institution in London. Under the circumstances, there is nothing left for me but to sell or lease the edifice in Kingsway. I hope that it will fall into the hands of parties who will devote it to some of the great and worthy purposes for which it was erected by me."

During a brief and hurried visit to North America, I took time to visit Boston, and was fortunate enough to find the Concert Hall open. The regular season was over and Promenade Concerts ruled, under the energetic direction of Gustav Strube; but though the programmes were not of a very serious or even interesting order, and the orchestra was reduced, it was possible to enjoy long evenings in a concert hall of rare beauty and noble proportions, and to admire, if not the quality of the music presented, the quality of the instruments that helped the presentation. Each seemed to be the best of its kind, and the resultant beauty of tone could not be disguised. They were odd programmes. On one night a selection from "Die Walküre" was followed immediately by a paraphrase of "The Old Folks at Home," a thing of hideous but popular commonplaces. On another evening the "Lohengrin" Prelude josted the introduction to the second act of "Jewels of the Madonna"; on a third, a selection from Lehar's "Gipsy Love" ended one section, and the "Meistersinger" Prelude another. Then there were "Harvard" nights and "Amherst" nights, and a special "Tufts" night, at which the strangest substitutes for music found favour in the eyes of "Tufts" men and "Harvard" men, and the rest. In brief, the orchestra was out for popularity after a strenuous season of better things, and achieved the goal. It is not fair to criticise performances frankly designed to be popular: the players did not show to advantage, nor did Mr. Strube's readings of the more serious items always commend themselves. Yet, in spite of all disadvantages, the Symphony players were clearly men of mark, and left one at least of their audience with a sincere regret that he had not heard them under the direction of a conductor of world-wide renown. Their attack was singularly clear and clean, and its vigour was never relaxed; they responded instantly to every mood of the conductor, even to those that seemed to the writer to be rather erratic ones; while, as has been said already, the quality of the instruments was of the highest. Even the brass, so often a source of weakness, was beyond reproach. Certainly Dr. Muck could not desire finer material than he will find to his hand.

Another source of strength to the orchestra is the legitimate pride that Bostonians take in it. The expenses are beyond the covering power of subscriptions, but the deficit is found by the endowment given by Mr. Henry Lee Higginson, one of the city's rich men, who has been quite content to pay for the city's pride of place. New York may lead in the realm of opera, but, as far as absolute music is concerned, Boston stands alone. The best of the world's soloists find their way to Symphony Hall during the season, so that nothing is lacking to complete the attractions.

The list of great musicians who have looked after the interests of the orchestra is an imposing one. Georg Henschel was the first (1881-4), and he was followed by Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur, Gericke again, Dr. Karl Muck, and Mr. Max Fiedler. The orchestra does not limit its activities to the city that is its home. New York, Baltimore, and Philadelphia enjoy a taste of its quality, though two of these cities have their own flourishing orchestral societies, and do not depend upon the ministrations of bodies beyond their own area.

The Boston Symphony players are not only well provided for by the administration, but they have their own pension fund, and two concerts are given annually for its benefit. Everything is done to make the players feel that they have fixity of tenure in their office and a measure of security against the latter days. This must have done much in the past, and must be doing much in the present, to make for a measure of ease that every musician should enjoy. Only a rich city, and one with public-spirited men in it, could carry on work that is designed to be good rather than profitable; there have been years when the deficit has approached £9000, but it has been cheerfully met. The chief items of outlay are, of course, the conductor and the soloists, and the fee paid to the first-named is one of the prizes of the musical profession. It is not for a modest sum that one of the great lights of the European world of music crosses the Atlantic even to conduct a fine orchestra in a concert hall that is probably second to none.

COMMON CHORD.

Address
Date
Established:

KEYNOTES

MUSIC ACROSS THE ATLANTIC: PROSPECTS OF THE BOSTON SEASON.

THERE is much pleasant anticipation of a great musical season in Boston, where Dr. Karl Muck is coming to direct the fortunes of the famous Symphony Orchestra in succession to Max Fiedler, who has held the baton throughout the past four seasons. In order to return to Boston—he was there from 1906 to 1908—Dr. Muck has resigned the high office of General Music Director to the Royal Opera House in Berlin, where his loss will be severely felt, for not only has he directed the important Wagner operas there, but he had the honour of producing Dr. Richard Strauss's successful work, "Der Rosenkavalier." In addition to his labours in Berlin, Dr. Muck has conducted the performances of "Parsifal" at Bayreuth, and in June last he presided over the Lower Rhenish Music Festival at Aachen. In connection with his departure from Germany, there will be two gala performances at the Berlin Opera House next month.

RETIRING WITH HONOUR: MR. OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN, OF THE LONDON OPERA HOUSE.

Thanks to contradictory cables, Mr. Oscar Hammerstein was for some time a puzzle to those interested in the future of the London Opera House. His decision to abandon the production of grand opera in London has now been made known. "I have decided," he said to a Central News representative, "that there is nothing left for me but to withdraw, making room for one of more English nationality. With the deepest regret, therefore, I withdraw from a musically virgin, but subtle ground. Yet I am glad to have illustrated the possibility of a permanent grand operatic institution in London. Under the circumstances, there is nothing left for me but to sell or lease the edifice in Kingsway. I hope that it will fall into the hands of parties who will devote it to some of the great and worthy purposes for which it was erected by me."

The seats for the Symphony Concerts are put up to auction in Boston, and there will be a four-days' sale at the end of September and beginning of October. The Symphony Concerts are preceded by a public rehearsal—a practice that, while it cannot be very useful financially, in view of the low price charged, has a certain educational value which, we may be sure, is not overlooked. The fine concert hall, one of the best public buildings in Boston, is undoubtedly the Mecca of serious American musicians between October and May.

During a brief and hurried visit to North America, I took time to visit Boston, and was fortunate enough to find the Concert Hall open. The regular season was over and Promenade Concerts ruled, under the energetic direction of Gustav Strube; but though the programmes were not of a very serious or even interesting order, and the orchestra was reduced, it was possible to enjoy long evenings in a concert hall of rare beauty and noble proportions, and to admire, if not the quality of the music presented, the quality of the instruments that helped the presentation. Each seemed to be the best of its kind, and the resultant beauty of tone could not be disguised. They were odd programmes. On one night a selection from "Die Walküre" was followed immediately by a paraphrase of "The Old Folks at Home," a thing of hideous but popular commonplaces. On another evening the "Lohengrin" Prelude jostled the introduction to the second act of "Jewels of the Madonna"; on a third, a selection from Lehar's "Gipsy Love" ended one section, and the "Meistersinger" Prelude another. Then there were "Harvard" nights and "Amherst" nights, and a special "Tufts" night, at which the strangest substitutes for music found favour in the eyes of "Tufts" men and "Harvard" men, and the rest. In brief, the orchestra was out for popularity after a strenuous season of better things, and achieved the goal. It is not fair to criticise performances frankly designed to be popular: the players did not show to advantage, nor did Mr. Strube's readings of the more serious items always commend themselves. Yet, in spite of all disadvantages, the Symphony players were clearly men of mark, and left one at least of their audience with a sincere regret that he had not heard them under the direction of a conductor of world-wide renown. Their attack was singularly clear and clean, and its vigour was never relaxed; they responded instantly to every mood of the conductor, even to those that seemed to the writer to be rather erratic ones; while, as has been said already, the quality of the instruments was of the highest. Even the brass, so often a source of weakness, was beyond reproach. Certainly Dr. Muck could not desire finer material than he will find to his hand.

Another source of strength to the orchestra is the legitimate pride that Bostonians take in it. The expenses are beyond the covering power of subscriptions, but the deficit is found by the endowment given by Mr. Henry Lee Higginson, one of the city's rich men, who has been quite content to pay for the city's pride of place. New York may lead in the realm of opera, but, as far as absolute music is concerned, Boston stands alone. The best of the world's soloists find their way to Symphony Hall during the season, so that nothing is lacking to complete the attractions. The list of great musicians who have looked after the interests of the orchestra is an imposing one. Georg Henschel was the first (1881-4), and he was followed by Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur, Gericke again, Dr. Karl Muck, and Mr. Max Fiedler. The orchestra does not limit its activities to the city that is its home. New York, Baltimore, and Philadelphia enjoy a taste of its quality, though two of these cities have their own flourishing orchestral societies, and do not depend upon the ministrations of bodies beyond their own area.

The Boston Symphony players are not only well provided for by the administration, but they have their own pension fund, and two concerts are given annually for its benefit. Everything is done to make the players feel that they have fixity of tenure in their office and a measure of security against the latter days. This must have done much in the past, and must be doing much in the present, to make for a measure of ease that every musician should enjoy. Only a rich city, and one with public-spirited men in it, could carry on work that is designed to be good rather than profitable; there have been years when the deficit has approached £9000, but it has been cheerfully met. The chief items of outlay are, of course, the conductor and the soloists, and the fee paid to the first-named is one of the prizes of the musical profession. It is not for a modest sum that one of the great lights of the European world of music crosses the Atlantic even to conduct a fine orchestra in a concert hall that is probably second to none.

COMMON CHORD.

Address Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 11 1912

Established:

Conductor And Artists Of Boston Symphony

FRITZ KREISLER

ELENA GERHART

DR. KARL MUCK

MAX PAUER

Boston Symphony Plans Feast For Music Lovers

Few musical conductors who have visited Baltimore in past years ever have won for themselves such popularity among local music lovers as that enjoyed by Dr. Karl Muck, who has rejoined the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will appear in this city five times during the approaching musical season.

To most Baltimoreans who have seen or met Dr. Muck in his visits to this city of a few years ago, when he appeared in the same capacity, there is something truly magnetic about the man and his work. Of slight build, with thin, sharp features and face animated with firmness and sincerity, Dr. Muck in wielding the baton impresses one with his every movement of earnestness of purpose, stability of conviction and effectiveness of desire. The men around him understand him thoroughly and love him, and their deep respect for his ability as a profound musician is reflected in their own crisp responsiveness.

The two years that Dr. Muck was at the head of the Boston Symphony—1906 and 1907—were among the most notable in the history of the organization. And nowhere did conductor and orchestra make a deeper and more favorable impression than in Baltimore. During the last four years Dr. Muck was the musical director of the Royal Opera in Berlin, with the title of general music director to the King of Prussia. His present contract with the Boston Symphony is for five years.

The coming Baltimore concerts will be given on the evenings of November 6, December 4, January 8, February 19 and March 19. The general sale of season tickets will be begun at Albaugh's next Monday morning. The number of renewals by last year's subscribers has been unusually large, and the demand for tickets seems to be much greater than ever before.

The first concert will be entirely orchestral, but at each of the subsequent performances of the series there will be a distinguished soloist. On December 4 Fritz Kreisler, in many respects the greatest violinist before the American public, will play, very likely in one of the great concertos.

In January the soloist will be Miss Elena Gerhardt, soprano, who came to America for the first time last winter and brought with her a well-earned reputation as one of the most popular concert singers of Europe. She appeared with the orchestra in Boston and made such a favorable impression that she was engaged almost instantaneously for a series of concerts this winter.

The February concert will bring to this city a pianist not new merely to Baltimore but to all America. He is Max Pauer, of Stuttgart. Pauer is held in extraordinary esteem in the musical circles of Germany, Austria, Russia and England. He is one of the greatest classical players of the day, say European critics.

At the March concert the soloist will be Otto Urack, who is at the first desk in the cello section of the orchestra, being the successor in the organization of Alwin Schroeder. Urack was for the last few summers solo cellist of the Bayreuth Festival Orchestra, the most honorable post of its kind in Europe, and was previously in the Royal Court Orchestra of

---

From SUN
Address: New York
Date OCT 13 1912

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its thirty-second season in Boston with the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon and the first concert last evening. The programme presented by Dr. Muck consisted of the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven; the Roman Carnival Overture of Berlioz; Liszt's symphonic poem "Mazeppa" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The return of Dr. Muck to Boston was signalized by renewed interest in the orchestra and its auction sales made new records. The sale of season tickets for the New York concerts, which has been in progress at Carnegie Hall, has come up to expectations and there are very few desirable seats left for either series. Those not already subscribed for will be sold long before the first concert in November.

From NEW
Address: New York City.
Date OCT 13 1912

Das Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſter hat ſeine 32. Saiſon in der verfloſſenen Woche mit gewaltigem Erfolg in Boſton begonnen, wobei Dr. Muck, der nach einer Pauſe von vier Jahren bekanntlich wieder an die Spitze des berühmten Orcheſters getreten iſt, einen vollen Erfolg davontrug. Er dirigirte Beethoven's „Eroica", Liszt's „Mazeppa", die „Römiſche Karneval-Ouverture" von Berlioz und das Vorſpiel zu den „Meiſterſingern". Der Verkauf der noch vorhandenen Sitze für die beiden Serien New Yorker Konzerte iſt ein ſo reger, daß die wenigen noch verfügbaren Sitze vor dem erſten Konzert längſt in feſten Händen ſein werden.

Morgen, Montag, Vormittag, beginnt an den Kaſſen von Carnegie Hall und der Brooklyner Academy of Muſic der Verkauf für die Konzert-Serien der Philharmoniſchen Geſellſchaft.

Die diesjährigen Konzerte der Symphonie Geſellſchaft unter der Leitung von Herrn Walter Damroſch finden in der neuen Aeolian Hall, Weſt 43. Str., nahe der 6. Avenue, ſtatt. Der Perſonalbeſtand des Orcheſters iſt nahezu unverändert. Herr Damroſch verſpricht eine lange Liſte intereſſanter Novitäten.

Die Ruſſiſche Symphonie Geſellſchaft kündigt für die kommende Saiſon drei Konzerte unter Leitung von Herrn Modeſt Altſchuler an, welche in der Aeolian Hall ſtattfinden werden. Wie gewöhnlich hat Herr Altſchuler auch diesmal für gute Novitäten ruſſiſcher Provenienz geſorgt.

Newspaper Cutting

From POST
Address: New York
Date OCT 12 1912

Dr. Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, thinks there is "too much composition being done by little men in Germany to-day. They are all copyists of the greater men, and follow blindly in their tracks, with the result that they lack all individuality."

In a conversation with Philip Hale, of the Boston Herald, Dr. Muck declared that neither in Scandinavia, Russia, the Netherlands, France, nor Germany does he know of young composers that give genuine promise. Bischoff's second symphony is not equal to his first. Glazounoff writes a symphony at least every six months, and is a victim to routine; the younger Scandinavians ape Grieg—and their music is Grieg and water, or, rather, water with a tincture of Grieg.

Concerning the "musical" anarchist, Arnold Schönberg, one of whose pieces was recently hissed in London, Dr. Muck said that he cannot make out this man's music. "He puts C major, D major, E major in juxtaposition, without any harmonic pretext known to even radicals, and the result is to me—well, I do not understand it, and it is hard for me to believe that the composer is sincere. Now, Debussy's harmonic scheme, while it is highly original, is logical and effective."

Some time ago it was reported that Richard Strauss had nearly completed an Alpine symphony, and the scheme of it was described in detail. Strauss made a curious confession to his late colleague, Dr. Muck. He said that since he has had much to do in the opera house, his invention has flagged when he has set himself to work on absolute music. "When I read a libretto, and am able to see in my mind the characters and the situations on the stage, then my mind is active, and ideas readily come. It is wholly the contrary if there be question of a symphonic work. I have completed the first movement of the 'Alpine' symphony. I may turn it into a symphonic poem, for at present I cannot continue it, and have no thoughts for the other movements."

From AMERICAN
Address: New York
Date OCT 13 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give its opening event in New York on November 7, began its season in Boston last Friday afternoon, with Dr. Carl Muck holding the baton. Dr. Muck's return to the conductor's desk, after an absence of five years, was observed by an exceptionally dignified programme, the numbers given consisting of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, "The Roman Carneval," by Berlioz; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

Est 384

From
Address
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony orchestra are reminded that they have only up to Saturday, Oct. 12, in which to renew their subscriptions and secure the seats held by them last year. A large majority of former subscribers have already renewed, but a few are yet to be heard from.

All communications should be addressed to Mr. C. A. Ellis, care of M. Steinert & Sons Co., 505 Westminster street. The general sale of season tickets to new subscribers will open at Steinert's next Monday morning, Oct. 14.

1884

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
OCT 13 1912
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its thirty-second season in Boston with the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon last and the first concert last evening. The programme presented by Dr. Muck consisted of the "Eroica" Symphony by Beethoven; the Roman Carnival overture of Berlioz; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The return of Dr. Muck to Boston was signalized by renewed interest in the orchestra and its aution sales made new records. The renewal of subscriptions which has been proceeding at the Institute of Arts and Sciences for the Brooklyn concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra indicates that the final subscription will be quite as large as last year, if not even larger, although there is not much room for increase, as nearly the whole house was sold by subscription for the season of 1911-1912. Last year's subscribers have until October 19 in which to renew, and the sale, as heretofore announced, to new subscribers, will open at the box office of the Academy of Music on October 25.

Estab 884

From EVG. NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 10 1912

For Boston Symphony

The Baltimore season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra promises to be one of the best that organization has ever had here. The renewal of subscriptions has been in progress for the last week. This is the last day on which this can be done. O[illegible] Monday at Albaugh's such [illegible] tickets as have not ben taken [illegible] last year's subscribers will be placed on sale.

Es 1884

From MORNING TELEGR PH
Address: New York.
OCT 13 1912
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its thirty-second season in Boston with the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon and the first concert last evening. The programme presented by Dr. Muck consisted of the "Eroica" Symphony by Beethoven, the Roman Carnival Overture of Berlioz, Liszt's "Mazeppa" symphonic poem and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nurem-

The return of Dr. Muck to Boston was signalized by renewed interest in the orchestra and its auction sales made new records. The sale of season tickets for the New York concerts, which has been in progress at Carnegie Hall, has come up to expectations and there are very few desirable seats left for either series. Those not already subscribed for will be sold long before the first concert in November.

Est 34

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 12 1912

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its thirty-second season in Boston with the public rehearsal yesterday afternoon, and will give its first concert this evening. The programme to be presented by Dr. Muck consists of the "Eroica" Symphony, by Beethoven; the Roman Carnival Overture of Berlioz; Liszt's symphonic poem "Mazeppa," and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The return of Dr. Muck to Boston was signalized by renewed interest in the orchestra and its auction The renewal of subscriptions, which sales made new records. has been proceeding at the Institute of Arts and Sciences for the Brooklyn concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, indicates that the final subscription will be quite as large as last year, if not even larger, although there is not much room for increase, as nearly the whole house was sold by subscription for the season of 1911-1912. Last year's subscribers have until Oct. 19 in which to renew, and the sale, as heretofore announced, to new subscribers, will open at the box office of the Academy of Music on Oct. 25.

Establi

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 13 1912

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its thirty-second season in Boston with a public rehearsal on Friday afternoon and the first concert, last evening. The programme presented by Dr. Muck consisted of the "Eroica" Symphony by Beethoven; the Roman Carnival Overture of Berlioz; Liszt's symphonic poem "Mazeppa," and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The return of Dr. Muck to Boston was signalized by renewed interest in the orchestra and its auction sales made new records.

Es 884

From TIMES
Address: New York.
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its thirty-second season in Boston with the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon and the first concert last evening. The programme presented by Dr. Muck consisted of the "Eroica" Symphony by Beethoven, the Roman Carnival Overture of Berlioz, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The return of Dr. Muck to Boston was signalized by renewed interest in the orchestra, and its auction sales made new records. The sale of season tickets for the New York concerts, which has been in progress at Carnegie Hall, has come up to expectations, and there are very few desirable seats left for either series.

Establis

From EVG. MAIL
OCT 12 1912
Address: New York.
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has opened its thirty-second season in Boston under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, whose return was long awaited. The first New York concerts will be given in November.

1884

Newspaper

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.
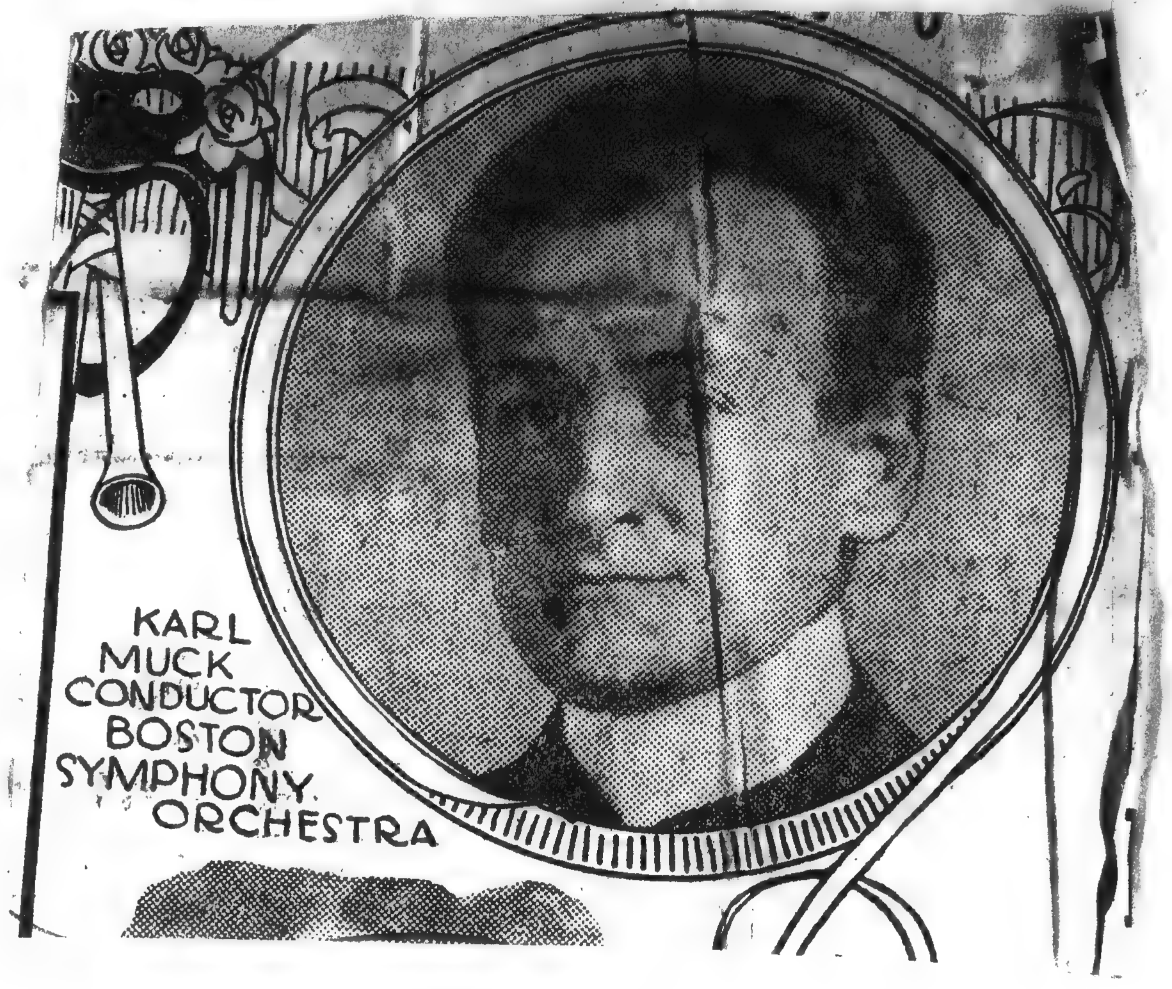
D

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its thirty-second season in Boston with the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon and the first concert last evening. The programme presented by Dr. Muck consisted of the "Eroica" Symphony, by Beethoven; the Roman Carnival Overture of Berlioz; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The return of Dr. Muck to Boston was signalized by renewed interest in the orchestra, and its auction sales made new records. The sale of season tickets for the New York concerts, which has been in progress at Carnegie Hall, has come up to expectations, and there are very few desirable seats left for either series. Those not already subscribed for will be sold long before the first concert, in November.

, 1884



KARL MUCK CONDUCTOR BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

From PRESS
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
3
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces its usual distinguished list of soloists for the concert it is to give in Philadelphia during the coming season. As the first concert will be in a sense a celebration of the return of Dr. Muck to the orchestra, the program will be entirely orchestral, but at each of the following four concerts there will be a soloist of highest rank, two of them quite new to Philadelphia. These soloists will be two singers—Madame Matzenauer, of the Metropolitan Company, and Julia Culp; one violinist, Fritz Kreisler; and one pianist, Max Pauer.

Madame Matzenauer needs no introduction to Philadelphia, although she is yet to be heard here on the concert stage. Fritz Kreisler, who is to be the soloist at the December concert, will make his only appearance of the year with the Boston Orchestra. He comes to America, this season, for a few weeks, under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony and his only appearances in the East are with that organization.

Max Pauer and Julia Culp are names new not merely to Philadelphia but to America. Pauer is one of the most distinguished pianists of Germany. None is held in higher esteem in his own country or in Austria, Russia or England. He is regarded as a master of the classics and while he does not necessarily specialize in these, it is as an interpreter of the great composers—Brahms, Schumann, Beethoven, Bach, and the like, that he has won his greatest fame. On the other side, he is not only a favorite with the general public, but his playing is regarded as of inestimable value to students.

Much interest has been raised by the announcement of the coming to America of Julia Culp, the distinguished Dutch mezzo-soprano. She is one of the two or three women like Elena Gerhardt and Tilly Koenen who have withstood the temptations of the operatic stage and confined themselves entirely to concert work. For several years now her recitals in London, Paris, Berlin, Vienna and St. Petersburg have been notably marked by overflowing houses. She is said to be a woman of most engaging personality, the possessor of more than usually beautiful voice and a musician of high attainments.

The general sale of season tickets to new subscribers will open at Miss Harris' ticket office, 1119 Chestnut Street, to-morrow morning. The five concerts will be in Academy of Music, on Monday evenings, the dates being: November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17.

Esta 884

From EVG. JOURNAL
Address: New York
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its thirty-second season this year under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, last night in Boston, and will open its New York series of ten concerts in Carnegie Hall next month. Dr. Muck's opening programme was most conservative, including the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven and Berlioz, Liszt and Wagner filling out the rest of the evening.

k, 1884

From AMERICAN
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 13 1912

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The general sale of season tickets to new subscribers for the five concerts the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in Baltimore during the coming season will open at Albaugh's ticket agency, Charles and Fayette streets, tomorrow morning, October 14. The concerts are to be given as in the past, on Wednesday evenings, the dates being November 6, December 4, January 8, February 19 and March 19. The number of renewals by last year's subscribers has been unusually large and the demand for tickets seems to be much greater than ever before.

Interest in the season of 1912-1913 is heightened by the return to America as conductor of the Boston Symphony of Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin. The two years that Dr. Muck was at the head of the orchestra—in 1906 and 1907—were among the most notable in its history and nowhere did he make a deeper impression upon the musical public than here in Baltimore.

The management of the orchestra takes pleasure in announcing four most distinguished soloists. At the first concert, which will mark Dr. Muck's return, the program will be purely orchestral. For the second concert Fritz Kreisler has been engaged. Mr. Kreisler is in many respects the greatest violinist now before the public.

In January the soloist will be Miss Elena Gerhardt. Miss Gerhardt came to America for the first time last winter and brought with her a well-earned reputation of being one of the most distinguished concert singers of Europe.

The February concert will bring a new pianist, new not merely to Baltimore, but new to America. This is Max Pauer, of Stuttgart. Pauer, while not belonging to the sensational school of pianists, is a man held in extraordinarily high esteem in Germany, Austria, Russia and England, where he has been concertizing many years.

At the last concert in March the soloist will be Otto Urack, who is the successor in the orchestra of Mr. Alvin Schroeder. Mr. Urack is one of the most notable young men in Germany.

From EVG. STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date OCT 13 1912

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Seven years ago the Boston Symphony Orchestra, after a lapse of several seasons, resumed its concerts in Washington, and these years have been marked with success from every point of view. The concerts given at monthly intervals Tuesday afternoons in the New National Theater have been attended by notable audiences in size and in quality. The coming season promises to fully equal the past. The concerts will be given as usual Tuesday afternoons at half-past 4, the dates being November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18. The general sale of season tickets to new subscribers opens at Droop's music store Wednesday morning.

Interest in the season of 1912-13 is heightened by the return to America as conductor of the Boston symphony of Dr. Karl Muck of Berlin. The two years that Dr. Muck was at the head of the orchestra, in 1906 and 1907, were among the most notable in its history.

Four soloists are announced. At the first concert the program will be purely orchestral. For the second concert Fritz Kreisler, one of the greatest violinists now before the public, has been engaged.

In January the soloist will be Miss Elene Gerhardt, who came to America for the first time last winter with the reputation of being one of the most distinguished concert singers of Europe, a soprano, the possessor of a more than usually beautiful voice, added to a keen musical intelligence and faultless taste.

The February concert will bring a pianist new to America, Max Pauer of Stuttgart. Mr. Pauer, while not belonging to the sensational school of pianists, is said to be held in very high esteem in Germany, Austria, Russia and England, where he has been concertizing many years.

At the last concert, in March, the soloist will be Otto Urack, the successor in the orchestra of Alwin Schroeder. For the last several summers he has been the solo cellist in the Bayreuth Festival Orchestra, the most honorable post of its kind in Europe. He was formerly in the Royal Court Orchestra of Berlin.

Conductor and Soloists of Boston Symphony

FRITZ KREISLER
MME MATZENAUER
PHOTO BY MISHKIN
DR KARL MUCK, CONDUCTOR
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
PHOTO BY GAR
MAX PAUER
JULIA CULP

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Musical Notes

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces its usual distinguished list of soloists for the concerts it is to give in Philadelphia during the coming season. As the first concert will be in a sense a celebration of the return of Doctor Muck to the orchestra, the programme will be entirely orchestral, but at each of the following four concerts there will be a soloist of the highest rank, two of them quite new to Philadelphia. These soloists will be two singers—Madame Matzenauer, of the Metropolitan company, and Julia Culp; one violinist, Fritz Kreisler, and one pianist, Max Pauer.

Madame Matzenauer needs no introduction to Philadelphia, although she is yet to be heard here on the concert stage. This remarkable artist came to America a year ago from Munich almost unheralded, and she was, conservatively speaking, the principal sensation of New York opera. A woman of stately presence, the possessor of a wonderful voice, she unites with these qualities a keen musical intelligence and a flawless taste, which are none too common among the singers of our day. Fritz Kreisler, who is to be the soloist at the December concert, will make his only appearance of the year with the Boston orchestra. He comes to America this season for a few weeks under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony, and his only appearances in the East are with that organization. The years that Kreisler has been away have, from all accounts, made his art riper than ever, and he holds securely his position as one of the very greatest violinists of the world. His favor in public has increased consequently, and today there is no artist more popular than he.

Max Pauer and Julia Culp are names new not merely to Philadelphia, but to America. Pauer is one of the most distinguished pianists of Germany. None is held in higher esteem in his own country or in Austria, Russia or England. He is regarded as a master of the classics, and while he does not necessarily specialize in these, it is as an interpreter of the great composers, Brahms, Schumann, Beethoven, Bach and the like, that he has won his greatest fame. On the other side he not only is a favorite with the general public, but his playing is regarded as of inestimable value to students. Much interest has been raised by the announcement of the coming to America of Julia Culp, the distinguished Dutch mezzo-soprano. She is one of the two or three women, like Elena Gerhardt and Tilly Koenen, who have withstood the temptations of the operatic stage and confined themselves entirely to concert work. For several years now her recitals in London, Paris, Berlin, Vienna and St. Petersburg have been notably marked by overflowing houses. She is said to be a woman of most engaging personality, the possessor of a voice more than usually beautiful, and a musician of high attainments.

The general sale of season tickets to new subscribers will open at Miss Harris' office, in Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut street, tomorrow morning. The five concerts will be in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, the dates being November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17.

From Address PA
Date

W. Wright.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's first concert of the season, under the direction of Carl Muck, will be given at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 4, the succeeding dates, on four Monday evenings, being December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17. The four soloists announced are Mme. Matzenauer, contralto; Fritz Kreisler, violinist; Max Pauer, pianist, and Julia Culp, mezzo-soprano.

From INQUIRER
Address. Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

MADE A NOTE OF

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces its usual distinguished list of soloists for the concerts it is to give in Philadelphia during the coming season. As the first concert will be in a sense a celebration of the return of Dr. Muck to the orchestra, the program will be entirely orchestral, but at each of the following four concerts there will be a soloist of highest rank, two of them quite new to Philadelphia. These soloists will be two singers—Madame Matzenauer, of the Metropolitan Company, and Julia Culp; one violinist, Fritz Kreisler, and one pianist, Max Pauer. The general sale of season tickets to new subscribers will open at Miss Harris' ticket office in Heppe's piano rooms, 1119 Chestnut street, tomorrow (Monday) morning. The five concerts will be in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, the dates being November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17.

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 12 1912

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

With Dr. Muck again at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with the infusion of considerable new blood into the personnel of the orchestra and with a list of most distinguished soloists, the coming season of Boston's great orchestra in Baltimore, which is the twenty-eighth consecutive season in which it has come to this city, promises to exceed all others in brilliancy, artistically, materially and socially. The number of renewals of last year's subscribers has passed all expectations, and when the season tickets have been sold to new subscribers there will be very little left for the casual patron. The general sale of season tickets to new subscribers opens Monday morning, October 14, at Albaugh's Ticket Agency, Fayette and Charles streets.

That Dr. Muck has finally abandoned Berlin and has come to America to make his home in Boston and to be for at least five years at the head of the orchestra of that city, is a matter of congratulation to everybody interested in the cause of music in this country.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date OCT 13 191

Boston Symphony Seat Sale.

It is seven years ago that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, after a lapse of several seasons, resumed its concerts in Washington, and these years have been marked with utmost success from every point of view. The concerts have been attended by most notable audiences. The coming season promises fully to equal the past. The concerts will be given at the National, as usual, on Tuesday afternoons at 4:30, the dates being November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18, and March 18. The general sale of season tickets to new subscribers opens at Droop's music store next Wednesday morning, October 16.

The management of the orchestra takes pleasure in announcing four most distinguished soloists. At the first concert, which will mark Dr. Karl Muck's return, the program will be purely orchestral. For the second concert Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, has been engaged.

In January the soloist will be Miss Elene Gerhardt, soprano, much of whose coaching was done with the distinguished conductor, Arthur Nikisch. The February concert will bring a new pianist, new not merely to Washington, but new to America. This is Max Pauer, of Stuttgart. At the last concert in March the soloist will be Otto Urack, who is the successor in the orchestra of Alwin Schroeder, Mr. Urack sharing the first desk of the cello section with Heinrich Warnke.

Newspaper

From
Address
Date

Dr. Karl Muck, who this season resumes the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived last Tuesday on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie, after an absence of four years, bringing with him three new members of the orchestra, Otto Urack, who succeeds Alwin Schroeder at the first desk of the 'cellist; Maurice Koessler, one of the new first violins, and Bruno Steinke, one of the new cellists.

Otto Urack has an enviable reputation as a 'cellist, musician and con conductor. For the past few seasons he has been principal 'cellist of the Festival Orchestra of Bayreuth, and has done much operatic and concert conducting in the lower Rhenish cities.

Among the newcomers that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have this year is Walther Habenichl, for the last three seasons concertmaster of the Keil Philharmonic Orchestra. Habenichl comes to Boston to be the leader of the second violins. The woodwind section will be strengthened through the coming from Paris of Albert Chevriot, flutist, and Pierre Fosse, oboist. Both these musicians are young men and are winners of the first prize in the Paris Conservatoire.

The plans for the season of the Orchestra are now complete. The season begins in Boston with the first public rehearsal on Friday, October 11, and ends with the last concert on May 3. Between those two dates 110 concerts will be given—eight less than last year. The Orchestra is called together for its first rehearsal to-day.

The Orchestra will give its usual series of five evening concerts in this city at the Academy of Music during the coming season on Monday evenings, November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17.

[40]

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 13 1912

The prospectus for the Philadelphia season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra calls for the usual five concerts on Monday evenings, the dates being November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17. Four soloists are announced. Two of them are singers—Madame Matzenauer, of the Metropolitan Company, New York, and Julia Culp. The other two are Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Max Pauer, pianist. While these are representative artists, interest in the concerts naturally centres in the return of Dr. Karl Muck as conductor. No conductor with the orchestra has in the 31 years of its life left a deeper impression upon the general public and the orchestra itself than has this distinguished musician, who was at its head during the seasons of 1906-07 and 1907-08. He seemed to bring to the orchestra just what it needed. In the words of one of the distinguished critics of New York, Dr. Muck found when he first came to America a wonderful instrument which needed only the vivifying impulse of genius to make perfect. This influence he brought to the orchestra and he left it not merely a marvelous machine, but a really living instrument.

No soloist is scheduled for the first concert in November, but in December Fritz Kreisler will make his only appearance of the year. He comes to America this winter for a few weeks under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and his only appearances in the East will be with that organization. Madame Matzenauer was the great dramatic discovery of last season. She came to America practically unheralded, but before the season had run many weeks she had become one of the most notable figures in the Metropolitan Opera House.

In February the soloist will be Max Pauer, who is making his first visit to America. Pauer is regarded as one of the classical giants of Germany. In London, Berlin, Vienna and other German cities no pianist is held in higher esteem.

The fourth and last soloist, Julia Culp, is a native of Holland and, like two or three other distinguished singers of her time, has devoted herself entirely to the concert stage. She brings with her the reputation of being one of the most distinguished concert singers of the world.

DR. KARL MUCK.

JOURNAL
From PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Address OCT
Date

pose.

* * *

Former subscribers to the Boston symphony series have been busy during the past week renewing their reservations, and to-morrow the general sale of season tickets to the five concerts will open at Steinert's music store. The management has announced the order in which the five soloists will appear, as follows:

Oct. 22—Mme. Marie Rappold of the Metropolitan Opera Company, the dramatic soprano.

Nov. 19—Fritz Kreisler, the Austrian violinist, who comes to America this year under exclusive contract to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dec. 31.—Elena Gerhardt, soprano,

Dr. Karl Muck.
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

whose first visit to America was made last year.

Feb. 4—Norman Wilks, an English pianist, for whom this is the first season in America.

April 1—Julia Culp, the famous Dutch concert singer.

From TRIBUNE PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Address
Date

SYMPHONY SOLOISTS.

Three Singers, a Violinist and Pianists Coming Here.

Three singers of international reputation, one of the greatest violinists of our time and an English pianist who is expected to be the sensation of the coming season are announced as the soloists for the five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence during the coming season. The concerts will be given, as usual, in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evenings, the dates being Oct. 22, Nov. 19, Dec. 31, Feb. 4 and April 1.

The three singers announced are Mme. Marie Rappold for the first concert; Miss Elena Gerhardt for the third concert, and Miss Julia Culp for the fifth. Mme. Rappold is one of the principal sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera House of New York, and her career has been almost in the nature of a fairy tale. Without any stage experience, in fact without ever having appeared in public, she was cast for the very important part of Sulamith in Goldmark's "The Queen of Sheba" four years ago and won as astounding success from the beginning.

Mme. Rappold had never to undergo the long apprenticeship of the European opera house. In fact, she was a famous singer before she ever appeared in Europe, the whole of her training being in this country. She is not only one of the principal members of the Metropolitan Opera but is one of the most sought-after concert singers of to-day.

Miss Elena Gerhardt, the famous German concert singer, made her first appearances in America last year and was in many respects the great feature of the season. The possessor of a more than usually beautiful voice, she unites with this a keen musical perception and flawless taste and while she makes a specialty of song recitals, her appearances with orchestra in the greater arias are always memorable events.

Miss Julia Culp, the third singer, is a newcomer to America, for this will be her first season on this side of the Atlantic. Miss Culp is a native of Holland and her career has been principally on the Continent, although she has in the last two or three years become a great favorite in London. Like Miss Gerhardt, she is a concert singer, devoting herself to song recitals and to appearances with orchestra. She is said to have a mezzo-soprano voice of great beauty and is regarded as one of the greatest artists of our time.

The violinist, Fritz Kreisler, has been unrivalled among men of our time and generation. He comes to America this year under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his only appearances in the East will be with that organization.

Finally, Norman Wilks, the English pianist, who is preceded by a most enviable reputation. His playing has been for the past two years one of the sensations of Berlin and his appearances in London always means overflowing houses. It is expected that he will be a most valuable addition to the musical season if 1912-1913.

The prospects of the orchestra in Providence have never been better. The number of renewals has been unusually large and it is almost certain that there will be very few seats left for the individual concerts.

From EVG. NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 12 1912

NOTED SOLOISTS TO BE WITH ORCHESTRA

Elena Gerhardt, Max Pauer And Otto Urack Stars Of Boston Symphony.

With Dr. Muck again at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with the infusion of considerable new blood into the personnel of the orchestra and with a list of distinguished soloists, the coming season of Boston's Orchestra in Baltimore—which is the twenty-eighth consecutive season in which it has come to this city—promises to excel all others. The general sale of season tickets for new subscribers opens Monday morning at Albaugh's.

In January the soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, German concert singer, whose appearances in America last year, when she made her first visit to this country, were among the sensations of the season.

The February soloist will be Max Pauer of Stuttgart. Pauer, curiously enough, has never before been in America although in the last 15 years he has been ranked among the giants of the piano in Europe.

The soloist at the last concert will be Otto Urack, the successor to Alwin Schroeder in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Urack comes to America from Berlin, where for several years he has been regarded as the foremost cello virtuoso of Germany.

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date OCT 13 1912

Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the National Theater on Tuesday afternoons at 4:30 o'clock on November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18, and March 18. The general sale of season tickets to new subscribers opens at Droop's Music Store next Wednesday morning, October 16.

Interest in the season of 1912-1913 is heightened by the return to America as conductor of the Boston Symphony of Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin. During the last four years Dr. Muck has been the musical director of the Royal Opera in Berlin, but is now to be in America for several years.

The first concert will be purely orchestral, and for the second Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, has been engaged. In January, Miss Gerhardt, soprano, will be heard; in February, Max Pauer, pianist, of Stuttgart, new to America. At the last concert in March, Otto Urack, cellist, formerly of the Royal Court Orchestra, of Berling, will appear.

* * *

From Address PROVIDENCE
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra are reminded that they have only until Saturday in which to renew their subscriptions and secure the seats held by them last year. A large majority of former subscribers have already renewed, but a few are yet to be heard from.

All communications should be addressed to C. A. Ellis, care of M. Steinert & Sons Co., 505 Westminster street. The general sale of season tickets to new subscribers will open at Steinert's next Monday morning. Oct. 14.

From EVG. SUN
Address: New York
Date OCT 14 1912

After a week of private drill, the Boston Symphony Orchestra began its thirty-second season in Boston on Saturday night. The programme presented by Dr. Muck consisted of the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz, Liszt's "Mazeppa" and Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers."

Dr. Muck's return to Boston is officially stated to have renewed public interest in the orchestra, and its famous "auction sales" made new records at Symphony Hall.

The agents for New York, at Carnegie Hall, report very few desirable seats left for the first concert here in November.

[41]

October 19-1912

BOSTON POST,
OCTOBER 17,

THIS WEEK'S PAIR OF SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The Symphony concerts of this week which will be played tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening, present as soloist Madame Marie Rappold of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Madame Rappold makes her second appearance as soloist of the Symphony Orchestra in this city. She will sing Elizabeth's greeting, from the second act of "Tannhauser," and two songs with orchestra—"Chanson Provencale," by dell'Acqua, and "Fruhlingsnacht," by Van der Stucken.

The Symphony will be Sgambati's in D-Major, No. 1, Op. 16, which was played here twice when Mr. Paur was conductor. The first number will be Pfitzner's overture to "The Little Christ Child," and the second orchestral number will be Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn. The symphony comes at the end.

OCTOBER 18,
TRANSCRIPT,

NEWS OF MUSIC

Dr. Muck Reappears in Cambridge and Repeats His First Programme—An Apt English Comparison—Miss Genee Promises a Revival—Items and Opinion

DR. MUCK does not court applause and his audience seems somehow to have caught a hint of his disposition toward it. A week ago, when he returned to Boston, his audiences in Symphony Hall received him warmly but briefly, and again last evening, when he reappeared in Cambridge, the applause in Sanders Theatre was hearty and short. He and the orchestra repeated there the pieces with which they had also begun the season in Boston: Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony; Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival"; Liszt's tone-poem, "Mazeppa" and the prelude to Wagner's operatic comedy, "Die Meistersinger." The performance of all this music did not differ materially from that which it received last week in Symphony Hall, but it gained, as all music and all performances do, by the superior resonance of the wooden walls of Sanders Theatre. Acoustically, Symphony Hall is not what the experts call a "lively" auditorium. Sanders Theatre is, and an orchestra that has been actually reduced in numbers seems there to be multiplied.

Once more, the conductor and his men made the "Eroica" symphony sound as it has not sounded before hereabouts within long memory. The music unrolled itself in the great design and with the great voice of Beethoven in sustained and climacteric continuity. Yet within that design were diversity of structural line, variety of tonal force, significant shadings and transitions, unforced modulations and contrasts, each apt and imaginative in its place. The voice spoke with many emotions, isolated or blended, of stress of struggling spirit, of heroic lament, of tumultuous elation and release, yet always it was the voice of Beethoven's melody, mighty to persuade. Beside such music so performed, "Mazeppa" did seem a poor and tawdry, a rhetorical and theatrical thing. Perhaps, after all, the years have sifted Liszt's tone-poems wisely when they let "Mazeppa" run through the sieve into semi-oblivion. And Berlioz's overture, in comparison, seemed no more than brilliant and ornate tone-picturing. Only the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" quite held its own, and at last Dr. Muck had persuaded the orchestra to fling it off as a white-hot and almost racing improvisation upon the joy of life in young and old Nuremberg. Perhaps Wagner wrote it so. Perhaps had he sat in Sanders Theatre, he would have thought that some of his contrapuntal detailing merely raced by.

NOVEMBER 9,
ADVERTISER,

Music Notes.

The fifth programme of the Symphony Orchestra which will be given on Friday and Saturday comprises the first symphony of Sibelius in E-Minor, Glazounoff's Overture "Solennelle," Tschaikowsky's Second Concerto in C-Major and Chabrier's "Espana" Rhapsody, the soloist being George Proctor.

Sunday night, Nov. 17, in Symphony hall, is the first of the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra for the increase of its Pension Fund. The programme will consist of the overtures to "Rienzi" and "The Flying Dutchman"; the preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristan," "Die Meistersinger" and "Parsifal"; the orchestral glorification of Siegfried in "Gotterdammerung" and the Venusberg music from "Tannhauser."

The Philharmonic, Josef Stransky and Mischa Elman, soloist, appear at Symphony hall tomorrow.

OCTOBER 19,
GLOBE-

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Mme Rappold Is Effective in Two Arias.

Sgambati, Pfitzner and Brahms Are Represented on Program.

The program of the second public Symphony rehearsal, with Mme Marie Rappold of the Metropolitan Opera House as soloist, was as follows: Sgambati, symphony in D major, No. 1, op 16; Wagner, Elisabeth's greeting to the hall of song from the second act of "Tannhauser;" Pfitzner, overture to "The Little Christ-Elf;" Weber, recit and aria of Agathe from "Der Freischuetz;" Brahms' Variations on a Theme of Josef Haydn.

It is said that Sgambati has not received due apreciation at the hands of his countrymen. He is a unique, in a sense, an isolated figure. Even as Wolf-Ferarri turned his face toward foreign musical gods, so Sgambati, before him, disregarded Italian models and, looking across the Alps, turned his muse to that of the Germans. Eliminate the operatic element from Italian music today, and what remains for chamber music and the symphonic orchestra is not significant. Sgambati's contributions to these forms have impressed more than his Italian contemporaries.

ADVERTISER,
OCTOBER 19,

FINE PROGRAMME AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

DR. MUCK ESPECIALLY GREAT IN BRAHMS

Gave Masterly Reading to Variations on a Theme—Mme. Rappold the Soloist.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Sgambati—Symphony in D major, No. 1.
Wagner—Elizabeth's Greeting to the Hall, from "Tannhaeuser."
Mme. Marie Rappold.
Pfitzner—Overture to "The Little Christ-child."
Weber—Prayer Scene from "Der Freischutz."
Mme. Rappold.
Brahms—Variations on a Theme by Haydn.

An interesting programme, and, like the first one, not too wildly modern. The only composer who indulged in dry progressions and turgid counterpoint was Pfitzner, who will never be called a "Honey Pfitz" (as our present mayor is), for he is sometimes rather turgid for so gentle a subject as "Christelflein"—The Christ elf. He brings in melodies that suggest the direct simplicity of folk-themes, and just as we begin to congratulate ourselves on finding a new Humperdinck, he smothers them in ponderous counterpoint as ruthlessly as the princes were smothered in the tower. He gives much ingenious figure treatment, which may be the right thing, but is in the wrong place. The "elfin" part is rather in the title than in the music. But, for all this, there are dainty carollings at times, there is attractive treatment of rhythm, and there is a very attractive ending. The work deserved more applause than it received. In fact, the audience was too reserved during the entire concert.

HERALD,
OCTOBER 19,

MUCK REVIVES OLD SYMPHONY

Sgambati's Work Is a Pleasing Italian Germanization of Artistic Intention.

MME. RAPPOLD WAS SOLOIST

Sings Familiar Arias, and Brahms and Pfitzner Complete Program.

By PHILIP HALE.

The second public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mme. Marie Rappold, soprano, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony in D major, No. 1........Sgambati
Elisabeth's Greeting, "Tannhaeuser"..Wagner
Overture to "The Little Christ-Elf"...Pfitzner
Agathe's scene and aria from "Der Freischuetz"........................Weber Variations on a theme of Haydn........Brahms

We have not heard Sgambati's symphony for 14 years. Much water has flowed under the bridge since 1898, and the hearers of that year now listen to music that would then have seemed incredible, if not impossible. It does not matter what was written about the symphony then; it was long ago forgotten, and unfortunate, indeed, are those who never change opinion or belief, to whom no great light appears on the road to Damascus. The symphony still lives, whether it was then liked or disliked, or whether the critics, smiling, put the question by.

Sgambati, an Italian with an English mother, was a serious person in music from the beginning, and was greatly influenced by Liszt. As pianist, and as concert giver, Sgambati fought valiantly for German music. Brahms was no more foreign to him than was Beethoven; he was interested in Schumann and Wagner alike; but Liszt undoubtedly moulded him. It is natural to say that this Italian heard his own music the other side of the Alps. It would be unjust to say that he denied his enviable birthright. If there is abundant evidence of German influence in this symphony, there are also unmistakable manifestations of Italian sentiment and expression. Nor is the composer's nationality revealed only in the Serenata. In the second movement, and even in the Scherzo, there is the suggestion of the solemn festal music in a Roman basilica. Furthermore, in allegro passages there is a peculiar vivacity that we do not associate with either French or German composers; a vivacity that is not idly gay, a vivacity that does not remind one of Milton's unwieldy elephant wreathing his lithe proboscis to make our first parents mirth; nor in the allegro is there the demoniac spirit that at times gives character to an otherwise inconspicuous German scherzo.

This Italian composer has not the gift of original melodic invention. Perhaps this is the reason why. Unlike his fellow countrymen, he has not sought fame in the opera house; but his themes are not dry or sterile. There are no great moments in the symphony; there is no deep emotion; there are no passionate outbursts; but this music has other qualities that are not to be ignored, much less despised. There is always the honorable, artistic intention; there is indisputable skill in the expression. There is a sense of proportion; there are interesting harmonic progressions—it should be remembered that the symphony is over 30 years old; there is ingenuity in the blending and the contrasting of instrumental timbres; there is rhythmic variety; the climaxes are intelligently and effectively prepared. It was a good thing to hear this music again. It gave pleasure, and it reminded the audience that there are Italians who are not always cudgelling their brains to find out appropriate music for "amore," and "dolore."

Although Hans Pfitzner is a name that incites discussion in Germany—the sort of discussion in which it were well that one of the disputants should be fastened securely to his chair—his music is little known in this country. It is not probable that his operas will be performed here; his chamber music is neglected; few if any of his songs are sung by singers nervously seeking something new. Dr. Muck brought out the overture to Ilse von Ctach's fairy play when he was in Boston five years ago. The overture then made little impression, and the excellent performance yesterday did not convince us of any inherent worth lurking in the pages. However, this music was written for a play; to prepare the spectators; to put them in sensitive, recipient mood. In the theatre the purpose of the composer may have been accomplished. To those, for example, who have seen "L'Arlesienne" in Paris, the Prelude of Bizet when played in the concert hall has a keener significance. As a concert piece Pfitzner's overture contains a few agreeable passages of unaffected simplicity, but many more that are as routine work of little distinction.

The unhappy Hugo Wolf in one of his many bilious articles against Johannes Brahms cynically admitted that Brahms was a master when he wrote variations on another composer's theme, and he exclaimed: "Is not the whole of Brahms's creative work only one huge variation of the work of Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Schumann?" This is, of course, extravagant, unjust; but it is not to be denied that the great and distinguishing gift of Brahms was his skill in construction, and this skill is the dominating feature of the St. Anthony variations. Grant the suave beauty of the "Pastoral" variation, and of the variation with the Hungarian flavor, the set as a whole suffers from the monotony of the prevailing tonality, and too much of the music is interesting only by reason of flawless workmanship in the orthodox manner.

The orchestra is regaining its reputation for precision, balance, eloquent phrasing, euphony, and under Dr. Muck as interpreter and disciplinarian it will surely not lose in plasticity and passion.

Mme. Rappold of the Metropolitan Opera House is an amiable, a cheerful singer with a voice of pleasing quality. It was announced that she would sing songs by Dell' Acqua and Van der Stucken, but at rehearsals these songs were not found worthy of a symphony concert, although they might excite applause in a parlor. Would it not be well to put Agathe's scene and air on the shelf? The "prayer" is often heard in church; the long recitative-arioso passages have significance only on the operatic stage; and the final allegro is barbariously written for the voice.

The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Bischoff, symphony in E major; Wagner, A Siegfried Idyl; Weber, overture to "Euryanthe."

JOURNAL

SYMPHONY SOLOIST HAS GOLDEN VOICE

Mme. Marie Rappold Also Displays Strong Dramatic Power.

An American soloist, Mme. Marie Rappold, is leading the Symphony list this season. The New York dramatic soprano is appearing at this week's concerts, singing one of the very songs chosen for her Symphony debut four years ago, Agathe's scene and aria from "Der Freischuetz," together with a less venerable classic, Elisabeth's greeting, "Dich, theure halle," from "Tannhaeuser." It is a pity that Mme. Rappold has never taken the part of Elisabeth on the operatic stage here. Yesterday she displayed her dramatic power more clearly than ever before to a Boston audience.

As regards this particular song, Mme. Rappold has the advantage of youth and beauty to assist her in the effective delivery of a rhapsody that marks one of the finest outbursts of Wagnerian passion and melodiousness. There are prima donnas who would venture upon such a scene with distracting garments, as if dressed for the Country Club races. Mme. Rappold was a lovely apparition. But she did not forget that clothes do not make a singer, even if they can make an actress. There are dull tones in her middle register, but otherwise her voice is golden; and her dramatic talent crowns her vocal art. It flashed through her tones. The concert hall is the more trying place for the dramatic soprano, and yesterday Mme. Rappold improved the impressions she made here before.

However, it was not an afternoon remarkable for applause. The brilliancy of the Sgambati symphony number was confined largely to the orchestra, whose performance, especially of the fiery finale, was a technical feat of the highest order. The symphony, which is a novelty to the new generation, is tragic in character and rather prolix. It is a large order of Italian caviar, and the enthusiasm after it was over belonged for the most part to its admirable interpreters.

Pfitzner's delightful "Little Christ-Elf" overture, which Dr. Muck himself introduced here five years ago, and Brahms's encyclopedic "Variations on a Theme of Josef Haydn" complete the program, which will be performed again tonight.

Next week's program includes the Bischoff symphony in E major, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture.

NOVEMBER 9,
JOURNAL-

Philharmonic Society With Mischa Elman

The Philharmonic Society of New York, under the leadership of Josef Stransky, is to be heard here tomorrow afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mischa Elman, the celebrated Russian violinist, will be the soloist.

A program that will appeal to all classes of concert-goers has been arranged and it will show the famous orchestra at its best. The first number is the ever welcome "Euryanthe" overture of Weber. This will be followed by the fifth symphony of Beethoven, in C minor, and the love scene from Richard Strauss's "Feuersnot." The solo number will be the Brahms concerto in D minor. The last [illegible] will be Liszt's [illegible] poem, "Ta[illegible]

Pension Fund Concert

The return of Dr. Muck has given a fresh impetus to the pension fund concerts, as it has to the regular Symphony series, and the committee having charge of the concert which will be given Sunday evening, Nov. 17, feels secure in offering a program without a soloist, devoted entirely to Wagnerian music. Boston has few oportunities to hear such music in concert or in the Opera House. Dr. Muck confessedly dislikes the idea of Wagner in the concert room, but such is his interest in the pension fund that knowing the atraction a Wagner program has, three times during his first engagement and now at the first concert in his second engagement, he has devoted the program to such music.

The first part of the program will contain the overture to "Rienzi," the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," and the introduction and bacchanale from the first act of "Tannhaeuser." The second part will contain the prelude to "Lohengrin," the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" (but not the Liebestod), prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg," the funeral music from "Gotterdaemmerung," and finally the prelude to "Parsifal."

OCTOBER 19,

POST,

MME. RAPPOLD AT SYMPHONY

Singer at Best in Wagner Number

BY OLIN DOWNES

Mme. Marie Rappold, soprano, of the Metropolitan Opera Company was soloist at the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. She sang the air, "Dich Theure Halle," from Tannhauser, and the recitative, "Wie Nahte Mir die Schlummer," and the aria, "Leise, Leise," from "Der Freischutz." Mme. Rappold has developed as a singer since her first appearance in Boston several seasons ago. There was then, if memory serves, an evident and inconvenient break between the registers of her voice which, if it did exist, exists no more. Yesterday afternoon, too, her phrasing was usually finished and her diction clean. The voice itself has uncommon body and quality. In the Weber aria Mme. Rappold was applauded enthusiastically, and several times recalled. Still, with all its virtuosity, the eloquence of the recitative—which is far finer than the claptrap passages which occur at the last and the brilliancy of these final passages, where the composer utilizes a voice as if it were a fiddle or a clarinet—in spite of this, the air had not all of that deep conviction and a certain ineffable purity which are its sustaining qualities, nor was the transition to the final allegro as thrilling as it has been in other instances. There was more refinement, finish and genuine discernment in the music of Wagner. The greeting of Elizabeth, the expectant virgin, was better sung and better interpreted.

Italian Symphony

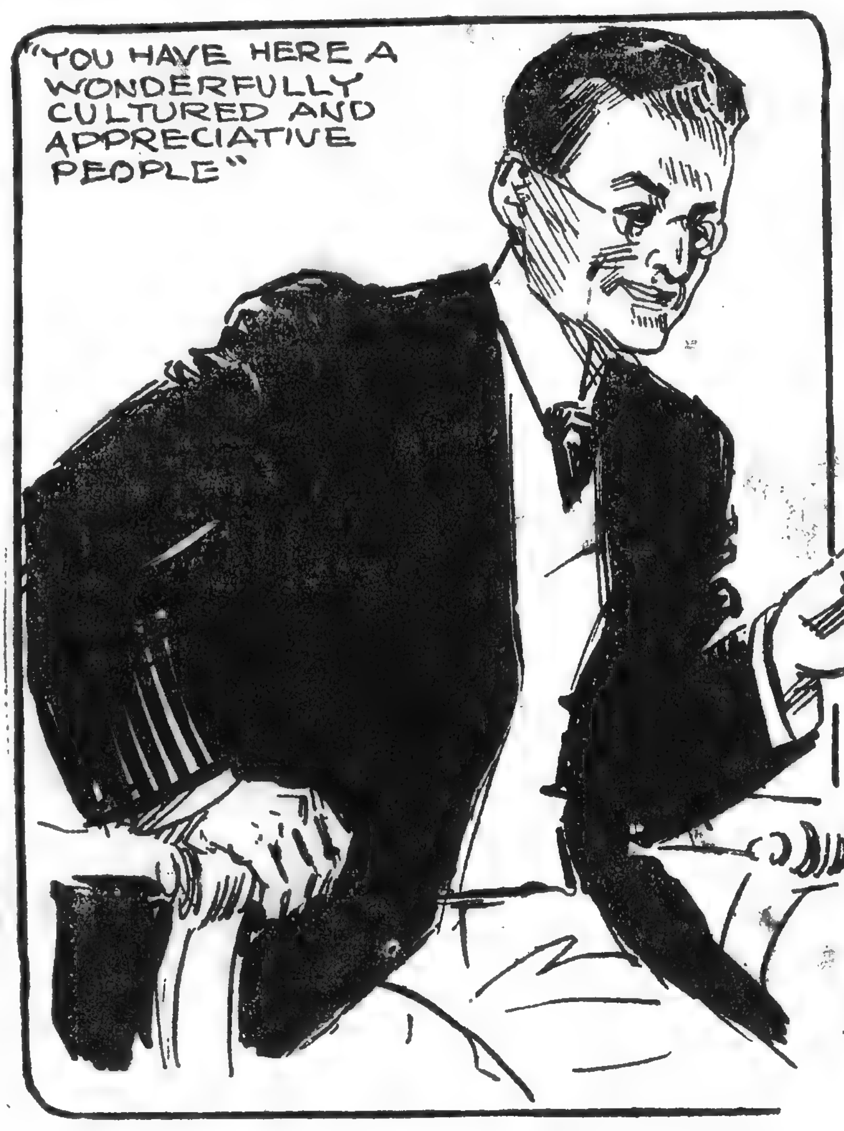
Dr. Muck revived a symphony by Sgambati, one of the few symphonies by Italians which have crossed the boundaries of Italy, and the worthy effort of one born to think as an Italian persuading himself to write in the style of the German symphonists. Shall we praise Sgambati for his fair measure of success? The symphony is ingratiating. The spectre of form has not terrified the composer out of his inherent gift for frank, gracious melody. And the symphony is formally correct. It can even show a bold dozen of measures when the composer made a heroic but feeble effort to think for himself. It is music tinged with a Tennysonian melancholy. The instrumentation is "refined." The melodic material is sometimes thin, and unworthy of such a serious symphony as Sgambati evidently set out to write, in his opening movement. Listening to this opening movement, you have heard all that the composer has to say. For reasons known to himself, Dr. Muck chose to revive the work. The symphony says nothing. It is more a suite in symphonic form than a symphony. There is no cumulative effect, either musical or emotional, which is one of the grand characteristics of the real symphony or of any work of art laid out on great lines. There is, in the last movement, bluster which is wholly unconvincing. The slow movement is well worked out, in spite of the conventionality of accompanying figures, and the weary evenness of the length of the melodies and sections. Then the symphony, for all of its tingle and chatter, commences to be a bore; 30 years old. Aye, and more than that. No more lovers!

The overture to Pfitzner's "The Little Christ-Elf," a Christmas Fairy Story in three acts by Ilse von Stach, was played here by Dr. Muck in 1907. It did not then make a profound impression. Yesterday Dr. Muck saw that the composer had all possible opportunity. Still, in spite of a few passages that stood out and distinguished themselves from what seemed to be a sort of mosaic of thematic fragments, the overture did not profoundly impress. Pfitzner has his many adherents in Germany. His opera, "Der Rose vom Liebesgarten," has been especially praised there. Is it that he is rather a gifted composer of no pronouncedly individual tendencies, than a man who can force the world to listen, whether or no?

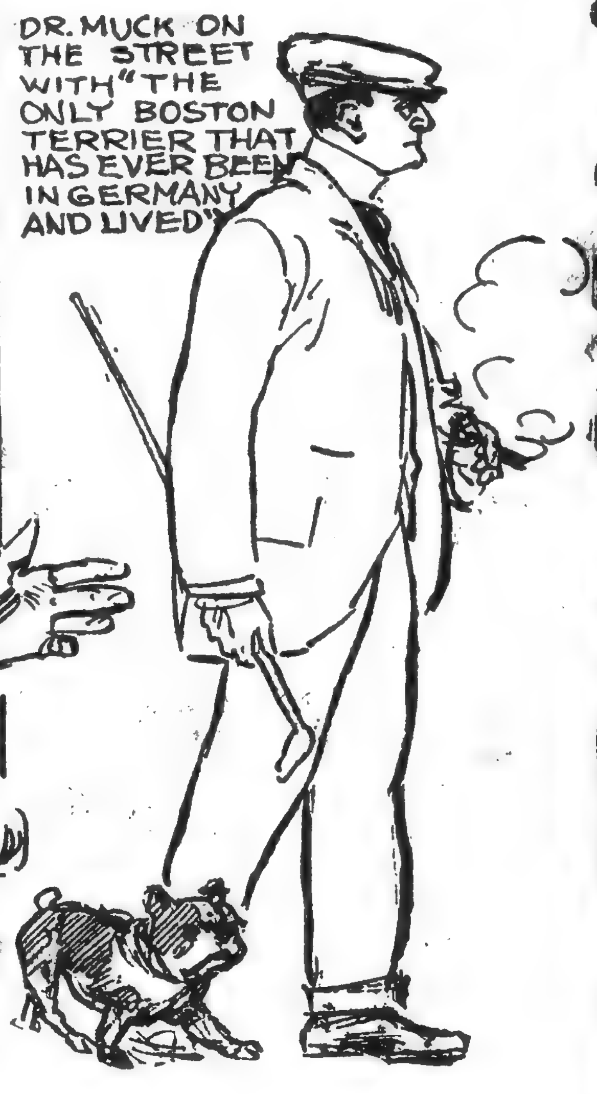
The concert closed with an admirable performance of the excellent variations of Johannes Brahms upon a theme by one Josef Haydn. The performance and the piece became, orchestrally, the most significant moments of the afternoon.

MAGAZINE, COMIC AN

Step Up and Meet Dr. Karl Muck, the Noted Conduct



"YOU HAVE HERE A WONDERFULLY CULTURED AND APPRECIATIVE PEOPLE"



DR. MUCK ON THE STREET WITH "THE ONLY BOSTON TERRIER THAT HAS EVER BEEN IN GERMANY AND LIVED"

DR KARL MUCK

Dr. Karl Muck as he is today, giving his views on music, and taki visited Germany and lived" out for a stroll. Dr. Muck doesn't

By FREDERICK JOHNS

HERE is Dr. Karl Muck, one of the greatest conductors in the world, come to Boston to lead our Symphony Orchestra. Let's us know all about him, how he looks, what he wears, what he thinks about things.

Is he getting bald? Has he grown fat? He used to be poetic; has he become prosaic? In short, what kind of a man is this new Dr. Muck that Berlin has permitted to come back to us?

These are important questions. I think musical people would rather have them answered than hear what he thinks about Max Reger, and Claude Debussy, and George Cohan. Besides, Dr. Muck is much too discreet to tell what he thinks about those people.

Therefore, have at you, Doctor Muck! I found him in his apartments at the Hotel Somerset. He was engaged in marking an instrumental part of the Liszt symphonic poem "Mazeppa," putting guide posts upon it for the benefit of the flutist or violinist who will have to perform it.

Not Long and Lean

One thinks of Doctor Muck as long and lean. I have seen cartoons which made him look like Punch, with his prominent nose and long chin almost colliding. Actually he is not a tall man, and though not fat, quite well nurtured. His face has rounded somewhat since he was last in Boston. It is a remarkably pleasant face despite long nose and chin. He is the kind of man who might sit down at your restaurant table when you were reading the "dope" on the world's series and get you into conversation without causing any resentment. His hair is well barbered and I regret to report that he is losing it in front just the way that Weingartner is parting with his raven locks. His eyes are bright and twinkle behind his spectacles.

In attire Dr. Muck is something of a sport; certainly he doesn't dress much like a musician. In fact, after interviewing many great musicians and finding them all looking like bankers or clerks, I have come to the conclusion that long hair, black string ties and cape overcoats are not a musical uniform at all.

His Bulldog Unusual

Doctor Muck wore tan shoes, dark red stockings and a cravat which looked pink in the fading daylight.

We sat down to consider what language we should talk in, when out came a Boston bull terrier and began to inspect my freshly shined boots.

"That," said Dr. Muck, impressively, "is the only Boston terrier that has ever been in Germany and lived."

"What happened to all the others?"

"They died," replied the doctor. "I do not know why it is, but Boston terriers cannot live in Germany."

Now here was an important item of news from an indisputable authority, and I pricked up my ears. Could it be that Boston terriers make the best sausages, and Boston butchers do not know it?

"Do they—er—die natural deaths?"

"But of course. They are delicate dogs and do not stand change of climate. This dog was given me by Mrs. James Storrow when I departed four years ago for Germany. He was the only one of the kind in Berlin, and was greatly admired. Now I have brought him back to his native land."

Jack Loves to Chew Dogs

"Come here, Jack," said Doctor Muck. "You are in good health, are you not? But certainly. Are you glad to be back in Boston again? But, certainly.

"He is friendly to persons, not animals," said the Doctor, and then he threw back his head and chuckled contagiously. "Jack is slightly quarrelsome in his disposition. He is a great cat killer, and other dogs he would chew up when possible."

"Our ambassador to America has tried to bring Boston terriers home to Berlin but always they have died.'

Jack climbed into a large wicker basket lined with cushions and snuggled down. The Doctor crossed the room and pulled his ears.

Thus it will be seen that great conductors are like other human beings, have many interests, and are not too fond of talking shop.

The chamber was lavishly decorated with flowers, large bouquets with white cards attached representing tribute from Boston's music lovers.

"Boston people have been very kind to us," said the doctor. "My wife and I have been overwhelmed with attentions and little deeds of kindness that we have appreciated so much.

"Just now we are busy getting our flat ready. It is in Commonwealth avenue. I was there to help, but my wife told me to go away. She said I didn't assist—quite the contrary. It took two of your big moving vans to carry the furniture I brought from Germany. And my library it is in twelve big boxes, more than a thousand books, scores and such things."

Why He Doesn't Compose

"You have seen my first program? Nothing revolutionary. I am not averse to novelties, but I wish them to be worth the trouble of performing."

"You are not a great admirer of the modern school?"

"Oh, yes. I like Strauss and also Debussy, but the imitators of these men I do not like."

"You yourself do not compose, doctor?"

"Ah, no," he said, with a laugh of de

I have no special aptitude for com tion; then why should I compose?

"To tell the truth, we conductors have our heads full of the music of Wagner, Beethoven, Tschaikowsky, Strauss and the others, and how can we know if the theme that runs in our minds is our own or something from one of the masters? To be sure, some conductors compose, but I am content to conduct.

"For thirty-two years I have conducted."

"Is it possible?" I questioned, for Dr. Muck does not look more than forty-five.

"Ah, yes. I began when I was [illegible], and now I am fifty-two."

"Then you knew many of the [illegible] composers."

"Wagner. I never knew, [illegible]ugh I

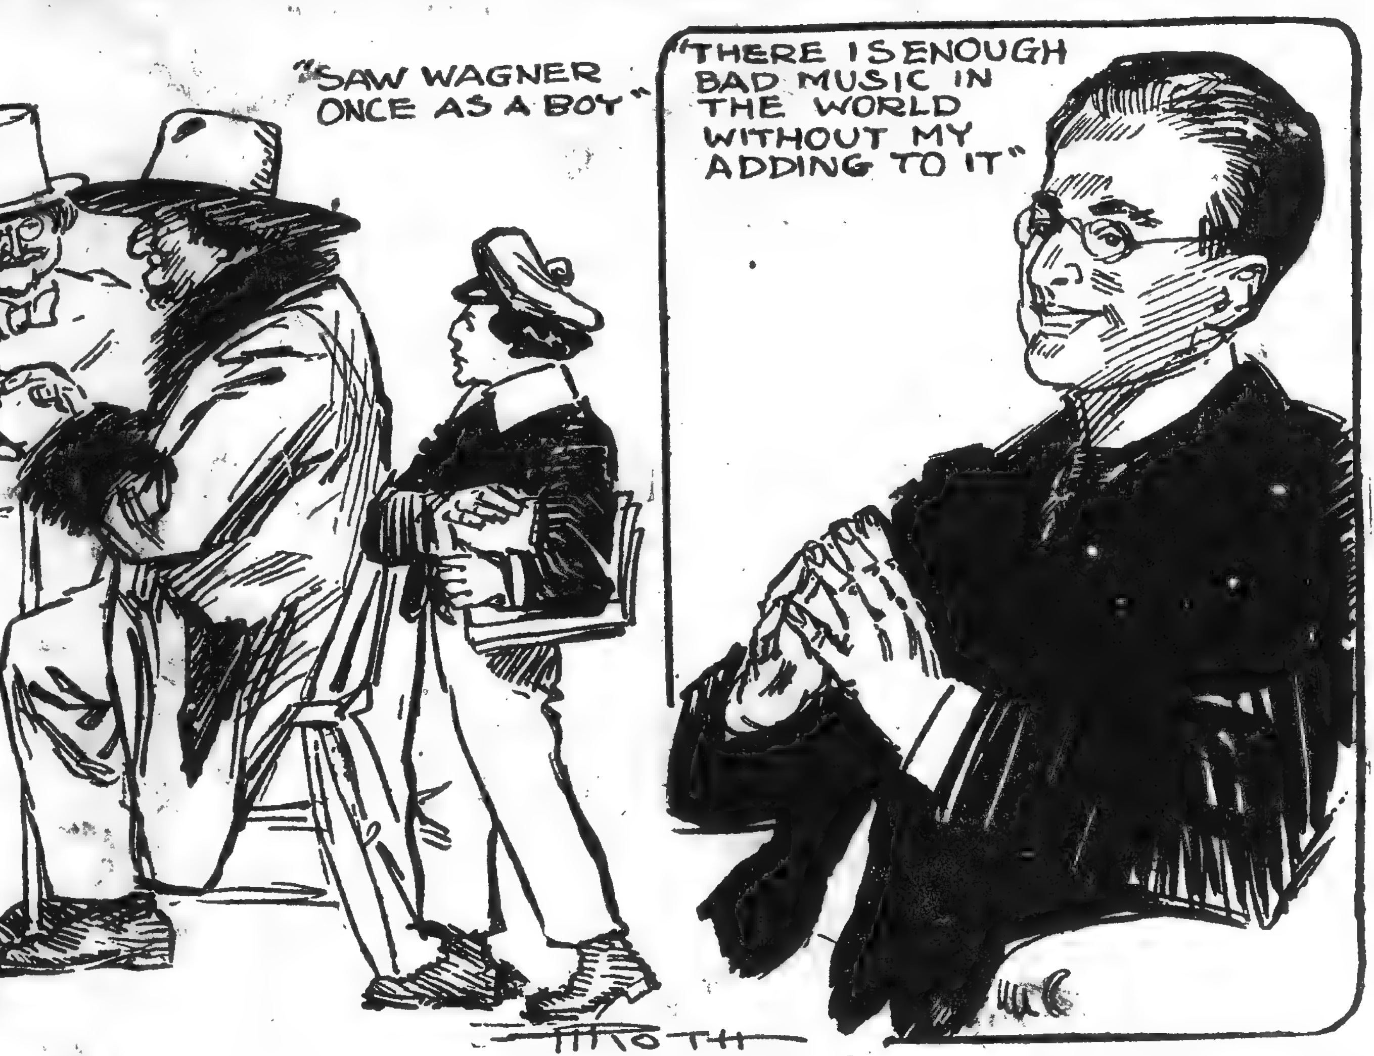
MIC AND FICTION PAGE

ted Conduct of the Symphony Orchestra, as He Is Today

PHOTO BY GARO

KARL MUCK

s views on music, and taki ng "the only Boston terrier that has ever for a stroll. Dr. Muck does n't dress a bit like a musician.



"SAW WAGNER ONCE AS A BOY"
"THERE IS ENOUGH BAD MUSIC IN THE WORLD WITHOUT MY ADDING TO IT" ROTH

ave no special aptitude for composi-; then why should I compose?

To tell the truth, we conductors have heads full of the music of Wagner, thoven, Tschaikowsky, Strauss and the rs, and how can we know if the theme runs in our minds is our own or thing from one of the masters? To ure, some conductors compose, but n content to conduct.

For thirty-two years I have con-ed."

"Is it possible?" I questioned, for Dr. does not look more than forty-five.

h, yes. I began when I was t now I am fifty-two."

Then you knew many of the great com-rs."

Wagner, I never knew, although I saw him once as a boy. I knew very well Brahms, and Tschaikowsky and Liszt and most of the composers of the eighties and nineties."

"And you admire Brahms greatly?"

"Well, I am not what we call a Brahmin. I find some of his works very wonderful and others, well, I do not care for them.

"Do you prefer to conduct opera or symphony concerts?"

"It depends. The concert is more satisfactory, because you can get absolute results with the right amount of effort. In opera you might rehearse until everything was perfect, and then a singer migh have a cold, or a stage hand make an error, and something would spoil all you have striven to secure."

"I am told you believe that opera in America should be sung in English."

"It would be desirable if it could be secured. Unfortunately, most of your singers here are Italians, and Italians have little aptitude for other languages. There is Caruso, who for years has wished to sing Lohengrin in German. He has studied and studied for five or six years, and even today he does not dare try it.

The Covent Garden Choruses.

"In Germany we have German singers to sing all operas in German, but sometimes we give opera in other languages. Our German chorus in Berlin can sing in Italian, French and Russian when necessary.

"I do not like to hear opera sung in several languages. Once I conducted in Covent Garden. We had three choruses, German, French and Italian. But in the big operas, like "Lohengrin," they combined them—and there they were, each singing their own tongue. It was terrible," said the doctor, with a rueful laugh.

"I believe that some day you will have nearly all American singers in your opera houses. Then it will be easy to sing opera in English. It is so in Germany, France and Italy. Most of the artists are natives of the country where they sing and of course it is not difficult to make them sing in the vernacular.

"I am looking forward to a splendid season here in Boston. You have here a wonderfully cultured and appreciative people. It is such a pleasure to perform some involved symphonic work and to know that your auditors understand what you are trying to interpret, that your expressions are caught, and such an impetus to know that if you make errors they will be recognized."

A Tender Topic

ON the village green a travelling phrenologist had taken up his stand, and offered to "feel the bumps" of the natives at a very small charge each.

One of the first applicants was the local blacksmith, a burly fellow, and as he seated himself in the chair someone slyly whispered in the "professor's" ear:

"He's awfully fond of veal!"

The "professor" nodded gracefully, and proceeded to ascribe to his client all the virtues he could think of, and then as a climax he said in a loud voice:

"Now, to come to the question of likes and dislikes. If there is one thing on earth that my subject is fond of it is veal!"

He stopped suddenly, for the blacksmith had sprung from the chair and struck him lustily on the jaw.

"An' if I did steal a calf, what's it got to do wi' you?" he roared furiously.

AMERICAN

OCTOBER 19

MME. RAPPOLD AT SYMPHONY

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

Marie Rappold of the Metropolitan Opera was soloist at the second public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon.

The program consisted of the Sgambati Symphony in D major, No. 1, op. 16, Putzner's overture to "The Little Christ-Elf" and Brahm's Variations on a Theme by Josef Haydn. Mme. Rappold was heard in Elizabeth's Greeting from "Tannhauser," and Weber's recitative and aria "Leise, leise," from "Der Freischutz."

Rappold last sang in Boston at a performance of "Il Trovatore" two years ago at the Boston Opera House. I did not admire her greatly at that time and was therefore agreeably surprised to find her singing Elizabeth's Greeting with a fine large tone, rich and mellow, and smoothly flowing. She sang easily, gracefully and appealingly.

In "Der Freischutz," the smoothness of her voice was even more evident; there was a lyric elegance about her singing of the aria that was very grateful.

Program of Pure Melody.

Dr. Muck again offered us a program of pure melody, music that makes a direct appeal to the senses and does not claim to be intellectual.

The Sgambati symphony has not figured upon Boston programs for fourteen years. Sgambati is an Italian, although his mother was English. He is still living, but this symphony was composed in 1881. Sgambati is one of the few Italians who exercises his talents in the symphonic instead of the opera field. As a young man he was patronized by Wagner and Liszt, and his work shows traces of Germanic influences.

It is a pleasant symphony, abounding in sweet and charming melodies, surprising one at times by peculiar rhythms and unexpected harmonies. It is a work which gains much by the lovely quality of the strings in the Boston orchestra.

The Pfitzner Overture is joyous, dainty and tuneful. Hans Pfitzner is a capable German composer who is overlooked at home because he is a melodist in the domain of Richard Strauss. Dr. Muck is evidently one of his admirers because he played this little overture here during his previous tenancy of the Boston conductorship.

Two Enjoyable Concerts.

Brahms is thoroughly enjoyable in these Variations, for he is not here the academician, painstakingly working abstruse symphonies upon commonplace themes, but a master jeweler making curious settings for a melodic gem by the father of melody, Josef Haydn.

Some people have affected to discover that the Symphony Orchestra has already made forward strides since Muck assumed control. I think it is still too early for appreciable improvement, especially as the orchestra was a very nearly perfect instrument when Max Fiedler laid down his baton last Spring. It is certain, however, that Dr. Muck has given us two hugely enjoyable concerts.

[44]

OCTOBER 19,

TRAVELER

DR. MUCK OFFERS ITALIAN SYMPHONY

Sgambiti Given Scant Recognition; Brahms Number Feature of Concert.

By FRANK BERTWALL.

Dr. Muck just reversed his plan of program yesterday afternoon from that of his first concert. Last week he gave his best number first. Yesterday it was a case of the best number last. The result of both concerts would seem to indicate that neither is a happy thought. There is this much to be said for the first arrangement, both orchestra and audience are alert and therefore appreciative. Yet this fact is discounted in a measure, so far as the orchestra is concerned anyway, by yesterday's superb performance of the Brahms variation on a theme by Hadyn. It is true the audience did not seem to enthuse a great deal over it, but that was largely because the women folks were busy adjusting their hats and the men in dodging dangerous hatpins.

Another thought arises as a result of yesterday's concert and that is what is the real value of a vocalist at these concerts? Mme. Rappold in her two selections from "Tannhaeuser" and Weber was fairly satisfactory yet scarcely absorbingly interesting. Her vocal methods while showing some improvement are scarcely ideal. She received respectful applause after her first song and recognition bordering on enthusiasm after the second selection.

Sgambiti Symphony Leads Off.

The Sgambiti symphony, with which the concert opened, seemed to suffer from the fact that many in the audience had eyes and ears only for the soloist yet to come. The symphony, notwithstanding its many merits and artistic reading, received scant recognition. It is true Sgambiti in it seems to have changed his mind several times with the result that a number of his thoughts are not carried out to their logical conclusion. But it was well worth hearing as a study of how a composer has avoided the pitfalls that have proved the undoing of others. Sgambiti thinks for himself and in this symphony, notably in the second movement, has written most interestingly.

The Pfitzner overture is largely a case of promise rather than fulfilment. It starts well several times, but apparently the composer's mind became drowsy and his hand heavy with the result that your expectations are never realized.

The Brahms number, as already noted, was the feature of the concert. Dr. Muck, ever noted for his reading of Brahms, has done nothing better. Notwithstanding the fact that a large portion of the audience had to be satisfied with an occasional glimpse of conductor and orchestra through their neighbors' crooked elbows and between ducks as this and that headgear was fastened down, it was the most enjoyable number of the concert and under more favorable conditions would have received the reward merited.

Next week's program calls for Bischoff's [illegible] in E major, Wagner's "A Si[illegible]l" and Weber's overture t[illegible]nthe."

OCTOBER 19,

TRANSCRIPT,

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Bischoff's Vigorous and Imaginative Modern Symphony to Be Revived by Dr. Muck—Mme. Calve and Her Husband in a Concert of Operatic Fragments

DR. MUCK and the Symphony Orchestra have not quite all the concerts of next week to themselves, for Mme Calvé, outstripping the other wandering singers in the beginning of her tour, will reappear at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon in a concert of operatic fragments. Dr. Muck and the orchestra have decidedly the advantage, however, in the quality of their programme. During his previous term of service here, the conductor performed for the first times in America a symphony by Hermann Bischoff, friend of Richard Strauss, resident in Munich, but otherwise unknown on this side of the sea. The symphony was of large design and voice, rich in all the incisiveness and color that contemporary harmony and instrumentation could lend it. Bischoff stretched an ample canvas and on it he painted in tones a huge allegorical fresco, wherein youth took its wild and riotous pleasures, dreamed its dreams of life, saw at last its vision of happiness and then could not attain it because it had wasted the powers that would have made it worthy. Berlioz might have conceived and written such a symphony, and it was of an ultra-modern Berlioz that some listeners thought as they heard Bischoff's music. But Berlioz, the romantic of the nineteenth century, would hardly have fallen into Bischoff's brooding pessimism of the twentieth, and he lacked many an harmonic and instrumental resource that Bischoff has at ready command. Dr. Muck much admired the symphony when he produced it, and he and the music itself persuaded his audiences to enough curiosity about it to warrant a repetition a few weeks later. Since, the score has lain untouched on the shelves of Symphony Hall, and not even Bischoff's second symphony—accounted in Germany an inferior piece—has been added to it. Next Friday and Saturday at the Symphony Concerts, Dr. Muck will revive that first symphony and he has already entered with his old zest and admiration upon the rehearsals for it. With it, upon a programme that is purely orchestral, go Weber's overture to his opera, "Euryanthe," and the one orchestral piece that Wagner wrote with no thought of performance in a great theatre—the "Siegfried Idyl" that was born of his first happy years with Madame Cosima.

MONITOR,

., SATURDAY, OCTOBER 19, 1912

of Music

DR. MUCK IN OPERATIC WORK

With Mme. Marie Rappold as soloist, Karl Muck presented at the second public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra Friday afternoon the following program: Sgambati, Symphony in D major, No. 1, op. 16; Wagner, Elisabeth's greeting, from "Tannhauser"; Pfitzner, overture to "The Little Christ-Child," by Ilse von Stach, op. 20; Weber, recitative and aria, from "Der Freischutz"; Brahms, variations on a "Theme of Josef Haydn," op. 56a.

If the modern development of the symphony had been left to the French and Italians, it would have attained a most respectable romanticism under the hands of D'Indy and a most ingratiating romanticism under the hands of Sgambati. These two men would be the towering figures in orchestral music today. Each as representing the highest type of symphonic expression in two contrasting styles would have been encouraged by the musical public of Europe to go on and write his nine symphonies, and the question in criticism would be to decide in which of the masterworks the pinnacle of late nineteenth century orchestral art was reached. With composers like these music would have had a peaceable history, and symphony orchestras of the first rank would have been possible during the last 30 years in every city of the United States of over 100,000 inhabitants.

We are helped to see the purpose of the German demand for a definite program in orchestral composition when we hear a work like the Sgambatil symphony. For while no piece of program music ever yet told in direct terms what its composer meant it to tell, it always had a logic which appealed to the listener just the same as the logic of the story itself appealed when that story was presented in literary form. There is a sequence of impression in any narrative, whether it is given in a book or on the stage, and this sequence of impression has just as much to do with the artistic effect of the work as the definite imagery of the novel or the living situations of the play.

This sequence is precisely the thing that program music reproduces. Consequently program music has idea which finds response in the listener. Music like Sgambati's, which is built on mere formula, gets no farther in 40 minutes than an eighteenth century piece of absolute music could go in 20. Modernism by enlargement of dimensions, not by strength of idea, is the kind we find in the symphony which was presented first on the program of Friday afternoon.

The concert took its chief interest from the solo singing. Here the work of Mme. Rappold was in the highest degree praiseworthy. The singing line and the verbal line were both delivered in the polished manner which marks the work of the popular artists at the beginning of the music season. Mme. Rappold had hearty appreciation from the Friday audience, which is a very difficult one to please.

The matinee listeners always respond with applause to a performance which has been conscientiously studied. They are too sophisticated to be made ill at ease by a slight slip which a dramatic soprano may make in executing a thematic phrase which is better written for violin than for voice. They are too glad to hear a singer who can give clear enunciation to the words to be disconcerted by an occasional sacrifice of tone to syllable. Mme. Rappold had the aria of Agatha in Weber's opera and that of Elisabeth in Wagner's extraordinarily well in hand, and her work did not remind her audience too much of studio practise either.

But the solo work was even more interesting from the general musical standpoint than from that of mere vocal tone and style. It had its great significance for the public in the consummate handling of the accompaniment by the conductor. More correctly speaking, the significance was in the direction of the selection as a whole for solo voice and orchestra. For Dr. Muck was no mere accompanist in the excerpt from "Der Freischuetz" and from "Tannhaeuser." He appeared in his character of the foremost of opera conductors directing two dramatic passages of the first lyric appeal.

Neither in concert hall nor in opera house have Bostonians heard in the recent seasons a reading of "Elisabeth's Greeting," or of any other passage from the operatic repertory to compare with this one by Dr. Muck in delicacy of handling and in mastery of associating the component factors of voice and instruments.

The musical public of the city will put itself in a poor light with posterity, to say the least, if it keeps a man of the most approved ability as an operatic conductor employed for five years exclusively in symphony concerts, when it has an opera equipment of the highest order on which it might occasionally employ such a talent. An epoch that boasts of its economical administration of things commercial and handles its artistic affairs in the uneconomical manner that this procedure implies, will certainly look strange to the historians who sum up its doings.

The present disunited state of the symphonic and operatic activities of the community forbids an artist of Dr. Muck's unexampled genius from being the public servant that he is capable of being. It is not conceivable that citizens who hold public banquets every little while at which they praise their day and generation for mastering the problem of efficiency will look complacently on such a situation, even though a perfectly straightforward and happy course of progress has brought them to it.

CONCERTS AND OPERA

Karl Muck, a judicious as well as an energetic musical director, is taking time to restore to the Boston Symphony orchestra technique that flexibility which means so much to him and to relieve it of that ponderousness and tonal aggressiveness which was of so much importance to his predecessor, Max Fiedler. Dr. Muck is practising his men in the early concerts in works of only ordinary requirements. But in another week he will be ready for that test which his Boston audiences, particularly his Friday afternoon audience, will regard as decisive. He will make what many will regard as his first real appearance on Oct. 25 and 26, when he presents a symphony of the severest modern demand both in respect to execution and interpretation. On those dates he gives Hermann Bischoff's symphony in E major, a work of vast technical difficulty and thoroughly of the present day in dramatic aim, as those who heard it when Dr. Muck first produced it in America in January, 1908, are fond of recalling.

The composer Bischoff was for three years associated with Richard Strauss in the study of orchestral scores and in the discussion of musical composition. He is a resident of Munich. Since Dr. Muck is to be regarded as a representative, not much short of official, of the Teutonism which is rushing forward to international leadership, and since this symphony may be considered an authoritative utterance of that Teutonism, the performance will mean all that Dr. Muck's coming to America means.

A youth missing happiness after having proved himself by reckless conduct to be unworthy of it is what the work, according to the composer's own explanation pictures. Thus through tragedy Bischoff, as through tragedy and comedy Richard Strauss, gives a militant nationality an expression that impresses the world as effectively as invasions and conquests or diplomatic incidents have impressed it in earlier epochs.

The smaller works on the third Symphony program are Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture.

* * *

OCTOBER 17.

REPUBLICAN:

CONCERT AT SMITH COLLEGE.

Heinrich Warnke the Soloist—Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony—The First in a Notable Course of Concerts.

What promises to be the finest series of concerts yet undertaken at Smith college opened last evening at the John M. Greene hall in Northampton by the Boston symphony orchestra. The occasion was notable in several ways. It was the first appearance of Dr Karl Muck as conductor since his departure for Europe three years ago, and the program was one to give full scope to his own gifts. And there was the stir which always marks the opening of a new season; seldom does an audience chat so gayly between the numbers, though when music was being performed there was no disturbance, in spite of an attendance so large that not all could find seats. The pressure in this fine, large, new auditorium seems likely to become almost as great as in the old college hall, and many music lovers are being drawn from Springfield and other cities by the exceptional attractions offered. Northampton owes much to the music department of the college.

The concert last evening was all that could be asked, in the program and in the performance. It opened with one of the greatest of the Beethoven symphonies, the "Eroica," No 3, but all the rest was modern; modern despite the fact that Berlioz, whose "Carnaval Romaine" came next, was a contemporary of Beethoven, and Liszt and Wagner, whose sixth symphonic poem, "Mazeppa" and "Meistersinger" prelude closed the concert, were contemporaries of Berlioz and of each other. For Berlioz was the forerunner of pretty much all that is modern, and all that came after the Beethoven symphony was separated from it in spirit and technic by a gap which in any other art than music would stand for the lapse of at least a century. Improvement? Posterity will have to decide that; evolution, certainly.

OCTOBER 19.
TRANSCRIPT

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE VARIED PLEASURE OF A LIGHT PROGRAMME

The Orchestra Keeps Its Regained Qualities—Mme. Rappold's Singing—The Peculiar Mood of Pfitzner's Overture—Brahms's Variations Again and Sgambati's Happy and Fortunate Italian Symphony

DR. MUCK had made a light programme for the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon—an amusing programme in the finer sense of the word—and it was interesting to watch the mood of all concerned toward it. Most of the audience received it with plentiful and honest enjoyment, applauded quickly and heartily after each piece and—what is more to the point—neither perused the reminiscent pages of the programme book nor surveyed their neighbors during the actual course of the music. A few very serious-minded youth, infected with the lust for "higher things" and nothing else that is one of the natural maladies of their age, complained that the abilities of the orchestra and the conductor and the attention of the audience—meaning thereby their own—were wasted upon such amiable music, so easy to comprehend and so instant in its pleasure, as Sgambati's symphony in D and Pfitzner's overture to a play of the Christ-Child. Nor was Mme. Rappold, pleasing as she is, eminent enough singer for their requirements. Only Brahms's Variations were sufficiently serious music for these solemn minds; but then and there those that love not so intricate and calculated a piece intervened and declared it the only dry spot in the concert.

Meanwhile, on the platform, Dr. Muck and the orchestra went their way untroubled and unabashed. To light music—as the music of symphony concerts goes—the conductor brought light pains that hid the clear understanding and the polishing diligence behind. Once more, Dr. Muck's sensibility to whatever music he chooses shone clear. Pfitzner's overture had its true voice of ingratiating melody, seemingly simple flow and homely feeling. For once Brahms's Variations were not difficult to follow, lost their air of cramping calculation, and had a diversified eloquence that was not always the voice of technique triumphant over self-imposed difficulties. From beginning to end, Sgambati's symphony, with all its mock German air, is unmistakably Italian, and Italian it sounded in the shaping and the coloring of its melodies, in its exuberance and its melancholy, in its whole pervading voice and accent as it came from Dr. Muck's hands. At every turn, throughout the concert, the orchestra was a sympathetic, responsive, and highly alert human instrument, using to new purposes all the technical virtues and the imparting qualities that it seemed to have regained last week. Beauty, clarity, plasticity, and expressiveness unite again in its playing—to remain there except as human mutability and chance circumstance may now and then affect them.

Thus the orchestra seems again the orchestra—so much so indeed that the accompaniment to Mme. Rappold's airs from "Tannhäuser" and "Der Freischütz" were quite as interesting as her own singing of them. She sang them with her light, clear soprano voice, that needs discreet manipulation if it is not to sound thin and shrill. She sang them with an agreeably clear and intelligent diction, though without much notion of the rapt outpouring of spirit with which Elisabeth salutes the hall of song. Mme. Rappold had evidently polished her version of the two airs to the last phrase, and her declamation of the recitatives in "Der Freischütz" had admirable fluency, significance and sense of lyrico-dramatic style. She was as good to hear in the final elate measures of Agatha's song. Her misfortune, alike in the opera house and the concert-room, is colorlessness of voice and of temperament and imagination behind. It leaves her singing a pretty shallow that now and then catches a reflection of emotion. In the orchestral voices were more of Agatha's changeful moods and of Elisabeth's ardent soliloquy of release from long broodings. The two airs, the two music-dramas, are old stories to Dr. Muck, the operatic conductor. With the orchestra for a voice, he can sing and dramatize them.

Pfitzner's overture needs a German audience—almost a German audience in a particular mood. It was written to precede a Christmas play of the Christ Child turned little fairy of two worlds—a play that was designed to be fanciful and sweet, naive and childlike. The play failed of its purpose even with the expectant and responsive Müncheners. Pfitzner's overture is almost predestined to failure before a Bostonian audience in a concert-room on a warm October afternoon. Most of us, it seems safe to say, heard a well-made overture full of neat, pleasantly unobtrusive and spontaneous workmanship, but workmanship that had no instant individualities and felicities. Most of us again heard the pleasant melodies which are the material and the medium for this skill. They were easy to comprehend agreeable to hear and as easy to forget. Again, they lacked any particular individuality of voice or felicity of invention. Yet as a few of us liked to imagine, they had qualities that would more commend them to German hearers, that would even give them a certain individual virtue and distinction. Some of the melodies and some of the treatment of them had a pleasant homeliness of the sort that German ears and hearts, however veneered, instinctively like. Now and again the overture ran merrily to a dancing rhythm and the voice was the voice of German good nature and high spirits. Again, especially in some transitions, it caught the quiver of child-like curiosity and expectancy—the in-Brahms's Variations, on the other hand, are of the universal art of music-making by exposition, calculation, reflection, scholarship and other grave arts and attributes of the musically learned and respected. Hear Brahms setting the orchestra to play over and over that simple theme of Haydn—as yet all innocent of what he is to evolve from it. Hear the evolution begin—Variation I., Variation II., and so on through the whole eight into the large-voiced and pounding finale. Watch—with ear and mind—Brahms deploying all his reflective skill in contrapuntal invention and all his ability to make a musical thought go a very long and a very shrewdly calculated way. Hear the little theme becoming the fruitful mother of offspring in which there is hardly any clear resemblance to itself. And hear finally the virtue of the Variations except as a transcendent exercise in contrapuntal, constructive and instrumental technique. Reflective, calculating as Brahms is, the creative process actually warms him. From the emotion of imaginative technical achievement, he rises to the larger feeling that makes two of the Variations gradually expand into clear-voiced instrumental song; that makes two more run with a pleasant capriciousness of fancy; that makes the finale large and climacteric tonal declamaton. Without these accidental virtues, as the pedantic "Brahmsites" sometimes call them, the Variations would be left to their plodding minds and to the exercise books of advanced students.

And so Sgambati, the Italian, prevailed over all these Germans. And why should not an Italian, if he is so minded and sufficiently equipped, write a symphony? They say that Puccini wrote the intricate orchestral part of "La Fanciulla" to prove that an Italian composer, no less than a French or a German, is quite capable of invention, imagination and manipulation in the most advanced contemporary instrumental style. Others—Sgambati, Caëtani, Sinigaglia, Bossi, for example—have proved, in turn, that they are capable of symphonic and chamber music that is entirely able to stand on its own artistic legs and to keep pace with much music of similar species that is written in Berlin and Vienna, Leipzig and Munich. Moreover, these Italians bring to symphonic and chamber music racial and individual qualities by which both profit. Italian is the fine musical exuberance of parts of the first movement of Sgambati's symphony and of nearly the whole of its finale. There is more spontaneity in this exuberance than there is in German bigness, strenuousness and tumult. Vivacity gives it individuality—the same liveliness of invention and movement that carries Sgambati brightly and fancifully through his scherzo.

Italian melody again has its symphonic uses. It is often unmistakable in this symphony of Sgambati. He does not give it theatrical length, breadth and thickness; he idealizes it; yet he keeps its arching curve, its full-voiced song, the harmonies and the modulations, the returns and the intensities by which ears recognize it. He knows the storehouses of the graver and the finer resources of Italian music, catches perhaps a little hint of folk-tune in his serenade and decks out his slow movement with the solemn harmonies of Gregorian chant. And when he is melancholy and makes his music of like mood, he is melancholy in Latin fashion. A Russian writing sad-voiced music is neurotically excited over it; a German is big with universal stress and woe; the Latin, whether he is French or Italian, finds melancholy a pleasant and, if he is composing, profitable emotion. He is elegant in it. Such "sad tunes" has Sgambati written into his symphony, and in these fashions generally do the Italians, when they try symphonic music, admirably enrich it.

Moreover, Sgambati is quick with the Latin instinct to please. Unless he is writing reiterated sequences—as though he were a Roman Elgar—and repeating musical ideas that he has already exhausted, his symphony is agreeable music to hear, clear of structure, fanciful in invention, warm of melody, piquant in rhythm and figuration, changeful of mood, apt of style and animated throughout with lively feeling grave or gay. Besides, there is a happy individuality in it. Germans write their symphonies and before they have put a note to paper the weight of a great tradition, of a heavy musical orthodoxy settles on their shoulders. Can a symphony be any less than the labors of a musical Hercules? Not in too many of their eyes. An Italian, even a grave Italian like Sgambati, takes his task more lightly, and shrugs off this mountain of tradition and precedent. As the impulse seizes him, he dares to be irregular in his form as Sgambati is irregular in this symphony. He makes the unexpected, instead of the anticipated, modulation, the transition that his own spirit—and not the rules—suggests. He plays the game—if the writing of symphonies may be so lightly named—in his own way. And in this particular case, Sgambati and his symphony win it by frequent beauty of instrumental song, by happy strokes of modulation, blending and contrast, by large moods of gravity and gaiety, by such suggestive music as the churchly slow movement and the glorified serenade, by a pervading ease of style and a pervading liveliness of musical and emotional spirit. No matter what an Italian does, he lives it.

H. T. P.

POST, OCTOBER 20,

DR. MUCK ON OPERA EXPENSES

The Cost in Germany—Singers and Dancers of Boston Opera—The Humor of Strauss' "Ariadne auf Naxos"—Concert Announcements.

Dr. Muck, in a conversation with the writer, had an interesting word to say concerning the standards and the expenses of opera giving in Germany. The figures are instructive, and they should comfort those who have in seasons past felt consternation at the size of the Boston operatic budget. Said the doctor: "The foundation of a good opera house is the chorus and the orchestra—nicht wahr?—and these are things that cost money. I don't speak now of the soloists' salaries. They are growing all the time, but the running expenses of the big opera house are sure to be enormous."

Did Dr. Muck believe in government subsidies?

"Yes. These big opera houses must have subsidy. There is the Royal Opera at Berlin. There the house is crowded practically every night of the season. And at the end of the season there is a big deficit. About a million marks ($250,000). It is true that we have an unusually large chorus and an orchestra which numbers about 160. This orchestra is not used entirely at each performance. If the opera is by Mozart, perhaps we use 60 men. If by Wagner, more than 100. Then there is the large ballet. And then you can no longer get a first tenor who will sing four or five times a week through a season considerably longer than yours here for 25,000 marks.

"Our repertoire, though, is very large. It includes some works you have never heard and probably never will hear in America. All of Meyerbeer, the operas of Lortzing and Marschner, Cornelius, Gluck and Mozart. There are fully 60 works in the repertoire.

"You don't like Meyerbeer? It depends upon how he is done. I myself don't like even Wagner if he is not well done. It is painful to me. Yon cannot kill Wagner as quickly as Meyerbeer, but there is much in Meyerbeer that is great and worth knowing."

In modern music, in spite of the Bischoff symphony of next week, Dr. Muck voiced his scorn of the shoals of small imitators of great men which exist today. "Debussy is a great man. I do not always agree with him, and I feel mannerisms more and more when I listen to him, but—he is a master with a right to think and to write such music as he does. But who are the other Frenchmen? For one Debussy, what else have we? There is D'Indy, a serious and an important man; but in France now I see only one sign of real genius. The few big men seem to crush the others. In Germany they imitate Strauss, or Reger. Reger"—with an ironical smile—"is our greatest virtuoso.

"Mahler had a tremendous imagination, but his musical conceptions seldom matched his intellectual fantasies. He has written some excellent songs for voice and orchestra. He is, in fact, greater in all things, and shall I say—smaller in great things? Yes, it seems to me that Mahler is often that. But Reger is growing, and his music becoming clearer and finer as he grows older."

Dr. Muck will conduct one of the Mahler symphonies early in the season.

He spoke indignantly of the present discussion of Bayreuth's right of tenure of "Parsifal," when the fast expiring copyright shall have gone. "It is not only the desecration of Wagner's wish," he said. "It is the thought of 'Parsifal,' a mystery play unlike anything else for the stage, requiring, if any music drama does, just the right setting and atmosphere—it is the thought of this great and rare work, between 'Mme. Butterfly' and, say, 'Carmen!' "

Third Symphony Concert

Among the younger Germans whom Dr. Muck brought to the attention of the Symphony audiences in Boston when he was here before was Herman Bischoff of Munich, whose great symphony in E-major he gave for the first times in America on Jan. 3 and 4, 1908, and repeated on Feb. 28 and 29 of the same year. Bischoff was for years an intimate friend and pupil of Richard Strauss. Dr. Muck regards this symphony as one of the most notable achievements in modern German music. It is this symphony with which Dr. Muck will begin his third programme of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The work is one of great difficulty and for the past week Dr. Muck has been rehearsing it with the different choirs of the orchestra.

The second part of the programme will consist of the Siegfried Idyl of Wagner and the "Euryanthe" Overture of Weber. It will be remembered that the Siegfried Idyl was on the first programme that Dr. Muck gave in Boston and on his farewell programme.

OCTOBER 20.
HERALD.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Among the younger Germans whom Dr. Muck brought to the attention of the Symphony audiences in Boston when he was here before was Hermann Bischoff of Munich, whose symphony in E major was performed here for the first time in America on Jan. 3 and 4, 1908, and repeated in February of the same year. Bischoff, who for some years was an intimate friend of Richard Strauss, has unquestionably been influenced by him, but the symphony shows originality in subject matter and treatment. In fact, Dr. Muck regards it as one of the most noteworthy achievements of modern German composers. It is this symphony with which he will begin his third program of the concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. According to the composer's own words, there is this argument to the work: "In my mind it is the story of a young man who, living a wild and debauched life, becomes acquainted with pure happiness when he is no longer worthy of it and therefore cannot possess it."

The second part of the program will consist of the Siegfried Idyl of Wagner and the "Euryanthe" Overture of Weber.

GLOBE—OCTOBER 20.

Dr Muck to Revive E Major Symphony by Bischoff

The symphony in E major, opus 16, by Hermann Bischoff, which Dr Muck played in Boston, Jan 3, 1908, at its first performance in this country, he will revive at the concerts of the orchestra this week. Bischoff, who is an associate and follower of Strauss, has chosen a program involving a young debauchee who attains happiness only after he no longer is worthy of it. The symphony will be followed by the Siegfried Idyl and the overture to "Euryanthe."

OCTOBER 20,
AMERICAN-

ON MUCK'S PROGRAM.

Difficult Work to Be Played Friday Afternoon and Sunday

Among the younger Germans whom Dr. Muck brought to the attention of the Symphony audiences in Boston when he was here before was Hermann Bischoff of Munich, whose great symphony in E-major he gave for the first times in America on January 3 and 4, 1908, and repeated on February 28 and 29 of the same year.

Bischoff, who for years was an intimate friend of Richard Strauss, has unquestionably been influenced by him, but the symphony in question shows great originality in subject matter and treatment. In fact, Dr. Muck regards it as one of the most notable achievements of modern German composers.

It is this symphony with which Dr. Muck will begin his third program which will be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The work is one of great difficulty, and for the past week Dr. Muck has been rehearsing it with the different choirs of the orchestra. The symphony, according to the composer's own words, is a program which may be summarized as follows:

"In my mind it is the story of a young man who, living a wild and debauched life, becomes acquainted with pure happiness when he is no longer worthy of it and therefore cannot possess it."

From GLOBE
Address: New York
Date OCT 18 1912

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its New York season with its first pair of concerts on Nov. 7 and 9 in Carnegie Hall with the comfortable feeling of sold-out houses. For the first time since it came to New York, and doubtless for the first time in any series of concerts in New York, Carnegie Hall has been sold out absolutely and completely by subscription. For the past several years every concert by the Boston Symphony has had a full house, but for the coming season only admission tickets will be available for the general public.

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 17 1912

GREAT GREETING FOR DR. MUCK IN BOSTON

With the seats for this season's series of Boston Symphony concerts almost entirely sold out in Baltimore, the prospect is big for a repetition here of the enthusiasm which greeted Dr. Karl Muck in Boston last week.

Nothing in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is said to have equaled the warmth with which Dr. Muck was greeted at his first appearance in Boston, October 11 and 12. On both occasions Symphony Hall was filled to its utmost capacity, and at both performances the entire audience arose as the distinguished conductor made his first appearance on the stage, the orchestra sounding a "Tusch." At the end of one of the performances Mr. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, left his seat in the middle of the hall, and walking down to the stage called Dr. Muck and shook hands with him warmly. Newspaper comment regarding the performances of the orchestra is laudatory.

With memories of the great conductor lingering lovingly in their minds, there is no doubt as to the reception he will be accorded here when he takes up the baton at the Lyric on the night of November 6.

From EVG. NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 14 1912

Many Buy Seats For Boston Symphony Concert

A long line of men and women stood in the rain outside of Albaugh's Ticket Office this morning waiting their turn to enroll their names as season subscribers for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts.

Former patrons of the Orchestra were given the opportunity last week to renew the seats they have occupied in former years, and with most of these disposed of it became evident, by reason of the big demand at the opening of the sale for the remaining season seats, just how popular the Orchestra is in Baltimore. It looked almost as if the Lyric could have been sold out for the season even were it twice as large as it is.

While Max Fiedler, director of the Orchestra for the last four years, was extremely popular, the fact that his place has been filled by another musician of high standing, and one who is already well known in Baltimore, Dr. Karl Muck, is attributed as a reason for the special interest that is being shown this year.

The first concert will be given on November 6.

From EVG. MAIL
Address: New York.
Date OCT 19 1912

The first pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Dr. Carl Muck will be given in Carnegie Hall November 7-9, when the orchestra and its conductor will face the capacity of Carnegie Hall, as every seat in the house has been sold by subscription for the entire season. Nothing in the history of the Boston orchestra has equaled the reception accorded Dr. Muck at the opening concerts last week.

From
Address: New York City.
Date OCT 20

Für die ſämmtlichen Concerte des Boſton Symphonie-Orcheſters in New York — die erſten finden am 7. und 9. November in Carnegie Hall ſtatt — ſind ſämmtliche Sitze durch Subſkription genommen worden. Nur noch allgemeine Eintrittskarten ſind noch erhältlich.

Established: London, 1881; New York, 1884

From AMERICAN
Address: New York.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its New York season with its first pair of concerts on November 7 and 9 in Carnegie Hall, with the comfortable feeling of sold-out houses. For the first time since it came to New York and doubtless for the first time in any series of concerts in New York, Carnegie Hall has been sold out absolutely and completely by subscription. Only admission tickets will be available for the general public. Nothing in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has equalled the warmth with which Dr. Muck was greeted at his appearances in Boston on Friday afternoon, October 11 and Saturday evening, October 12. On both occasions Symphony Hall was filled and the entire audience rose as the distinguished conductor made his appearance on the stage, while the orchestra sounded a "Tusch."

From
Address: New York City.
Date

Wie vorauszuſehen war, wurde Herr Dr. Carl Muck bei ſeinem erſten öffentlichen Erſcheinen in Boſton, in den beiden Concerten am Freitag Nachmittag, den 11. Oktober und am Samstag Abend den 12. Oktober, in ganz beſonderer Weiſe geehrt. Vielleicht zum erſten Male iſt es vorgekommen, daß das ganze Auditorium ſich bei ſeinem Eintritt von den Sitzen erhob, und dann, als das Orcheſter einen „Tuſch" blies, durch ein langwährendes Händeklatſchen ſeiner Freude Ausdruck verlieh, den berühmten Kapellmeiſter wieder in ſeiner Mitte zu wiſſen.

From
Address PHILADELPHIA. PA.
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual series of five evening concerts in the Academy of Music during the coming season on Monday evenings, November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17. Dr. Karl Muck will resume the post of conductor after an absence of four years. The list of soloists includes Mme. Matzenauer, the eminent contralto of the Metropolitan Opera, and Fritz Kreisler, who comes to America this season under an exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date 1912

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Nothing in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has equaled the warmth with which Dr. Muck was greeted at his first appearances in Boston on Friday afternoon, October 11, and Saturday evening, October 12. On both occasions Symphony Hall was filled to its utmost capacity, and both in the afternoon and in the evening the entire audience rose as the distinguished conductor made his appearance on the stage, while the orchestra sounded a "tusch."

Newspaper comment regarding the performance of the orchestra was unanimous in the opinion that it had not in years played with such brilliancy and such effect.

The sale of season tickets in Washington, which has been in progress at Droop's music store since last Wednesday, shows a decided increase in subscription over that of last year. The first concert will be given on Tuesday afternoon, November 5, in the National, at 4:30 o'clock.

From SUN
Address: New York
Date 1912

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its New York season with its first pair of concerts on November 7 and 9 in Carnegie Hall with the comfortable feeling of sold out houses. For the first time since it came to New York, and doubtless for the first time in any series of concerts in New York, Carnegie Hall has been sold out absolutely and completely by subscription. For the past several years every concert by the Boston Symphony has had a full house, but for the coming season only admission tickets will be available for the general public. Nothing in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has equalled the warmth with which Dr. Muck was greeted at his first appearances in Boston on Friday afternoon, October 11, and Saturday evening, October 12. On both occasions Symphony Hall was filled to its utmost capacity and both in the afternoon and in the evening the entire audience rose as the distinguished conductor made his appearance on the stage.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date 1912

The sale of season tickets for the five concerts to be given in Brooklyn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming winter will open at the box office of the Brooklyn Academy of Music next Friday, October 25, and on the following day tickets may be purchased not only at the Academy of Music but at Abraham & Straus's and Frederick Loeser & Co.'s. The renewals of last year's subscriptions have been unusually large and the number of tickets to be disposed of to new subscribers is necessarily limited. The concerts will be given as usual on Friday evenings, the dates being November 8, December 6, January 10, February 21, and March 21. For the first concert there will be no soloist, for this will signalize the return to the orchestra of Dr. Karl Muck, whose two years in America made such a notable page in the history of music of this country. For the December concert the soloist will be Fritz Kreisler; in January, Miss Elena Gerhardt; in February, Max Pauer. The soloist for the March concert has not yet been arranged for. While the above is a most notable list of assisting artists, interest necessarily centers in the return of Dr. Muck, who has come to America to make it his home for a number of years. Under Dr. Muck, during the seasons of 1906-07 and 1907-08, the Orchestra reached the highest point of its artistic efficiency, and already, although he has had but a short time to impress himself again upon his colleagues, the orchestra is playing with extraordinary virtuosity. His first appearances in Boston on Friday afternoon, October 11, and Saturday evening, October 12, were signalized by ovations such as never have been given to any conductor in that city. On both occasions when he entered to take his place on the podium the entire audience arose. A very pretty and significant incident marked the concert on Saturday evening. At the end of the "Eroica" symphony, which was the first number on the programme, Mr. Higginson, the founder and maintainer of the orchestra, left his seat in the middle of the hall, went down to the stage, and warmly shook Dr. Muck's hand. This tribute to the distinguished conductor was cheered by the audience. Of the four soloists engaged for the last four concerts, two are known in Brooklyn and two are strangers. Fritz Kreisler, the most distinguished of the younger violinists of the world, will make his only appearance in Brooklyn with the orchestra, for he comes to this country under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony, and plays with no other organization in the East, and gives no recitals. Miss Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German singer, will be agreeably remembered by the pleasure she gave with her recitals a year ago. She is easily one of the best concert artists of the stage to-day. Max Pauer, the German pianist, is a new comer. He is regarded as one of the giants of the pianoforte in Germany, and it is one of the strange freaks of fortune that he has never been in America. He is particularly famous as a classical player. At the same time this does not signify that he is dry or pedantic, and he has won some of his greatest successes in the romantic works of the modern composers. Dr. Muck has made considerable plans for his concerts, and a season of unusual interest may be expected.

Newspaper

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address New York
Dat OCT 20 1912

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its New York season with its first pair of concerts on Nov. 7 and 9 in Carnegie Hall with the comfortable feeling of sold out houses. For the first time since it came to New York, and doubtless for the first time in any series of concerts in New York, Carnegie Hall has been sold out absolutely and completely by subscription. For the past several years every concert by the Boston Symphony has had a full house, but for the coming season only admission tickets will be available for the general public.

Nothing in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has equaled the warmth with which Dr. Muck was greeted at his first appearances in Boston on Friday afternoon, Oct. 11, and Saturday evening, Oct. 12. On both occasions Symphony Hall was filled to its utmost capacity, and both in the afternoon and in the evening the entire audience rose as the distinguished conductor made his appearnce on the stage, while the orchestra sounded a "Tusch." On Saturday evening there was a pleasant incident. The first number on the programme was the "Eroica" Symphony. At the end of the performance of the symphony Mr. Higginson, the founder of the orchestra, left his scat in the middle of the hall and walked down to the stage where he called Dr. Muck and shook him warmly by the hand, thus giving evidence of his own feelings toward the conductor. Newspaper comment regarding the performance of the orchestra was unanimous in the opinion that it sounded like a new organization and had not in years played with such brilliancy and such effect.

DAILY HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE

TWELVE PAGES. NORTHAMPTON, MASS., THURSDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1912. TWELVE PAGES. Pric

CONCERT AT SMITH COLLEGE.

Heinrich Warnke the Soloist—Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony—The First in a Notable Course of Concerts.

What promises to be the finest series of concerts yet undertaken at Smith college opened last evening at the John M. Greene hall in Northampton by the Boston symphony orchestra. The occasion was notable in several ways. It was the first appearance of Dr Karl Muck as conductor since his departure for Europe three years ago, and the program was one to give full scope to his own gifts. And there was the stir which always marks the opening of a new season; seldom does an audience chat so gayly between the numbers, though when music was being performed there was no disturbance, in spite of an attendance so large that not all could find seats. The pressure in this fine, large, new auditorium seems likely to become almost as great as in the old college hall, and many music lovers are being drawn from Springfield and other cities by the exceptional attractions offered. Northampton owes much to the music department of the college.

The concert last evening was all that could be asked, in the program and in the performance. It opened with one of the greatest of the Beethoven symphonies, the "Eroica," No 3, but all the rest was modern; modern despite the fact that Berlioz, whose "Carnaval Romaine" came next, was a contemporary of Beethoven, and Liszt and Wagner, whose sixth symphonic poem, "Mazeppa" and "Meistersinger" prelude closed the concert, were contemporaries of Berlioz and of each other. For Berlioz was the forerunner of pretty much all that is modern, and all that came after the Beethoven symphony was separated from it in spirit and technic by a gap which in any other art than music would stand for the lapse of at least a century. Improvement? Posterity will have to decide that; evolution, certainly.

It was a superb program, yet nothing on it was more delightful than the symphony with which it opened. The tonal climax came later, and Dr Muck had arranged for this with his infallible taste. But there is a weightiness of ideas and of personality as well as of brass instruments, and even though slightly kept down to fit its place at the opening, the symphony as given under Dr Muck was profoundly impressive. Possibly in the first movement he carried this preliminary understatement too far; there is such a thing as delaying one's effects too long, and while beautifully played it lacked power. But the funeral march and adagio were exquisitely played, broadly, tenderly, with nobility of style and perfection of nuance, and nothing could be lighter, gayer and more perfect than the scherzo. In the vigorous finale there was ample reward for the cool reserve of the first movement; it came to a superb close.

The interlude was long enough not to put Beethoven into too strong a contrast with the brilliant colors of the "Carnival Romaine," which followed, one of many carnival pieces, and one of the best. To make it Berlioz rifled his unsuccessful opera "Benvenuto Cellini" of its best material, and to one familiar with the opera the airs might carry, like opera overtures, the added pleasure of dramatic recognition. But few know the opera, and the connotation of the tunes is of little consequence in a concert number which can so well stand on its own merits as a brilliant piece of orchestration. If not one of the greatest works of Berlioz, it is thoroughly characteristic and interesting, and it was played in a way that brought out all its qualities. Then came a concerto for violoncello and orchestra by Lalo, in D minor, played by Heinrich Warnke of the orchestra, whose last previous appearance as soloist at Northampton was in Dvorak's concerto in B minor, at a concert given by the orchestra at the academy of music some six years ago.

Mr Warnke is a 'cellist of ingratiating quality, with a supple style, clean technic, and a pure, mellow tone, which he never forces in the fashion of those who strive to make of this beautiful instrument something more than it is. His suave utterance found a congenial medium in the concerto by Lalo, which is one of the not too numerous 'cello concertos which can stand on their musical merits. It has no octaves, consecutive thirds, set figures in the high thumb positions, artificial flageolet tones, or other stock devices for the exhibition of superfluous technic. The solo instrument has a dignified and melodious part, marked by some fascinating rhythms and highly original turns of expression, and the orchestral part is strong and well sounding. It is rather too long, and many players give the last two movements; Mr Warnke chose the first two, and on the whole these are the best. The final is brilliant, but not so interesting and original as the first movement with its odd rhythms. But equally original and the most taking of all is the middle movement, on which Mr Warnke closed, a pleasing cantabile which slips gracefully into a quaint and piquant allegretto, which he played with much lightness and charm. The concert had a splendid close in Liszt's powerful tone poem, "Mazeppa," and in the favorite "Meistersinger" overture by Wagner, both superbly played.

Springfield
Republican

A GREAT MUSICAL NIGHT AT JOHN. M. GREENE HALL

A magnificent audience filled John M. Greene hall to overflowing last night at the opening concert of the Smith college concert course. All seats were sold by afternoon and many people were in line for standing room when the ticket office opened at 7.30. Among the audience were scores of people from Springfield, Holyoke, Amherst, Greenfield and adjacent towns. The college girls were out 1500 strong and the Capen school, the Burnham school and the high school were largely represented. The value to the community of such a concert and such a series as this represents can hardly be overestimated.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave a superb concert. Eighty-three men came up from Boston and were taken back by special train leaving soon after eleven o'clock. The orchestra gives its first concert in Cambridge tonight, which with the two Boston concerts Friday and Saturday, will make a busy week. Dr. Muck, the conductor, who is returning for a five years' term of office, was given a most hearty reception. His conducting throughout the evening evidenced the command of resources the understanding of music, and the temperament balanced by reserve, which has placed him in the very front rank of the orchestral conductors of the day. He is a great program maker, as shown by last night's program. The conservative and lengthy "Eroica" symphony being followed by the lighter and brilliant "Carnaval Romain" by Berlioz. Then followed two movements of the Concerto in D minor for violoncello by Lala, the fiery "Mazeppa" symphonic poem by Liszt and the favorite and wholesome "Meistersinger" prelude as a concluding number.

The interpretation of the symphony was characterized by reserve both of feeling and of tone in the first movement, producing a stirring and effective conclusion in the finale. The funeral march was given with great impressiveness and the scherzo was notably dainty and spirited. The symphony was listened to with great intentness by the big audience and the applause at the end was spontaneous and prolonged.

The "Roman Carnival" was received with great enthusiasm by the audience, in which young life so largely predominated. Berlioz could not have complained that his "Saltarello" was taken too slowly last night,as he did when Habeneck first conducted it in Paris 70 years ago in the opera "Benvenuto Cellini", for which it was first written.

Mr. Warneke played the concerto beautifully and was repeatedly encored at its conclusion, the orchestra and Dr. Muck joining in applause.

To many the most interesting orchestral number was the "Mazeppa." It is a work which keeps the players busy but is immensely effective. The scoring is clear and avoids the overloading so common in later works of this character.

The performance last night was one more argument in favor of Liszt's high rank as a composer for the orchestra, a field in which many consider his work to be greater and more lasting than in the better known field of piano music.

The "Meistersinger" prelude brought the concert to a most satisfactory conclusion.

Comparison between Dr. Muck's conducting and that of Mr. Fiedler, his predecessor, can hardly be avoided. Dr. Muck showed more reserve in interpretation, a greater command of his forces, a strong tendency to save his climaxes until the most fitting time—in other words a keener intellectual grasp of the music as a whole. He is less temperamental and happily he conducts less with his body and more with his magnetic eye than does Mr. Fiedler. The orchestra has noticeably improved in attack over its appearance here a year ago. Every player was intently watching and studying Dr. Muck throughout the evening. This great orchestra, unsurpassed in the world, is surely well suited in its present conductor.

The next concert of the course will be given by the renowned violinist Fritz Kreisler, on November 20. On November 22, Mme. Schumann Heink, the favorite contralto, will give a recital in Greene hall, under the auspices of the Western Massachusetts alumnae association of Smith college, for the benefit of the "Million Dollar" endowment fund. This concert is not included in the regular concert course.

The Springfield Republican in the

"What promises to be the finest series of concerts yet undertaken at Smith college opened last evening at the John M. Greene hall in Northampton by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The occasion was notable in several ways. It was the first appearance of Dr. Karl Muck as conductor since his departure for Europe three years ago, and the program was one to give full scope to his own gifts. And there was the stir which always marks the opening of a new season; seldom does an audience chat so gayly between the numbers, though when music was being performed there was no disturbance in spite of an attendance so large that not all could find seats. The pressure in this fine, large, new auditorium seems likely to become almost as great as in the old college hall, and many music lovers are being drawn from Springfield and other cities by the exceptional attractions offered. Northampton owes much to the music department of the college."

A Turkish force, repulsed by Servians, left 200 dead on the field, according to a Belgrade dispatch today while the Servians had ten killed and 40 wounded. It was presumed that the message referred to the fight at Prijepolje.

[48]

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.
Date

1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its New York season with its first pair of concerts on November 7 and 9, in Carnegie Hall, with the comfortable feeling of sold-out houses. For the first time since it came to New York, and doubtless for the first time in any series of concerts in New York, Carnegie Hall has been sold out absolutely and completely by subscription. For the past several years every concert by the Boston Symphony has had a full house, but for the coming season only admission tickets will be available for the general public.

Nothing in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has equalled the warmth with which Mr. Muck was greeted at his first appearances in Boston on Friday afternoon, October 11, and Saturday evening, October 12. On both occasions Symphony Hall was filled to its utmost capacity, and both in the afternoon and in the evening the entire audience rose as the distinguished conductor made his appearance on the stage, while the orchestra sounded a "Tusch." On Saturday evening there was a particularly pretty incident. The first number on the programme was the "Eroica" Symphony. At the end of the performance of the symphony Mr. Higginson, the founder of the orchestra, left his seat in the middle of the hall and walked down to the stage, where he called Dr. Muck and shook him warmly by the hand, thus giving evidence of his own feelings toward the conductor. Newspaper comment regarding the performance of the orchestra was unanimous in the opinion that it sounded like a new organization, and had not in years played with such brilliancy and such effect.

From
Address: New York City.
Date [illegible] 1912

, 1884

Symphonie=Konzerte.

Die Leitung der Boſtoner Symphonie=Konzerte macht die Mittheilung, daß die beiden New Yorker Serien zum erſten Mal in dieſem Jahre gänzlich ausverkauft ſind, ſo daß für das allgemeine Publikum nur einige Entree=Billete verfügbar ſein werden. Die Boſtoner Eröffnungs=Konzerte am 11. und 12. Oktober, brachten Dr. Muck, der wieder an die Spitze der Boſtoner getreten iſt, erleſene Ovation, welche ihren Höhepunkt fanden, als Mr. Higginſon, der Gründer des Orcheſters, ſich von ſeinem Sitz im Parterre auf die Bühne begab, um Dr. Muck herzlich zu beglückwünſchen.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York.
Date OCT 20 1912
Es 1884

PLAN TO GIVE FREE HIGH CLASS MUSIC AT CARNEGIE HALL

Proposed to Use the Basement to Render Selections from Popular Works.

WHY NOT A BETTER PLACE?

Something Less Dreary Might Be Utilized, Says Charles Henry Meltzer.

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

A plan has been announced for giving concerts, of a good and serious kind, without charge, throughout the Winter, at Carnegie Hall. It is proposed to use the basement of that building for a series of popular concerts similar in character to those which in the Summer crowd the Mall in Central Park.

Nahan Franko, Arnold Volpe and other public-spirited musicians seem willing to devote their energies to the fulfillment of the plan—a most worthy one.

Two years ago something of the same kind was warmly advocated in these columns. A response came shortly after, with the beginning of a brief but useful season of free concerts, more or less classical, at the Normal College.

The present scheme is an extension of the Normal College idea. So far as can be seen it is of public interest and deserves support.

Nothing more sensible, nothing more merciful, of an artistic nature could be conceived than this new plan for putting poetry and joy into the lives of those who cannot pay for music.

Fitted to Give the Idea Form.

Both Mr. Volpe and Mr. Franko are exceptionally fitted to give form to the idea. Both have, at different times, directed concerts for the people with success. Thousands upon thousands have listened to their interpretations of good music in Central Park. Thousands upon thousands owe them gratitude.

Perhaps, though, a less dreary place than the substructure of the Carnegie Music Hall might be chosen for the projected concerts. There is something too suggestive in this notion of inviting our less prosperous music lovers to hear Bach and Beethoven in a basement. Acoustically the interpretation of great masters who are gods of art might not be harmed by the surroundings. But it should be possible to avoid the suggestion of a slight or slur.

The New York Symphony Society is this season to transfer its activities from the Century Theatre to the Aeolian Hall. Could not the free use of the Century be secured from its rich owners, with the assent of the lessees? Or, failing that, could not the Cooper Union Hall be leased, on moderate terms, for the new concerts?

Good music is a civilizing force. It is moral as well as beautiful. If they helped Mr. Franko and Mr. Volpe to give popular concerts, free, gratis, for nothing, the founders and lessees of the Century Theatre would be public benefactors.

* * *

As they well know, in the selection of their programmes, the organizers of the concerts could with safety avoid trivial music, of the kind vulgarly and mistakenly called "popular." Mr. Franko and Mr. Volpe would, I am sure, confirm this statement. I do not say that the "Domestic Symphony" or the "Death and Transfiguration" of Richard Strauss would arouse enthusiasm if they were played at the projected performances. But parts of the Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven symphonies, the "Largo" of Haendel, the "Meditation" from "Thais," and the overtures to many of the standard operas, would be welcomed with more heartiness and thanks than lighter works.

Incidentally it would be both gracious and politic to give occasional performances of American compositions.

* * *

Other Great Conductors.

Toscanini and Campanini are not the only great conductors who will be seen ere very long in our opera houses.

Felix Weingartner is, for the second time, to direct some of the performances at the Boston Opera House. The re-engagement of that wonderful musician should add much lustre to the Boston season. For, like the late Gustav Mahler, Felix Weingartner is one of the chief figures in the world of lyric art. As a composer he may be criticized, and even unfavorably criticized. But as a conductor he is in the foremost rank with Nikisch, Toscanini, foremost rank with Nikisch, Toscanini,

Though for a time he had control over the artistic destinies of the world-famous Vienna Opera House, Weingartner hates [illegible]

[illegible] year ago, when I met him in Paris, "but pray, pray do not name me Herr Direktor."

He vows that he will never more concern himself with the administration of opera. His nature has rebelled against the drudgery of art. He is a poet, a creator, not a manager. And, more than all, he is a great interpreter.

Even more important, perhaps, than the return of Weingartner this season is the re-engagement, for five years, of Dr. Muck by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Karl Muck is, perhaps, the foremost of the symphony conductors in the world to-day. For many years he acted as music director of the Berlin Opera House. When he assumed the responsibilities attaching to that post, the Berlin Opera House—or at least the orchestra connected with that theatre—was (to quote Dr. Muck's own words to me) a standard of crude inefficiency. Yet, when six months ago he left Berlin, his orchestra ranked with the best in Europe.

For five years, while he stays in Boston, Dr. Muck will devote himself, wholly and absolutely, to the interpretation of concert music. In Boston (and in many other places), he will be an inspiration. He has the rare and special gifts, he has the training and the temperamental charm, which make a leader. He has "magnetism." He is a master.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 20 1912
1884

WHAT ARTISTS PLAN IN THE MUSIC WORLD

Season Will Soon Be in Full Swing, Though Slow in Starting.

LOCAL EVENTS THIS WEEK.

Concerts, Lecture and Organ Recital. Goings and Comings of Musicians.

The Boston Symphony concerts will be given, as usual, on Friday evenings, the dates being November 8, December 6, January 10, February 21 and March 21. For the first concert there will be no soloist, for this will signalize the return to the orchestra of Dr. Karl Muck, whose two years in America made such a notable page in the history of music of this country. For the December concert the soloist will be Fritz Kreisler. In January Miss Elena Gerhardt. In February, Max Pauer. The soloist for the March concert has not yet been arranged for. While the above is notable list of assisting artists, interest necessarily centers in the return of Dr. Muck, who has come to America to make it has home for years. Under Dr. Muck, during the seasons of 1906-1907 and 1907-1908, the orchestra reached the highest point of its artistic efficiency and already, although he has had but a short time to impress himself again upon his colleagues, the orchestra is playing with extraordinary virtuosity. His first appearances in Boston on Friday afternoon, October 11 and Saturday evening, October 12, were signalized by ovations such as never have been given to any conductor in that city.

Of the four soloists engaged for the last four concerts, two are known in Brooklyn, and two are strangers. Fritz Kreisler the most distinguished of the younger violinists of the world, will make his only appearance in Brooklyn with the orchestra, for he comes to this country under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony, plays with no other organization in the East and gives no recitals. Miss Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German singer, will be agreeably remembered by the pleasure she gave with her recitals a year ago.

Max Pauer, the German pianist, is a newcomer. He is regarded as one of the giants of the pianoforte in Germany, and it is one of the strange freaks of fortune that he has never been in America. All accounts have it that he is one of the great artists of the world. This does not mean that he is of the sensational order, but the impression he makes everywhere is profound and lasting. He is particularly famous as a classical player. At the same time this does not signify that he is dry or pedantic, and he has won some of his greatest successes in the romantic works of the modern composers.

From JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Address OCT 17 1912
Date

Boston Symphony Concerts Here.

The sale of season tickets for the five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city, which has been in progress at Steinert's since Monday, exceeds all records of previous years. The first concert will be given next Tuesday evening, in Infantry Hall with Madame Marie Rappold of the Metropolitan Opera House as soloist.

1884

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 19 1912
Establi 1884

MUSIC NOTES OF INTEREST

Boston Orchestra Renewals Are Many.

SUBSCRIPTION TO OPEN FRIDAY AT THE ACADEMY

Spalding Violin Recital To-Morrow Afternoon—Institute Events of the Week—Stransky on His Way to Resume His Duties.

The sale of season tickets for the five concerts to be given in Brooklyn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming winter will open at thhe Box Office of the Brooklyn Academy of Music next Friday, Oct. 25, and on the following day tickets may be purchased, not only at the Academy of Music, but at Abraham & Straus and Frederick Loeser & Co. The renewals of last years's subscriptions have been unusually large and the number of tickets to be disposed of to new subscribers is necessarily limited. Therefore those expecting to secure subscriptions must make their purchases early.

The concerts will be given, as usual, on Friday evenings, the dates being Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Feb. 21 and March 21. For the first concert there will be no soloist, as this appearance will signalize the return to the orchestra of Dr. Karl Muck, whose two years in America made a notable page in the history of music in this country.

For the December concert the soloist will be Fritz Kreisler; in January Miss Elena Gerhard; in February, Max Pauer; The soloist for the March concert has not yet been arranged for.

While the above is a most notable list of assisting artists, interest necessarily centers in the return of Dr. Muck, who has come to America to make it his home for a number of years. Under Dr. Muck during the seasons of 1906-07 and 1907-08, the orchestra reached the highest point of its artistic efficiency and already, although he has had but a short time to impress himself again upon his colleagues, the Orchestra is playing with extraordinary virtuosity. His first appearance in Boston on Friday afternoon, Oct. 11 and Saturday evening, Oct. 12, were signalized by ovations such as never have been given to any conductor in that city. On both occasions, when he entered to take his place, the entire audience arose. A very pretty and significant incident marked the concert on Saturday evening. At the end of the "Eroica" symphony, which was the first number on the programme, Mr. Higginson, the founder and maintainer of the orchestra, left his seat in the middle of the hall, went down to stage and warmly shook Dr. Muck's hand This tribute to the conductor was cheered by the audience.

Of the four soloists engaged for the last four concerts two are known in Brooklyn and two are strangers. Fritz Kreisler will make his only appearance in Brooklyn with the orchestra, for he comes to this country under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony and plays with no other organization in the East, and gives no recitals. Miss Elene Gerhardt, the distinguished German singer, will be agreeably remembered for the pleasure she gave with her recitals a year ago.

Max Pauer, the German pianist, is a newcomer. He is regarded as one of the finest players of the pianoforte in Germany, and it is one of the strange freaks of fortune that he has never been in America. All accounts have it that he is one of the great artists.

Dr. Muck has considerable plans for his concerts, and a season of unusual interest may be expected.

From WORLD BROOKLYN EDIT
Address: New York
Date OCT 20 1912
E 1884

The future in local musical circles portends many brilliant events. The welcome Nov. 8 to Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music, is one of the approaching incidents of wide musical interest. This will be the first of the series of five Philharmonic concerts under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Women's Auxiliary Board.

From TIMES
Address Brooklyn, N. Y. OCT 19 1912
Date
Establis

The sale of season tickets for the five concerts to be given in Brooklyn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming winter will open at the box office of the Brooklyn Academy of Music next Friday, October 25, and on the following day tickets may be purchased not only at the Academy of Music, but at Abraham & Straus' and Frederick Loeser & Co.'s. The renewals of last year's subscriptions have been unusually large and the number of [illegible]

From EVG. SUN
Address: New York
Date OCT 19 1912

The Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its ten New York visits on Nov. 7 and 9, in Carnegie Hall, with the comfortable feeling of sold-out houses for the entire season. There isn't one seat unsubscribed.

When Karl Muck reappeared in Boston last week, the audience rose, the orchestra sounded a "Tusch," and after the "Eroica" symphony Mr. Higginson, the founder, walked down the aisle and shook the conductor by the hand.

From PRESS
Address: New York
Date OCT 20 1912

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens the coming New York season, on November 7 and 9, in Carnegie Hall, it will be with the comfortable feeling of sold-out houses. For the first time since it came to New York and doubtless for the first time in any series of concerts in New York, Carnegie Hall has been sold out by subscription. For the past several years every concert by the Boston Symphony has had a full house, but for the coming season only admission tickets will be available for the general public.

Nothing in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has equaled the warmth with which Dr. Muck was greeted at his first appeareances in Boston, on Friday afternoon, October 11, and Saturday evening, October 12. On both occasions Symphony Hall was filled to its capacity, and both in the afternoon and in the evening the entire audience rose as the distinguished conductor made his appearance on the stage, while the orchestra sounded a "Tusch." On Saturday evening a particularly pretty incident took place. The first number on the programme was the "Eroica" symphony. At the end of the performance of the symphony Colonel Higginson, the founder of the orchestra, left his seat in the middle of the hall and walked down to the stage, where he called Dr. Muck and shook him warmly by the hand, thus giving evidence of his own feelings toward the conductor.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

The next treat for Washington music lovers will be a concert at the New National Theater, November 5, at 4:30 p. m., by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Karl Muck again its conductor.

This will be a testimonial to Dr. Muck, who left the orchestra in the spring of 1908 to fill an engagement with the Royal Opera, Berlin. The keen regret caused by his departure at that time was tempered by his promise to return at the end of his engagement. That time has come, and for several years Boston will be his home, and America the field of his artistic work.

At the instance of Oscar Hammerstein, who has shown a marked interest in her career, Gretchen Hood, who has been studying vocal music in Brussels, has undertaken a series of finishing lessons at the hand of D'Aubigne, the instructor Felice Lyne, and other successful American prima donas, and for that purpose has taken up her residence in Paris for the coming winter.

W. T. Taber, a newcomer to Washington, and an organist of very general reputation, is filling a month's engagement at the First Cogregational Church, Tenth and G Streets Northwest. During his thirty-five years as a church organist Mr. Taber has played in many cities, having been in charge of the organ in the First Congregational Church in Omaha ten years; two years at the Fourth Presbyterian Church, New York; three years at the Central Presbyterian Church, Denver; two years at the First Methodist, and one year at the First Presbyterian, Atlanta.

Mr. Taber has given upward of a hundred recitals in the cities where he has been stationed in connection with his duties with the Pay Corps of the United States Army, and should his army duties permit his remaining in Washington long enough to become permanently engaged here he would udoubtedly do much to popularize the church organ, by a series of recitals. He was a pupil of George E. Whiting, of Boston.

The musical programme for the service this morning at the First Congregational Church is as follows: Organ prelude, "Andante in C" (Smart), anthem, "Praise the Lord" (Minshall); anthem, "Morning Hymn" (Wagner); bass solo, "If God So Clothed the Grass" (Bischoff), by J. Walter Humphrey; organ postlude, "March in F" (Guilmant). In the evening the following musical numbers will be given at the regular service: Organ prelude, "Nocturne" (Mendelssohn); anthem, "Sing Allelufa Forth" (Buck); quartet, "For God Loved the World" (Stainer), by Mrs. B. H. Smart, soprano; Miss Edna Scott Smith, contralto; Henneth W. Golden, tenor, and J. Walter Humphrey, bass; organ postlude, march from "Rienzi" (Wagner). Mr. Taber will preside at the organ.

From INQUIRER
Address. Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

The sale of season tickets for the Philadelphia concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has been in progress at Heppe's since last Monday, showe a decided increase in subscription over that of last year. The first concert will be given on Monday evening, November 4.

JULIA CULP
Who will be heard here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From EVG. NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 19 1912
Established:

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMING NOVEMBER 6

Dr. Karl Muck Meets With Warm Reception On His Return To The Hub.

The first concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, November 6.

Nothing in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has equaled the warmth with which Dr. Muck was greeted at his first appearance in Boston on October 11 and 12. On both occasions Symphony Hall was filled to its utmost capacity, and both in the afternoon and in the evening the entire audience arose as the distinguished conductor made his first appearance on the stage, while the orchestra sounded a "Tusch."

On Saturday evening there was a pretty incident. The first number on the program was the "Eroica" Symphony. At the end of the performance of the symphony Mr. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, left his seat in the middle of the hall, walked to the stage, called Dr. Muck and shook him by the hand. Newspaper comment regarding the performance of the orchestra was unanimous in the opinion that it sounded like a new organization and had not in years played with such brilliancy.

From NEWS
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date OCT 17 1912

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sale of season tickets for the five concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Providence, which has been in progress at Steinert's since Monday, exceeds all records of previous years. Not only was the number of renewals greater than ever, but the number of new subscribers showed a material increase and as a result there will be very few seats left for single sales.

The first concert will be given next Tuesday evening, Oct. 22nd, in Infantry hall with Mme. Marie Rappold of the Metropolitan Opera house as soloist.

From EVG. STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date OCT 24 1912

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Nothing in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it is said, has equaled the warmth with which Dr. Muck was greeted at his first appearances in Boston recently. Symphony Hall was filled to its utmost capacity, and both in the afternoon and in the evening the entire audience rose as the conductor made his appearance on the stage, Newspaper comment regarding the performance of the orchestra voiced the opinion that it sounded like a new organization, and had not in years played with such brilliancy and such effect.

The sale of season tickets in Washington is in progress at Droop's music store. The first concert here will be given Tuesday afternoon, November 5, in the New National Theater, at 4:30 o'clock.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa. OCT 20 1912
Date

* * *

Nothing in the history of the Boston Symphony orchestra has equaled the warmth with which Dr. Karl Muck was greeted at his first appearances in Boston on Friday afternoon, October 11, and Saturday evening, October 12. On both occasions Symphony Hall was filled to its capacity, and both in the afternoon and in the evening the entire audience arose as the distinguished conductor made his first appearance on the stage, while the orchestra sounded a "Tusch." On Saturday evening there was a particularly pretty incident. The first number on the program was the "Eroica" symphony. At the end of the performance of the symphony Mr. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, left his seat in the middle of the hall and walked down to the stage, called Dr. Muck and shook him warmly by the hand. Newspaper comment regarding the orchestra was that it sounded like a new organization and had not in years played with such brilliancy.

The sale of season tickets for the Philadelphia concerts, which has been in progress since last Monday, shows a decided increase in subscription over that of last year. The first concert will be given on Monday evening, November 4.

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date 1912

Boston Welcomes Doctor Muck

Scarcely anything in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has equaled the warmth with which Doctor Muck was greeted at his first appearances in Boston on Friday afternoon, October 11, and Saturday evening, October 12. On both occasions Symphony Hall was filled to its capacity, and both in the afternoon and in the evening the audience arose as the distinguished conductor made his first appearance on the stage, while the orchestra sounded a "Tusch." On Saturday evening there was a particularly pretty incident. The first number on the program was the "Eroica" symphony.

At the end of the performance of the symphony Mr. Higginson, the founder of the orchestra, left his seat in the middle of the hall and walked down to the stage, called Doctor Muck and shook him warmly by the hand, thus giving evidence of his own feelings toward the conductor. Newspaper comment regarding the performance of the orchestra was unanimous in the opinion that it sounded like a new organization, and had not in years played with such brilliancy.

The new dramatic soprano, Cecilia Gagliardi, who is to sing the title role in that opera at the opening performance of the eason on October 31, will arrive in New York tomorrow morning on the Potsdam and will come immediately to this city to begin rehearsals.

[50]

From EVENING SUN
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 19 1912

HEARTY WELCOME TO DR. MUCK IN BOSTON

Symphony Orchestra's Founder Greets Conductor On Auditorium Floor.

Few events in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have equaled the warmth with which Dr. Karl Muck was greeted at his first appearance in Boston on Friday afternoon of last week and on the following Saturday evening.

On both occasions Symphony Hall was filled to its capacity, and both audiences arose as the conductor made his first appearance on the stage while the orchestra sounded a "Tusch." On Saturday evening the first number on the program was the "Eroica" Symphony. At the end of the performance of the symphony Mr. Higginson, the founder of the orchestra, left his seat in the middle of the hall and walked down to the stage, called Dr. Muck and shook him warmly by the hand, thus giving evidence of his own feelings toward the conductor.

Newspaper comment regarding the performance of the orchestra was unanimous in the opinion that it sounded like a new organization and had not in years played with such brilliancy.

The sale of season tickets for the Baltimore concerts, which has been in progress at Albaugh's since last Monday, shows a decided increase in subscriptions over last year. The first concert will be given in the Lyric Theatre on Wednesday evening, November 6.

From PRESS
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date 19 1912

* * *

Nothing in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has equaled the warmth with which Dr. Muck was greeted at his first appearance in Boston on Friday afternoon, October 11, and Saturday evening, October 12. On both occasions Symphony Hall was filled to its utmost capacity and both in the afternoon and in the evening the entire audience arose as the distinguished conductor made his first appearance on the stage, while the orchestra sounded a "Tusch." On Saturday evening there was a particularly pretty incident. The first number on the program was the "Eroica" Symphony. At the end of the performance of the symphony Mr. Higginson, the founder of the orchestra, left his seat in the middle of the hall and walked down to the stage, called Dr. Muck and shook him warmly by the hand, thus giving evidence of his own feelings toward the conductor. Newspaper comment regarding the performance of the orchestra was unanimous in the opinion that it sounded like a new organization and had not in years played with such brilliancy. The sale of season tickets for the Philadelphia concerts, which has been in progress at 1719 Chestnut Street, since last Monday, shows a decided increase in subscription over that of last year. The first concert will be given on Monday evening, November 4.

* * * CA

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 21 1912

$50,000 rental for the hall.

Boston Welcomes Doctor Muck

Scarcely anything in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has equaled the warmth with which Doctor Muck was greeted at his first appearances in Boston on Friday afternoon, October 11, and Saturday evening, October 12. On both occasions Symphony Hall was filled to its capacity, and both in the afternoon and in the evening the audience arose as the distinguished conductor made his first appearance on the stage, while the orchestra sounded a "Tusch." On Saturday evening there was a particularly pretty incident. The first number on the program was the "Eroica" symphony.

At the end of the performance of the symphony Mr. Higginson, the founder of the orchestra, left his seat in the middle of the hall and walked down to the stage, called Doctor Muck and shook him warmly by the hand, thus giving evidence of his own feelings toward the conductor. Newspaper comment regarding the performance of the orchestra was unanimous in the opinion that it sounded like a new organization, and had not in years played with such brilliancy.

The new dramatic soprano, Cecilia Gagliardi, who is to sing the title role in that opera at the opening performance of the season on October 31, will arrive in New York tomorrow morning on the Potsdam and will come immediately to this city to begin rehearsals.

Many Vocal Students Enrolled

[illegible] members of the public

From BULLETIN
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Date OCT 19 1912

Dance."

Music Notes

The Boston Symphony's first concert of the season, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, will be given at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 4.

From JOURNAL
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.

THE symphony season will open this week, when on Tuesday evening the famous Boston orchestra, once more under the leadership of Dr. Muck, will give its first Providence concert of the year. Much of the individual interest usually given to the soloist will go this time to Dr. Muck himself, whose work with the orchestra during the brief rehearsal period of the season has won enthusiasm from Boston audiences and critics. The welcome he received at the first public appearance of the orchestra after his return was such as is rarely seen in Boston, the enthusiasm being at once spectacular and impressive. At the Saturday concert Maj. Higginson, founder and chief maintainer of the organization, left his seat in the hall and walked to the platform, where he shook Dr. Muck by the hand.

For Tuesday the orchestral numbers will be Sgambati's Symphony in D-major, No. 1, Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Joseph Haydn, and "The Roman Carnival" Overture of Berlioz. Sgambati is the dean of Italian composers and is one of the very few Italians who have devoted themselves to absolute music rather than to opera. This symphony was first played in Rome 30 years ago and Sgambati himself is now a man well advanced in years. He was a protege of Liszt and a friend of Wagner, who helped him greatly in making his work known in Germany. The symphony is one of genuine Italian melody. In his Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Brahms has taken a notable chorale of Haydn's and has worked it up with his wonderful skill and genius. It is likewise a splendid exhibitive piece of the virtuosity of an orchestra. The "Roman Carnival" Overture of Berlioz is based on themes taken from that composer's opera "Benevenuto Cellini." It is bright and gay and melodious.

Mme. Marie Rappold
Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday Evening.

The soloist will be Madame Marie Rappold, one of the principal sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera House. Mme. Rappold's career has been especially notable from the fact that she is one of the few American singers to attain highest rank without the aid of European training. The wife of a prominent Brooklyn, N. Y., physician, she has been working at singing for a number of years, when Heinrich Conried, the then conductor of the Metropolitan Opera House, gave her a hearing. He was so pleased with her voice that he immediately engaged her for the important part of Sulamith in the revival of Goldmark's "The Queen of Sheba," a few years ago. Her success was extraordinary, considering that it was practically not merely her first appearance on the stage, but her first appearance in public. Since then she has played a most prominent role in opera in New York and in concerts in this country. She was one of the principals in the revival of Gluck's "Orpheus" by the Metropolitan Opera Company two years ago, singing the part of Eurydice. Mme. Rappold is described as a dramatic soprano, but not one of the heroic type.

Tuesday's programme calls for two numbers by her. The first will be "Elizabeth's Greeting," the opening aria in the second act of "Tannhauser," and the second will be composed of two short pieces with orchestra—"Chanson Provencale" by dell' Acqua, and "Fruhlingsnacht" by Frank van der Stucken.

* * *

From JOURNAL
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date OCT 20 1912

BELATED PROGRAMMES.

Too Little Time to Study Boston Orchestra Offerings.

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

For years the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has complained that the concerts in Providence are not attended as they ought to be. Yet the management seems to be but very little inclined to increase the attendance and get the good will of the Providence people by such little acts of courtesy as furnishing the community with a programme of their coming concerts in adequate time beforehand.

While the soloists are no doubt a drawing card to many people, the majority of the subscribers go to these concerts of the Symphony Orchestra to hear orchestral music; and it makes a great deal of difference, especially to those who buy single tickets, what the orchestra is going to play. Many people study the scores beforehand, or play compositions, if possible, with friends, four-hand, in order to study them, and thus get more enjoyment out of the concerts. All these things enhance the educational value of these concerts, of which there is always so much said when the cash receipts get somewhat low.

Now, if this orchestra is a strictly educational organization, and means to educate, why, in the name of common sense, doesn't the management assist the people in this? Last Monday, when the tickets were sold, nobody at Steinert's knew anything about the programme, and it is tommyrot to assume that the conductor and management had not made up their minds by that time what the orchestra would play a week from that day.

The analytical programmes also arrive altogether too late, and are very seldom available for that very purpose. Neither does the management care to advertise the programme, even the Sunday before the concerts, as was noticed several times last year.

If it does not appear to be common business sense to the management to facilitate the enjoyment and the attendance of the people, then they should look upon it as their plain duty. Although the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a mighty good orchestra, it is by no means the only pebble on the beach, as we found out when the Philharmonic came here from New York last year. The Federation of Musical Clubs has again and again made appeals to the management to be furnished with the programme in sufficient time beforehand so that those who go to the trouble to lecture at Brown University on these programmes, and thus stimulate an added interest, may have time to prepare these lectures. Nobody seems to pay any attention in Boston to letters written and inquiries made in regard to that purpose.

SUBSCRIBER.

Providence, Oct. 18

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 20 1912
Established:

Musical Notes

Nothing in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has equaled the warmth with which Doctor Muck was greeted at his first appearances in Boston on Friday afternoon, October 11, and Saturday evening, October 12. On both occasions Symphony Hall was filled to its utmost capacity, and both in the afternoon and in the evening the entire audience arose as the distinguished conductor made his first appearance on the stage, while the orchestra sounded a "Tusch." On Saturday evening there was a particularly pretty incident. The first number on the programme was the Eroica Symphony. At the end of the performance of the symphony Mr. Higginson, the founder of the orchestra, left his seat in the middle of the hall and walked down to the stage, called Doctor Muck and shook him warmly by the hand, thus giving evidence of his own feelings toward the conductor. Newspaper comment regarding the performance of the orchestra was unanimous in the opinion that it sounded like a new organization, and had not in years played with such brilliancy.

The sale of season tickets for the Philadelphia concerts, which has been in progress at Heppe's since last Monday, shows a decided increase in subscription over that of last year. The first concert will be given on Monday evening, November 4.

From STANDARD UNION
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 22 1912

WILL GIVE PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS IN DIM LIGHT.

The fall meeting of the Women's Auxiliary Board on philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held in science room, Academy of Music, this morning. In the absence of the president, Mrs. Camden C. Dike, Mrs. George Notman presided. Mrs. James H. Post, Mrs. H. R. Price, Mrs. F. H. Sloan, Mrs. Arthur F. Eggleston, Miss Holmes and Miss Marie Louise Rosset were added as members to the auxiliary, and Mrs. Arnold Guyot Dana resigned.

In a letter, Mrs. Glentworth R. Butler suggested the lowering of the lights during the playing of a number in the philharmonic concerts. This was put into a motion and unanimously carried.

There were reports from the secretary, Mrs. Frank M. Lupton, and from the executive committee. The last mentioned reviewed the philharmonic concerts from early days, and spoke of the orchestral concerts for young people, which are given by the New York Symphony Orchestra. These were recommended for their good work in building up a future audience for the philharmonic con-

From TRIBUNE

Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Date OCT 20 191

Est

884

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Dr. Muck to be Welcomed at Infantry Hall Tuesday.

The musical season of Providence will have its formal opening next Tuesday evening, Oct. 22, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives the first concert of its series of five in Infantry Hall. It is gratifying to know that the subscription is larger than ever before and it may fairly be assumed that the concerts will be even more brilliant than they have ever been in the past. The critics of Boston unite in giving most glowing praise to the performances of the orchestra under Dr. Muck. The first rehearsal and concert were among the most brilliant musical affairs Boston has ever known and at only a less degree did the same brilliancy characterize the second pair of concerts when the novelty of welcoming back the great conductor had disappeared.

Following the custom of recent years the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has striven to engage for the Providence concerts soloists of highest rank and the assisting artist at this first concert will be Madame Marie Rappold, one of the principal sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. Madame Rappold is one of the few singers of to-day who has the intense satisfaction of having had all her training in this country and having risen to the foremost rank of her profession in America before she was ever heard abroad. Her appearances abroad, however, have fully vindicated the judgment of the American public.

The programme has been so arranged that she will sing twice. Her first number will be the opening aria of Elizabeth in the second act of "Tannhauser," "Dich theure Halle," and her second number will be composed of two smaller pieces with orchestra—"Chanson provencale," by dell'Acqua, and "Fruhlingsnacht," by Frank van der Stucken.

Dr. Muck has arranged an exceedingly interesting group of orchestral pieces. The symphony will be that in D-major by the Italian composer, Giovanni Sgambati. Sgambati is one of the Italians who have devoted themselves to absolute music instead of spending their energy on operas. A man now well advanced in years, he was a prodigy of Liszt and Wagner not only expressed the greatest admiration for him but was instrumental in securing a German publisher for his music. The symphony which Dr. Muck will play is a work of true Italian melodiousness and at the same time is scholarly and musicianly.

The other orchestral numbers will be Brahms's superb variations on the St. Anthony Chorale of Joseph Haydn and Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival." The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Sgambati....Symphony in D-major, No. 1
Wagner..........Elizabeth's Greeting from "Tannhauser."
Brahms..Variations on a Theme by Joseph Haydn.
Songs with orchestra....Chanson Provencale, "Fruhlingsbacht."
Berlioz.......Overture, "The Roman Carnival."

Soloist—Madame Marie Rappold.

JOURNAL—
OCTOBER 26, 1912.

BISCHOFF'S WORK BRILLIANTLY GIVEN

Symphony Orchestra in Dazzling Form in the Straussian Composition.

This week the Symphony Orchestra is giving a performance of the Bischoff symphony in E-major that is altogether worthy of the most brilliant days of Boston's unsurpassed organization. It is by all odds the memorable feature of this third pair of concerts, the first of which was given yesterday afternoon. The other will take place tonight. It is a performance at once intellectual in the highest sense, a lucid and sympathetic interpretation of one of the most subtle and complex examples of the music of the Richard Strauss school, and stirring in its technical power and beauty. Even those who do not quite relish the taste of this new music must be grateful for the revival of this colossal composition if only because it furnishes a means of displaying Dr. Muck's rare talent as a conductor and the superb skill of the players themselves.

This symphony, which had its first American performance in Boston early in 1908 under Dr. Muck, is one of the most formidable works in the repertoire of the orchestra. It took nearly an hour and a quarter yesterday to play the four movements. With the exception of one flute and one oboe, a full modern orchestra is required. This week, for instance, even the assistant harpist, Miss Harriet A. Shaw, makes one of her infrequent appearances.

Little is known of Hermann Bischoff beyond the fact that he studied at the Leipsic Conservatory 25 years ago and that later he became associated with Strauss, to whom he has dedicated this first symphony. A second symphony appears to have been a comparative failure. The first movement of the symphony on this week's program is widely known as one of the most vivid tone descriptions of "orgiastic masked balls," to use the composer's words, and "passionate love, murmuring in gardens flooded with moonlight and vocal with the songs of birds." After this comes the apotheosis of the hero, long-drawn out.

The audience yesterday applauded the performance heartily. The program is one of well-chosen contrasts, the other numbers being the suave "Siegfried Idyl" by Wagner and the scintillating overture to Weber's "Euryanthe."

Beethoven's eighth symphony and the Buelow arrangement of Bach's suite in B-minor, for flute and string orchestra, will be the principal numbers next week. Herbert Witherspoon, the American bass with the Metropolitan Opera Company, will sing an aria from Marschner's "Hans Heiling" and Wotan's farewell, from the third act of Wagner's "Die Walkuere." This number will include the performance of the magic fire scene.

OCTOBER 26.
GLOBE-

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Compositions by Bischoff, Wagner and Weber Played by the Boston Orchestra Yesterday Afternoon.

The third program of the Boston Symphony season comprised three pieces not unfamiliar to patrons of these concerts. The opening number yesterday, Bischoff's E Major Symphony, occupied more than the first half of the afternoon, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Weber's "Euryanthe," overture following. The symphony was first played in Boston at a Symphony concert under Dr Muck's direction in January, 1908, and was repeated in February of the same year.

Colossal in its proportions and very difficult in its orchestration for every choir, the work taxes alike the abilities of conductor and players and the patience of the hearers, for it is more than one hour in length of performance and the fortissimo passages are many and mighty in volume.

Bischoff's musical scheme was to illustrate the progress of a dissolute fellow, who finds true happiness denied him after his course of debauchery. Visions, evil and good, appear to him, but his worthlessness debars him from enjoying pure delights. The score is dedicated to Richard Strauss.

The work as a whole shows vivid imagination in tonal colorings, skilled use of the modern orchestra, cleverness in utilizing up-to-date ideas in producing weird effects by various instrumental combinations and a perplexing assignment of parts to the various choirs.

Effective, but in a style more suited to the "advanced" body of musicians and students than to the average attendant on matters musical.

In the second part and the scherzo of the third movement are some pleasurable moments; one might call them restful after the storm and stress of other portions of the fiery work. The orchestra acquitted itself admirably under Dr Muck's guidance, giving an impressive interpretation of a gigantic, though hardly a popular, composition.

After the intermission came Wagner. Not the Wagner on the mood of Bischoff, but of a gentler vein and in the form of the charming "Siegfried Idyl." The tribute to his son, based upon familiar themes of the music-drama for which he was named, shows the master in a delightfully sympathetic mood and the piece is deservedly a favorite, for there is melody a-plenty scored with delicate musical outlines. The highest praise is due the performance by Dr Muck's men, the audience evidently giving this [illegible] place in its appreciation.

With the [illegible] Weber over[illegible] tional [illegible]

OCTOBER 26,
ADVERTISER.

BISCHOFF SYMPHONY REVIVED BY DR. MUCK

A GRAND FEAST OF TONE COLORING

Despite Extreme Length of Composition Audience Expressed Unstinted Approval of the Masterly Playing.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Bischoff—Symphony in E major.
Wagner—A Siegfried Idyl.
Weber—Overture to "Euryanthe."

Entirely orchestral in its numbers, this concert was not so short as one might suppose from its brevity in print. A modern symphony is not only a complex, but a prolix thing, and Bischoff's symphony was a concert in itself. Dr. Muck is evidently a propagandist for the new composer, for we have not had this symphony since he gave it twice to us during his old regime, and we had never had it before then.

Of course the symphony has a heavy scoring and rich tonal effects. We have become accustomed to this brilliancy in the present epoch. There are half-a-dozen composers alive who can orchestrate as well as Beethoven and better than Brahms or Schumann. Yet somehow they do not seem to rank with these men. It is because tone-coloring is a trade that can be learned, but poetic ideas cannot be thus acquired.

The first movement of Bischoff's symphony has, however, a tinge of Bacchanalian revelry that is not ineffective. The movement is almost half an hour in length, the longest one of the symphony, yet we did not find it prosy, although fragmentary. Its scintillating character, its insouciance, sometimes even its frank vulgarity, made it far more bearable than the long movements of Elgar or Paderewski. But when these pictures of revelry are given the piccolo has work to do, and we feel that the piccolo player ought to be hailed as the hero of a good part of this work;—Rum and Piccolo always go together.

Another point in Bischoff's favor is that he is not a problem writer, but presents original ideas clearly expressed. Nor does he avoid melody. His music is not crabbed nor ascetic. The first movement is the opposite of that. Not even the parrot and the monkey had such a time. The scheme of the work is the redemption of the wild reveller by a lovely woman, or at least his realization of the mistake of his career, because of her. This is all very moral, but we like the reveller best while he is revelling. The first movement might make a symphonic poem in itself and might be entitled, "A Wild and Wet Night," or something like that. The moral would be gone, but we can enjoy music even without a moral tacked on at the end. This movement received a most brilliant performance.

The second movement pictures remorse. There was no need of much remorse after such a brilliant movement, but at least it gave a chance to the piccolo-player to get back his breath. To reform a piccolo would be impossible. It is innately depraved and mixes up in every musical debauch that ever has been composed. It has nothing to do with good resolves or repentance such as here appear. The second movement comes as a good contrast to the dissipation of the first movement. It had two fine melodies which were used thematically. We have come to be very grateful for a little melody now and then in a modern work. This slow movement impressed us much more than at the former performances. It was noble and broadly sustained.

The third movement takes the place of a Scherzo. There is nothing playful in it, however, for the hero, who is evidently scourged and pursued by some furies of the "Peer Gynt" type. By the time this movement is reached we begin to sense reiteration and an undue expansion of ideas. The piccolo reported back for duty in this movement and yelled and shrieked right lustily. The trombones also did their best in mighty upheavals and tonal explosions.

These were but a preamble to a general tumult in the finale. Here Bischoff cried Havoc and let loose the trumpets, kettledrums, trombones and piccolo, and tried for regions of dynamic force yet unreached. In spite of the excess of force demanded, in spite of needless repetition of musical ideas, there is something in this work that compels one to rank Bischoff with the big men of the present. If this symphony were half the length it might probably achieve twice the success.

We consider Bischoff rather on the path of Mohler than of Richard Strauss, but, unlike Mohler, he gives an inkling of the "programme" of his music, which the other always refused to do. Mohler renounced programme-music, while Bischoff countenances and defends it.

The symphony is a grand feast of tone-color and it leads to a magnificent climax. The work took nearly an hour and 10 minutes in its performance, and it is a great victory for the composer that the audience seemed never to lose their interest. Each movement was applauded, and at the end there was so much enthusiasm displayed that the orchestra was finally obliged to rise in acknowledgment. The tribute was well deserved for Dr. Muck and his men must have worked like Trojans to have achieved so great a result with such a difficult and long composition. We await with some curiosity the effect of this symphony in New York. It will at all events prove to the Gotham critics that our orchestra is not deteriorating. But now let some conductor seek out Herr Bischoff with surgical instruments and blue pencil.

To hear Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" directly after Bischoff's orchestral earthquakes gave one the impression that the aforesaid Wagner was something of a Haydn in scoring. This is, of course, his simplest score, for it was written and played as a birthday surprise to his second wife, which necessitated an orchestra of modest proportions. It is Wagner's "Sinfonia Domestica" and is far less militant and unwieldy than Strauss's home-life done into music. Not every lady has her birthday music become a standard number in the orchestral repertoire.

Placed in the sharply contrasted juxtaposition it seemed the acme of Peace and Gentleness. The sweetly reiterated and interwoven figures of "Siegfried, the World's refuge," of the "Melody of Peace," the "Bird-call," etc., made a most charming impression and the tranquil work was read with beautiful delicacy and suavity. It was never sentimentalized or dragged, and the horn soloist deserves especial mention for fine work.

Then we went back to spice in the shape of Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. But this is no longer so thrilling as once it was. Sir Walter Scott's novels and Weber's music were once deemed the extreme of excitement, but the procession has passed beyond them and they are now heard or read with respect, but without especial thrills. The sharp contrasts, which make Weber's music theatrical, were well brought out.

There were three distinct schools in this programme and Dr. Muck was great in each one of them. Yet the chief task was the Bischoff Symphony, which must have been an arduous labor to conductor and men alike, and it is pleasant to chronicle that it was so wonderfully carried out.

Musical Matters.

The first of the season's concerts in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, Nov. 17. At the request of many friends of the orchestra, Dr. Muck has consented to play practically the Wagner programme that he gave twice with such success his first year in Boston in 1906-'07. That programme comprised all the preludes and overtures of Wagner and the funeral music from "Gotterdammerung."

From EVG. NEWS

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date OCT 26 1912

Esta

884

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINE PROGRAM

Dr. Muck Selects Two Great Compositions For Orchestra Here.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has this year in Baltimore the largest subscription in its history, and the return of Dr. Muck to America seems to have excited as much interest here as it has in other cities. The orchestra is said to be playing more brilliantly than ever, and the series of five concerts is looked forward to with much eagerness.

For this first program, which will be rendered at the Lyric Theater, Wednesday evening, November 6, Dr. Muck has elected to play the same number which he will play in New York on the following Saturday afternoon. The Symphony will be Bischoff's in E major.

This is a work of large dimensions and enormous technical difficulties which Dr. Muck introduced to America five years ago. He regards it as one of the most important of modern compositions. It is a work full of melody and displays the virtuosity of the orchestra to its utmost.

The second half of the program will have as its numbers the delicious "Siegfried Idyl" of Wagner and the ever-popular "Euryanthe" overture of Weber.

From POST

Address: Washington, D. C.

Date OCT 27 1912

Establis

this field of the [illegible]

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The closing of the subscription sale for the Boston Symphony concerts in this city shows that the house is practically sold out, only a few seats remaining for single sale. The return of Dr. Muck to America seems to have excited the same interest in Washington that it has elsewhere, and everybody looks forward to a brilliant series of concerts. The first concert will be given on Tuesday afternoon, November 5, in the National, at 4:30. Dr. Muck has arranged a most delightful program. It opens with the charming eighth symphony of Beethoven, "the little symphony in A," as the composer called it, and the second half will comprise the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz; the symphonic poem "Mazeppa" of Liszt, and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," by Wagner.

OCTOBER POST,

DULL WORK IS MADE BRIGHT

Brilliant Reading of Bischoff's Symphony by Dr. Muck

BY OLIN DOWNES

Hermann Bischoff's E major symphony was the principal feature of the fourth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, a symphony which Dr. Muck performed twice in Boston when he was here in the season of 1907-08. A symphony one hour and 11 minutes—or is it 12?—in length, a symphony meriting to the utmost that famous German adjective, "kolossal," in all its horrible significance.

Dr. Muck favored the work with a virtuoso performance which will go down in the annals of the great achievements of a great orchestra. The performance left nothing to be desired. It was so finished and the work was interpreted with such conviction and magnetism that many a passage which might well have fallen flat "sounded" splendidly. If only by reason of the quality and the myriad colors of the orchestra, the music was for a space good to hear. Dr. Muck more than did the composer justice. He presented the score as it was conceived in the brain of the musician, rather than as actually put on paper. The performance was creative in its vividness, and who knows how many unmentioned services the conductor did the composer, as he lightened and clarified thick passages by the most skilful adjustment of the instrumental timbres, and made the orchestra flash like a prism. For the performance there is no praise too high.

First Movement Vigorous

As it was the symphony might have proved entertaining if not thoroughly convincing had it been shorn of, say, its last two movements. This would have been bad for the underlying "programme" of the music, but more programme and less music might in this instance have been preferable. We leave those who consider the matter ground for discussion to decide for themselves. Certainly the first movement is the most vigorous and interesting of the four. There are the themes, not too original in character, but vigorous and handled with constant ingenuity and resource, and there are many Straussian effects of orchestration, effects which not only dazzle at first but which sweetly imply a certain intimacy between great souls. You hear the composer whispering, with a smile, "My colleague and I."

The following scherzo is a naive and clumsy attempt at the portrayal of soul-states—an attempt and a failure only possible in such a manner to a modern German. The last movement is boisterous, empty, like sounding brass and tinkling cymbals. This is too much! Is anyone impressed by this futile shouting to the heavens by one with nothing left to say? In a word this symphony as a whole is in atrociously bad taste, and in a style now unfortunately fostered and encouraged in Germany. The ingenious remark has been made by admirers or apologists of the Bischoff symphony that we must consider Bischoff as a sort of modern revival of the spirit of Berlioz and his time. But will anyone pretend that there is artistic affinity between this work and the remarkable works of the master Frenchman who loved and comprehended the orchestra as Bischoff cannot love it, if he will treat it so—and in all, nearly all, of whose works there is to be found at least one lightning flash of genius?

Everyone to his taste, but let us not confuse issues! The bulk of the music of Berlioz is ultra-modern and extraordinary today. This work of Bischoff's is now a work of the past, the product of an undistinguished manner that is already passing behind us, and not too distinguished a product, at that. Let us not mingle this man's name with that of the hero who revolutionized French music.

We have spoken of the excellence of the orchestral performance. At the ead Dr. Muck and his men rose in acknowledgment of the tribute tendered them.

Pleasing Contrast

The listing of Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" to follow this the work of Bischoff was an inspiration in programme-making and the performance was excellent in all respects. So was the performance of the "Euryanthe" overture, composed in 1823 and by fully three-quarters of a century younger—not older—than the symphony of 1906. Three-quarters of a century bears witness to the youth of this overture, to its gallantry and romance. And the largo set in the midst of the overture is still strange and stirring to the imagination, despite instrumental coloring that is mouse-like in comparison to the whacking brush strokes of the symphony. How much Weber tells us—how

---

MONITOR, OCTOBER 26.

PLAN FOR PENSION CONCERT

The first pension fund concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor, will be given in Symphony hall Sunday evening, Nov. 17. The program will be Wagnerian and will be practically the same as that which Dr. Muck presented twice in the season of 1906-07. Nearly all the preludes and overtures of the Wagner operas will be played, besides the funeral music from "Goetterdaemmerung." It is expected that the Venusberg music from "Tannhaeuser" will be given instead of the much-performed overture to that opera.

Dr. Muck is said to be less averse today than during his former engagement in Boston to presenting Wagner on orchestral programs. The Symphony conductor is more yielding, now that he is to have a competitor in Wagnerian interpretation in Felix Weingartner, who will conduct "Tristan and Isolde" in the midseason at the Boston opera house, than he was when he held the situation absolutely in his own hands six years ago. His audiences are more liberal, too, in their attitude toward excerpts from the music dramas. The idea, recently popular in Boston, that no Wagner at all is better than Wagner in an incomplete form is seen to have no very staunch esthetic foundation. Moreover, Wagner does not stand so indisputably in the forefront of lyric time as he did a few years ago. Richard Strauss has written his "Elektra" and has laid claim to the title of leadership in modern German opera. There have been great changes in European art since Dr. Muck was last in America as its representative; and Dr. Muck himself has had a large share in making them. There have been great changes, too, in American appreciation of European art. The purchasing power of the provincial city which once secured the services of the distinguished conductor from Berlin has secured them again, even in the face of political opposition, and it has also secured those of a conductor from Vienna who is in every respect the Berlin man's peer. There is liberality all around, and there must continue to [illegible] until Dr. Muck is known to Boston [illegible] his full powers as a Wagnerian, [illegible] his competitor, Felix Weingartner, is known to them in all his powers as a symphonist.

Herbert Witherspoon, as soloist at the Symphony concerts of Nov. 1 and 2, will sing an air from Marschner's "Hans Heilung" and Wotan's Farewell from Wagner's "Die Walkuere." The principal number of the program will be the eighth symphony of Beethoven. The selections announced by Dr. Muck are as follows: Beethoven, symphony in F major, No. 8, opus 93; Marschner, aria, "An jenem Tag," from "Hans Heiling;" Bach-Buelow, suite in B minor for flute and string orchestra; Wagner, Wotan's farewell and fire scene, "Die Walkuere," act 3.

Important symphony soloists to be heard soon are Mr. Godowsky, the pianist, and Mr. Kreisler, the violinist. Max Pauer, the pianist, who comes to America under the direction of M. H. Hanson of New York, will make his appearance with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Boston in February.

* * *

PIANIST ON SYMPHONY SOLO LIST

Max Pauer booked to appear with Boston orchestra in concerts of mid-season and to give recital

---

THE BOSTON TRAVELER OCTOBER 26,

BISCHOFF HEARD TO ADVANTAGE

Dr. Muck Charms with an Exceptional Reading of Long Symphony.

By FRANK BERTWALL

There was so much of general excellence in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's public rehearsal yesterday afternoon that one hesitates to declare that such and such a selection was the feature. Certain it is that those who came expecting to be bored by the unusual length of the Bischoff symphony were most agreeably disappointed.

Dr. Muck's exceptionally fine reading of the number robbed it of any suggestion of being tiresome, barring possibly for the orchestra itself, for it does make unusual demands on the players. Indeed so artistically was the selection given that many rather wished the composer had told an even longer story.

One need not necessarily agree with him in his choice of a topic, which as he says is the story of a young man who, living a wild and debauched life, becomes acquainted with pure happiness when he is no longer worthy of it and therefore cannot possess it. But all will agree that the composer says what he has to say in a most interesting and intelligent manner and in his own way.

In yesterday afternoon's interpretation there was a going behind the actual score to the very thoughts of the composer himself, such as vouchsafed all too seldom. Bischoff, with Dr. Muck as the interpreter, can no longer be reckoned as of doubtful merit.

Fine as was the symphony, it somehow seemed forced to yield first place in hte afternoon's excellence to the "Siegfried Idyl." It was a bit of a jump from Bischoff to Wagner, and yet the landing was not exactly what one might have expected had he shut his eyes to the particular selection and merely thought of the composer. Especially delightful were the horn passages and those for the oboe.

Naturally the closing number, Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, seemed a bit tame after [illegible] feast. It was as though we [illegible] come down to everyday earth once again after a most delightful journey in realms that cause one to lose all thought of day by day affairs.

First of Season's Pension Fund Concerts.

The first of the season's concerts in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, Nov. 17. At the request of many friends of the orchestra Dr. Muck has consented to play practically the Wagner programme that he gave twice with such success his first year in Boston in 1906-07.

Wagner Number for Bass Soloist.

One of the very few opportunities to hear an excerpt with voice of Wagnerian music drama will come at the next Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next. The soloist will be Herbert Witherspoon, the eminent basso of the Metropolitan Opera company, and for his last number he will sing Wotan's "Farewell" and Dr. Muck will play the entire final score of "Die Walkure," including the magic fire scene.

The program will begin with Beethoven's "Little Symphony in F, No. 8," and the other orchestral number will be von Bulow's arrangement of Bach's suite in B-minor for flute and string orchestra. Mr. Maquarre will, of course, play the solo flute. Mr. Witherspoon will also sing the aria, "An jenem Tag," from Marschner's opera, "Hans Heiling." The order of the program is as follows: Beethoven, symphony in F-major, No. 8, op. 93; Marschner, aria, "An jenem Tag," from "Hans Heiling"; Bach-Bulow, suite in B-minor for flute and string orchestra; Wagner, Wotan's "Farewell" and magic fire scene, "Die Walkure," act 3.

OCTOBER 27, AMERICAN

WITHERSPOON TO SING.

Basso Soloist in Wagnerian Excerpt at Symphony.

One of the very few opportunities to hear an excerpt, with voice, of Wagnerian music drama will come at the next Symphony concerts on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The soloist will be Herbert Witherspoon, the eminent basso of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York. For the last number he will sing "Wotan's Farewell," and Dr. Muck will play the entire final scene of "Die Walkure" including the Magic Fire Scene.

The program will begin with Beethoven's "Little Symphony in F, No. 8, and the other orchestral number will be von Bulow's arrangement of Bach's Suite in B-Minor for flute and string orchestra. Mr. Marquarre will, of course, play the solo flute. Mr. Witherspoon will also sing the aria, "An Jenem Tag" from Merschner's opera "Hans Heiling." The arder of the program is as follows:

Beethoven, Symphony in F-major, No. 8, Op. 93; Marschner, Aria, "An jenem Tag," from "Hans Heiling;" Bach-Bulow, Suite in B-minor for Flute and String Orchestra; Wagner, Wotan Farewell and Magic Fire Scene "Die Walkure," Act II.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

Dr. Muck Will Play Program of Wagner Music.

The first of the season's concerts in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, Nov. 17. At the request of many friends of the orchestra, Dr. Muck has consented to play practically the Wagner program that he gave twice with such success his first year in Boston in 1906-7. That program comprised all the preludes and overtures of Wagner and the funeral music from "Gotterdammerung." It is possible that he may decide to make a slight change, as he is considering the advisability of substituting the Venusberg music from "Tannhauser" for the overture of the same opera.

OCTOBER 27.
HERALD.

ISION FUND CONCERT

irst of the season's concerts in the pension fund of the Boston my Orchestra will be in Sym-Hall on Sunday evening, Nov. 17. At the request of many friends of the orchestra Dr. Muck has consented to play practically the Wagner program that he gave twice with such success his first year in Boston. That program comprised all the preludes and overtures of Wagner and the funeral music from "Goetterdaemmerung." It is possible that he may decide to make a slight change, as he is considering the advisability of substituting the Venusberg music from "Tannhaeuser" for the overture of the same opera.

Dr. Muck is no less unwilling to place excerpts from Wagerian music dramas on Symphony programs now than he was when he was in this country before and for this reason such a program as he proposes giving will be all the more welcome.

Tickets for the concert are now on sale at Symphony Hall.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

One of the very few opportunities to hear an excerpt with voice of Wagnerian music drama will come at the next Symphony concerts on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The soloist will be Herbert Witherspoon of the Metropolitan Opera company. For his last number he will sing Wotan's "Farewell," and Dr. Muck will play the entire final scene of "Die Walkuere," including the Magic Fire scene.

The program will begin with Beethoven's symphony in E major, No. 8, and the other orchestral number will be Buelow's arrangement of Bach's Suite in B minor for flute and string orchestra. Mr. Maquarre will play the solo flute. Mr. Witherspoon will also sing the aria "Non piu andrai" from "The Marriage of Figaro."

OCTOBER 27.
GLOBE

First Pension Fund Concert.

The first of the season's concerts in aid of the Pension Fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall Sunday evening, Nov 17. At the request of many friends of the orchestra Dr Muck has consented to play practically the Wagner program that he gave twice with such success his first year in Boston in 1906-07.

That program comprised all the preludes and overtures of Wagner and the "Funeral Music" from "Gotterdammerung."

It is possible that he may decide to make a slight change, as he is considering the advisability of substituting the Venusberg music from "Tannhauser" for the overture of the same opera.

Dr Muck is no less unwilling to place excerpts from Wagnerian music dramas on Symphony programs now than he was when he was in this country before and for this reason such a program as he proposes giving will be all the more welcome. Tickets for the concert are now on sale at Symphony Hall.

Herbert Witherspoon This Week's Symphony Soloist

One of the few opportunities to hear an excerpt, with voice, of Wagnerian music drama, will come at the next Symphony concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The soloist will be Mr Herbert Witherspoon, the eminent basso of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York, and for his last number he will sing "Wotan's Farewell" and Dr Muck will play the entire final scene of "Die Walkure," including the "Magic Fire Scene."

The program will begin with Beethoven's "Little Symphony" in F, No. 8, and the other orchestral number will be Von Bulow's arrangement of Bach's suite in B minor for flute and string orchestra. Mr Maquarre will play the solo flute. Mr Witherspoon will also sing the aria, "An jenem Tag," from Marschner's opera, "Hans Heiling."

SUNDAY POST,

OCTOBER 27,

SUNDAY CONCERTS AT SYMPHONY HALL

Concert managers of Chicago long ago made the discovery that a greater public could be depended upon to attend high-class concerts if given Sunday afternoons than at any other time, and have prospered accordingly. Last winter the experiment was tried at Symphony Hall with a few concerts, which attracted very large audiences and indicated a similar preference for Sunday afternoons in this city. Arrangements have, therefore, been made to continue the concerts this season.

The first of the concerts will be given Sunday afternoon, Nov. 10, by the Philharmonic Society of New York, with its full complement of 100 players, Joseph Stransky conductor and Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, as soloist.

The programme will comprise the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber, Beethoven's Symphony No. 5, the Love Scene from Strauss' "Feuersnot," Liszt's symphonic poem "Tasso," and Brahms Violin Concerto.

Mail orders addressed to L. H. Mudgett, Symphony Hall, will be filled i the order of their receipt before th opening of the public sale.

FIRST PENSION FUND CONCERT

The first of the season's concerts in aid of the Pension Fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, Nov. 17. At the request of many friends of the orchestra Dr. Muck has consented to play practically the Wagner programme that he gave twice with such success his first year in Boston in 1906-07. That programme comprised all the preludes and overtures of Wagner and the funeral music from "Gotterdammerung." It is possible that he may decide to make a slight change as he is considering the advisability of substituting the Venusberg music from "Tannhauser," for the overture of the same opera.

Dr. Muck is no less unwilling to place excerpts from Wagnerian music dramas on Symphony programmes now than he was when he was in this country before and for this reason such a programme as he proposes giving will be all the more welcome.

Tickets for the concert are now on sale at Symphony Hall.

Symphony Concerts

The programme of the four pains of Symphony concerts of the season will begin with Beethoven's "Little Symphony," so-called, in F, No. 8, and the other orchestral number will be Von Bulow's arrangement of Bach's suite in B-minor for flute and string orchestra. Mr. Maquarre will, of course, play the solo flute. Mr. Witherspoon will also sing the aria, "An jenem Tag," from Marschner's opera "Hans Heiling." The order of the programme is as follows:

Symphony in F-major, No. 8, Op. 93 ..... Beethoven
Aria, "An jenem Tag," from "Hans Heiling" ..... Marschner
Suite in B-minor for flute and string orchestra ..... Bach-Bulow Wotan's farewell and magic fire scene, "Die Walkure," Act III ..... Wagner

MONITOR,

OCTOBER 26,

WAGNER IDYL IS PLAYED

Appearing for the first time since his return to Boston as an interpreter of a modern orchestra work of the highest order of technical difficulty, Karl Muck presented on Friday afternoon at the third public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra the symphony in E major, op. 16, by Hermann Bischoff, which he first brought to America during his former engagement. To fill out the program and to give contrast to the heavily scored symphony, Dr. Muck read to his audience after the intermission the calm and ingratiating "Siegfried idyl" of Wagner and that sparkling little romance of Weber's, the "Euryanthe" overture.

The music that impressed the audience the most, to judge by the applause, was not the symphony with its magnificent structural perspectives, its skilfully related features of design and its judiciously applied decoration, but the little work with which the conductor led off the second part of the program, the "Siegfried idyl." Characteristically, Dr. Muck did not entrust the fortunes of the concert to his principal selection. He went into the lists with side arms to draw in event of his big lance not hitting. The conductor, though not always, perhaps, choosing the numbers of his program with the most pictorial effect, is invariably successful in making an impression. The audience that shows itself hard to please is pretty sure to yield before his hour and a half with it is over. An Achaean general cares not whether his attack in force wins Troy or whether a stratagem that captivated the imagination of the citizens does it.

How could those holding the musical citadel believe that the "Siegfried idyl" contained any purpose against their security? Who among the Friday listeners but has laid a hand on the ropes to draw this fine Wagnerian device within the walls? The audience resisted the Bischoff symphony and the persuasion of its post-Straussian propaganda admirably. The matinee house made a capital exhibition of indifference, even compelling the conductor without its assent to thank his men for their handsome efforts in executing the work. But the same house responded heartily to the familiar stairway music, which as interpreted was neither sentimental in tone coloring nor showy in phrasing, but altogether genuine, restrained, beautiful.

An uncommonly small part of the audience felt the call of the great out-of-doors stronger than that of the selection at the end of the program. And all who stayed were rewarded, for the reading of the "Euryanthe" overture was far from being a perfunctory performance. The Symphony concerts may not be theoretically so interesting on the side of program-making as they have been, but the thoroughness of their preparation is something for the community to rejoice in. Subscribers may not now content themselves with the idea that they lose little if they sacrifice the beginning or the end of the concert. For every bit of enjoyment thus clipped is a loss.

The Bischoff symphony is replete with ideas of orchestral contrast that find no counterpart in nineteenth century works. In this piece the modern composer is no longer overwhelmed by the vastness of his instrumental resources; he is controlling these resources to ends of expression in keeping with the classic reaction now setting in. Bischoff's composition represents the symphony orchestra of the Straussian magnitude entering into its period of formalism.

The inspiration of the symphony in E major is less surprising than that of the tone poems with which Richard Strauss has captured first place in the regard of the listener of today; but the style is more comprehensible. The listener is not so much impressed by the fact that the composer is breaking old rules as that he is endeavoring to find substantial new ones; that he is seeking general formulas that will carry modern thought in its broadest manifestations into musical expression; that he is trying to find something to take the place of those individualistic formulas which so confine the orchestra today. Bischoff is here working to release the orchestra from its domination by mere musical manner.

A twentieth century style that will enlarge the scope of the four instrumental groups that make up the orchestra is the aim of the composer whom Dr. Muck brought forward on Friday. The Bischoff orchestra is responsive to many types of contemporary thought. It does not magnify one view of life to the exclusion of others. With its fine balance of tonal assertions it is working out a broader service for the orchestra than it has hitherto known.

OCTOBER 26.
TRANSCRIPT.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Only the Two Symphony Concerts with Mr. Witherspoon for the Assisting Singer —A Symphony by Beethoven, a Suite by Bach and a Scene from "Die Walkuere"

ONCE more, and probably for the last time for two months to come, the only concerts of next week in Boston are the regular pair of Symphony Concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall. For them Dr. Muck has made a relatively light and a discreetly classic programme. It begins with Beethoven's melodious and almost merry Eighth Symphony (in F); proceeds with Bülow's re-arrangement of a suite in B minor by Bach for flute and string orchestra and ends with the final scene from "Die Walküre" in which Wotan takes farewell of Brünnhilde, lays her to sleep under the ash tree, invokes Loge and his fire, and leaves her in the circle of flame—until Siegfried shall come to awaken her. The orchestra and Dr. Muck will play the music of the entire scene from the moment in which the god takes the valkyr in his arms to his departure striding athwart the fire. Mr. Witherspoon, the able bass singer of the Metropolitan Opera House and the first "man singer" to appear at the Symphony Concerts for long, will sing the speeches of Wotan and between the Symphony and the Suite, the hackneyed air from Marschner's opera "Hans Heiling." Thus, and happily, do the exigencies of eminent assisting singers from opera houses relax Dr. Muck's objection to scenes from Wagner's music-dramas in the concert-room. Yet in this town, where Wagner's operas are heard so seldom in their integrity and their normal environment, such fragments have their uses and give their pleasure—even "in concert form."

OCTOBER 31,
TRANSCRIPT,

The Boston Programme Books

. . . . These little pamphlets are given out wherever the Boston Orchestra gives its concerts. In New York, perhaps also in other cities outside of Boston, the sale of the advertising privileges in programmes by the owners of theatres and music halls places an embargo on the little books which works a distinct hardship on the people who gather to hear the orchestra, inasmuch as they are prevented from receiving them in the concert-room or at its doors. Nevertheless, the books are eagerly sought and cherished not only for the help which they afford to the listeners during the performances, but also because they are delightful and entertaining literature at all times. It is a pity that Mr. Hale, who compiles them, is not permitted to use musical examples in his notes, for no amount of description can take the place of a theme set forth in its proper symbols, and to him who is able to read them the notes help to fix the attention while description diverts attention.

But for this shortcoming Mr. Hale offers a generous compensation in his historical and critical matter. His knowledge is encyclopædic and his communication of it most deft and amiable. He caters impartially to gatherers of statistics and the lovers of anecdote, and is a heart's delight to the devotee of literary curiosities. The pamphlets of a season, gathered together in a volume and thoroughly indexed, make a thesaurus the contents of which could not be supplied by a dozen volumes of history and biography and a score of books of analysis. No publisher's catalog[illegible] shows its like. [The New York T[illegible]

NEWS OF MUSIC

A Fruitful Experiment

AN interesting musical experiment has begun promisingly in New York. Last Sunday evening, six thousand or seven thousand persons in the Madison Square Garden heard the Russian Symphony Orchestra play pieces by Wagner, Saint-Saëns, Liszt and Tachaikowsky—heard them not badly played and with very hearty enjoyment. No one of the seven thousand had paid more than fifteen cents for his seat and the majority of them had paid only ten. Very few of the seven thousand, it is safe to say, ever find their way into the cheapest standing room at the Metropolitan or into the lowest-priced places at orchestral concerts in New York. They may have the desire for opera and for symphony concerts but they have not the means or the opportunity—in the working week—to gratify it. Sometimes, when they have both, they foolishly believe that they would not be welcome because their dress and aspect are not quite those of other listeners around them. The reporters in New York agree that most of the audience on Sunday seemed to be foreigners—a fact which merely signifies that these folk have more inclination to music than many Americans and are not ashamed to listen to music cheaply. Unwisely the proceedings were complicated by superfluous discourse about music as an expression of the brotherhood of man and about the socializing of the arts—all of which gabble interrupted the flow of music quite able to speak for itself, needlessly irritated the mistrustful and tried to graft upon musical enjoyment a quasi-political propaganda. For the sake of music itself and for the sake of the common pleasure in it, the hearing of it needs to be cheapened and extended as it was by this concert in New York, as it will be by the similar concerts which will follow. The audience may come out of the byways and hedges of the East Side, but out of that same audience will come also the next generation or two of listeners in concerts and at the opera houses. The socially significant will continue to [illegible] make possible as their [illegible] more and more the [illegible] unplaced will [illegible]

Here in Boston

By current report, Mr. Fiedler is living quietly this autumn in Berlin, content, after his four years of conducting in Boston, to be for a time without work.

Next Sunday, Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra depart on their first journey of the season to Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn. In New York, as it has been said in this place, they will repeat the programmes of their first and third concerts here. Philadelphia will hear that same first programme intact—Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony; Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" and Liszt's "Mazeppa." Washington will hear the last three items in it and Beethoven's eighth symphony. Brooklyn will be in like case, while to Baltimore Dr. Muck is repeating his third programme at home—Bischoff's symphony, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Weber's overt[illegible] his opera, "Euryanthe."

TRANSCRIPT
OCTOBER 26,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

REMARKABLE MUSIC THRILLINGLY PERFORMED

A Programme of Contrasts—Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" for Charm and Repose, Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture for Varied Romantic Glamour, and Bischoff's Symphony for Excitement—Its Unusual Attributes—Its Descent in the Royal Line of Programme Music—Passion, Power and Beauty, Musical and Delineative Imagination Mingle in It

AFTER all, Dr. Muck is not so perverse in his programme-making as some that mistrust it profess to believe. Zealous as he is for "unification," so that the concert shall hold together as a whole, he does not always overlook the craving for contrast in weaker human and musical natures than his own. He began yesterday with Bischoff's symphony in E, which he originally produced here nearly five years ago and performed no less than four times in a single season. Mr. Fiedler did not repeat it—strangely, as it now seems, when a rehearing suggests how much the music might have appealed to his ardent and robust temperament. Dr. Muck, returning, has made speed to revive the symphony as one of the most remarkable and engrossing pieces in its kind that has come out of contemporary Germany. But Bischoff is long-breathed and exacting; his symphony continues for nearly an hour and a quarter and he taxes the executive and expressive powers of conductor and men unsparingly. He is scarcely less severe upon his hearers. If his music appeals to them at all, it strains their imaginations, piles intensity upon intensity, and stretches mind, nerves and feelings unrelaxingly. Time and again, the symphony absorbs, commands. It is largely and eloquently written, besides, using the full powers or the penetrating individual voices of the orchestra. When it is done, even after "the customary intermission," there is need, on the stage and in the auditorium, of repose and contrast. Dr. Muck provided them, first, in Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl"—all intimate and finely felt sentiment, expressing itself with unflagging charm and with the reticence of emotion that is low-voiced because it runs so deep and would keep itself for a single cherished ear. Then for a final number, holding the audience as it always does, came Weber's overture to his opera of "Euryanthe." Nearly ninety years have little clouded the glow of the beginning or dimmed the romantic and chivalric ardor of the close. Yet the passage that told most were the soft, veiled tremulous and mysterious measures of the Largo, rising like a tonal vapor out of the air and vanishing into it again. Once more there were repose and contrast after the impassioned and full-throated Bischoff.

In all three pieces the conductor and the orchestra seemed strung to higher pitch than they have hitherto been this autumn even in their glorious performances of the "Eroica" symphony and Brahms's Variations. The voices of the strings were of an exquisite fineness and euphony in the Largo of Weber's overture, and Dr. Muck, melting phrase into phrase, made it seem like so much vaporous song. The beginning and the end of the overture had the true romantic fire that keeps the best of Weber's music ever young to minds and hearts with so much as a grain of youth left in them. There in Weber's tones and in the divining and imparting sense of conductor and men are the pages and the pictures of the boyish books of chivalry. Across them ride the lean-faced knights in their armor; the pennants on the lances blow; the escutcheons shine, and behind a little ways are the bannered balconies of the tournament and the guerdon of noble ladies' eyes. Once and for all and beyond any other composer—even the Wagner of moments in "Parsifal"—Weber wrote the music of chivalric romance.

An orchestra of many times the dimensions of the little band for which Wagner wrote his idyl of Siegfried, "my son" and Cosima, his mother, played it yesterday, as it needs must in so large an auditorium. Yet Dr. Muck—and the men no less—kept the music soft-voiced and sometimes almost whispering; let the climax of the middle passages well up like emotion that may not longer be stilled; polished, without drying, the charm that suffuses the piece, ran from delicate euphony to euphony, kept a little quiver in it, made it sunny as perhaps the sun fell into Wagner's villa on the Christmas morning when it was first played. Nowhere else has Wagner written so quietly tender music without a thought of the theatre. It deserves the quiet beauty of the performance yesterday.

And what did not orchestra and conductor have to do in Bischoff's symphony and what did they not "bring off." To play the music at all is no small feat even for our band of virtuosi, rehearsed these ten days, choir by choir, by the tireless Muck. To play the music with the varied and appropriate eloquence that they actually gave it was almost a feat of orchestral super-men. Bischoff makes his pace according to the passionate mood of his music with no thought of those that are to perform it. They must race forward in fire and frenzy; they must brood in long-drawn intensity; they must scale the heavens of ecstatic tone. He flings his orchestra upon a drinking song, until it bawls it out as in a frenzy. He fills it with the chattering, chortling, pitipatting ghosts of dead sins. He bids it bear the passionate voice of insatiable longing and of dolorous resignation. He piles climax upon climax of triumphant ecstasy. Dissonances scream out of some of the music; transitions are like leaps into the dark; and then may follow impassioned song, sustained but ever mounting upon itself. Now he goads the whole tonal mass to intenser and intenser voice; again he relies upon the penetrating timbres of two or three instruments.

Bischoff has designed the symphony with a magnificent boldness; the musical and the emotional development go hand in hand; yet scarcely a phrase in their march can be overlooked if the conductor is wary of his emphasis. To perform it requires more than astute musical generalship. The architectural faculty of the conductor, his sense of great sweeps and minute shadings of tone. his range of imagination, his capacity for many-sided beauty and endlessly varied power. his feeling for thoughtful, or frenzied, or ecstatic or ironic music must be at oen with the composer's. He must not only transmit the music to his hearers; he must make it seem full of expression, passion and strength. Nowhere, seemingly, did Dr. Muck fall short. At his hands, at least, Bischoff's symphony takes its place among the remarkable—almost the great—music of our immediate time. Had Richard Strauss, the illustrious, and not Hermann Bischoff, the obscure, signed it, how an expectant world might have hailed it. And yet—Strauss goes forward to new flowerings; while Bischoff has seemingly stopped and withered with this one symphony. The few German audiences that have heard his second, called it a failure.

First and foremost, it is hard to recall a piece of modern programme music of similar large dimensions—unless it is Liszt's "Faust" symphony or Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben"—in which the formal course of the music and the emotional development of the ideas and the passions behind are so completely welded into a simultaneously progressing whole. Bischoff uses the symphonic form freely, as every composer does nowadays; but nowhere does he forsake or wrench it. There are the prescribed principal and subsidiary melodies; there are the free fantasia and the coda; there are the trio in the scherzo and the two-fold elaboration of the musical thoughts in the slow movement. Yet from first to last the emotional, the passionate, the programmatic development of the music never halts. Clear and cumulative are the wild revelries, the downright debaucheries of his youthful hero in the first movement. Integral part of it, upspringing from it, is the passionate apparition and invocation of the beloved woman. The melodies of brooding longing and of dolorous and restless resignation—to make paradox over paradoxical music—never lose their emotional quality in all the long-drawn—the over long-drawn—second movement.

Bischoff's feat of musical imagination in the third movement matches Liszt's in his ironic scherzo of Mephistopheles in the "Faust" symphony. The ghosts of the revelries, the debaucheries and the melodies thereof in the first movement gibber and squirm through it, and again the brooding and passionate longing for the redeeming beloved—the trio—cannot dispel them. The fourth movement is music of sheer apotheosis—the triumph in climax heaped upon climax of the exalting force of the beloved. On its triumphant side, it will almost bear comparison with the mighty and magnificent close of Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration." On the ecstatic side, listening imagination darts back now and then to the luminous and quivering close of some of Bruckner's apotheoses. In this symphony at least Bischoff is direct descendant of the royal line that began with Berlioz, continued with Liszt, and mounted with the Strauss of the tone-poems—the royal line that can keep music symphonic and "absolute" and yet weld into it homogeneously and progressively, by sheer force of expressive imagination, the emotional design, the passionate visions. He can invent of himself and he is heir to all the great heritage of modern harmony and instrumentation. There is but one reproach to Bischoff on this score. Would that he had sung the beauty and the triumphant and redeeming force of devotion to an ideal—a finer and a more masculine thing than even the beatified love of woman. Yet, maybe, somewhat less human.

Beyond peradventure the symphony has power and the symphony has beauty, mingles almost extraordinarily musical thought and passionate emotion. If it is to be tested by Matthew Arnold's tests of poetry—being a sort of poetry in tones—it is not indeed simple (since to be so is not the way of contemporary music), but it is magnificently sensuous and impassioned. Recall the seizing force of the first movement before it has proceeded through twenty measures—the tingling force of its broken and sustained, its crossing and recrossing rhythms. Hear its dissonances flare; its transitions slither. Its isolated instrumental voices pierce ear and imagination. Its frenzied tonal masses over[illegible] Bischoff can write drunken sins and forgotten foulness that first slide into the scherzo and then squeak and gibber and preen and patter through it, and will not be stilled or exorcised from it—even by the longing of the beloved. Feel the gruesome, the macabre, the ghostly and ironic quality of the music. Not Berlioz, not Liszt has much excelled it. Recall, finally, the sustaining and surging force that lifts the finale to larger and larger intensities and higher and higher ecstasy. Recall the design and the passion, and in both is power. Recall the music that bears the one and releases the other, and there again is power.

For beauty, consider the transitional passage, mysterious, ominous, penetrating and touching the imagination, that precedes the first entrance of the melody of the redeeming beloved. The melody may be no inspired invention in itself, but under Bischoff's harmonic and instrumental treatment, under his insistent and glowing intensities, it becomes rich in beauty. Hear it again in its long swells and sweeps of triumph, in the apotheosis of the finale, in the last ecstatic glorification of the basic idea of both the music and the passion of the symphony. There must be individuality in Bischoff's melody and in his treatment of it, for some have called both Straussian and others have labelled them Mahleresque. The two adjectives are really wide apart, but behind them is a common implication that Bischoff attains in this finale the mighty and magnificent beauty, the dramatic and glorifying force to the ear and the imagination, that is one of the goals of contemporary music. Listen, again, in memory, to the music of mournful resignation, of dolorous and passionate brooding that fills the slow movement; and that, if there is color in music as well as motion, makes it gray-voiced and restless. Weak as this slow movement seems beside the strength of the rest, here, too, is another beauty, melancholy, anguished, introspective, rebellious, that is also of the goals of that same contemporary music. It reflects its neurotic time.

H. T. P.

From POST
Address: New York OCT 26 1912
Date

The first pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 7, and Saturday afternoon, November 9. The programme for the first concert comprises the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, the "Roman Carnival" Overture of Berlioz, the "Mazeppa" symphonic poem of Liszt, and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The programme for Saturday afternoon comprises Bischoff's symphony in E major, the "Siegfried Idyl" of Wagner, and the "Euryanthe" Overture of Weber.

Est 184

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the

From [illegible]
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date OCT 22 1912

Boston Symphony Orchestra To-night.

The first of the five Boston Symphony Concerts will be given in Infantry Hall this evening at 8:15. Dr. Muck has been compelled to make a slight change in the programme announced last Sunday. Madame Marie Rappold of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, who is the soloist, has changed her second number. Instead of the two pieces by dell'Acqua and Van der Stucken, Madame Rappold will sing the great aria of Agatha, "How Tranquilly I Slumbered," from Weber's opera "Der Freischutz." Her first number, as announced, will be Elizabeth's greeting from the second act of "Tannhauser." The orchestral numbers will be Sgambati's symphony in D-major, Brahms's variations on a theme by Haydn and Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival."

k, 1884

Newspaper Cutting

From EVG. STAR
Address: Washington, D. C. OCT 27 1912
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The closing of the subscription sale for the Boston Symphony concerts in this city shows practically the same state of affairs as it has for the last several years. The house is almost entirely sold out, only a few seats remaining for single sale. The return of Dr. Muck to America seems to have excited the same interest in Washington that it has elsewhere and everybody looks forward to the most brilliant series of concerts. The first concert will be given Tuesday afternoon, November 5, in the New National Theater at 4:30. The program opens with the eighth symphony of Beethoven, and the second half will comprise the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz; the symphonic poem "Mazeppa" of Liszt and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" by Wagner.

E 1884

Newspap

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. OCT 26 1912
Date

SALE OF TICKETS FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

The opening public sale of season tickets for the Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced by the Brooklyn Institute for yesterday afternoon, at 4 o'clock, was held. There was a long line before the ticket booth and an extremely lively sale for a few minutes and then the thirty-six tickets for the body of the house which the subscribers had left for the general public to buy, were gone. There are some seats still left in the boxes.

The ticket sellers in the booth in the Academy of Music lobby immediately began taking names and addresses in order that the disappointed ones might be notified in case any subscriber did not take up his tickets. But the last ones on the line seemed to realize that they stood a rather slim chance, for it is hardly likely that a hundred or so of the old subscribers, seasoned Boston Symphony concert goers that they are, would omit to get their much prized tickets.

Esta 1884

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York OCT
Date

Symphonie-Konzerte.

Dr. Muck hat die Programme für die Anfangskonzerte der Boſtoner wie folgt feſtgeſetzt. Am Abend des 7. November Beethoven's „Eroica", Berlioz' „Römiſcher Karneval"-Ouverture, Liszt, „Mazeppa" und das Vorſpiel zu den „Meiſterſingern"; am Nachmittag des 9. November Biſchoff's E-Dur-Symphonie, Wagner's „Siegfried-Idyll" und Weber's „Euryanthe"-Ouverture.

E , 1884

55

Newspaper

From POST
Address: New York 1912
Date

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN.

Luncheon Days for Clubs — Girls Paying Their Way.

ANN ARBOR, Mich., October 23.—The announcement of the Choral Union and May festival series of concerts for the ensuing year presents the following pre-festival programme:

October 22, Mme. Schumann-Heink; November 25, Flonzaley Quartet; December 13, R. Werrenrath; January 31, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Karl Muck as conductor; February 28, Tina Lerner. The twentieth May festival, not yet announced in detail, will include five concerts to be given on May 14, 15, 16, 17, 1913. The new Hill Memorial Hall, with a seating capacity of 5,500, will be available for the festival concerts.

The Michigan Union is planning to set aside one day each week for society luncheons. The absence of a University commons has shown the need of providing some means whereby members of the numerous campus organizations may be brought into a closer relationship. Each society will have its own table in the large dining-room.

An automobile course is announced by the Engineering College, to be given by Professor Bailey. The course is in electrical ignition for gasolene engines.

The report covering University registration thus far this year, as issued by Secretary Smith, is as follows:

Literary department, 2,271; law department, 644; medical department, 221; homœopathic department, 76; engineering department, 1,284; dental department, 255; pharmacy department, 94; Graduate School, 192; total, 5,037. Students electing combined courses, thus presenting double registration, 106; total (net), 4,931. Summer School registration (net), 693; total for 1912, 5,628.

Establ

From CITIZEN 1912
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

The first Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music a week from next Friday night, Nov. 8, at 8:15 o'clock. As last year the subscription to the five concerts practically exhausts the seating capacity of the Academy of Music and the return of Dr. Muck has evidently excited as much interest in Brooklyn as it has in the other cities that the orchestra visits.

For this first concert he has arranged a programme of which the first number will be Beethoven's "Little Symphony in A," No. 8. The second half of the programme will consist of Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture, Liszt's "Mazeppa" symphonic poem and Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Establi

From EVENING SUN
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 24 1912

TO GIVE BALTIMORE PROGRAM IN NEW YORK

Boston Symphony Will Repeat Numbers Played Here In Its Gotham Concert.

Baltimoreans will have an opportunity to hear, even before New Yorkers this year, Bischoff's symphony in E major, Wagner's "Siegfried's Idyll" and Von Weber's delightful "Euryanthe" overture, for it is the intention of Dr. Karl Muck, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to give this program here the night before the orchestra repeats it in Gotham.

Bischoff's E major symphony, a work of extraordinary dimensions and enormous technical demands, is regarded by Dr. Muck as one of the most important of modern compositions, and was introduced by him in America five years ago. This work, together with the others mentioned, will be played at the first of the coming series of Boston Symphony concerts at the Lyric on November 6.

On the following evening the orchestra will go to New York, where the program in its entirety will be repeated.

E k, 1884

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 26 1912

The opening public sale of season tickets for the Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced by the Brooklyn Institute for yesterday afternoon at 4 o'clock, was held. There was a long line before the ticket booth and an extremely lively sale for a few minutes, and then the thirty-six tickets for the body of the house which subscribers had left for the general public to buy were gone. There are some seats still left in the boxes.

The ticket sellers in the booth in the Academy of Music lobby immediately began taking names and addresses in order that the disappointed applicants might be notified in the event that any subscriber did not take up his tickets. But the last ones on the line seemed to realize that they stood a rather slim chance, for it is hardly likely that a hundred or so of the old subscribers, seasoned Boston Symphony concertgoers that they are, would omit to get their much-prized tickets.

Estab 4

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.
Date OCT 27 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The first pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 7, at 8:15 and Saturday afternoon, November 9, at 2:30. The programme for the first concert comprises the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, the "Roman Carnaval" overture of Berlioz, the "Mazeppa" symphonic poem of Liszt and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The programme for Saturday afternoon comprises Bischoff's symphony in E major, the "Siegfried Idyl" of Wagner and the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber.

Estat

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.
Date OCT 28 1912

A SUNDAY'S CONCERTS

Orchestral Music at Cheap Prices.

There were two orchestral concerts yesterday, a pianoforte recital, an entertainment in which there were pleasant echoes of Viennese life blended with efforts which evoked more ambitious work, but were less ingratiating, and a reading mixed with music, some of which was designed to illustrate the words spoken by the elocutionist. Rather a generous allowance, it might be said, for the second Sunday in the season; but concerts of larger scope and better quality will soon pre-empt the field, which fact may be accepted as an explanation of the somewhat unusual flurry.

The orchestral concerts were given by the People's Symphony Society at Carnegie Hall in the afternoon and the Russian Symphony Society at Madison Square Garden in the evening, and were both designed for the edification of that portion of the city's population which is excluded by their small means from the enjoyment of the concerts given by such organizations as the Philharmonic and Symphony societies and the Boston Orchestra. That in the afternoon took on something of a memorial character, Mr. F. X. Arens, the director of the People's Symphony, producing some of Massenet's music (the overture to "Phèdre" and the so-called "Meditation" from "Thaïs") in memory of the composer, who died recently, and playing also the dirge from MacDowell's "Indian Suite" as a tribute to Alfred L. Seligman, who was one of the society's generous patrons. Other numbers were Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, MacDowell's pianoforte concerto in D minor (the solo part played by Miss Laeta Hartley) and Elgar's march "Pomp and Circumstance."

The pianoforte recital was given in the afternoon in the Republic Theatre—a room whose acoustical properties proved to be admirably adapted to such an entertainment. The player was David Sapirstein, who as a lad some years ago appeared before the public and then went to Europe to continue his studies. To judge by his programme, one must conclude that he feels himself entitled to a place among the foremost virtuosi, for only the best, or at least the most venturesome, would dare invite critical judgment on their playing of Brahms's variations on a theme by Handel, Beethoven's stupendous sonata in B flat, Op. 106; all the preludes by Chopin and Liszt's fantasia on themes from "Don Giovanni." Mr. Sapirstein would have been deserving of praise had he not issued so loud a challenge, for in all of this music a great deal more is required than a good technical equipment—even so good an outfit as Mr. Sapirstein possesses. There were too many moments in the long afternoon when attention flagged because there was a proclamation of the literal text of the works only, uninspired by fancy, unwarmed even by beauty of tone, and disappointing in its absence of good legato playing.

The meeting in Madison Square Garden was an extraordinary demonstration, the audience numbering no fewer than five thousand persons, the vast majority of them plainly working people from the East Side. The conditions did not invite discussion of the artistic side of the affair, the place being far too large to justify anything except music of a simple and popular character. The most effective number of the programme, therefore, was a group of Russian folksongs arranged by Glazounow, Rimsky-Korsakow, Spendiarow and Rubinstein, which with their Oriental intervals and rhythm gave obvious pleasure.

H. E. K.

MME. BERNHARDT SAILS SOON

Est 384

From AMERICAN
Address: New York
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The first pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 7, and on Saturday afternoon, November 9. The programme for the first concert comprises the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz, the "Mazeppa" symphonic poem of Liszt and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The programme for Saturday afternoon comprises Bischoff's symphony in E-major, the "Siegfried Idyl" of Wagner and the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber.

E 1884

From SUN
Address: New York
Date

Marie Rappold, after her success at the Maine Festival early last week, commenced her fall tour by appearing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Boston on Friday and Saturday last as first soloist of the season.

Estab 4

From TIMES
Address: New York.
Date 1912

***

The first pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Nov. 7, at 8:15, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 9, at 2:30. The programme for the first concert comprises the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, the "Roman Carnival" Overture of Berlioz, the "Mazeppa" symphonic poem of Liszt, and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The programme for Saturday afternoon comprises Bischoff's symphony in E major, the "Siegfried Idyl" of Wagner, and the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber.

***

Estat

Newspaper

From WORLD
Address: New York
Date

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes the preliminary announcement that it will give the usual two series of concerts in Carnegie Hall during the coming season, on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons, respectively. The dates of the evening concerts are Nov. 7, Dec. 5, Jan. 9, Feb. 20 and March 20. The dates of the afternoon concerts are Nov. 9, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 22 and March 22.

Dr. Karl Muck will resume the post of conductor after an absence of four years, becoming the permanent conductor of the orchestra. The list of soloists will include Miss Geraldine Farrar, Mme. Matzenauer and Fritz Kreisler.

Estab 384

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 27 1912

The first Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music a week from next Friday night, November 8, at 8:15 o'clock. As last year the subscription to the five concerts practically exhausts the seating capacity of the Academy of Music and the return of Dr. Muck has evidently excited as much interest in Brooklyn as it has in the other cities that the orchestra visits. For this first concert he has arranged a delightful programme. The first number will be Beethoven's "Little Symphony in A," No. 8. The second half of the programme will consist of Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture, Liszt's "Mazeppa" symphonic poem and Wagner's Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

, 1884

[56]

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.
Date OCT 27 1912

1884

A SECOND VIOLIN RECITAL

Return of Mischa Elman—Concert at Carnegie Hall.

In the season of 1910-'11 Mischa Elman won a degree of popularity throughout the country which none of his rivals, admirable as some of them were, was able to reach. His progress, from his first appearance till the moment when the stage of Carnegie Hall had to be called into requisition so that all of his listeners might be accommodated at a recital, was steady, and it was a cause of rejoicing that it was marked by a growth in taste and musicianship as well as in sobriety of platform manners which augured more for a lasting appreciation than the fiats of virtuosoship with which he first startled the local public. It is probable that association with the Boston Orchestra in a series of concerts at the beginning of that season had a good effect upon him. It invited him to dignity of bearing and to a more reverential attitude toward the art than he had shown before or is habitually displayed by mere virtuosi.

To judge by some of the features of his recital in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon Mr. Elman has not retained the excellencies which evoked much warm praise two years ago in all their strong beauty. At times he again acted as if he thought that by swaying his body, rising on tiptoe and lifting up his violin he might overcome the laws of nature which kept him upon the floor of the stage; and also at times he filled his exquisitely rich, full, warm and intrinsically noble tone with an alloy of sentimentality which cheapened it deplorably. On such occasions, too, he "orientalized" the music with a little explosive push at the beginning of each phrase which robbed it of some of its dignity and eloquence. It was all very unnecessary, indeed, for when in the Handel Sonata in D major he realized that the tawdry device was out of place he showed how marvellously steady, round, full and deep-breathed a tone he could draw. Much more effective now was the voice of his instrument than in the pretty tonal impetuosities with which he sought to impart feeling to the serene and contented Sonata in F (Op. 24), by Beethoven, with which he and Mr. Percy Kahn (a thoroughly worthy companion) opened the concert. Yet the slow movement of the work was exquisitely sung and the dainty little scherzo was tossed off with ravishing grace and archness.

When an artist like Kreisler sets the example of devoting half of a programme to ear-tickling arrangements, it is not to be wondered at that all his colleagues follow; but it is a gracious dispensation that the peripatetic violin virtuosi have made it a rule to associate with themselves pianists who are also virtuosi and with whom they need not hesitate to share equally the labors which must needs go into performances of such works as the Beethoven and Handel sonatas and also divide the honors. Between these sonatas yesterday Mr. Elman played Ernst's Concerto in F sharp minor with amazing brilliancy.

H. E. K.

From PRESS
Address: New York
Date OCT 27 1912

Es 1884

The first two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 7, at 8.15 o'clock, and Saturday afternoon, November 9, at 2.30. The programme for the first concert comprises the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz, the "Mazeppa" symphonic poem of Liszt and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The programme for Saturday afternoon comprises Bischoff's symphony in E major, the "Siegfried Idyl" of Wagner and the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
OCT 27 1912
Date

E k, 1884

The first Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music a week from next Friday night, Nov. 8, at 8:15 o'clock. As last year, the subscription to the five concerts practically exhausts the seating capacity of the Academy of Music, and the return of Dr. Muck has evidently excited as much interest in Brooklyn as it has in the other cities that the orchestra visits. For this first concert he has arranged a programme full of delights. The first number will be Beethoven's little symphony in A, No. 8. The second half of the programme will consist of Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, Liszt's "Mazeppa" symphonic poem, and Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Newspaper Cutting
From MORGEN JOURNAL
Address: New York City OCT 27 1912
Date

Establish

* * *

Hanſon'ſche Künſtler ſind ſehr beſchäftigt. Marie Rappold hatte nur zwei Monate Ferien. Gleich nach ihrer Ankunft vorige Woche ging die Kunſtreiſe wieder los; mit dem Maine-Feſtival fing es an. Am Freitag war die Diva — wie ſie jetzt gewiß genannt werden darf — die erſte Soliſtin der Saiſon des Boſton Symphony Orcheſter in Boſton. Die Herbſttour dauert bis Anfang der Opern-Saiſon am 11. November. Als ganz beſondere Vergünſtigung iſt ihr von Signor Gatti-Caſazza erlaubt worden, an dem Tage noch in Utica zu ſingen und ſich 48 Stunden nach angeſetztm äußerſten Termin für die Saiſon zu melden. Während der kurzen Opern-Saiſon giebt es nur ein Konzert-Auftreten, und zwar im Deutſchen Liederkranz am 1. Dezember. Am 6. Januar fängt die große Konzertreiſe an, und zwar in Begleitung des New York Philharmonic Orcheſter unter Joſef Stransky in Buffalo. Erſt Anfang Mai wird Frau Rappold wieder in New York ſingen. Inzwiſchen giebt ſie abe zum erſten Male einen eigenen Lieder Abend in Brooklyn.

From EVG. MAIL
Address: New York.
Date OCT 26 1912

The programmes for the first pair of Boston Symphony concerts under Dr. Muck will be as follows: "Eroica" symphony, Beethoven; "Roman Carnival," Berlioz; Liszt's "Mazeppa" symphonic poem and the prelude to "The Mastersingers."

ork, 1884

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 27 1912

ork, 1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has this year in Baltimore the largest subscription in its history and the return of Dr. Muck to America seems to have excited as much interest here as it has in other cities. The orchestra is said to be playing more brilliantly than ever, and the series of five concerts is looked forward to with much eagerness.

For his first program, which will be played in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, November 6, Dr. Muck has elected to play the same numbers which he will play in New York on the following Saturday afternoon.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 27 1912

Estab 184

To Gottfried Galston, the Munich pianist, will fall the honor of being the first artist to appear in the new Aeolian Hall, Manhattan. The occasion will be Mr. Galston's first appearance in America. The recital will take place on Saturday, Nov. 2, at 2:30 P. M.

Louis Persinger, a young American violinist, residing at Berlin, a pupil of Ysaye and Thibaud, will make his first American appearance, since his childhood days, as soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra on Nov. 1 and 2. His first Manhattan appearance will be made in recital at the new Aeolian Hall, on Nov. 9, at 2:30 P. M., when he will play concertos by Nardini and Bruch, some Bach, and many delightful smaller compositions. He will make his first orchestral appearance in Manhattan on Dec. 22, with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, under Josef Stransky.

Laura Graves, the American mezzo-soprano, who has been abroad for a number of years, singing mostly in London, will make her first Manhattan appearance in a song recital at Aeolian Hall on Nov. 16. She will be accompanied by Percy Kahn, Mischa Ellman's assistant. The programme will comprise songs by Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, Debussy and several American and English composers.

Marguerite Lemon, the dramatic soprano, who has been the leading prima donna of the Mayence Opera House, and sang guest roles at the Metropolitan Opera House, at Covent Gardens, and who, at the Rome festival performance, in 1911, sang Nedda to Caruso's Canio, has this week returned to New York to sing in a number of concerts. Mme. Lemon will remain the entire season. Next year she will join one of the greatest of German opera houses.

Marie Rappold, after her great success at the Maine Festival, commenced her fall tour by appearing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Boston, as first soloist of the season.

Leon Rains, the basso, gave a farewell recital at Dresden prior to his forthcoming American tour. He sang to a packed and most enthusiastic house. Roland Bocquet, the composer, was at the piano. Mr. Bocquet will come to America [illegible]

[57]

From NEW PROVIDENCE
Address
Date OCT 23 1912

Establis

BOSTON SYMPHONY WARMLY GREETED

Dr. Muck and His Band of Players Give a Most Delightful Concert at Infantry Hall.

A large and distinguished audience greeted Dr. Karl Muck and his talented musicians at the opening concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Infantry hall, Tuesday evening, it being the 32d season of the orchestra and the 125th concert in Providence.

MME. MARIE RAPPOLD.

Dr. Muck, who had previously filled the position of conductor of the orchestra, was received with applause, as he is recognized as one of the greatest of those who have filled the post of conductor of the splendid Boston organization, and his first program in Providence fully shows what the people of this city may expect. The program was:

Symphony in D major, No. 1, Op. 16.. ....Sgambati
1. Allegro vivace, non tropop.
2. Andante Mesto.
3. Scherzo, Pseto: Trio un poco meno
4. Serenata: Andante.
5. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

Elizabeth's Greeting, "Dich, Theure Hale," from "Tannhauser" ....Wagner
Variations on a Theme of Josef Haydn, Op. 56a......... ....Brahms
Recitative and aria, "Leise, leise," from "Der Freischutz" ... .Weber
Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Op. 9, ...Berlioz

The Sgambati symphony comes to Providence as a novelty, and it made a most delightful impression. Sgambati, while an Italian shows abundant evidence of German influence in this symphony; there are also unmistakable manifestations of Italian sentiment and expression. Nor is the composer's nationality revealed only in the serenata. In the second movement, and even in the sherzo, there is the suggestion of the solemn festal music in a Roman basilica. Furthermore in allegro pasages there is a peculiar vivacity that we do not associate with either French or German composers.

There are no great moments in the symphony; there is no deep emotion, there are no passionate outbursts; but this music has other qualities that are not to be ignored, much less despised. There is always the honorable, artistic intention; there is indisputable skill in the expression. There is a sense of proportion; there are interesting harmonic progressions—it should be remembered that the symphony is over 30 years old; there is ingenuity in the blending and the contrasting of instrumental timbres; there is rhythmic variety; the climaxes are inteligently and effectively prepared. It was a good thing to hear this music.

The soloist was Mme. Marie Rappold of the Metropolitan Opera House, who sang the air of Elizabeth in "Tannhauser," and the familiar recitative and aria from "Der Freischutz." Mme. Rappold sings with a fine large tone, rich and mellow, and smoothly flowing. She sang easily, gracefully and appealingly in the Elizabeth aria, and in "Der Freischutz," the smoothness of her voice was even more evident; there was a lyric elegance about her singing of the aria that was very grateful.

The orchestra is regaining its reputation for precision, balance, eloquent phrasing, euphony, and under Dr. Muck as interpreter and disciplinarian it will surely not lose in plasticity and passion. Thus in all the other numbers of the program the work of the members of the orchestra was of the highest order, and particularly so in "Le Carnival Romain" of Berlioz.

The next concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Providence will occur on the evening of Nov. 19.

From
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date OCT 22 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT PROGRAM

Mme. Marie Rappold, Prima Donna, Gives Views About Sending Young Girls to Study Abroad.

The first of the five Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Infantry hall this evening at 8:15. Dr. Muck has been compelled to make a slight change in the program announced last Sunday. Madame Marie Rappold of the Metropolitan Opera house, New York, who is the soloist, has changed her second number. Instead of the two pieces of Dell'Acqua and Van der Stucken, Madame Rappold will sing the great aria of Agatha, "How Tranquilly I Slumbered" from Weber's opera "Der Freischutz."

Her first number as announced will be Elisabeth's greeting from the second act of "Tannhauser." The orchestral numbers will be Sgambati's Symphony in D-major, Brahms's Variations on a theme by ~~Haydn, and~~ Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival."

Madame Rappold has most decided views about sending girls to Paris and Berlin to learn the art of singing. Speaking of it Madame Rappold said:

"No daughter of mine will ever go abroad to study, unless I am able to go with her. Even then I would not think of sending her until her vocal training had secured a solid foundation in this country. The more I see of the methods of teaching in Paris and Berlin and the ideas of the teachers there, the more I wonder that even so many singers are turned out of the studios as there are. I do not mean to say that there are not good and conscientious teachers in these cities, but I am not afraid to make the general statement that not only the French and German teachers in these cities, but the Americans who have settled there are much more interested in getting their fees than in actually doing their best by their pupils.

From that point of view the situation is a serious one but it is infinitely more serious when one considers the question of sending a girl of 17 18 or 19 to Paris or Berlin, throwing her on her own responsibility in these cities, surrounded by strange and potent temptations which hardly give her a fair chance to come out whole.

"I never go abroad that I do not hear some exceedingly tragic stories of girls who have gone abroad with bright prospects and for one reason or another have not been able to stand the stress of conditions which exist there. One only hears a few of the stories. There are thousands of American girls residing in Europe having gone there with the idea of preparing for a great career. The majority of them return home discouraged and beaten.

"A considerable minority of them never return and it is not difficult to imagine their fate. Now and then, like that poor girl in Paris last winter, one of them kills herself and there is a great turmoil in the papers over it, but still the good people here persist in letting their daughters go over there whether they have talent or not when as a matter of fact they can get better training in this country than is possible to secure abroad.

"It is all right to send a girl abroad after she has become old enough to take care of herself but I think it is nothing less than wicked to allow a young, ignorant girl to be thrown on her own responsibilities in the so-called artistic atmosphere of Paris and Berlin."

From TOWN TOPICS
Address: New York City
Date OCT 26 1912

Following what has now become its established custom of having each year the exclusive services of an artist of first rank as soloist at a series of its concerts, the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming season has made an arrangement whereby it brings to America, for a limited number of concerts, Fritz Kreisler, the violinist. He is to play with the orchestra in New York at both of its December concerts, and this will be his only appearance with orchestra in this city. The management of the orchestra has arranged that he shall give a recital in Aeolian Hall later in the season.

From GLOBE
Address: New York
Date OCT 25 1912

Dr. Muck will present at the opening pair of New York concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Thursday evening, Nov. 7, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 9, at Carnegie Hall the programme that he has offered at the first and the third concerts, respectively, of the orchestra in Boston. Thursday's programme comprises Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude. Saturday Bischoff's E major symphony will be introduced, followed by Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. As for soloists, Dr. Muck himself in his rôle of conductor, is the soloist for these concerts.

1884

From PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Address
Date OCT 23 1912

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Return of Dr. Muck as Conductor of the Orchestra.

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall last night marked the beginning of its 32nd season and its 125th concert in Providence. There was a large audience and the programme was full of interest, though presenting no real novelties. The occasion was notable in one respect, however, and that was the reappearance of Dr. Karl Muck as the orchestra's conductor.

During his previous engagement here Dr. Muck won a wide and deserved popularity. As conductor, as musician, and as programme-maker, he was outshone by none of the able men who have been at the head of the Boston orchestra, and it is generally agreed that he was the most successful of them all. It is a pleasure to know that his return this time is for an indefinite period—certainly for five years.

Last night's programme was full of life, of melody and of effective contrast. It was presented in the following order:

Symphony in D-major, No. 1, Op. 16...Sgambati
1. Allegro vivace, non troppo.
2. Andante Mesto.
3. Scherzo, Pseto: Trio un poco meno.
4. Serenata: Andante.
5. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.
Elizabeth's Greeting, "Dich, Theure Halle," from "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Variations on a Theme of Josef Haydn, Op. 56a .... Brahms
Recitative and aria, "Leise, leise," from "Der Freischutz" .... Weber
Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Op. 9. .... Berlioz

Sgambati's symphony, the backbone of the programme, might almost be termed a novelty, for, if memory serves, it has not had more than one previous hearing in Infantry Hall, and that at no very recent date. It will bear more frequent repetition. One feels that he would like to become more familiar with its manifold beauties. The Italian composers have made few attempts at writing in the symphonic style, their temperament seeking expression more naturally in the opera. But here is a work that challenges attention and respect. No one could possibly mistake it for a German work. It has not the formality nor the downright weight of a symphony by Beethoven or Brahms, but it abounds in melody, is worked out in a rather free style and with abundance of masterly and effective orchestration. An unconventional work and a pleasant one to hear.

In the playing of this—and, in fact, in the playing of the whole programme—one was conscious of a new hand at the helm. Not only are Dr. Muck's readings full of poetry and grace, but he always seems to get more out of his players than any other leader the orchestra has had. Last night's performance fell short here and there of the careful finish for which the Boston orchestra is justly renowned. That was unavoidable at the beginning of a season's work and with more changes than are usual in the personnel of the orchestra. But with the advent of Dr. Muck there is a noticeable increase in the life and energy of the playing; the finish will not be lacking later.

An interesting set of variations by Brahms on a theme of Haydn, and Berlioz's remarkably brilliant and colorful "Roman Carnival" made up the rest of the orchestral programme. Madame Marie Rappold of the Metropolitan opera was the soloist, and she chose for her selections two well-known battle-horses, neither of which, curiously, was especially suited to her voice and style. She has not the power and the grand style for the air of Elizabeth in "Tannhauser," nor the sweetness and the elegant legato demanded by the lovely air from Weber's "Der Freischutz." But she is a good singer, in spite of that, and the warm applause which greeted her performance was not ill-deserved.

The concert, on the whole, was very enjoyable and an auspicious beginning of the symphony season. The second concert of the series will take place on Nov 19, with Fritz Kreisler, the famous violinist, as the soloist.

W. A. P.

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 26 1912

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has this year in Baltimore the largest subscription in its history and the return of Dr. Muck to America seems to have excited as much interest here as it has in other cities. The orchestra is said to be playing more brilliantly than ever, and the series of five concerts is looked forward to with much eagerness.

For his first program, which will be played in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, November 6, Dr. Muck has elected to play the same numbers which he will play in New York on the following Saturday afternoon

---

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N.Y.
Date OCT 26 1912

The opening public sale of season tickets for the concerts by the Bosto Symphony Orchestra was held yesterda afternoon. There was a long line befor the ticket booth and an extremely lively sale for a few minutes, and then the thirty-six tickets for the body of the house which the subscribers had left for the general public to buy were gone. There are some seats still left in the boxes.

The ticket sellers in the booth in th Academy of Music lobby immediately began taking names and addresses in orde that the disappointed ones might be notified in case any subscriber did not take up his tickets. But the last ones on th line seemed to realize that they stood a rather slim chance, for it is hardly likely that a hundred or so of the old subscrib ers, seasoned Boston Symphony concert goers that they are, would omit to get their much-prized tickets.

At his Brooklyn Institute organ recital, at 4 o'clock to-morrow afternoon in music hall, Academy of Music, Scott Wheeler will play the Scherzo, Opus 132 (Rheinberger), and the Romance in D Flat (Lemare). The recital will precede a reading by Miss Alice Chapman, of Boston.

"Tiefland" (The Low Land), a Spanish Romance or music drama by Eugene d'Albert, will be the subject of Carl Fique's Brooklyn Institute lecture recital on Tuesday evening, fifth in a course. It is set in music hall, Academy of Music.

Newspaper
From TRIBUNE
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date OCT 23 1912

FIRST CONCERT OF SYMPHONY SEASON

Boston Orchestra and Madame Rappold Delighted Audience That Filled Infantry Hall.

1884

Infantry Hall was practically filled last night for the first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and there was unusual interest felt and shown in the event, not only because it was the initial concert of the winter here by this musical organization of wide fame, but particularly because it marked the reappearance in this city as the conductor of the orchestra of Dr. Muck, the former leader, who returns after several years abroad, and he was warmly welcomed by his friends and admirers. The orchestra showed the effects of his splendid leadership and training by the excellence of its work.

For the opening concert of the series Dr. Muck had arranged a well-diversified programme of orchestral selections admirably adapted to please music lovers. The symphony was that in D-major by the Italian composer, Giovanni Sgambati. It is the work of true Italian melody and yet scholarly. It is not a new composition, but has stood the test of three decades. As rendered by the orchestra all its beauty and melodious character was revealed, and it was keenly enjoyed. The second orchestral number was "Brahms Variations" on a theme by Joseph Haydn. This is a superb composition based upon the St. Anthony Chorale and developed into one of the best selections for the display of the versatility and skill of an orchestra like this. The final instrumental number was "The Roman Carnival," overture of Berlioz, built up on themes from the opera "Benevenuto Cellini," which is regarded as one of the brightest and liveliest works of that composer. It was delightfully rendered and left the audience in excellent mood.

The soloist was Madame Marie Rappold, one of the leading sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera House. Her entrance upon the operatic stage was sudden and without the aid of any training abroad, but her success was immediate and her career since has been most flattering. She has filled prominent roles in operas and has sung in concerts with equal success, though she is rated as a dramatic soprano. Last night she sang twice, her first number being the opening aria of Elizabeth in the second act of "Tannhauser," "Dich Theure Halle," and her second selection the recitative "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer" and the aria "Leise, leise," from Weber's "Der Freischutz." Both were well sung in a voice that is clear and sweet and of pleasing timbre. She shared with the orchestra in the demonstrations of approval of which the audience was generous.

The programme follows:

Symphony in D-major, No. 1, Op. 16..Sgambati
1. Allegro vivace, non troppo.
2. Andante Mesto.
3. Scherzo, Pseto: Trio un poco meno.
4. Serenata: Andante.
5. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.
Elizabeth's Greeting, "Dich, Theure Halle," from "Tannhauser" ....Wagner
Variations on a Theme of Josef Haydn, Op. 56a ....Brahms
Recitative and aria, "Leise, leise," from "Der Freitschutz" ....Weber
Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Op. 9.... ....Berlioz

ANOTHER GENERATION

From

Address PROVIDENCE, R.I.

Date OCT 22 19

Esta

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT PROGRAM

Mme. Marie Rappold, Prima Donna, Gives Views About Sending Young Girls to Study Abroad.

The first of the five Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Infantry hall this evening at 8:15. Dr. Muck has been compelled to make a slight change in the program announced last Sunday. Madame Marie Rappold of the Metropolitan Opera house, New York, who is the soloist, has changed her second number. Instead of the two pieces of Dell' Acqua and Van der Stucken, Madame Rappold will sing the great aria of Agatha, "How Tranquilly I Slumbered" from Weber's opera "Der Freischutz."

Her first number as announced will be Elisabeth's greeting from the second act of "Tannhauser." The orchestral numbers will be Sgambati's Symphony in D-major, Brahms's Variations on a theme by Haydn, and Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival."

Madame Rappold has most decided views about sending girls to Paris and Berlin to learn the art of singing. Speaking of it Madame Rappold said:

"No daughter of mine will ever go abroad to study, unless I am able to go with her. Even then I would not think of sending her until her vocal training had secured a solid foundation in this country. The more I see of the methods of teaching in Paris and Berlin and the ideas of the teachers there, the more I wonder that even so many singers are turned out of the studios as there are. I do not mean to say that there are not good and conscientious teachers in those cities, but I am not afraid to make the general statement that not only the French and German teachers in these cities, but the Americans who have settled there are much more interested in getting their fees than in actually doing their best by their pupils.

From that point of view the situation is a serious one but it is infinitely more serious when one consideres the question of sending a girl of 17 18 or 19 to Paris or Berlin, throwing her on her own responsibility in these cities, surrounded by strange and potent temptations which hardly give her a fair chance to come out whole.

"I never go abroad that I do not hear some exceedingly tragic stories of girls who have gone abroad with bright prospects and for one reason or another have not been able to stand the stress of conditions which exist there. One only hears a few of the stories. There are thousands of American girls residing in Europe having gone there with the idea of preparing for a great career. The majority of them return home discouraged and beaten.

"A considerable minority of them never return and it is not difficult to imagine their fate. Now and then, like that poor girl in Paris last winter, one of them kills herself and there is a great turmoil in the papers over it, but still the good people here persist in letting their daughters go over there whether they have talent or not when as a matter of fact they can get better training in this country than is possible to secure abroad.

"It is all right to send a girl abroad after she has become old enough to take care of hersedf but I think it is nothing less than wicked to allow a young, ignorant girl to be thrown on her own responsibilities in the so-called artistic atmosphere of Paris and Berlin."

From TOWN TOPICS

Address: New York City

Date OCT 24 1912

Following what has now become its established custom of having each year the exclusive services of an artist of first rank as soloist at a series of its concerts, the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming season has made an arrangement whereby it brings to America, for a limited number of concerts, Fritz Kreisler, the violinist. He is to play with the orchestra in New York at both of its December concerts, and this will be his only appearance with orchestra in this city. The management of the orchestra has arranged that he shall give a recital in Aeolian Hall later in the season.

From GLOBE

Address: New York

Date OCT 25 1912

Es 1884

Dr. Muck will present at the opening pair of New York concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Thursday evening, Nov. 7, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 9, at Carnegie Hall the programme that he has offered at the first and the third concerts, respectively, of the orchestra in Boston. Thursday's programme comprises Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude. Saturday Bischoff's E major symphony will be introduced, followed by Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. As for soloists, Dr. Muck himself in his rôle of conductor, is the soloist for these concerts.

From PROVIDENCE, R.I.

Address

Date OCT 23 1912

ablish

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Return of Dr. Muck as Conductor of the Orchestra.

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall last night marked the beginning of its 32nd season and its 125th concert in Providence. There was a large audience and the programme was full of interest, though presenting no real novelties. The occasion was notable in one respect, however, and that was the reappearance of Dr. Karl Muck as the orchestra's conductor.

During his previous engagement here Dr. Muck won a wide and deserved popularity. As conductor, as musician, and as programme-maker, he was outshone by none of the able men who have been at the head of the Boston orchestra, and it is generally agreed that he was the most successful of them all. It is a pleasure to know that his return this time is for an indefinite period—certainly for five years.

Last night's programme was full of life, of melody and of effective contrast. It was presented in the following order:

Symphony in D-major, No. 1, Op. 16...Sgambati
1. Allegro vivace, non troppo.
2. Andante Mesto.
3. Scherzo. Pseto: Trio un poco meno.
4. Serenata: Andante.
5. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.
Elizabeth's Greeting, "Dich, Theure Halle," from "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Variations on a Theme of Josef Haydn, Op. 56a .... Brahms
Recitative and aria, "Leise, leise," from "Der Freischutz" .... Weber
Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Op. 9..... .... Berlioz

Sgambati's symphony, the backbone of the programme, might almost be termed a novelty, for, if memory serves, it has not had more than one previous hearing in Infantry Hall, and that at no very recent date. It will bear more frequent repetition. One feels that he would like to become more familiar with its manifold beauties. The Italian composers have made few attempts at writing in the symphonic style, their temperament seeking expression more naturally in the opera. But here is a work that challenges attention and respect. No one could possibly mistake it for a German work. It has not the formality nor the downright weight of a symphony by Beethoven or Brahms, but it abounds in melody, is worked out in a rather free style and with abundance of masterly and effective orchestration. An unconventional work and a pleasant one to hear.

In the playing of this—and, in fact, in the playing of the whole programme—one was conscious of a new hand at the helm. Not only are Dr. Muck's readings full of poetry and grace, but he always seems to get more out of his players than any other leader the orchestra has had. Last night's performance fell short here and there of the careful finish for which the Boston orchestra is justly renowned. That was unavoidable at the beginning of a season's work and with more changes than are usual in the personnel of the orchestra. But with the advent of Dr. Muck there is a noticeable increase in the life and energy of the playing; the finish will not be lacking later.

An interesting set of variations by Brahms on a theme of Haydn, and Berlioz's remarkably brilliant and colorful "Roman Carnival" made up the rest of the orchestral programme. Madame Marie Rappold of the Metropolitan opera was the soloist, and she chose for her selections two well-known battle-horses, neither of which, curiously, was especially suited to her voice and style. She has not the power and the grand style for the air of Elizabeth in "Tannhauser," nor the sweetness and the elegant legato demanded by the lovely air from Weber's "Der Freischutz." But she is a good singer, in spite of that, and the warm applause which greeted her performance was not ill-deserved.

The concert, on the whole, was very enjoyable and an auspicious beginning of the symphony season. The second concert of the series will take place on Nov 19, with Fritz Kreisler, the famous violinist, as the soloist.

W. A. P.

From EVG. STAR

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date OCT 26 1912

Est 1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has this year in Baltimore the largest subscription in its history and the return of Dr. Muck to America seems to have excited as much interest here as it has in other cities. The orchestra is said to be playing more brilliantly than ever, and the series of five concerts is looked forward to with much eagerness.

For his first program, which will be played in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, November 6, Dr. Muck has elected to play the same numbers which he will play in New York on the following Saturday afternoon.

From CITIZEN

Address: Brooklyn, N.Y.

Date OCT 26 1912

Es 1884

The opening public sale of season tickets for the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held yesterday afternoon. There was a long line before the ticket booth and an extremely lively sale for a few minutes, and then the thirty-six tickets for the body of the house which the subscribers had left for the general public to buy were gone. There are some seats still left in the boxes.

The ticket sellers in the booth in the Academy of Music lobby immediately began taking names and addresses in order that the disappointed ones might be notified in case any subscriber did not take up his tickets. But the last ones on the line seemed to realize that they stood a rather slim chance, for it is hardly likely that a hundred or so of the old subscribers, seasoned Boston Symphony concertgoers that they are, would omit to get their much-prized tickets.

At his Brooklyn Institute organ recital, at 4 o'clock to-morrow afternoon in music hall, Academy of Music, Scott Wheeler will play the Scherzo, Opus 132 (Rheinberger), and the Romance in D Flat (Lemare). The recital will precede a reading by Miss Alice Chapman, of Boston.

"Tiefland" (The Low Land), a Spanish Romance or music drama by Eugene d'Albert, will be the subject of Carl Fique's Brooklyn Institute lecture recital on Tuesday evening, fifth in a course. It is set in music hall, Academy of Music.

Newspaper

From

Address PROVIDENCE, R.I.

Date OCT 23 1912

Es 1884

FIRST CONCERT OF SYMPHONY SEASON

Boston Orchestra and Madame Rappold Delighted Audience That Filled Infantry Hall.

Infantry Hall was practically filled last night for the first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and there was unusual interest felt and shown in the event, not only because it was the initial concert of the winter here by this musical organization of wide fame, but particularly because it marked the reappearance in this city as the conductor of the orchestra of Dr. Muck, the former leader, who returns after several years abroad, and he was warmly welcomed by his friends and admirers. The orchestra showed the effects of his splendid leadership and training by the excellence of its work.

For the opening concert of the series Dr. Muck had arranged a well-diversified programme of orchestral selections admirably adapted to please music lovers. The symphony was that in D-major by the Italian composer, Giovanni Sganbati. It is the work of true Italian melody and yet scholarly. It is not a new composition, but has stood the test of three decades. As rendered by the orchestra all its beauty and melodious character was revealed, and it was keenly enjoyed. The second orchestral number was "Brahms Variations" on a theme by Joseph Haydn. This is a superb composition based upon the St. Anthony Chorale and developed into one of the best selections for the display of the versatility and skill of an orchestra like this. The final instrumental number was "The Roman Carnival," overture of Berlioz, built up on themes from the opera "Benevenuto Cellini," which is regarded as one of the brightest and liveliest works of that composer. It was delightfully rendered and left the audience in excellent mood.

The soloist was Madame Marie Rappold, one of the leading sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera House. Her entrance upon the operatic stage was sudden and without the aid of any training abroad, but her success was immediate and her career since has been most flattering. She has filled prominent roles in operas and has sung in concerts with equal success, though she is rated as a dramatic soprano. Last night she sang twice, her first number being the opening aria of Elizabeth in the second act of "Tannhauser," "Dich Theure Halle," and her second selection the recitative "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer" and the aria "Leise, leise," from Weber's "Der Freischutz." Both were well sung in a voice that is clear and sweet and of pleasing timbre. She shared with the orchestra in the demonstrations of approval of which the audience was generous.

The programme follows:

Symphony in D-major, No. 1, Op. 16..Sgambati
1. Allegro vivace, non troppo.
2. Andante Mesto.
3. Scherzo. Pseto: Trio un poco meno.
4. Serenata: Andante.
5. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.
Elizabeth's Greeting, "Dich, Theure Halle," from "Tannhauser" ....Wagner
Variations on a Theme of Josef Haydn, Op. 56a ....Brahms
Recitative and aria, "Leise, leise," from "Der Freitschutz" ....Weber
Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Op. 9.... ....Berlioz

ANOTHER GENERATION

Newspaper

From AMERICAN
Address: New York

Date

Established:

NOW THE MUSIC FEAST OF THE SEASON BEGINS

New York, Says Charles Henry Meltzer, is, After All, the Golden Mecca of Musicians.

BIG CONCERT PROGRAMME

Boston and Philadelphia Taking the Lead in Producing Opera in English.

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

At some time in their lives all virtuosos, singers, players and conductors come to America.

For this, above all other lands on earth, is the grand, golden mecca of musicians. London and Paris, Vienna and Berlin may make them known. But nowhere in the world can they grow rich so soon—if they are really great—as in this country.

There have been lean years, to be sure, even over here. Years in which the concert halls have been neglected and the poor fiddler has been far from prosperous.

It looks as if this would be a most fat year. Not only for the pampered opera stars—these we have always with us—but for the famous pianists, singers of lieder, violinists, 'cellists, harpists and performers on wind instruments who drift this way.

Seldom have the announcements of the concert agents had more charm than now. We are promised Ysaye, a poet, besides Zimbalist and Elman, Maud Powell and Kreisler as his rivals. We may look forward to the return of Josef Hofmann, Busoni, Tina Lerner and Godowsky. Sembrich, Schumann-Heink, Alma Gluck, Gadski, Clement and perhaps Bonci, will sing songs to us on the concert platform.

And they are but a small part of the artists who will make us glad.

To some, who love pure music more than artists, there will be joy in the new efforts of the Flonzaleys, the Kneisels and their ambitious, although less successful, emulators.

Above all, there will be a feast of symphony.

Big Orchestral Field.

This season, as in other years, six—if not seven—societies will fight for favor in the orchestral field. Foremost among them we shall have the admirable Boston Symphony Orchestra, now, as for a short time before, under the direction of Carl Muck, by many held the best conductor in the world. The return of Dr. Muck (who has been engaged for five years) has already effected wonders. It has put new vigor and new life into the great Boston society. And we, in turn, shall have the rare delight of listening to the interpretations of the masters under his guidance.

The earnestness and the broad scholarship of Walter Damrosch will again be devoted to the concerts of the New York Symphony Orchestra. Josef Stransky will lead the forces of the Philharmonic. Modest Altschuler will resume his labors as head of the Russian Symphony Society and do much, no doubt, to give music to the masses. From time to time Arnold Volpe and his followers will vie with older leaders. And last, athough not least, the People's Symphony Orchestra, under the skilled conductorship of F. X. Arens, will work zealously to spread the love of art.

This year, unless all omens should mislead, it is highly probable that the concerts will be of more genuine interest in New York than opera.

For it is only far too clear and sure that the absence of competition has not quickened the anxiety of the Metropolitan Opera management to widen its activities, to give us representative novelties, or to acquaint us with the progress of some nations in the art of music.

No French Opera.

Mr. Gatti-Casazza seems to ignore the fact that opera has of late years been developed both in France and Germany. He continues to exclude "Louise," "Pelleas et Melisande," "Monna Vanna," "Les Troyens," "La Muette de Portici" and other French works of rare beauty from his repertory. He will present neither "Salome" nor "Elektra."

Nor does he seem anxious to do much more than in the past to test opera in English.

One work sung in our language is announced an American opera, the "Cryano de Bergerac" of Walter Damrosch and W. J. Henderson. One work is not enough to content the thousands who are eager and hungry to have opera made real and plain and vital to their hearts and ears.

The parrot cry of "opera in the original" is heard now as of old at the Metropolitan. We are still told that it would be absurd and blasphemous to sing Wagner in English, though Wagner, like his widow and his son, like Muck and Richter (the highest of all authorities) have favored the pretended outrage.

If only Mr. Gatti-Casazza were consistent in his advocacy of "opera in the original." But is it consistent to give the French "Les Huguenots" in Italian; the Russian "Boris Goudonou" also in Italian, and the Bohemian "Prodana Nevesti" ("The Bartered Bride") in German?

Meanwhile, however, it is of some interest to note that the managers of the Boston and Chicago opera companies have resolved to attempt what the amiable manager of the Metropolitan thinks impossible. Mr. Russell announces a production of "Martha," a foreign opera, in English, while an English version of Goldmark's "Cricket on the Hearth" will be tried ere long by Mr. Dippel.

Newsp

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.

Date 27 1912

Establi

DRY GOODS.
R. H. Macy & Co.

The Boston Programme Book —Some Remarks on Indian Music.

Something like six weeks ago some music by Arnold Schönberg was performed at a promenade concert in Queen's Hall, London, and was received with hisses as well as applause. The music was "an essay in dissonance"—so said the critic of "The Times" newspaper, who, in a subsequent article on "The Boon of Intolerance" lauded the expression of disapproval on the part of the audience, not because the music deserved it, but because it was an expression of interest in a question plainly raised by the music. The writer says:

"We have been too much flooded with stories of the intolerance of other people, and their absurdly erring judgments have been held up to ridicule. Just as professed critics in the press are intimidated by the thought of what their predecessors said about Schumann and Wagner and Brahms, so the larger body of audiences (every member of whom ought to be a critic, if he is to justify his presence in the concert room or opera house) tremble when they remember the conflict which raged over Brahms's first symphony, the hounding off the stage of Paris, and more recently the curious fact that one of Puccini's most popular operas, 'Madama Butterfly,' was literally howled down in Milan, the very centre of Italian opera."

Commenting on the London incident the writer of the editorials in "The New Music Review," remarks:

"It is not pleasant to hiss or to be hissed, and yet we believe that this expression of disapproval would occasionally clear the air and be of benefit to composers, conductors, and all sorts of musical wild fowl. Those who hissed might err in judgment, as many of the great have lamentably erred in judging their contemporaries, but at any rate, they would have an opinion and would not be afraid to pronounce it."

This is sound; but it does not go to the heart of the matter. It is a pity, perhaps, that the patrons of our opera houses and concert rooms do not say so when they dislike a performance and give expression to their disapproval only by staying away. But it would be hard to educate them up to the standard thus implied. Perhaps the audience in London would not have ventured to hiss had not some of its constituent units known that it had become a fashion to hiss Schönberg's music in Vienna. Our chief concern after all is with the critic—the newspaper critic. No man has a right to an opinion in a question of art who is afraid to express it; and the foolishest course that a critic, lay or professional, can follow is to withhold his opinion for fear that at some future time it may be found that his opinion was erroneous. After that the next most foolish thing is for the critic to sneer at the honest writer of the past from whose view the majority of his fellows have turned. The men who could not approve of Beethoven were not all dishonest fools; nor were those who objected to Schumann, or Wagner, or Brahms. Neither is it a sign of idiocy to question the validity of Richard Strauss, or Reger or Debussy or Arnold Schönberg. Honest antagonism to innovations is beneficial and necessary to sound progress. It provides the regulative flywheel, without which the engine would go racing to destruction. It cannot stop progress, and there never was a critic honestly concerned about his art who desired that it should. There is more cant about everything new being good than there is in the proclamation that old things are good because they are old. The former proclamation is too frequently based on cowardice and ignorance. No critic worthy of the name is afraid to speak out his dissent because the history of criticism has taught him that he may be overruled by others to-morrow or that he may himself change his mind. If he is honest and speaks from conviction there is likely to be something in his verdict which will remain true, no matter what the winds and tides of popular favor may do to his utterances or their subject. Beethoven, Schumann, Wagner and Brahms have won and held their sway over the popular heart; but there was much in the criticism addressed against their creations which was valid when it was spoken and is valid to-day. That residuum must go down to their everlasting credit. They were brave men and better men than those who sneer at them to-day. The coward in criticism who has no opinion unfavorable to the artist who is his friend or affects friendship for him, who pronounces everything good which the god of his idolatry admired or admirers, screening his ignorance behind an imposing name, will be in no danger of being overruled by posterity, for he will give posterity no reason for remembering him, and his influence will stop with his friends or the friends of his friends.

There never was a time when musical criticism stood higher in the United States than it does to-day. The reviewers for the daily newspapers of Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago and New York, as a rule, are men of learning, taste, good judgment and honesty, who know what they are writing about, and who present the fruits of their trained knowledge attractively, pleasantly, without arrogance and without fear. Among those who exert an influence there is not one who is rude or offensive in manner; neither is there one who is a mollycoddle.

A critic who is fortunate in being able to extend his influence far beyond the circle of his newspaper readers is Mr. Philip Hale. Not only does he write the musical reviews for "The Boston Herald," but he also writes the historical and descriptive notes for the programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. These little pamphlets are given out wherever the Boston organization gives its concerts. In New York, perhaps also in other cities outside of Boston, the sale of the advertising privileges by the owners of theatres and music halls places an embargo on the little books which works a distinct hardship on the people who gather to hear the orchestra, inasmuch as they are prevented from receiving them in the concert room or at its doors. Nevertheless, the books are eagerly sought and cherished not only for the help which they afford to the listeners during the performance, but also because they are delightful and entertaining literature at all times. It is a pity that Mr. Hale is not permitted to use musical examples in his notes, for no amount of description can take the place of a theme set forth in its proper symbols, and to him who is able to read them the notes help to fix the attention while description diverts attention. But for this shortcoming Mr. Hale offers a generous compensation in his historical and critical matter. His knowledge is encyclopædic and his communication of it most deft and amiable. He caters impartially to gatherers of statistics and the lovers of anecdote, and is a heart's delight to the devotee of literary curiosities. The pamphlets of a season, gathered together in a volume and thoroughly indexed, make a thesaurus whose contents could not be supplied by a dozen volumes of history and biography and a score of books of analysis. No publisher's catalogue shows its like.

Newspaper

From AMERICAN
Address: New York

Date ....

Established:

NOW THE MUSIC FEAST OF THE SEASON BEGINS

New York, Says Charles Henry Meltzer, is, After All, the Golden Mecca of Musicians.

BIG CONCERT PROGRAMME

Boston and Philadelphia Taking the Lead in Producing Opera in English.

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

At some time in their lives all virtuosos, singers, players and conductors come to America.

For this, above all other lands on earth, is the grand, golden mecca of musicians. London and Paris, Vienna and Berlin may make them known. But nowhere in the world can they grow rich so soon—if they are really great—as in this country.

There have been lean years, to be sure, even over here. Years in which the concert halls have been neglected and the poor fiddler has been far from prosperous.

It looks as if this would be a most fat year. Not only for the pampered opera stars—these we have always with us—but for the famous pianists, singers of lieder, violinists, 'cellists, harpists and performers on wind instruments who drift this way.

Seldom have the announcements of the concert agents had more charm than now. We are promised Ysaye, a poet, besides Zimbalist and Elman, Maud Powell and Kreisler as his rivals. We may look forward to the return of Josef Hofmann, Busoni, Tina Lerner and Godowsky. Sembrich, Schumann-Heink, Alma Gluck, Gadski, Clement, and perhaps Bonci, will sing songs to us on the concert platform.

And they are but a small part of the artists who will make us glad.

To some, who love pure music more than artists, there will be joy in the new efforts of the Flonzaleys, the Kneisels and their ambitious, although less successful, emulators.

Above all, there will be a feast of symphony.

Big Orchestral Field.

This season, as in other years, six—if not seven—societies will fight for favor in the orchestral field. Foremost among them we shall have the admirable Boston Symphony Orchestra, now, as for a short time before, under the direction of Carl Muck, by many held the best conductor in the world. The return of Dr. Muck (who has been engaged for five years) has already effected wonders. It has put new vigor and new life into the great Boston society. And we, in turn, shall have the rare delight of listening to the interpretations of the masters under his guidance.

The earnestness and the broad scholarship of Walter Damrosch will again be devoted to the concerts of the New York Symphony Orchestra. Josef Stransky will lead the forces of the Philharmonic. Modest Altschuler will resume his labors as head of the Russian Symphony Society and do much, no doubt, to give music to the masses. From time to time Arnold Volpe and his followers will vie with older leaders. And last, athough not least, the People's Symphony Orchestra, under the skilled conductorship of F. X. Arens, will work zealously to spread the love of art.

This year, unless all omens should mislead, it is highly probable that the concerts will be of more genuine interest in New York than opera.

For it is only far too clear and sure that the absence of competition has not quickened the anxiety of the Metropolitan Opera management to widen its activities, to give us representative novelties, or to acquaint us with the progress of some nation in the art of music.

No French Opera.

Mr. Gatti-Casazza seems to ignore the fact that opera has of late years been developed both in France and Germany. He continues to exclude "Louise," "Pelleas et Melisande," "Monna Vanna," "Les Troyens," "La Muette de Portici" and other French works of rare beauty from his repertory. He will present neither "Salome" nor "Elektra."

Nor does he seem anxious to do much more than in the past to test opera in English.

One work sung in our language is announced an American opera, the "Cryano de Bergerac" of Walter Damrosch and W. J. Henderson. One work is not enough to content the thousands who are eager and hungry to have opera made real and plain and vital to their hearts and ears.

The parrot cry of "opera in the original" is heard now as of old at the Metropolitan. We are still told that it would be absurd and blasphemous to sing Wagner in English, though Wagner, like his widow and his son, like Muck and Richter (the highest of all authorities) have favored the pretended outrage.

If only Mr. Gatti-Casazza were consistent in his advocacy of "opera in the original." But is it consistent to give the French "Les Huguenots" in Italian; the Russian "Boris Goudonou" also in Italian, and the Bohemian "Prodana Nevesti" ("The Bartered Bride") in German?

Meanwhile, however, it is of some interest to note that the managers of the Boston and Chicago opera companies have resolved to attempt what the amiable manager of the Metropolitan thinks impossible. Mr. Russell announces a production of "Martha," a foreign opera, in English, while an English version of Goldmark's "Cricket on the Hearth" will be tried ere long by Mr. Dippel.

Newspaper

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.

Date 1912

Establi

Musical Critics and the Public —Their Roles in Condemnation

The Boston Programme Book —Some Remarks on Indian Music.

Something like six weeks ago some music by Arnold Schönberg was performed at a promenade concert in Queen's Hall, London, and was received with hisses as well as applause. The music was "an essay in dissonance"—so said the critic of "The Times" newspaper, who, in a subsequent article on "The Boon of Intolerance" lauded the expression of disapproval on the part of the audience, not because the music deserved it, but because it was an expression of interest in a question plainly raised by the music. The writer says:

"We have been too much flooded with stories of the intolerance of other people, and their absurdly erring judgments have been held up to ridicule. Just as professed critics in the press are intimidated by the thought of what their predecessors said about Schumann and Wagner and Brahms, so the larger body of audiences (every member of whom ought to be a critic, if he is to justify his presence in the concert room or opera house) tremble when they remember the conflict which raged over Brahms's first symphony, the hounding off the stage of Paris, and more recently the curious fact that one of Puccini's most popular operas, 'Madama Butterfly,' was literally howled down in Milan, the very centre of Italian opera."

Commenting on the London incident the writer of the editorials in "The New Music Review," remarks:

"It is not pleasant to hiss or to be hissed, and yet we believe that this expression of disapproval would occasionally clear the air and be of benefit to composers, conductors, and all sorts of musical wild fowl. Those who hissed might err in judgment, as many of the great have lamentably erred in judging their contemporaries, but at any rate, they would have an opinion and would not be afraid to pronounce it."

This is sound; but it does not go to the heart of the matter. It is a pity, perhaps, that the patrons of our opera houses and concert rooms do not say so when they dislike a performance and give expression to their disapproval only by staying away. But it would be hard to educate them up to the standard thus implied. Perhaps the audience in London would not have ventured to hiss had not some of its constituent units known that it had become a fashion to hiss Schönberg's music in Vienna. Our chief concern after all is with the critic—the newspaper critic. No man has a right to an opinion in a question of art who is afraid to express it; and the foolishest course that a critic, lay or professional, can follow is to withhold his opinion for fear that at some future time it may be found that his opinion was erroneous. After that the next most foolish thing is for the critic to sneer at the honest writer of the past from whose view the majority of his fellows have turned. The men who could not approve of Beethoven were not all dishonest fools; nor were those who objected to Schumann, or Wagner, or Brahms. Neither is it a sign of idiocy to question the validity of Richard Strauss, or Reger or Debussy or Arnold Schönberg. Honest antagonism to innovations is beneficial and necessary to sound progress. It provides the regulative flywheel, without which the engine would go racing to destruction. It cannot stop progress, and there never was a critic honestly concerned about his art who desired that it should. There is more cant about everything new being good than there is in the proclamation that old things are good because they are old. The former proclamation is too frequently based on cowardice and ignorance. No critic worthy of the name is afraid to speak out his dissent because the history of criticism has taught him that he may be overruled by others to-morrow or that he may himself change his mind. If he is honest and speaks from conviction there is likely to be something in his verdict which will remain true, no matter what the winds and tides of popular favor may do to his utterances or their subject. Beethoven, Schumann, Wagner and Brahms have won and held their sway over the popular heart; but there was much in the criticism addressed against their creations which was valid when it was spoken and is valid to-day. That residuum must go down to their everlasting credit. They were brave men and better men than those who sneer at them to-day. The coward in criticism who has no opinion unfavorable to the artist who is his friend or affects friendship for him, who pronounces everything good which the god of his idolatry admired or admires, screening his ignorance behind an imposing name, will be in no danger of being overruled by posterity, for he will give posterity no reason for remembe [illegible] and his influence [illegible] or the friends [illegible] friend [illegible] when musical [illegible] the United States, [illegible] the reviewers for the daily newspapers of Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago and New York, as a rule, are men of learning, taste, good judgment and honesty, who know what they are writing about, and who present the fruits of their trained knowledge attractively, pleasantly, without arrogance and without fear. Among those who exert an influence there is not one who is rude or offensive in manner; neither is there one who is a mollycoddle.

A critic who is fortunate in being able to extend his influence far beyond the circle of his newspaper readers is Mr. Philip Hale. Not only does he write the musical reviews for "The Boston Herald," but he also writes the historical and descriptive notes for the programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. These little pamphlets are given out wherever the Boston organization gives its concerts. In New York, perhaps also in other cities outside of Boston, the sale of the advertising privileges by the owners of theatres and music halls places an embargo on the little books which works a distinct hardship on the people who gather to hear the orchestra, inasmuch as they are prevented from receiving them in the concert room or at its doors. Nevertheless, the books are eagerly sought and cherished not only for the help which they afford to the listeners during the performance, but also because they are delightful and entertaining literature at all times. It is a pity that Mr. Hale is not permitted to use musical examples in his notes, for no amount of description can take the place of a theme set forth in its proper symbols, and to him who is able to read them the notes help to fix the attention while description diverts attention. But for this shortcoming Mr. Hale offers a generous compensation in his historical and critical matter. His knowledge is encyclopædic and his communication of it most deft and amiable. He caters impartially to gatherers of statistics and the lovers of anecdote, and is a heart's delight to the devotee of literary curiosities. The pamphlets of a season, gathered together in a volume and thoroughly indexed, make a thesaurus whose contents could not be supplied by a dozen volumes of history and biography and a score of books of analysis. No publisher's catalogue shows its like.

Newspaper

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date OCT 27 1912

Establish

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its 27th consecutive season of concerts in Philadelphia on Monday evening, November 4, at 8.15, with the largest subscription it has had in this city in many years. The return of Doctor Muck to the leadership of the orchestra seems to have excited the same interest in Philadelphia that it has aroused elsewhere. Doctor Muck has elected to play at this concert the programme with which he opened his season in Boston on the 11th and 12th of October. This programme comprises the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven; the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz; the "Mazeppa" symphonic poem of Liszt and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," by Wagner.

The sale of seats for this concert opens at Heppe's tomorrow.

Newspaper

From TELEGRAPH

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date OCT 26 1912

Est 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its twenty-seventh consecutive season of concerts in Philadelphia on Monday evening, November 4, with the largest subscription it has had in this city in many years. Dr. Muck will play at this concert the program with which he opened his season in Boston, on the 11th and 12th inst.,comprising the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, the "Roman Carnival," overture of Berlioz; the "Mazeppa" symphonic poem of Liszt, and the prelude to "The Meistersingers of Nuremberg" of Wagner. The sale of seats for this concert opens at Heppe's, Monday.

Newspaper

From NORTH AMERICAN

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date OCT 27 1912

1884

Boston Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its twenty-seventh consecutive season of concerts in Philadelphia on Monday evening, November 4, with the largest subscription it has had in this city in many years. The return of Doctor Muck to the leadership of the orchestra seems to have excited the same interest in Philadelphia that it has elsewhere. Doctor Muck has elected to play at this concert the program with which he opened his season in Boston on October 11 and 12. This program comprises the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven; the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz; the "Mazeppa" Symphony poem of Liszt and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," by Wagner.

Edwin Evans, of this city has been engaged to give a song recital in Utica, N. Y., on November 21, and on November 25 will appear as assisting soloist with the Dr. Parry Male Chorus, of Scranton, Pa. On December 5 his eighth Philadelphia song recital occurs in Witherspoon Hall, under the auspices of the University Extension Society. Later on Evans Williams and Mr. Evans will probably be heard in a joint concert in Witherspoon Hall.

Miguel Llobet, whose odd name is not Welsh, but Spanish Catalan, will give an exhibition of virtuosity on the guitar in a concert in the Orpheus Club's rooms, 1520 Chestnut street, on Tuesday afternoon of this week. On the same evening Paul Meyer, the violinist, will be heard in a recital in Griffith Hall. He will play a Tschaikowsky concerto, the Tartini-Kreisler, "Trill du Diable," and Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole."

The Lyric Club, formerly known as the Choral Club, under the direction of Helen Pulaski Innes has so increased in membership that new quarters are being considered. The club will probably hold rehearsals in Estey Hall. The first concert will be given in January, at Witherspoon Hall.

Newspaper Cutting

From PRESS

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date OCT 27 1912

Es 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its twenty-seventh consecutive season of concerts in Philadelphia on Monday evening, November 4, with the largest subscription it has had in this city in many years. The return of Dr. Muck to the leadership of the Orchestra seems to have excited the same interest in Philadelphia that it has elsewhere. Dr. Muck has elected to play at this concert the program with which he opened his season in Boston on the 11th and 12th of October. This program comprises the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven; the "Roman Carnival" Overture of Berlioz; the "Mazeppa" symphonic poem of Liszt, and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" of Wagner.

From EVE. JOURNAL

Address New York City.

Date OCT 30 1912

Es 1884

The programmes for the first pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York, on November 7 and 9 at Carnegie Hall, under Dr. Carl Muck, have been announced. On the Thursday evening Dr. Muck will play the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, the Berlioz "Roman Carnival" overture, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppt," and the "Mesitersinger" prelude. On the Saturday afternoon Bischoff's symphony in E, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Webber's "Euryanthe" overture will be heard.

The fifteenth

From HERALD

Address: Washington, D. C.

Date OCT 27 1912

Es 1884

Washington is to have the pleasure of hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Karl Muck again its conductor, at the National Theater, Tuesday afternoon, November 5, at 4:30 o'clock, under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

This great musical organization has the good fortune to begin its thirty-second year with the return of Dr. Muck, for which Boston has reason for self-congratulation. That music lovers of that city appreciate their good fortune was fully exemplified at the first two recitals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, early in October. A most affecing instance was the spontaneous action of Mr. Higginson, the honored patron and supporter of the orchestra, when he walked to the stage and extended his hand over the footlights in silent greeting to the great conductor.

Dr. Muck began his academic education at Heidelberg, which he finished at Leipsic, while studying music under Richter and Reinecke. Before coming to America he had conducted orchestras in Zurich, Salsburg, Gratz, Prague, and Berlin. Dr. Muck is a great conductor, whose influence over his orchestra is powerful. He is of a distinguished rather than commanding personality, a simple, unaffected man whose quiet gestures wield a mysterious magic over his players. His genius lies in great imaginative powers, a subtle sense of the composer's meanings, from the broadest to the most delicate, most elusive, combining emotional feeling with intellectual restraint, having patience for the most minute details, poetic insight, and mental balance.

One is at a loss to say wherein lies his greatest skill—in the perfect balance of the instruments, the splendid surge and rush of a tumultuous crescendo, or the fluttering breath of a pianissimo. He is a masterly interpreter for a great orchestra.

From BULLETIN

Address PHILADELPHIA PA

Date

Estab

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its twenty-seventh consecutive season of concerts in this city on Monday evening, November 4, with the largest subscription it has had here in many years. The return of Dr. Muck to the leadership seems to have excited the same interest in Philadelphia that it has elsewhere. Dr. Muck has elected to play at this concert the program with which he opened his season in Boston a fortnight ago. It comprises the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven; the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz; the "Mazeppa" symphonic poem of Liszt and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," by Wagner.

From EVG. SUN

Address: New York

Date OCT 29 1912

Estab

New York's first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Nov. 7 in Carnegie Hall repeats Dr. Muck's first programme at the Hub the other day, Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Berlioz's "Roman Carnival," Liszt's "Mazeppa" and Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers."

Dr. Muck's first Saturday matinée here comprises Bischoff's symphony in E major, the "Siegfried Idyl" of Wagner and the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber.

From ITEM

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA

Date OCT 27 1912

Es 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual series of five evening concerts in the Academy of Music during the coming season on Monday

[illegible]

evenings, November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17. Dr. Karl Muck will resume the post of conductor after an absence of four years. The list of soloists includes Matzenauer, the eminent contralto of the Metropolitan Opera, and [illegible] who comes to America [illegible] Kreisler [illegible] an exclusive [illegible] Symphony Orchestra [illegible]

From RECORD

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date OCT 27 1912

Esta 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its twenty-seventh consecutive season of concerts in Philadelphia on Monday evening, November 4. Subscription is the largest in this city in many years. The return of Dr. Karl Muck to the leadership of the orchestra seems to have aroused the same interest in Philadelphia that it has elsewhere. Dr. Muck will play at this concert the

---

From SUN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date OCT 27 1912

Estabi 14

When Dr. Muck brings the Boston Orchestra here in November the major portion of the evening will be devoted to the playing of the Bischoff symphony in E major, which the famous conductor first introduced to America about five years ago and which he is said to regard as one of the most important of modern compositions, not only because of its melodic significance, but because it requires so much virtuosity on the part of the individual members of the orchestra.

TELEPHONE, 92 CHELSEA

Intended for Boston Orchest

"O wad some power the giftie gie us
To see oursel's as ithers see us"

HENRY ROMEIKE,

106-110 Seventh Ave., N. Y. City

CABLE ADDRESS:
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK

NEW Y

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From NATION

Address: New York City.

Date 3 1

E

Music

Boston Symphony Orchestra Programmes. With Historical and Descriptive Notes by Philip Hale. Boston: C. A. Ellis.

The bound volume containing the home programmes for 1911-1912 of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a book of 1,594 pages. More than half of these pages are filled with advertisements. Now that this orchestra has become so popular and prosperous, it is to be hoped that these advertisements may soon be printed and paged separately from the reading matter, so that they need not be bound up with it. The programmes themselves thoroughly deserve being bound and preserved. They contain a good deal of valuable reading matter in addition to Mr. Hale's erudite yet entertaining and sane notes on the pieces played at the season's twenty-four concerts. Each of the programmes has a footnote imparting the information that there will be an intermission of ten minutes after the symphony. In order that the Boston music-lover's mind may not be arrested in its quest of culture even during that brief interval of time, Mr. Hale always provides a literary entr'acte, consisting either of an article on some general musical topic from his own workshop, or else, and more frequently, a paper reprinted from some English or American periodical. This Programme Book thus comes once a year as a life-preserver for a good deal that is valuable in contemporary journalistic literature.

Mr. Hale himself descants on Beethoven the Pianist, The Beginning of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Bruckner, Color, Tonal and Colored Audition, Works of Liszt Played by the Boston Orchestra, Salome and Her Dance, The Triangle, Wagner's Account of Himself. Mr. Hale's predecessor, W. F. Apthorp, provides interesting reminiscences of earlier years of the Boston Orchestra. Barry writes about Liszt and the Symphonic Poem; Newman on Bantock, Wallace, and Elgar's Second Symphony; Runciman on England's Lack of Great Musicians and on Brünnhilde's Self-Immolation, on which subject Bernard Shaw is also quoted. Of special interest are the reprints from the London Times of papers on Cathedral Festivals, A Chopin Relic, Humor and Quotation, Mannerisms, Musical Patriotism, Post-Wagnerian Opera, Science and Singing. A good index makes it easy to find what one happens to be interested in, and this index also embraces those incidental references and footnotes which are a specialty of Mr. Hale's and many of which contain information hard to find elsewhere.

French music is a particular object of Mr. Hale's admiration; he keeps his eyes open for everything relating to it, and no one who gets this annual record is likely to miss anything of importance. While Saint-Saëns towers high above all French composers of the day, the most prominent of them, and the most widely discussed, is Debussy. Under the head of "Cor and Debussy" Mr. Hale gives a bird's-eye view of contemporary French and German opinion on this exotic composer. An article from the pen of Raphael Cor entitled "M. Claude Debussy et le Snobisme Contemporain" aroused a good deal of discussion. The Revue du Temps Présent, in which this article appeared, thereupon sent a circular to a number of prominent European musicians, asking them to answer certain questions relating to that composer. Thirty of the answers were printed in a small volume which M. Debussy must have read with mingled feelings of pride and indignation. What he read, among many other things, was that he is a musician without parallel; that he is original, but only negatively so: "take away from music rhythm, melody, and emotion, and you have defined Debussy's musical works." The monotony of his music "stupifies the hearer." It leads to reveries; it is a mosaic of chords; the passionate admiration of it is in Paris "a disease of the season, or a crisis." There are many vain imitations of it—childish apings. He was just the man to work in sympathy with Maeterlinck, the "Shakespeare for snobs." Among the thirty whose answers are printed in the volume referred to are Siegfried Wagner, who says regarding "Pelléas et Mélisande": "I heard only one act, and no one should judge after one act." Another composer, Reynaldo Hahn, wrote that, while he held Debussy in high honor, he was not a Debussyite, and regarded Debussyites as unfortunate persons. Paul Flat agreed with M. Cor that there is "an enormous part of snobbism and bluff" in the reputation of Debussy. The most amusing thing in the volume is a remark contributed by Romain Rolland, whose novel in nine Christophe," has found so many readers and admirers. In answer to the question whether Debussy is likely to found a school, he writes: "Every great artist has a school. Every school is injurious. Would it not, then, be better if there were no great artists?"

[60]

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 27 1912

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its 27th consecutive season of concerts in Philadelphia on Monday evening, November 4, at 8.15, with the largest subscription it has had in this city in many years. The return of Doctor Muck to the leadership of the orchestra seems to have excited the same interest in Philadelphia that it has aroused elsewhere. Doctor Muck has elected to play at this concert the programme with which he opened his season in Boston on the 11th and 12th of October. This programme comprises the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven; the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz; the "Mazeppa" symphonic poem of Liszt and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," by Wagner.

The sale of seats for this concert opens at Heppe's tomorrow.

From TELEGRAPH
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 26 1912

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its twenty-seventh consecutive season of concerts in Philadelphia on Monday evening, November 4, with the largest subscription it has had in this city in many years. Dr. Muck will play at this concert the program with which he opened his season in Boston, on the 11th and 12th inst., comprising the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, the "Roman Carnival," overture of Berlioz; the "Mazeppa" symphonic poem of Liszt, and the prelude to "The Meistersingers of Nuremberg" of Wagner. The sale of seats for this concert opens at Heppe's, Monday.

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 27

Boston Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its twenty-seventh consecutive season of concerts in Philadelphia on Monday evening, November 4, with the largest subscription it has had in this city in many years. The return of Doctor Muck to the leadership of the orchestra seems to have excited the same interest in Philadelphia that it has elsewhere. Doctor Muck has elected to play at this concert the program with which he opened his season in Boston on October 11 and 12. This program comprises the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven; the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz; the "Mazeppa" Symphony poem of Liszt and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," by Wagner.

Edwin Evans, of this city, has been engaged to give a song recital in Utica, N. Y., on November 21, and on November 25 will appear as assisting soloist with the Dr. Parry Male Chorus, of Scranton, Pa. On December 5 his eighth Philadelphia song recital occurs in Witherspoon Hall, under the auspices of the University Extension Society. Later on Evans Williams and Mr. Evans will probably be heard in a joint concert in Witherspoon Hall.

Miguel Llobet, whose odd name is not Welsh, but Spanish Catalan, will give an exhibition of virtuosity on the guitar in a concert in the Orpheus Club's rooms, 1520 Chestnut street, on Tuesday afternoon of this week. On the same evening Paul Meyer, the violinist, will be heard in a recital in Griffith Hall. He will play a Tschaikowsky concerto, the Tartini-Kreisler, "Trill du Diable," and Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole."

The Lyric Club, formerly known as the Choral Club, under the direction of Helen Pulaski Innes has so increased in membership that new quarters are being considered. The club will probably hold rehearsals in Estey Hall. The first concert will be given in January, at Witherspoon Hall.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

From PRESS
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 27 1912

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its twenty-seventh consecutive season of concerts in Philadelphia on Monday evening, November 4, with the largest subscription it has had in this city in many years. The return of Dr. Muck to the leadership of the Orchestra seems to have excited the same interest in Philadelphia that it has elsewhere. Dr. Muck has elected to play at this concert the program with which he opened his season in Boston on the 11th and 12th of October. This program comprises the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven; the "Roman Carnival" Overture of Berlioz; the "Mazeppa" symphonic poem of Liszt, and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" of Wagner.

From EVE. JOURNAL
Address New York City.
Date OCT 30 1912

The programmes for the first pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York, on November 7 and 9 at Carnegie Hall, under Dr. Carl Muck, have been announced. On the Thursday evening Dr. Muck will play the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, the Berlioz "Roman Carnival" overture, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppt," and the "Mesitersinger" prelude. On the Saturday afternoon Bischoff's symphony in E. Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Webber's "Euryanthe" overture will be heard.

The fifteenth season of the

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date OCT 27 1912

Washington is to have the pleasure of hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Karl Muck again its conductor, at the National Theater, Tuesday afternoon, November 5, at 4:30 o'clock, under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

This great musical organization has the good fortune to begin its thirty-second year with the return of Dr. Muck, for which Boston has reason for self-congratulation. That music lovers of that city appreciate their good fortune was fully exemplified at the first two recitals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, early in October. A most affecing instance was the spontaneous action of Mr. Higginson, the honored patron and supporter of the orchestra, when he walked to the stage and extended his hand over the footlights in silent greeting to the great conductor.

Dr. Muck began his academic education at Heidelberg, which he finished at Leipsic, while studying music under Richter and Reinecke. Before coming to America he had conducted orchestras in Zurich, Salsburg, Gratz, Prague, and Berlin. Dr. Muck is a great conductor, whose influence over his orchestra is powerful. He is of a distinguished rather than commanding personality, a simple, unaffected man whose quiet gestures wield a mysterious magic over his players. His genius lies in great imaginative powers, a subtle sense of the composer's meanings, from the broadest to the most delicate, most elusive, combining emotional feeling with intellectual restraint, having patience for the most minute details, poetic insight, and mental balance.

One is at a loss to say wherein lies his greatest skill—in the perfect balance of the instruments, the splendid surge and rush of a tumultuous crescendo, or the fluttering breath of a pianissimo. He is a masterly interpreter for a great orchestra.

From BULLETIN
Address PHILADELPHIA PA
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its twenty-seventh consecutive season of concerts in this city on Monday evening, November 4, with the largest subscription it has had here in many years. The return of Dr. Muck to the leadership seems to have excited the same interest in Philadelphia that it has elsewhere. Dr. Muck has elected to play at this concert the program with which he opened his season in Boston a fortnight ago. It comprises the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven; the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz; the "Mazeppa" symphonis poem of Liszt and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," by Wagner.

From EVG. SUN
Address: New York
Date OCT 29 1912

New York's first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Nov. 7 in Carnegie Hall repeats Dr. Muck's first programme at the Hub the other day, Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Berlioz's "Roman Carnival," Liszt's "Mazeppa" and Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers."

Dr. Muck's first Saturday matinée here comprises Bischoff's symphony in E major, the "Siegfried Idyl" of Wagner and the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber.

From [illegible]
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date OCT 27 1912

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual series of five evening concerts in the Academy of Music during the coming season on Monday

UNDAY, OCTOBER

venings, November 4, December 2, anuary 6, February 17 and March 17. Dr. Karl Muck will resume the post of conductor after an absence of four years. The list of soloists includes Mme. Matzenauer, the eminent contralto of the Metropolitan Opera, and Fritz Kreisler, who comes to America this season under an exclusive contract with the [illegible] Symphony Orchestra.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 27 1912

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its twenty-seventh consecutive season of concerts in Philadelphia on Monday evening, November 4. Subscription is the largest in this city in many years. The return of Dr. Karl Muck to the leadership of the orchestra seems to have aroused the same interest in Philadelphia that it has elsewhere. Dr. Muck will play at this concert the program with which he opened his sea-

---

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 27 1912

When Dr. Muck brings the Boston Orchestra here in November the major portion of the evening will be devoted to the playing of the Bischoff symphony in E major, which the famous conductor first introduced to America about five years ago and which he is said to regard as one of the most important of modern compositions, not only because of its melodic significance, but because it requires so much virtuosity on the part of the individual members of the orchestra.

TELEPHONE, 929 CHELSEA

Intended for Boston Orchestra

"O wad some power the giftie gie us
To see oursel's as others see us"

HENRY ROMEIKE,
106-110 Seventh Ave., N. Y. City
CABLE ADDRESS:
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From NATION
Address: New York City.
Date

Music

Boston Symphony Orchestra Programmes. With Historical and Descriptive Notes by Philip Hale. Boston: C. A. Ellis.

The bound volume containing the home programmes for 1911-1912 of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a book of 1,594 pages. More than half of these pages are filled with advertisements. Now that this orchestra has become so popular and prosperous, it is to be hoped that these advertisements may soon be printed and paged separately from the reading matter, so that they need not be bound up with it. The programmes themselves thoroughly deserve being bound and preserved. They contain a good deal of valuable reading matter in addition to Mr. Hale's erudite yet entertaining and sane notes on the pieces played at the season's twenty-four concerts. Each of the programmes has a footnote imparting the information that there will be an intermission of ten minutes after the symphony. In order that the Boston music-lover's mind may not be arrested in its quest of culture even during that brief interval of time, Mr. Hale always provides a literary entr'acte, consisting either of an article on some general musical topic from his own workshop, or else, and more frequently, a paper reprinted from some English or American periodical. This Programme Book thus comes once a year as a life-preserver for a good deal that is valuable in contemporary journalistic literature.

Mr. Hale himself descants on Beethoven the Pianist, The Beginning of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Bruckner, Color, Tonal and Colored Audition, Works of Liszt Played by the Boston Orchestra, Salome and Her Dance, The Triangle, Wagner's Account of Himself. Mr. Hale's predecessor, W. F. Apthorp, provides interesting reminiscences of earlier years of the Boston Orchestra. Barry writes about Liszt and the Symphonic Poem; Newman on Bantock, Wallace, and Elgar's Second Symphony; Runciman on England's Lack of Great Musicians and on Brünnhilde's Self-Immolation, on which subject Bernard Shaw is also quoted. Of special interest are the reprints from the London Times of papers on Cathedral Festivals, A Chopin Relic, Humor and Quotation, Mannerisms, Musical Patriotism, Post-Wagnerian Opera, Science and Singing. A good index makes it easy to find what one happens to be interested in, and this index also embraces those incidental references and footnotes which are a specialty of Mr. Hale's and many of which contain information hard to find elsewhere.

French music is a particular object of Mr. Hale's admiration; he keeps his eyes open for everything relating to it, and no one who gets this annual record is likely to miss anything of importance. While Saint-Saëns towers high above all French composers of the day, the most prominent of them, and the most widely discussed, is Debussy. Under the head of "Cor and Debussy" Mr. Hale gives a bird's-eye view of contemporary French and German opinion on this exotic composer. An article from the pen of Raphael Cor entitled "M. Claude Debussy et le Snobisme Contemporain" aroused a good deal of discussion. The Revue du Temps Présent, in which this article appeared, thereupon sent a circular to a number of prominent European musicians, asking them to answer certain questions relating to that composer. Thirty of the answers were printed in a small volume which M. Debussy must have read with mingled feelings of pride and indignation. What he read, among many other things, was that he is a musician without parallel; that he is original, but only negatively so: "take away from music rhythm, melody, and emotion, and you have defined Debussy's musical works." The monotony of his music "stupifies the hearer." It leads to reveries; it is a mosaic of chords; the passionate admiration of it is in Paris "a disease of the season, or a crisis." There are many vain imitations of it—childish apings. He was just the man to work in sympathy with Maeterlinck, the "Shakespeare for snobs." Among the thirty whose answers are printed in the volume referred to are Siegfried Wagner, who says regarding "Pelléas et Mélisande": "I heard only one act, and no one should judge after one act." Another composer, Reynaldo Hahn, wrote that, while he held Debussy in high honor, he was not a Debussyite, and regarded Debussyites as unfortunate persons. Paul Flat agreed with M. Cor that there is "an enormous part of snobbism and bluff" in the reputation of Debussy. The most amusing thing in the volume is a remark contributed by Romain Rolland, whose novel in nine volumes, "Jean Christophe," has found so many readers and admirers. In answer to the question whether Debussy is likely to found a school, he writes: "Every great artist has a school. Every school is injurious. Would it not, then, be better if there were no great artists?"

[60]

From NATION
Address: New York City.
Date OCT 31 1912

The first pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 7, and Saturday afternoon, November 9. The programme for the first concert comprises the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, the "Roman Carnival" Overture of Berlioz, the "Mazeppa" symphonic poem of Liszt, and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The programme for Saturday afternoon includes Bischoff's symphony in E major, the "Siegfried Idyl" of Wagner, and the "Euryanthe" Overture of Weber.

1884

From EVO. SUN
Address: New York
Date NOV 2 - 1912

After four years' absence, Karl Muck, the Kaiser's own Berlin conductor, will make his reappearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York next week. He has chosen to repeat Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall, and Friday in Brooklyn, the music played at his return to Boston last month.

Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony shares the honors with Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, Liszt's "Mazeppa's Ride" and Wagner's prelude to "Meistersinger."

Est 1884

From EVO. MAIL
Address: New York.
Date NOV 2 - 1912

EARLY ORCHESTRA CONCERTS.

Dr. Muck will make his reappearance after an absence of four years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The programme for the evening concert will open with the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven and include "Roman Carnival" of Berlioz, Liszt's "Mazeppa" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers" of Wagner. Saturday afternoon Dr. Muck will offer the symphony in E major, by Hermann Bischoff.

k, 1884

NOVMEBER 3,

POST

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ON FIRST SOUTHERN TRIP

The Symphony Orchestra leaves tonight for the first Southern trip of the season. Monday night it plays in Philadelphia, Tuesday afternoon in Washington, Wednesday evening in Baltimore, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in New York and Friday evening in Brooklyn. The eagerness of the musical public of these cities to hear the orchestra has never been so keen as this year. In New York, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington the houses are sold out by subscription for the season. In Philadelphia there is very little left and full houses will be the rule in that city as in the others. Dr. Muck will conduct the programme of his first Boston concert this season in Philadelphia and on Thursday evening in New York. In Baltimore and on Saturday afternoon in New York he will play the third Boston programme—the Bischoff symphony, the "Siegfried Idyll," the "Euryanthe" overture, and in Washington and Brooklyn he will play the eighth symphony of Beethoven and the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz, Liszt's "Mazeppa" symphonic poem and the "Meistersinger" prelude of Wagner, which were on the first Boston programme.

The fifth Boston concert will bring Sibelius' first symphony, which has been heard in Boston but once and then under Dr. Muck's leadership; Glazounoff's "Overture Solennelle"; Tschaikowsky's seldom heard G-Major concerto for piano and Chabrier's "Espana" rhapsodie. Mr. George Proctor will be the soloist.

SUNDAY GLOBE-
NOVEMBER 3,

Pension Fund Concert.

The pension fund concert of the Symphony Orchestra to be given in Symphony Hall Sunday evening, Nov 17, will comprise practically a complete review of the different styles of Richard Wagner, for Dr Muck will repeat with one change the program that he gave twice at the pension fund concerts in the season of 1906-'07.

It comprises seven overtures and preludes and the "Funeral Music" from the third act of "Gotterdammerung." From "Rienzi" the program goes to "The Flying Dutchman." Instead, however, of the formal "Tannhauser" overture, which is seldom played now except for concert use, Dr Muck will use the Paris version of the opera, playing that part of the original overture that is used as an introduction to the opera and running into the "Venus[illegible]

The second part of the program will comprise in order the preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristan" and the "Meistersinger," the "Funeral Music" from "Gotterdammerung," and, finally, the prelude to "Parsifal."

First Southern Trip of the Symphony Orchestra

The Symphony Orchestra leaves tonight for the first Southern trip of the season. Monday night it plays in Philadelphia, Tuesday afternoon in Washington, Wednesday evening in Baltimore, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in New York and Friday evening in Brooklyn.

In New York, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington the houses are sold out by subscription for the season. In Philadelphia there is very little left, and full houses will be the rule in that city as in the others. The return of Dr Muck as conductor is regarded in New York as quite the most important musical event of the season.

The fifth Boston concert will bring Sibelius' First Symphony, which has been heard in Boston but once and then under Dr Muck's leadership; Glazounoff's "Overture Solennelle"; Tschaikowsky's seldom heard G-major concerto for piano, and Chabrier's "Espana" Rhapsodie. Mr George Proctor will be the soloist.

TRANSCRIPT, NOVEMBER 2,

Boston's Wagner Starvation

An Acute Case and the Remedy

By H. T. P.

YESTERDAY afternoon in the person and the voice of Mr. Herbert Wilberspoon, Wotan sang in Symphony Hall the music that Wagner wrote for him in the final scene of "Die Walküre." Therein he condemns Brünnhilde to her sleep, upon the fire-girt rock until the freer hero shall come to awake her. Therein he takes sorrowful and noble farewell of her, lays her to rest, invokes Loge, the fire god, to raise the circle of flame, sees it rise, dart, expand until it fills all the horizon; stands for an instant silhouetted in gloomy meditation against it, and then strides away into the surrounding darkness. The scene stirs the emotions and holds the imagination of those that look and listen as do few episodes in the whole course of the "Ring" operas. It does so by a triple suggestion and stimulation—through the music, through the visible action, through the picture and the play of light upon the stage. The scene happens also to be the climax, prepared from afar by Wagner's masterful hand, of the three acts that make "Die Walküre." For three hours he has been leading his audience toward it.

"Concert Wagner"

The scene was the climax and the end, yesterday, not of "Die Walküre," but of a Symphony Concert. Wotan, in formal "afternoon dress," stood between orchestra and audience and, having put his glasses in his pocket, sang the speeches of sentence, farewell and invocation. His eloquence lay wholly in his tone. He could not stir a muscle, he could hardly alter a glance of his eye. He stood still while the orchestra laid Brünnhilde to sleep. Out of the orchestra, sprang the curtain of fire, though what the audience saw was the cold, gray and gold organ of Symphony Hall. The music ended and Wotan, bowing appreciatively to hearty applause, politely walked from the platform. There was no vision of the mournful, brooding, solitary god, standing grim and silent between the flames before he took up again the burden of even celestial existence. Two weeks, hence, in that same Symphony Hall, we shall hear Dr. Muck and the orchestra play the overtures and preludes to five or six of Wagner's music-dramas. They will play them dramatically, thrillingly, expectantly; but upon none of them will the curtain rise. We shall hear the orchestra glorify the dead Siegfried, but we shall see naught of the hero-life out of which the tonal apotheosis has been wrought. We shall hear the music of the Venusberg in "Tannhäuser," but we shall see none of the imaginative pictures with which a few German opera houses—though not our own Metropolitan—accompany it. Doubtless there will be more "Wagner Concerts" in Boston in the course of the winter and they will shift his music of the theatre plentifully into the circumstances of the concert-room for which it was never designed, and of which in substance and spirit it is often the antithesis. Some time in February, for three evenings and one matinée, we shall see and hear "Tristan" performed in its true place and in its due integrity, under Mr. Weingartner on the stage of the Boston Opera House. For a whole musical year, these four performances will be the beginning and the end of our Wagner in the theatre.

Anomaly and Absurdity

The anomaly, the absurdity of the situation speaks for itself. We like to call Boston a musical capital; we are unquestionably the second city in musical activity and importance in America. We have our opera house, our Symphony Concerts, our swarm of miscellaneous concerts and recitals. It is the custom to characterize our opera-going and concert-going public, our musical world in general, as intelligent, interested, eager, able to encourage music and to gratify its likings. And in a whole musical year, we shall hear one music-drama of Wagner, thrice or four times performed at our opera house. For the rest, the Symphony Orchestra will play the overtures, the preludes and such excerpts from the music-dramas as the doubting Muck can be persuaded to venture, under the conditions of the concert-room. The conductor is unquestionably right in his refusal to put such fragments on his programmes inasmuch as they were written for the theatre, depend for a part of their effect upon conditions of the theatre and are integral parts of a continuous drama. But we poor Bostonians can hear them nowhere else than in the concert-hall unless we journey to the Metropolitan in New York or take our summer pleasure in European opera houses.

Little German cities of half the size and half the pretensions of Boston as a musical capital hear ten times as much of Wagner's music in a year as do we—and in its proper place, the theatre. We have not heard the four "Ring" operas in sequence since the spring of 1888. "Das Rheingold," which has been in existence for forty years, has actually been represented twice—in a single fortnight in that same spring—in this town. New York has its annual "Ring" cycles; so does Paris, London, and many another city. "Die Meistersinger," "Siegfried," "Götterdämmerung" are still little known operas here. New York hears Wagner's operas almost to surfeit; Philadelphia and Chicago listen to them on frequent occasion; Boston alone of the musical capitals of America, hears them in fortuitous and highly intermittent opportunity. Of all the greater composers, Wagner is the least known in this town by actual performance of his music. Yet even when it is played "in concert form" the audience fills the hall.

The Actual Situation

Responsibility for these conditions does not lie in our Opera House. It maintains an Italian company, because the tastes of its public seems most to crave Italian opera. It maintains a French company, because French opera is of next importance in its repertory and ambitions and in the seeming inclinations of its public. It would willingly maintain a German company for the performance of Wagner's operas had it the financial means so to do. Even the richer Metropolitan maintains only two companies—an Italian and a German. It has no real French contingent. American audiences expect Wagner's operas to be performed in German by Germans, plus perhaps a few international singers, especially expert in them. The Boston Opera has not the financial resources to maintain a German contingent, and it is not likely to have them unless increased public patronage or opportune private beneficence supplies them. It is doing much in the conditions under which it labors, to keep "Tristan" in its active repertory in such German performances. For future seasons, no more can be reasonably expected of it than the addition to its repertory of one or another of the easier operas of Wagner—until it is able to maintain a full German company, conductor, singers and chorus. In years past, the company of the Metropolitan has visited Boston and included two or three representations of Wagner's operas in its performances. These visits are now definitively at an end. We can expect no Wagner from the Metropolitan—until the remote day of operatic wisdom shall come in which one able German company shall suffice for all the German opera of New York, Chicago and Boston, passing for long stays from city to city—all of which is milenial vision. What we may do to establish Wagner's operas in Boston, we must now do for ourselves.

The Vision of a Festival

In a decade, perhaps, if all goes well at the Boston Opera House and its resources gradually increase, Wagner's operas will come one by one to its stage. Meantime, we shall go fasting or sit down before the meagre and infrequent Wagnerian repasts that opera house and concert-room now afford us. There ought to be some more immediate relief from our present state of Wagnerian starvation. One relief the director of the Opera House suggested last summer, as others have suggested it before him. Since we cannot hear the operas of Wagner regularly, why might we not hear them in occasional festival—say as a prelude or a postlude to our musical season? Imagine a company of German singers, assembled for the purpose, from German stages, from the Metropolitan, from any theatre that provided able singing-players. Imagine performances that should include a "Ring" cycle, "Tristan" and "Die Meistersinger." Imagine the preparation and the accomplishment of them confided to Dr. Muck or to Mr. Weingartner, acknowledged masters in Wagnerian conducting and staging. Imagine these operas set upon the stage of the Opera House with all the vision and resource of the newer German arts. Imagine a chorus and orchestra as good as careful selection and long preparation could make them. Imagine, in fine, such a Wagner Festival of, in and for Boston. The standards of performance need not fall below those of the Wagner Festivals at Munich, celebrated the world over. They might easily be higher. The prestige of the festival might in time become as great. The musical and the operatic glory of the city would wax accordingly; while at last our days of starvation would be ended. Surfeit and gorging might replace it, but at least we should be hearing Wagner's operas in their integrity and we should be hearing them in the theatre for which the highly theatrical Wagner designed them. Imagine a cycle of "The Ring," two performances of "Tristan" and, say, two of "Die Meistersinger" spread over an auspicious fortnight. Maybe it is beatific vision, but once and again even in this uncertain world, beatitude comes to realization.

Resources and Co-ordination

Where there is a will, there is a way—even in things operatic and in visions as remote as that of a Boston Wagner Festival. Here in America and at hand, we have the able German contingent of the Metropolitan Company irregularly but by no means fully employed in the months it spends in New York. Under present operatic conditions, eminent singers come readily to America for short visits—if a manager will pay their fees. The Boston Opera House excels any theatre, lyric or dramatic in America, in its scenic resources and in the skilful, imaginatve and illusive use of them. In time, it could evolve very beautiful, significant and atmospheric settings of Wagner's music-dramas. Meantime, the settings of the Metropolitan, good, bad and indifferent, might supply immediate need.

At no very distant time Mr. Weingartner may come for a whole season to the Boston Opera House, and he is an expert and experienced conducter in Wagner festivals. Here will dwell for five years to come Dr. Muck, a master in his turn in the conducting of Wagner's music and the ordering of Wagner's operas on the stage. True, his work with the Symphony Orchestra engrosses him; but he may yet long again for the flesh-pots of operatic conducting. And in the Symphony Orchestra itself, though it does lack operatic experience, is a band for a Wagner Festival that even Baireuth could not match. German choruses, such as "Die Meistersinger" or "Tannhäuser" exact, are not impossible to assemble and train, even from the material Boston could afford. The lack is a general—a general who could coördinate all these elements into a single force that could achieve the festival. On the programme and the posters he would be the manager. Maybe there are one or two, here in Boston at this very hour, capable of even so difficult an undertaking.

From NATION
Address: New York City.
Date OCT 31 1912

The first pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 7, and Saturday afternoon, November 9. The programme for the first concert comprises the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, the "Roman Carnival" Overture of Berlioz, the "Mazeppa" symphonic poem of Liszt, and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The programme for Saturday afternoon includes Bischoff's symphony in E major, the "Siegfried Idyl" of Wagner, and the "Euryanthe" Overture of Weber.

1884

From EVG. SUN
Address: New York
Date NOV 2 1912

After four years' absence, Karl Muck, the Kaiser's own Berlin conductor, will make his reappearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York next week. He has chosen to repeat Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall, and Friday in Brooklyn, the music played at his return to Boston last month.

Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony shares the honors with Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, Liszt's "Mazeppa's Ride" and Wagner's prelude to "Meistersinger."

Est 884

From EVG. MAIL
Address: New York.
Date NOV 2 1912

EARLY ORCHESTRA CONCERTS.

Dr. Muck will make his reappearance after an absence of four years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The programme for the evening concert will open with the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven and include "Roman Carnival" of Berlioz, Liszt's "Mazeppa" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers" of Wagner. Saturday afternoon Dr. Muck will offer the symphony in E major, by Hermann Bischoff.

k, 1884

NOVMEBER 3,

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ON FIRST SOUTHERN TRIP

The Symphony Orchestra leaves tonight for the first Southern trip of the season. Monday night it plays in Philadelphia, Tuesday afternoon in Washington, Wednesday evening in Baltimore, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in New York and Friday evening in Brooklyn. The eagerness of the musical public of these cities to hear the orchestra has never been so keen as this year. In New York, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington the houses are sold out by subscription for the season. In Philadelphia there is very little left and full houses will be the rule in that city as in the others. Dr. Muck will conduct the programme of his first Boston concert this season in Philadelphia and on Thursday evening in New York. In Baltimore and on Saturday afternoon in New York he will play the third Boston programme—the Bischoff symphony, the "Siegfried Idyll," the "Euryanthe" overture, and in Washington and Brooklyn he will play the eighth symphony of Beethoven and the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz, Liszt's "Mazeppa" symphonic poem and the "Meistersinger" prelude of Wagner, which were on the first Boston programme.

The fifth Boston concert will bring Sibelius' first symphony, which has been heard in Boston but once and then under Dr. Muck's leadership; Glazounoff's "Overture Solennelle"; Tschaikowsky's seldom heard G-Major concerto for piano and Chabrier's "Espana" rhapsodie. Mr. George Proctor will be the soloist.

SUNDAY GLOBE--NOVEMBER 3,

Pension Fund Concert.

The pension fund concert of the Symphony Orchestra to be given in Symphony Hall Sunday evening, Nov 17, will comprise practically a complete review of the different styles of Richard Wagner, for Dr Muck will repeat with one change the program that he gave twice at the pension fund concerts in the season of 1906-'07.

It comprises seven overtures and preludes, and the "Funeral Music" from the third act of "Gotterdammerung." From "Rienzi" the program goes to "The Flying Dutchman." Instead, however, of the formal "Tannhauser" overture, which is seldom played now except for concert use, Dr Muck will use the Paris version of the opera, playing that part of the original overture that is used as an introduction to the opera and running into the "Venusberg" music.

The second part of the program will comprise in order the preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristan" and the "Meistersingers"; the "Funeral Music" from "Gotterdammerung," and, finally, the prelude to "Parsifal."

First Southern Trip of the Symphony Orchestra

The Symphony Orchestra leaves tonight for the first Southern trip of the season. Monday night it plays in Philadelphia, Tuesday afternoon in Washington, Wednesday evening in Baltimore, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in New York and Friday evening in Brooklyn.

In New York, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington the houses are sold out by subscription for the season. In Philadelphia there is very little left, and full houses will be the rule in that city as in the others. The return of Dr Muck as conductor is regarded in New York as quite the most important musical event of the season.

The fifth Boston concert will bring Sibelius' First Symphony, which has been heard in Boston but once and then under Dr Muck's leadership; Glazounoff's "Overture Solennelle"; Tschaikowsky's seldom heard G-major concerto for piano, and Chabrier's "Espana" Rhapsodie. Mr George Proctor will be the soloist.

TRANSCRIPT, NOVEMBER 2,

Boston's Wagner Starvation

An Acute Case and the Remedy

By H. T. P.

YESTERDAY afternoon in the person and the voice of Mr. Herbert Wilberspoon, Wotan sang in Symphony Hall the music that Wagner wrote for him in the final scene of "Die Walküre." Therein he condemns Brünnhilde to her sleep, upon the fire-girt rock until the freer hero shall come to awake her. Therein he takes sorrowful and noble farewell of her, lays her to rest, invokes Loge, the fire god, to raise the circle of flame, sees it rise, dart, expand until it fills all the horizon; stands for an instant silhouetted in gloomy meditation against it, and then strides away into the surrounding darkness. The scene stirs the emotions and holds the imagination of those that look and listen as do few episodes in the whole course of the "Ring" operas. It does so by a triple suggestion and stimulation—through the music, through the visible action, through the picture and the play of light upon the stage. The scene happens also to be the climax, prepared from afar by Wagner's masterful hand, of the three acts that make "Die Walküre." For three hours he has been leading his audience toward it.

"Concert Wagner"

The scene was the climax and the end, yesterday, not of "Die Walküre," but of a Symphony Concert. Wotan, in formal "afternoon dress," stood between orchestra and audience and, having put his glasses in his pocket, sang the speeches of sentence, farewell and invocation. His eloquence lay wholly in his tone. He could not stir a muscle, he could hardly alter a glance of his eye. He stood still while the orchestra laid Brünnhilde to sleep. Out of the orchestra, sprang the curtain of fire, though what the audience saw was the cold, gray and gold organ of Symphony Hall. The music ended and Wotan, bowing appreciatively to hearty applause, politely walked from the platform. There was no vision of the mournful, brooding, solitary god, standing grim and silent between the flames before he took up again the burden of even celestial existence. Two weeks, hence, in that same Symphony Hall, we shall hear Dr. Muck and the orchestra play the overtures and preludes to five or six of Wagner's music-dramas. They will play them dramatically, thrillingly, expectantly; but upon none of them will the curtain rise. We shall hear the orchestra glorify the dead Siegfried, but we shall see naught of the hero-life out of which the tonal apotheosis has been wrought. We shall hear the music of the Venusberg in "Tannhäuser," but we shall see none of the imaginative pictures with which a few German opera houses—though not our own Metropolitan—accompany it. Doubtless there will be more "Wagner Concerts" in Boston in the course of the winter and they will shift his music of the theatre plentifully into the circumstances of the concert-room for which it was never designed, and of which in substance and spirit it is often the antithesis. Some time in February, for three evenings and one matinée, we shall see and hear "Tristan" performed in its true place and in its due integrity, under Mr. Weingartner on the stage of the Boston Opera House. For a whole musical year, these four performances will be the beginning and the end of our Wagner in the theatre.

Anomaly and Absurdity

The anomaly, the absurdity of the situation speaks for itself. We like to call Boston a musical capital; we are unquestionably the second city in musical activity and importance in America. We have our opera house, our Symphony Concerts, our swarm of miscellaneous concerts and recitals. It is the custom to characterize our opera-going and concert-going public, our musical world in general, as intelligent, interested, eager, able to encourage music and to gratify its likings. And in a whole musical year, we shall hear one music-drama of Wagner, thrice or four times performed at our opera house. For the rest, the Symphony Orchestra will play the overtures, the preludes and such excerpts from the music-dramas as the doubting Muck can be persuaded to venture, under the conditions of the concert-room. The conductor is unquestionably right in his refusal to put such fragments on his programmes inasmuch as they were written for the theatre, depend for a part of their effect upon conditions of the theatre and are integral parts of a continuous drama. But we poor Bostonians can hear them nowhere else than in the concert-hall unless we journey to the Metropolitan in New York or take our summer pleasure in European opera houses.

Little German cities of half the size and half the pretensions of Boston as a musical capital hear ten times as much of Wagner's music in a year as do we—and in its proper place, the theatre. We have not heard the four "Ring" operas in sequence since the spring of 1888. "Das Rheingold," which has been in existence for forty years, has actually been represented twice—in a single fortnight in that same spring—in this town. New York has its annual "Ring" cycles; so does Paris, London, and many another city. "Die Meistersinger," "Siegfried," "Götterdämmerung" are still little known operas here. New York hears Wagner's operas almost to surfeit; Philadelphia and Chicago listen to them on frequent occasion; Boston alone of the musical capitals of America, hears them in fortuitous and highly intermittent opportunity. Of all the greater composers, Wagner is the least known in this town by actual performance of his music. Yet even when it is played "in concert form" the audience fills the hall.

The Actual Situation

Responsibility for these conditions does not lie in our Opera House. It maintains an Italian company, because the tastes of its public seems most to crave Italian opera. It maintains a French company, because French opera is of next importance in its repertory and ambitions and in the seeming inclinations of its public. It would willingly maintain a German company for the performance of Wagner's operas had it the financial means so to do. Even the richer Metropolitan maintains only two companies—an Italian and a German. It has no real French contingent. American audiences expect Wagner's operas to be performed in German by Germans, plus perhaps a few international singers, especially expert in them. The Boston Opera has not the financial resources to maintain a German contingent, and it is not likely to have them unless increased public patronage or opportune private beneficence supplies them. It is doing much in the conditions under which it labors, to keep "Tristan" in its active repertory in such German performances. For future seasons, no more can be reasonably expected of it than the addition to its repertory of one or another of the easier operas of Wagner—until it is able to maintain a full German company, conductor, singers and chorus. In years past, the company of the Metropolitan has visited Boston and included two or three representations of Wagner's operas in its performances. These visits are now definitively at an end. We can expect no Wagner from the Metropolitan—until the remote day of operatic wisdom shall come in which one able German company shall suffice for all the German opera of New York, Chicago and Boston, passing for long stays from city to city—all of which is millenial vision. What we may do to establish Wagner's operas in Boston, we must now do for ourselves.

The Vision of a Festival

In a decade, perhaps, if all goes well at the Boston Opera House and its resources gradually increase, Wagner's operas will come one by one to its stage. Meantime, we shall go fasting or sit down before the meagre and infrequent Wagnerian repasts that opera house and concert-room now afford us. There ought to be some more immediate relief from our present state of Wagnerian starvation. One relief the director of the Opera House suggested last summer, as others have suggested it before him. Since we cannot hear the operas of Wagner regularly, why might we not hear them in occasional festival—say as a prelude or a postlude to our musical season? Imagine a company of German singers, assembled for the purpose, from German stages, from the Metropolitan, from any theatre that provided able singing-players. Imagine performances that should include a "Ring" cycle, "Tristan" and "Die Meistersinger." Imagine the preparation and the accomplishment of them confided to Dr. Muck or to Mr. Weingartner, acknowledged masters in Wagnerian conducting and staging. Imagine these operas set upon the stage of the Opera House with all the vision and resource of the newer German arts. Imagine a chorus and orchestra as good as careful selection and long preparation could make them. Imagine, in fine, such a Wagner Festival of, in and for Boston. The standards of performance need not fall below those of the Wagner Festivals at Munich, celebrated the world over. They might easily be higher. The prestige of the festival might in time become as great. The musical and the operatic glory of the city would wax accordingly; while at last our days of starvation would be ended. Surfeit and gorging might replace it, but at least we should be hearing Wagner's operas in their integrity and we should be hearing them in the theatre for which the highly theatrical Wagner designed them. Imagine a cycle of "The Ring," two performances of "Tristan" and, say, two of "Die Meistersinger" spread over an auspicious fortnight. Maybe it is beatific vision, but once and again even in this uncertain world, beatitude comes to realization.

Resources and Co-ordination

Where there is a will, there is a way—even in things operatic and in visions as remote as that of a Boston Wagner Festival. Here in America and at hand, we have the able German contingent of the Metropolitan Company irregularly but by no means fully employed in the months it spends in New York. Under present operatic conditions, eminent singers come readily to America for short visits—if a manager will pay their fees. The Boston Opera House excels any theatre, lyric or dramatic in America, in its scenic resources and in the skilful, imaginatve and illusive use of them. In time, it could evolve very beautiful, significant and atmospheric settings of Wagner's music-dramas. Meantime, the settings of the Metropolitan, good, bad and indifferent, might supply immediate need.

At no very distant time Mr. Weingartner may come for a whole season to the Boston Opera House, and he is an expert and experienced conductor in Wagner festivals. Here will dwell for five years to come Dr. Muck, a master in his turn in the conducting of Wagner's music and the ordering of Wagner's operas on the stage. True, his work with the Symphony Orchestra engrosses him; but he may yet long again for the flesh-pots of operatic conducting. And in the Symphony Orchestra itself, though it does lack operatic experience, is a band for a Wagner Festival that even Baireuth could not match. German choruses, such as "Die Meistersinger" or "Tannhäuser" exact, are not impossible to assemble and train, even from the material Boston could afford. The lack is a general—a general who could coördinate all these elements into a single force that could achieve the festival. On the programme and the posters he would be the manager. Maybe there are one or two, here in Boston at this very hour, capable of even so difficult an undertaking.

The Mood of the Public

The public would have its responsibilities, its great responsibilities, since without its support there could be no such festival. It fills the hall, equally in high-priced or low-priced places, whenever there is a "Wagner concert" in this town. A considerable "Wagner number" on the programme of the Symphony Concerts brings inquiries to the box office of Symphony Hall. The performances of "Tristan" last winter drew exceptionally large audiences and stirred them to warm applause, in spite of the handicap that the presence of Mme. Nordica in the cast laid upon them. Some of the German performances that the Metropolitan company has undertaken here have been well attended—and some have not. In public and in private, there is constant regret that Wagner's operas cannot be heard regularly in Boston. Some of this repining, given the opportunity, would surely translate itself into action. Possibly the less-well-to-do are more eager for Wagner than the more fortunate spending money and in social significance. Provide them, then, with the more seats within their means. Besides, not Boston only, but the whole of New England might be stirred to interest in a Wagner festival and to attendance upon it. Pilgrimages to such sites are frequent and general enough in Europe. They ought not to be out of the reckoning in America. When the general of prescient vision organizes our Wagner Festival he will spare not one of his managerial resources in preliminary advertising. Wagner himself, who was expert in such arts, would do likewise.

THE COMING PLAYS

Kitty Gordon and "The Enchantress" at the Colonial—Clifton Crawford and "My Best Girl" at the Boston—"Bought and Paid For," a Week Later—"The Merry Widow" Again

Monday, Nov. 11

At the Colonial—"The Enchantress," with Kitty Gordon, Victor Herbert and Harry B. Smith's operetta of last season. A woman of an opera house is set to ensnare a prince of the blood royal in order that he may abdicate the throne and bring a long course of amorous adventure to end and climax. He is ensnared; he is ready to abdicate; but "the enchantress" loves him so well and so truly that she will not suffer him to marry her until she has been opportunely proved of noble family and so meet to rise with him to the throne. The music is in Mr. Herbert's characteristic vein.

At the Boston—"My Best Girl," with Clifton Crawford. A musical play of the mishaps of a light-headed and light-hearted young man who exchanges identity with a deserter from the army. There is more plot than is usual in such pieces and comic sayings and well-turned rhymes along the way. Mr. Crawford has a characteristic part.

At the Majestic—"The Merry Widow," longest lived and best remembered of recent Viennese operettas, now performed by one of Mr. Savage's touring companies.

Monday, Nov. 18

At the Shubert—"Bought and Paid For," with Messrs. Richman and Craven, Miss Dean and the whole of the original cast. On its serious side the play follows the disillusion and stress of a wife who has married in poverty a rich and coarse-fibred husband who abuses her. On its comic side, it follows the social aspirations of a queer but better-mated couple. The piece is a mixture of these interests. The personages are recognizable types out of the life of New York and the whole is well acted.

At the Hollis—"Passers-By," with Charles Cherry. Haddon Chambers's "sympathetic" comedy of the young aristocrat who studies cabbies and street tramps only to meet romance.

At the St. James—For matinées on each day but Saturday, "Don," Rudolf Besier's delightful, whimsical and moving comedy of a Quixotic poet who rescues a young wife from her abusive husband and innocently takes her into his parents' home, where his own fiancée is staying.

At the Castle Square—"Madame X," the hectic and familiar French melodrama of the long-lost mother who turns up in the prisoner's dock to be defended by her unwitting son.

MISS GENEE'S RETURN

The Dancer at Hand at the Opera House in Novel Pieces

A YEAR ago, last May, Adeline Genée the dancer, took what seemed to be final leave of her American public at the Colonial Theatre. Two weeks hence, on the evening of Saturday, Nov. 16, she will reappear for the first time in another American tour at the Boston Opera House. This time, Miss Genée comes as a dancer in her own right and not as the star of any musical play or as an adjunct to it. She will bring with her a little company of dancers that she has chosen herself, her own expert conductor, and scenery and dresses for the ballets in which she purposes to dance. For her reappearance here, they will be "La Camargo"; a piece of her own inventing that traverses the history of the dance; and fragments of the dances in Meyerbeer's old opera, "Robert the Devil." In "La Camargo," Miss Genée will mime the illustrious dancer of the days of Louis XV., who, in the episodes of the ballet, softens the heart of the king when he would punish an old playmate so that he yields to the charm of her intercession. In the scenes of her own piece, Miss Genée will illustrate the progress of the dance from simple rhythmic movements to a complex artistry. In the fragments of Meyerbeer's "Robert," she can prove the skill, the grace, the charm, that ally her above any dancer of our time, to the Taglioni and the Ellsler, who of old danced them.

American
Nov. 5, 1912

WAGNER MUSIC FOR PENSION CONCERTS

The Pension Fund concert of the Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, November 17, will comprise practically a complete review of the different styles of Richard Wagner, for Dr. Muck will repeat with one change the program that he gave twice at Pension Fund concerts in the season of 1906-07. It comprises seven overtures and preludes and the funeral music from the third act of "Gotterdammerung." From "Rienzi" the program goes to "The Flying Dutchman." Instead, however, of the formal "Tannhauser" overture, which is seldom played now except for concert use, Dr. Muck will use the Paris version of the opera, playing that part of the original overture that is used as an introduction to the opera and running into the Venusberg music. The second part of the program will comprise in order the preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristan," and the "Meistersingers," the funeral music from "Gotterdammerung" and finally the prelude to "Parsifal."

EVENING TRANSCRIPT
NOVEMBER 2,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A LIGHT PROGRAMME AND LIVELY PLEASURE

Dr. Muck's New Programme-Making—Mr. Witherspoon Sings and "Figaro's Wedding" and "Die Walkuere" Fare as Best They May in Concert—An Exhilarating Performance of Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and Musical Satisfaction from Bach

DR. MUCK has the reputation of system in his programme-making and so it is interesting to note that, in the four Symphony Concerts of the season thus far, he has alternated an afternoon of relatively light pieces with an afternoon of more exacting numbers. He has shown, besides, a curious disposition to revive the pieces that he put on his programmes during his first term in Boston and that his successor overlooked—Bischoff's symphony, for example, a week ago; Bach's suite for flute and strings yesterday; and Sibelius's symphony in E minor announced for the concerts a fortnight hence. The orchestra has played these pieces as though it shared the conductor's zeal for them, and the audiences have, seemingly, found much pleasure in them. In particular, they have liked the lighter programmes, and at every pause in the concert yesterday the applause was long, general and hearty. The playing, as well as the music, of Beethoven's eighth symphony amply warranted it. Mr. Maquarre earned his share of it by the feathery lightness of his tone in the coloratura passages for the solo flute in Bach's suite in E minor and by the warm or wistful voice that he gave it when the music turned it songful. The accompanying strings matched him in virtuosity, while Dr. Muck kept the whole performance at the poise wherein Bach could speak for himself and so conquer—even in music that is by no means of his masterpieces.

Mr. Witherspoon, the singer of the day, had his considerable portion of this applause, and for the most part deservedly. Like Mme. Rappold a fortnight ago, he is one of the capable but hardly distinguished singers of the Metropolitan Opera House, and the very exacting might doubt whether he or she quite deserves a call to the Symphony Concerts. In the case of Mr. Witherspoon, however, it was interesting to hear a male voice again, since "men singers" have been few and far between in recent years with the Symphony Orchestra. It was interesting also to hear a bass-baritone, instead of the more usual tenor of concerts, and a bass-baritone capable of such antithetical pieces as the gay air of Mozart in which Figaro mocks Cherubino away to the wars, and the sombre and impassioned declamation of Wotan when he lays Brünnhilde to sleep and commands the fire-god. Unless the listener has a lively recollection of the end of the first act of "Figaro's Wedding" and the final scene of "Die Walküre" and can see in imagination the valet chaffing the page around Susanna's chamber and the god with the valkyr in his arms or silhouetted against the encircling flames, both excerpts lose much by transfer to the concert-hall—and the more because each is a climax to all that has preceded it in the opera. After all, opera house and concert-room, especially with such a lyric comedy as "Figaro's Wedding" and such a music-drama as "Die Walküre," are wide apart.

Happily, Mr. Witherspoon, avoiding a misplaced fashion of the hour, did not attempt to illustrate either of his pieces with histrionic action, even putting a hand in his pocket as though he would check once and for all the possible gestures of the voluble Figaro. Less happily, a few phrases of the valet's air lay too high even for his elastic voice, and once or twice he lacked the power of sustained tone that Wotan's declamation exacts. He sang both fragments with a true sense of big and broad operatic style, of established mood and of telling details within it. He was adroit in his humorous emphases in Figaro's air and in his leadings of it into repetitions and refrain. As bass-baritone voices go, his tones were unusually elastic in such swift patter. In itself his voice lies agreeably betwixt and between the usual sorts of bass tones. There are deeper bass voices, though Mr. Witherspoon is to sing the almost subterranean music of Sarastro in the approaching revival of "The Magic Flute" at the Metropolitan, and there are bass voices of richer and smoother texture. On the whole, however, his is a pleasurable voice capably used. Had it been bigger—and here and there Mr. Witherspoon unwisely forced it—Wotan's farewell to Brünnhilde, would have had a larger sonority; while had their been more dramatizing imagination behind, it would have sounded with more mournful and brooding passion.

Careful and intelligent as he was; perhaps indeed because he was so painstaking and thoughtful, Mr. Witherspoon missed the impassioned and magnificent intensity of some of the great phrases. "Der freier als ich, der Gott" and "So küsst er die Gottheit von dir" came rather tamely off his tongue. Dr. Muck and the orchestra made amends, though the conductor did dutifully subordinate the volume of instrumental tone to the volume of the singer's voice. Perhaps, however, he had other and subtler purposes in the quiet intensity with which he ordered the orchestral part Without falling into langurous and overdrawn pace and emphasis, Dr. Muck dwelt upon the beautiful phrases of the music in which Wotan lays Brünnhilde upon the rock and upon the lovelier phrases still, when the god has departed; the orchestra has stilled his broodings, and the valkyr lies sleeping in the magic and mystery of her fire-girt solitude. It was this magic and mystery, this suggestion of remote solitude that Dr. Muck wrought into the music. Even the "great climax," when the assuaged Brünnhilde flings herself into Wotan's arms and for the last time he clasps her, had less of the theatre and more of sublimated passion than it usually gains.

Beethoven's symphony and Bach's suite yielded unalloyed pleasure, and in the symphony, in particular shone Dr. Muck's intuitive and practised skill in the finding of exactly the revealing and the characterizing pace and accent for music. It is the crowning faculty of a conductor; it is his heaven-sent divination. That same heaven knows that enough has been said in print and talk, almost these hundred years, about the proper pace for each movement of this "little" symphony. Dr. Muck's tempi were very brisk and his accentuation duly light, except where Beethoven in sheer exuberance of spirit and utterance is downright boisterous. Tempi and accentuation were elastic, too, and the symphony seemed to run itself off like a glowing and vigorous improvisation, springing from phrase to phrase in spontaneous sureness. There were rich moments of elastic turmoil; gay moments of dashing outburst; moments when the under-voices seemed to race and sport with each other; moments when the basses or the trumpets seemed to cut in like boys leaping into the playful ring. There was not a trace of slowness or pomposity in the minuet, since Dr. Muck wisely refused to take it with pedagogic seriousness. "Ta, ta, ta, lieber Mälzel" ticked the winds, as the legend goes, in the allegretto, while the strings sang gayly over them or the basses clucked into the tonal mass. At every moment and at every turn, there was rhythmic animation.

Even reiterated chords, which can be monotonous, though a Beethoven wrote them, usually had their exuberant tang. He himself seemed to be smiting the kettledrums in sheer exhilaration of spirit. And the quality of tone was as revealing and characteristic of the music as the pace. The strings whirred in transparent excitements; the wood winds twinkled out little phrases, sent their voices curling about the main song or even sang it themselves; the basses stamped into the game; or the whole orchestra swelled into the burst of sound, only to rush brightly away into some light transition. The whole piece and performance—was pure, spontaneous, exciting, musical joy.

Bach's suite gave a soberer pleasure, more truly perhaps a solid musical satisfaction, in spite of the exquisite lightness and elegance of Mr. Maquarre's flute-playing and the gay babble of the strings in the final movement, suddenly subdued as though intruding gravity had waved an authoritative hand over them and sent the chatter vanishing into the air. The clear, sharp string tone, full-throated yet many-voiced was good to hear in the little overture. None but Bach—unless it was Händel in his own day or occasionally Reger in ours—has the secret of its peculiar intensity and tang. It almost died with the seventeenth century and the beginning of the eighteenth, and none, until Reger, could quite reanimate it. And so the suite ran forward in the variegated dance tunes, with the flute now feathering along the way over the sustaining strings or singing itself some intervening song in their steppings and posturings, while they listened whispering for the moment.

Adroitly Dr. Muck varied pace and accent, since these are not dances for dancers, but dances wrought and glorified into something like symphonic pattern. Yet, not once, did he make Bach lose his straightforwardness—that free, easy march, however intricate the counterpoint, that is one of the enduring glories and powers of his music. He kept, too, its fine masculinity, not merely in the sturdiness of the overture and some of the dances, but also when the music sought and gained the grace of the Rondo or the gentle melancholy of the Saraband. Thus he made Bach a living and breathing man, even after two hundred years, and not merely a classic whom it is good form to heed and

---

HERALD.
NOVEMBER 2,

SYMPHONY GIVES NOTABLE CONCERT

Beethoven, Wagner and Bach Selections and Two Soloists.

BY FRANK BERTWALL

Happy indeed was Dr. Muck in his choice of program for this week's concerts of the Symphony Orchestra. Yesterday afternoon's rehearsal showed that it could scarcely have been bettered. Right at the start the program commended itself with the jolly and melodious Eighth Symphony of Beethoven for an opening number, a symphony that is commendably brief, musical and free from puzzles for the auditor and players.

Second only to the symphony was the "Die Walkure" number, an ever popular and enjoyable selection, particularly so when as clearly and artistically expressed as was the case yesterday. Then there was the delightful Bach suite for flute and strings, made the more notable for the peerless playing of Mr. Maquarre and the exceptional seconding of the orchestra, notably the bassoons, and 'cello.

Even the "Non piu Andrai" of Mozart took on new interest from the artistic singing of Herbert Witherspoon and the finished playing of the orchestra. The soloist was given a most cordial greeting, twice recalled at its close and given almost an ovation for his great singing in the Wagner selection.

Southern Trip for Symphony Orchestra.

The Symphony orchestra leaves tomorrow night for the first southern trip of the season. Monday night it plays in Philadelphia, Tuesday afternoon in Washington, Wednesday evening in Baltimore, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in New York and Friday evening in Brooklyn. In New York, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington the houses are sold out by subscription for the season. In Philadelphia there is very little left.

The fifth Boston concert will bring Sibelius's first symphony which has been heard in Boston but once, and then under Dr. Muck's leadership; Glazounoff's "Overture Solenelle," Tschaikowsky's seldom-heard G Major Concerto for Piano, and Chabrier's "Espana" Rhapsodie. George Proctor will be the soloist.

First Pension Fund Concert of Season.

The pension fund concert of the Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, Nov. 17, will comprise practically a complete review of the different styles of Richard Wagner.

NOVEMBER 2,
MONITOR

WITHERSPOON SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

With Herbert Witherspoon, bass, as soloist, the Boston Symphony orchestra rehearsed its fourth Boston program in Symphony hall Friday afternoon, winning an even measure of applause for its brilliant reading of four rather unrelated selections, namely: Beethoven, symphony, No. 8, in F major op. 93; Mozart, "Non piu andrai," aria from "Le Nozze di Figaro," act I., scene 9; Bach, suite No. 2, in B minor, for flute and strings (Hans von Bulow's arrangement); Wagner, "Wotan's Farewell" and the fire music from "Die Walknere." In the Bach music the solo flutist was Andre Maquarre.

The pieces here grouped together, whatever may be said of them on general grounds of program making, are without doubt, the best works of all that are just now available, soloist and coming orchestral tour considered. The Symphony conductor has arranged his work by months, laying out four programs at a time. These must be, to a great extent, a compromise between the requirements of the home audience and the audiences of the tour. Homogeneity is little likely to characterize one of them when there is a visiting artist; not likely at all when the visitor is a Mozartean or Wagnerian singer who comes to fire the operatic imaginations of innocent Symphony listeners.

Nobody would like to ask Dr. Muck or even one of Dr. Muck's men, nobody attending the Symphony concerts would quite like to ask a fellow listener whether he did not in his heart regard the eighth symphony of Beethoven as consisting first and last of the allegretto. It is probably necessary for us to stick to the idea that each of the nine is a masterpiece, complete and indivisible, for at least another century. Yet we may go so far even now as to ask a neighbor whether he does not think that the opening and closing portions of the eighth serve their best purpose in furnishing a setting for the exquisite second movement. If the entire symphonic content of Beethoven were a picture gallery to be put up at auction, who would not go to the sale prepared to bid higher for this little masterpiece of conception and workmanship than for everything in the first four symphonies and in the sixth beside?

There is plenty of big music in the world, plenty of allegro vigor, plenty of marcia pompousness. There are enough "in excelsis" and "de profundis" examples of orchestral expression to take care of all the jubilant or solemn occasions that may arise. But there are precious few examples of music that tell about every day living and the poetry of it in the Homeric frankness of mood and simplicity of diction that characterize the pages which Beethoven said should be bound into his eighth symphony as its slow movement.

Beethoven in the allegretto reflects the sentiment of plain humanit, as it existed in an early nineteenth century city. He is a Wordsworth noting significant points of human character as they were to be observed in town instead of in the country and he is a Wordsworth who can laugh. Vienna made of the composer, as the English hills could not of the poet, a humorist. In interpreting music like that of the allegretto, music that talks about subjects recurring to the thought of men with every new day, music representing humanity in its buoyant, morning moods, Dr. Muck surpasses all other conductors.

With becoming enthusiasm the matinee audience applauded the music of the Bach suite. With Mr. Maquarre, the most self-effacing of virtuosi playing the solo part, the performance was one of those highly proper things which a Symphony public of high reputation for its appreciation of the old masters must now and then write down to its credit. Noteworthy service of the performance from a program standpoint was the telling contrast it offered to the Wagnerian piece of interpretation that closed the concert. A more extraordinary effect than that of the modern orchestral picture placed next to the archaic could hardly be contrived. Whether the effect is a valuable one or not is another question.

Dr. Muck, having an accomplished singer at his elbow to declaim the lines of Wotan, gave a reading of the selection from "Die Walkuere" which could do just one thing more than delight his listeners. It could exasperate them that such a master of Wagnerian conducting was only to disclose his abilities to them in excerpts from the music dramas. The restraint with which the fire music was interpreted would [illegible] the most remarkable trait of the entire performance of the afternoon if the clearness of thematic exposition and the balance of coloring had not been so wonderful.

Mr. Witherspoon's singing was of the greatest value from the general artistic standpoint in the Wotan music; but it was at its best from the special standpoint of vocal effectiveness in the Figaro music from Mozart. Mr. Witherspoon was a perfect stylist in the aria of the old school. He was capable vocally of meeting the large modern demand which Dr. Muck made by his full-toned accompaniment. With the conductor making no concessions whatever to the theory of Mozartean intimacy, the singer broadened out his interpretation and did it in a manner that forgot not proportion and propriety. The performance was a capital example of Mozart interpretation suited to the tonal demands of the day. There was no historic affectation whatever about the reading on the part of either the singer or the conductor. The "Non piu andrai" was presented as a modern piece of music. And it was presented on both sides with complete success. Mr. Witherspoon maintained his fine vocal style in the Wagnerian music, though probably he would be the last one to lay claim to low-voice powers of the magnitude required for a thorough performance of the great farewell scene of Wotan.

CONCERT ANNOUNCEMENTS

George Proctor, the pianist, will be the soloist at the fifth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor, to be played in Symphony hall Nov. 15 and 16. Mr. Proctor will be heard in the G major piano concerto by Tschaikowsky. The orchestral numbers of the fifth program will be the First symphony of Sibelius and the "Espana" rhapsody of Chabrier. Next week the orchestra takes its first trip to the cities of its southern circuit. On Monday night it plays in Philadelphia, on Tuesday afternoon in Washington, on Wednesday evening in Baltimore, on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in New York and on Friday evening in Brooklyn. In New York, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington, it is said, the houses are sold out by subscription for the season. At all the concerts Dr. Muck will present music which he has rehearsed with the orchestra at the Boston concerts.

The pension fund concert of the Symphony orchestra to be given in Symphony hall on Sunday evening, Nov. 17, will be a review of the different styles of Richard Wagner and will repeat with one change the program that Dr. Muck gave twice at pension fund concerts in the season of 1906-07. It comprises seven overtures and preludes and the funeral music from the third act of "Goetterdaemmerung." Instead of the formal "Tannhaeuser" overture, Dr. Muck will present the Paris version that is used as an introduction to the opera in actual performance. The introductory music of the operas "Rienzi," "Lohengrin," "Tristan," "Die Meistersinger," "Parsifal" and "The Flying Dutchman" will be included in the program.

AMERICAN
RDAY, NOVEMBER 2, 1912.

FINE PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

Beethoven, Bach, Mozart, Wagner, a truly classic program and typical of the Dr. Much who has come back to us, made the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony as attractive as its predecessors.

Herbert Witherspoon was the soloist and his presence enabled us to hear the whole of the Fire music from "Die Walkure," for which much thanks.

Wagner did not have Witherspoon in mind when he conceived Wotan, and therefore the Metropolitan opera basso is not ideal, but he does his best. and his best is pretty good. He sings well, as witness his performance of "Non Piu Andrai" from the "Marriage of Figaro," the utter antithesis of the "Walkure" music, but I don't like his voice; it isn't sonorous [illegible] and it is not of [illegible]

[illegible] for four years and has not yet heard "Walkure" or any of the Ring dramas. It is time we did. Henry Russell has suggested a Wagner festival at the close of the regular season. I hope it can be arranged. Paris just now is the holy place of our Boston opera, but alongside of the Wagner music drama, the modern French school of opera is "dinky." And even Paris gets serious now and then, and hears the Ring conducted by a Weingartner or a Messager.

The Symphony yesterday was Beethoven's Eighth, his pretty symphony. Dr. Muck took the much mooted minuet at a moderate pace which was yet too fast for dancing.

An interesting feature of the program was the performance of Bach's Second Suite in B Minor, for flute and strings. Hans Von Bulow's arrangement was used and the soloist was Andre Maquarre. The superb virtuosity of this distinguished member of the orchestra was again demonstrated, and the wonderful purity and clarity of his tone admired.

The music of the Suite is dainty and elegant. It brings up visions of powdered heads, brocades and patches.

NOVEMBER 2,
JOURNAL

TWO SOLOISTS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Witherspoon and Maquarre Applauded by a Big Audience.

Symphony Hall could have been sold half over again yesterday, such was the demand for seats to the first of the fourth pair of Symphony concerts. This biggest rush of the season was due partly to the rare attraction furnished by two soloists, Herbert Witherspoon, the bass from the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Andre Maquarre, the popular first flute player of the orchestra; and partly it was due to the increase of prestige the orchestra itself has gained since Dr. Muck's return.

It would be strange if Boston should seem at all backward in its support of the orchestra in view of the fact that the cities included in the tour which begins next week have paid the organiztion the compliment of the largest sales on record. In New York, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington the halls have been sold out by subscription for the entire season. In Philadelphia only a few seats remain unsold. No other orchestra ever proved to be so welcome an attraction. Everywhere Dr. Muck's return is regarded as one of the leading features of the year.

Here in Boston the only weak spot in the support has appeared on Saturday night, especially since the opera became established; but this season the evening concert is beginning to approach the matinee in popularity for the first time in years. The charm of the performances since the orchestra was reorganized and the agreeable contrasts and well-balanced nature of the programs are drawing crowds that promise one of the most successful years in the history of the orchestra.

Beethoven's "little symphony," the eighth, which occupies not much more than half a hour, but which is nearly all as sparkling as champagne, and Buelow's arrangement of the second Bach suite for flute and strings are the orchestral numbers this week. Mr. Maquarre's flute playing created a furore yesterday. Mr. Witherspoon sang "Non piu andrai," Figaro's vivacious aria from Mozart's "Nozzi di Figaro," and Wotan's farewell from Wagner's "Walkeure." He, too, was heartily applauded. Dr. Muck is a stickler for strict adherence to the original score in opera, perhaps more especially in the case of Wagner. So to play this fire scene music from "Walkeure" as it was originally written it was necessary to borrow scores from the Metropolitan Opera House.

George Proctor, the Boston pianist, will be the soloist the week after next, with the Tschaikowsky concerto No. 2. Sibelius's first symphony, Glazounoff's "Overture Solennelle" and Chabrier's "Espana" overture will fill out the program.

NOVEMBER 2,
GLOBE

DELIGHTFUL PROGRAM AT THE SYMPHONY

Dr Muck in Second Notable Beethoven Reading.

Maquarre in Bach Suite and Finale From 'Die Walkure' Worthy of Note.

The program of the fourth Symphony rehearsal was as follows: Beethoven, 8th Symphony in F-major; Mozart, "Non piu andrai," from "The [illegible] Herbert Witherspoon, soloist; Bach, suite No. 2 in B-minor, for flute and strings, Mr Maquarre, soloist; Wagner, "Wotan's Farewell" and the Magic Fire music from "Die Walkure."

Dr Muck and the orchestra finished yesterday the four pairs of concerts in Boston before departing upon the first monthly trip to New York and other Southern cities. Within the four weeks we have heard two Beethoven Symphonies, at the first concert the third, and yesterday the eighth.

When the conductor seated the entire double quartet of horns at his reentry a month ago it presumably was less for the purpose of greeting him with a military fanfare than for augmenting the original three-horn parts in the score of the "Eroica" to the sonority of eight voices in the hunting calls of the scherzo, and in them he added no violence to the thought of the music. Yesterday, in the "little symphony," the accustomed two horns sufficed.

Last season there was a flash of quickly sated curiosity over a symphony discovered in Jena, represented by some as an early work of Beethoven, perhaps in the manner of Haydn. Compare its vacuous and apologetic pages with the trenchant, virile thought of that of yesterday, searching and direct in serious moments but never long concealing the flash of humor which illumines all with what spirit of play and what wealth of imagination the hearer may chose, according to the mercurial habits of his own fancy.

Whereas the first movement of the "Eroica" is an epic, stern, towering, absolute as the summary of a scholar, or prophetic as the warning of a seer; the first movement of the eighth symphony of yesterday leads the hearer through a maze of forest where the same motto recurs perpetually before his eyes, darting here and there among the trees, but constantly in varying shapes and patterns. Now the chief theme will wear this guise, now another by a magic metamorphosis in tonality, or in harmonic or rhythmic scheme, a will-o'-the-wisp, elusive, pursued but never caught. It may be, on the contrary, merely a proof of the master's fertility in thematic development.

The unusual second movement invites debate of metronomes, yet who can stop at so prosaic an inspiration. Dr Muck may have had his joke with the opening staccato chords that go tick-tocking through the measures, yet who hears nothing, sees nothing else in the woodsy horns and wind choir and in the elf-like figure that presently appears, flitting about, light as air, and after some time answered by deep-voiced and fearsome gnomes. Again thematic development, but in a performance as instinct with sensibility, as that of yesterday, as filled with grace, delicacy and flexibility of nuance and as replete with golden colors of tone, the hearer may be permitted to take his Beethoven how he please.

Even the stately minuet—and Dr Muck might have pleased Richard Wagner by the alertness of his tempo—and the final allegro were filled with the surprises imparted technically by accentuation and dynamics, but to us construed emotionally according to temper and mood. It was an inspiring, a refreshing, indeed a recreating performance.

Bach's quaintly sculptured music afforded a chaste and precious delight. Despite the monotony of the continuing tonality, what variety of feeling is reflected in the aloof and stately elegance of these dances of a proudly artificial society? The grave Sarabande in which the dance wears the mask of a lament or feigns sorrow; the pompous bourree with its bold flourish of silver buckles over silken hose upon the accented step, or the overture embossed in its stately figures in treble and in bass, in the old and measured style.

Properly superseding the orchestra in this group, Mr Maquarre, the justly distinguished first flutist of the orchestra, played yesterday as the sovereign technician and as the scholarly and sensitive interpreter. In purity of tone, in husbandry of the breath, in manipulation and molding of the phrase, and in the appreciation of the mood, it was the playing of an artist. This morning it is a pleasure to recall particularly the dialogue with the 'cello in canon in which Mr Warnke happily joined him, and the gracefully ebullient badinerie and presto which concluded.

The feature of the afternoon outside of the symphony was the music attending Wotan's silent acts of farewell to his beloved daughter preparatory to her immolation; moments to be remembered with deep gratitude for their solemnity and grandeur; moments in which as though the last pageantry of pagan gods may have been in passing, and a new epoch were about to begin. Mr Witherspoon was able to impart a certain dignity and impressiveness to Wotan's music. His performance, however, was not wholly satisfying, either here or in the Mozart. In the latter his sense of style reveals limitations. It is true there was suggestion of the comic spirit, but there was need of nuance and finesse. The return of the opening phrase had no anticipation and created no suspense; each delivery of it was identical with every other, and there was no variety in color. Mr Witherspoon's middle voice has true bass quality and no little resonance, but the upper register is lost to him as it was yesterday because of tense emission of tone. There will be no orchestra concerts next week.

NOVEMBER 2,
POST,

PERFECTION AT CONCERT

Maquarre's Remarkable Artistry Feature

BY OLIN DOWNES

Yesterday afternoon's concert, or public rehearsal, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall was first of all remarkable for a most excellent and entertaining performance of Beethoven's 8th symphony. Rightly has this work been called the "Little Symphony." In [illegible] it is great enough, every page [illegible] with genius, and not one of the least concentrated expressions of a [illegible] genius. Yet in its [illegible] this 8th symphony [illegible] the nine, [illegible]

NOVEMBER 2,

MONITOR

WITHERSPOON SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

With Herbert Witherspoon, bass, as soloist, the Boston Symphony orchestra rehearsed its fourth Boston program in Symphony hall Friday afternoon, winning an even measure of applause for its brilliant reading of four rather unrelated selections, namely: Beethoven, symphony, No. 8, in F major op. 93; Mozart, "Non piu andrai," aria from "Le Nozze di Figaro," act I., scene 9; Bach, suite No. 2, in B minor, for flute and strings (Hans von Bulow's arrangement); Wagner, "Wotan's Farewell" and the fire music from "Die Walknere." In the Bach music the solo flutist was Andre Maquarre.

The pieces here grouped together, whatever may be said of them on general grounds of program making, are without doubt, the best works of all that are just now available, soloist and coming orchestral tour considered. The Symphony conductor has arranged his work by months, laying out four programs at a time. These must be, to a great extent, a compromise between the requirements of the home audience and the audiences of the tour. Homogeneity is little likely to characterize one of them when there is a visiting artist; not likely at all when the visitor is a Mozartean or Wagnerian singer who comes to fire the operatic imaginations of innocent Symphony listeners.

Nobody would like to ask Dr. Muck or even one of Dr. Muck's men, nobody attending the Symphony concerts would quite like to ask a fellow listener whether he did not in his heart regard the eighth symphony of Beethoven as consisting first and last of the allegretto. It is probably necessary for us to stick to the idea that each of the nine is a masterpiece, complete and indivisible, for at least another century. Yet we may go so far even now as to ask a neighbor whether he does not think that the opening and closing portions of the eighth serve their best purpose in furnishing a setting for the exqusite second movement. If the entire symphonic content of Beethoven were a picture gallery to be put up at auction, who would not go to the sale prepared to bid higher for this little masterpiece of conception and workmanship than for everything in the first four symphonies and in the sixth beside?

There is plenty of big music in the world, plenty of allegro vigor, plenty of marcia pompousness. There are enough "in excelsis" and "de profundis" examples of orchestral expression to take care of all the jubilant or solemn occasions that may arise. But there are precious few examples of music that tell about every day living and the poetry of it in the Homeric frankness of mood and simplicity of diction that characterize the pages which Beethoven said should be bound into his eighth symphony as its slow movement.

Beethoven in the allegretto reflects the sentiment of plain humanity as it existed in an early nineteenth century city. He is a Wordsworth noting significant points of human character as they were to be observed in town instead of in the country and he is a Wordsworth who can laugh. Vienna made of the composer, as the English hills could not of the poet, a humorist. In interpreting music like that of the allegretto, music that talks about subjects recurring to the thought of men with every new day, music representing humanity in its buoyant, morning moods, Dr. Muck surpasses all other conductors.

With becoming enthusiasm the matinee audience applauded the music of the Bach suite. With Mr. Maquarre, the most self-effacing of virtuosi playing the solo part, the performance was one of those highly proper things which a Symphony public of high reputation for its appreciation of the old masters must now and then write down to its credit. Noteworthy service of the performance from a program standpoint was the telling contrast it offered to the Wagnerian piece of interpretation that closed the concert. A more extraordinary effect than that of the modern orchestral picture placed next to the archaic could hardly be contrived. Whether the effect is a valuable one or not is another question.

Dr. Muck, having an accomplished singer at his elbow to declaim the lines of Wotan, gave a reading of the selection from "Die Walkuere" which could do just one thing more than delight his listeners. It could exasperate them that such a master of Wagnerian conducting was only to disclose his abilities to them in excerpts from the music dramas. The restraint with which the fire music was interpreted would have been the most remarkable trait of the entire performance of the afternoon if the clearness of thematic exposition and the balance of coloring had not been so wonderful.

Mr. Witherspoon's singing was of the greatest value from the general artistic standpoint in the Wotan music; but it was at its best from the special standpoint of vocal effectiveness in the Figaro music from Mozart. Mr. Witherspoon was a perfect stylist in the aria of the old school. He was capable vocally of meeting the large modern demand which Dr. Muck made by his full-toned accompaniment. With the conductor making no concessions whatever to the theory of Mozartean intimacy, the singer broadened out his interpretation and did it in a manner that forgot not proportion and propriety. The performance was a capital example of Mozart interpretation suited to the tonal demands of the day. There was no historic affectation whatever about the reading on the part of either the singer or the conductor. The "Non piu andrai" was presented as a modern piece of music. And it was presented on both sides with complete success. Mr. Witherspoon maintained his fine vocal style in the Wagnerian music, though probably he would be the last one to lay claim to low-voice powers of the magnitude required for a thorough performance of the great farewell scene of Wotan.

CONCERT ANNOUNCEMENTS

George Proctor, the pianist, will be the soloist at the fifth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor, to be played in Symphony hall Nov. 15 and 16. Mr. Proctor will be heard in the G major piano concerto by Tschaikowsky. The orchestral numbers of the fifth program will be the First symphony of Sibelius and the "Espana" rhapsody of Chabrier. Next week the orchestra takes its first trip to the cities of its southern circuit. On Monday night it plays in Philadelphia, on Tuesday afternoon in Washington, on Wednesday evening in Baltimore, on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in New York and on Friday evening in Brooklyn. In New York, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington, it is said, the houses are sold out by subscription for the season. At all the concerts Dr. Muck will present music which he has rehearsed with the orchestra at the Boston concerts.

The pension fund concert of the Symphony orchestra to be given in Symphony hall on Sunday evening, Nov. 17, will be a review of the different styles of Richard Wagner and will repeat with one change the program that Dr. Muck gave twice at pension fund concerts in the season of 1906-07. It comprises seven overtures and preludes and the funeral music from the third act of "Goetterdaemmerung." Instead of the formal "Tannhaeuser" overture, Dr. Muck will present the Paris version that is used as an introduction to the opera in actual performance. The introductory music of the operas "Rienzi," "Lohengrin," "Tristan," "Die Meistersinger," "Parsifal" and "The Flying Dutchman" will be included in the program.

AMERICAN

RDAY, NOVEMBER 2, 1912.

FINE PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

Beethoven, Bach, Mozart, Wagner, a truly classic program and typical of the Dr. Much who has come back to us, made the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony as attractive as its predecessors.

Herbert Witherspoon was the soloist and his presence enabled us to hear the whole of the Fire music from "Die Walkure," for which much thanks.

Wagner did not have Witherspoon in mind when he conceived Wotan, and therefore the Metropolitan opera basso is not ideal, but he does his best, and his best is pretty good. He sings well, as witness his performance of "Non Piu Andrai" from the "Marriage of Figaro," the utter antithesis of the "Walkure" music, but I don't like his voice; it isn't sonorous enough, and it is not of fine quality [illegible] has had [illegible] opera for four years and has not yet heard "Walkure" or any of the Ring dramas. It is time we did. Henry Russell has suggested a Wagner festival at the close of the regular season. I hope it can be arranged. Paris just now is the holy place of our Boston opera, but alongside of the Wagner music drama, the modern French school of opera is "dinky." And even Paris gets serious now and then, and hears the Ring conducted by a Weingartner or a Messager.

The Symphony yesterday was Beethoven's Eighth, his pretty symphony. Dr. Muck took the much mooted minuet at a moderate pace which was yet too fast for dancing.

An interesting feature of the program was the performance of Bach's Second Suite in B Minor, for flute and strings. Hans Von Bulow's arrangement was used and the soloist was Andre Maquarre. The superb virtuosity of this distinguished member of the orchestra was again demonstrated, and the wonderful purity and clarity of his tone admired.

The music of the Suite is dainty and elegant. It brings up visions of powdered heads, brocades and patches.

NOVEMBER 2,

JOURNAL

TWO SOLOISTS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Witherspoon and Maquarre Applauded by a Big Audience.

Symphony Hall could have been sold half over again yesterday, such was the demand for seats to the first of the fourth pair of Symphony concerts. This biggest rush of the season was due partly to the rare attraction furnished by two soloists. Herbert Witherspoon, the bass from the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Andre Maquarre, the popular first flute player of the orchestra; and partly it was due to the increase of prestige the orchestra itself has gained since Dr. Muck's return.

It would be strange if Boston should seem at all backward in its support of the orchestra in view of the fact that the cities included in the tour which begins next week have paid the organiztion the compliment of the largest sales on record. In New York, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington the halls have been sold out by subscription for the entire season. In Philadelphia only a few seats remain unsold. No other orchestra ever proved to be so welcome an attraction. Everywhere Dr. Muck's return is regarded as one of the leading features of the year.

Here in Boston the only weak spot in the support has appeared on Saturday night, especially since the opera became established; but this season the evening concert is beginning to approach the matinee in popularity for the first time in years. The charm of the performances since the orchestra was reorganized and the agreeable contrasts and well-balanced nature of the programs are drawing crowds that promise one of the most successful years in the history of the orchestra.

Beethoven's "little symphony," the eighth, which occupies not much more than half a hour, but which is nearly all as sparkling as champagne, and Buelow's arrangement of the second Bach suite for flute and strings are the orchestral numbers this week. Mr. Maquarre's flute playing created a furore yesterday. Mr. Witherspoon sang "Non piu andrai," Figaro's vivacious aria from Mozart's "Nozzi di Figaro," and Wotan's farewell from Wagner's "Walkeure." He, too, was heartily applauded. Dr. Muck is a stickler for strict adherence to the original score in opera, perhaps more especially in the case of Wagner. So to play this fire scene music from "Walkeure" as it was originally written it was necessary to borrow scores from the Metropolitan Opera House.

George Proctor, the Boston pianist, will be the soloist the week after next, with the Tschaikowsky concerto No. 2. Sibelius's first symphony, Glazounoff's "Overture Solennelle" and Chabrier's "Espana" overture will fill out the program.

NOVEMBER 2,

GLOBE-

DELIGHTFUL PROGRAM AT THE SYMPHONY

Dr Muck in Second Notable Beethoven Reading.

Maquarre in Bach Suite and Finale From 'Die Walkure' Worthy of Note.

The program of the fourth Symphony rehearsal was as follows: Beethoven, 8th Symphony in F-major; Mozart, "Non piu andrai," from "The Marriage [illegible] Herbert Witherspoon, soloist; Bach, suite No. 2 in B-minor, for flute and strings, Mr Maquarre, soloist; Wagner, "Wotan's Farewell" and the Magic Fire music from "Die Walkure."

Dr Muck and the orchestra finished yesterday the four pairs of concerts in Boston before departing upon the first monthly trip to New York and other Southern cities. Within the four weeks we have heard two Beethoven Symphonies, at the first concert the third, and yesterday the eighth.

When the conductor seated the entire double quartet of horns at his reentry a month ago it presumably was less for the purpose of greeting him with a military fanfare than for augmenting the original three-horn parts in the score of the "Eroica" to the sonority of eight voices in the hunting calls of the scherzo, and in them he added no violence to the thought of the music. Yesterday, in the "little symphony," the accustomed two horns sufficed.

Last season there was a flash of quickly sated curiosity over a symphony discovered in Jena, represented by some as an early work of Beethoven, perhaps in the manner of Haydn. Compare its vacuous and apologetic pages with the trenchant, virile thought of that of yesterday, searching and direct in serious moments but never long concealing the flash of humor which illumines all with what spirit of play and what wealth of imagination the hearer may chose, according to the mercurial habits of his own fancy.

Whereas the first movement of the "Eroica" is an epic, stern, towering, absolute as the summary of a scholar, or prophetic as the warning of a seer; the first movement of the eighth symphony of yesterday leads the hearer through a maze of forest where the same motto recurs perpetually before his eyes, darting here and there among the trees, but constantly in varying shapes and patterns. Now the chief theme will wear this guise, now another by a magic metamorphosis in tonality, or in harmonic or rhythmic scheme, a will-o'-the-wisp, elusive, pursued but never caught. It may be, on the contrary, merely a proof of the master's fertility in thematic development.

The unusual second movement invites debate of metronomes, yet who can stop at so prosaic an inspiration. Dr Muck may have had his joke with the opening staccato chords that go tick-tocking through the measures, yet who hears nothing, sees nothing else in the woodsy horns and wind choir and in the elf-like figure that presently appears, flitting about, light as air, and after some time answered by deep-voiced and fearsome gnomes. Again thematic development, but in a performance as instinct with sensibility, as that of yesterday, as filled with grace, delicacy and flexibility of nuance and as replete with golden colors of tone, the hearer may be permitted to take his Beethoven how he please.

Even the stately minuet—and Dr Muck might have pleased Richard Wagner by the alertness of his tempo—and the final allegro were filled with the surprises imparted technically by accentuation and dynamics, but to be construed emotionally according to temper and mood. It was an inspiring, a refreshing, indeed a recreating performance.

Bach's quaintly sculptured music afforded a chaste and precious delight. Despite the monotony of the continuing tonality, what variety of feeling is reflected in the aloof and stately elegance of these dances of a proudly artificial society? The grave Sarabande in which the dance wears the mask of a lament or feigns sorrow; the pompous bourree with its bold flourish of silver buckles over silken hose upon the accented step, or the overture embossed in its stately figures in treble and in bass, in the old and measured style.

Properly superseding the orchestra in this group, Mr Maquarre, the justly distinguished first flutist of the orchestra, played yesterday as the sovereign technician and as the scholarly and sensitive interpreter. In purity of tone, in husbandry of the breath, in manipulation and molding of the phrase, and in the appreciation of the mood, it was the playing of an artist. This morning it is a pleasure to recall particularly the dialogue with the 'cello in canon in which Mr Warnke happily joined him, and the gracefully ebullient badinerie and presto which concluded.

The feature of the afternoon outside of the symphony was the music attending Wotan's silent acts of farewell to his beloved daughter preparatory to her immolation; moments to be remembered with deep gratitude for their solemnity and grandeur; moments in which as though the last pageantry of pagan gods may have been in passing, and a new epoch were about to begin. Mr Witherspoon was able to impart a certain dignity and impressiveness to Wotan's music. His performance, however, was not wholly satisfying, either here or in the Mozart. In the latter his sense of style reveals limitations. It is true there was suggestion of the comic spirit, but there was need of nuance and finesse. The return of the opening phrase had no anticipation and created no suspense; each delivery of it was identical with every other, and there was no variety in color. Mr Witherspoon's middle voice has true bass quality and no little resonance, but the upper register is lost to him as it was yesterday because of tense emission of tone. There will be no orchestra concerts next week.

NOVEMBER 2,

POST,

PERFECTION AT CONCERT

Maquarre's RemarKable Artistry Feature

BY OLIN DOWNES

Yesterday afternoon's concert, or public rehearsal, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall was first of all remarkable for a most excellent and entertaining performance of Beethoven's 8th symphony. Rightly has this work been called the "Little Symphony." In itself it is great enough, every page adorned with genius, and not one of the least concentrated expressions of a very great genius. Yet, in its design and in its intent, this 8th symphony is the least pretentious of all the nine, [illegible]

This symphony is virtually a return to Mozart, a return, it is true, plus the ripened individuality and the astonishing resources of his successor, yet essentially and irresistably Mozart. Well on toward the later dreadful years, Beethoven threw off the mantle of melancholy. Let no one think that a great work of art is ever the direct result of some passing mood. Deliberately, marvellously, with an unspeakably fine sense of proportion, the composer chose and then adjusted his ideas, dispensed with the ordinary ceremonious succession of allegro, andante, scherzo, and finale of the classic symphony, and having finished his structure proceeded to its instrumental decoration. What can be said to adequately praise this orchestra? It is limpid as anything that Haydn or Mozart ever produced, and simple. Hence, every instrument is remembered, the jocular bassoon, the basses, the lovely solo horn in the trio of the scherzo, and a thousand remarkable things in the rushing final movement.

Dr. Muck's performance was again one worthy of the highest traditions of the orchestra. We have never heard one so fine, as regards this particular work. Its humor was infectious, indeed irresistible, and in every nuance and in the leading of each voice it approached perfection. Not many conductors, of late years, have been repeatedly recalled after so well-known a work as the 8th symphony.

Mr. Maquarre's Performance

There were two soloists at this concert. One was Mr. Herbert Witherspoon, the basso, who sang Figaro's aria, "Non piu andrai" from "The Marriage of Figaro," and all of Wotan's final monologue from the last act of "Die Walkure." The other was Mr. Maquarre, the remarkable first flute of the orchestra, who took part in the performance of a Bach suite for solo flute and strings, "No. 2," as arranged by Von Bulow. Let alone the fact that this suite was not imagined for a great concert hall or a great orchestra, that the effect would have been three times as delightful had the proportions of auditorium and orchestra been reduced by at least one-third, the fact remains that the performance was a pleasure from the first note to the last. To this Mr. Maquarre was one of the chief contributors. His musicianship is so sure and so thorough that it is needless to remark upon it today. He is a rarely accomplished musician, and a performer of extraordinary skill upon his instrument. No more musical, intelligent, and refined playing could be imagined. The perfection of phrasing and intonation, the purity and beauty of the tone, could have been envied by any artist. Worthy, indeed, was this performance of the rounds of applause that followed, to which the soloist repeatedly responded.

The performance of the strings was well balanced, singing, two-fisted for the more rapid and fixedly rhythmic movements, although so many strings in music of such rich polyphony can hardly escape the reproach of a certain thickness and heaviness of tone. And at times the strings were taxed to the utmost of their capacity for sonority. The suite itself is splendid music.

Mr. Witherspoon was heard to advantage in the music of Mozart. He realized its technical demands, and he caught admirably the swagger and the badinage of the air. The orchestral accompaniment, as under Dr. Muck, reinforced him with admirable results. The music and the performance were rendered homage. But in the Wagner excerpt Mr. Witherspoon was not so fortunate. The heavy orchestra taxed his throat. Dr. Muck, instead of contenting himself with the reduced scoring of this scene, commonly used for the concert platform, had secured from the Metropolitan Opera Company the extra parts that the original partition demands, as a second quartet of horns, a quartet of trombones, a quartet of trumpets with bass trumpet. We ourselves prefer the abridged version for use in the concert room. It provides as much color and sonority as the ears can easily assimilate under those circumstances. Contrary to Wagner's own stand in these matters, this scene suits excellently as a matter for the concert platform. What is it but a symphonic poem with a voice? It requires only imagination on the part of the hearer. Then the effect is fully as fine, if not finer, than the effect on the stage. Mr. Witherspoon undertook a difficult and strenuous task. It is not given to all men to be able to sing like a god in sorrow, or to surmount the vocal obstacles presented in opposition to heavy orchestration.

There will be no pair of concerts next week, as the orchestra will leave Boston on its first tour of the season.

NOVEMBER 2,

ADVERTISER.

FINE PROGRAMME AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

FEATURE BEETHOVEN'S EIGHTH SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck Reveals Himself Equally at Home in the Comical, Grotesque and Brusque Points of This Work.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven—Eighth Symphony.
Mozart—"Non Piu Andral," from "Marriage of Figaro."
Mr. Herbert Witherspoon.
Bach-Bulow—Suite in B minor. Flute and String Orchestra.
W[illegible]'s [illegible]well, and the Fire Charm, [illegible]re."
[illegible] W[illegible]spoon.

The enjoyable [illegible] gramme yesterday reminded us that there was once a time, long ago, when music was written to please, when concerts were sources of enjoyment. It was altogether pleasant to get into this fragrant atmosphere again. The concert of yesterday afternoon was replete with daintiness, jollity, intellectuality and romance. But there was not an unintelligible measure in it, and nothing untuneful. We speak most earnestly and sincerely when we say that we wish that such healthy concerts could be heard oftener, in place of some of the sick music of the present.

Fancy a symphony only a trifle over half-an-hour in length! Nevertheless it said a good deal more than the recent longer ones. After all it took "three Bs"—Bach, Beethoven and Brahms—to develop all that there was of beauty in a figure. And what simple figures Beethoven uses in the Eighth Symphony! An octave, or a simple three-noted figure, supply him with inexhaustible material.

Dr. Muck has shown how perfect he is in dramatic music and in the deeply intellectual school. Yesterday he revealed himself equally at home in the comical, grotesque and brusque points of the Beethoven work. It is difficult to catch up all its insouciance. The dialogue effects in the development of the first movement and the conversation between the violins and the violoncellos in the second movement; the absurdly, unexpectedly conventional end of the second movement; the quaintly antique flavor of the third movement; the comical way in which the contrabasses bite off the heads of the flutes and violins, in the finale; the clucking unison passages of bassoons and kettledrums, in the final coda; all of these were splendidly caught up by Dr. Muck and brightly executed by his men.

It is a bassoon and contrabass symphony if ever there was one. The bassoon was Beethoven's favorite instrument. He used it freely when he was in that informal and jolly mood which he graphically called "aufgekhoepft" ("unbuttoned"), and he was certainly in such an informal mood during the entire eighth symphony. There is not a single movement which gives the graver side. But his humor was always a little more burly and grotesque than that of, let us say, Mendelssohn. Anything so daintily humorous as the "Midsummer night's Dream Overture" Beethoven could not have written.

To return to our bassoons; they acquitted themselves excellently, and the horns in the minuet also deserve mention. The contrabasses also were of noticeable excellence in prominent passages. The passages where the contrabasses and violoncellos brusquely interrupt the violins and flutes, and the place (both in the last coda) where they sentimentally sing the tender second theme together, like two middle-aged serenaders, were very charmingly caught up, with the result that the finale was the most admirable part of a symphony whose whole conception and interpretation was memorable.

The work was fully appreciated, and there was not only much applause after each movement, but a double recall for Dr. Muck at its end.

The other orchestral work of this short (not too short) programme, was in good contrast with this symphony and made an excellent foil to it. Bach's instrumental suites are good illustrations of the lighter vein of his counterpoint. The short forms used admitted of good contrast with each other, although it was something of a handicap that Bach denied himself the privilege of changing to foreign keys in any of the different numbers in any of his suites. Once started he kept each number in the key of the first piece. He was such a stickler for key that he began his Christmas oratorio Dec. 25, and ended it 12 days later—in the same key. Strauss, Debussy, and Reger, and D'Indy, seldom stay two weeks in one key.

Of course the flute of Bach's time was the old "keyed flute," and not the great Boehm flute, which came in in 1834. This, in itself, would have restricted free modulation, for the instrument could not play in many keys without being out of tune. D major was its easiest key, and the tonality of this suite, B minor, is its relative minor. Therefore it is clear that Bach was endeavoring to favor his instrument.

It was a concert with two soloists, for Mr. A. Maquarre, the flautist, was certainly a most prominent figure in it, and proved himself an artist of the highest rank. The balance and ensemble of the string orchestra was perfect, so that the different voices in the fugue of the overture, and in the burly heartiness of the Bourree, were easily followed. The tempo of the minuet (much slower than that of Beethoven) was well chosen. But Mr. Maquarre's greatest work lay in the "double" (variation) of the Polonaise, and in the exquisite embroidery of the final Badinerie—a veritable omelette sourflee of music. Mr. Maquarre was enthusiastically applauded. The beautiful canon, for flute and cello, gave Mr. Warnke a golden opportunity, and his violoncello work calls for especial mention.

Wotan's "Fire-Charm" never will lose its charm. We recall a case, long ago, when a Boston Symphony programme had it "Wotan's Fire Alarm," which deserves to be recorded in memorable misprints. Wotan is a god of many misfortunes. He loses on real estate speculations. He is not shrewd enough to deceive his wife. He can be splendidly angry with Hunding, with his daughter, with anybody, but when Mrs. Wotan (nee Fricka) appears, the contrast of demeanor is deplorable. But he is expert at fire-charming, an excellent Allhallowe'en pastime.

Wotan is great and Witherspoon is his prophet. It is delightful to hear Mr. Witherspoon's voice holding its own so well in spite of much arduous operatic and concert work. It is a broad and noble baritone, under perfect control, and very equally developed. It was never better displayed than at this concert. He did not make an orator of Wotan, but he sang his music. We scarcely cared for "Non piu Andrai," which is somewhat faded, but the Mozart number was so smoothly given that it took on a new charm, and the singer was many times recalled after it. But it was the Wagner number that was the gem and glory of the concert. Dr. Muck was beyond all criticism in the interpretation. Every figure told its story, without undue emphasis, but with absolute Fate, Slumber, Loge, Siegfried, Wotan's oath, the spear-motif, etc., etc. They made a glorious panorama, and back of the unfolding story there was music that would thrill even an Egyptian mummy. It was the climax of a great concert.

The concert was shorter than usual. We wish that the good habit might be continued. We emphatically deny being "blase" or bored with our noble symphony concerts, but sometimes they have extended so much in length and difficulty, difficulty both for the orchestra and for the auditor, that what ought to be a refreshing pleasure becomes a difficult task. Yesterday was a model in every way. We know that the moderns must not be disregarded and that even extreme radicalism must have its voice heard at such educational concerts, but we plead for many occasions of this kind, and also that the blasts of extreme modernity may be neutralized by many more of the sterling works. Every one left the hall yesterday in exalted mood, elevated and refreshed by the high character of every number of this worthy programme.

NOVEMBER 2,

HERALD,

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Bach's Suite for the Flute and Strings Is Beautifully Played.

GREAT WORK BY BEETHOVEN

Herbert Witherspoon, Soloist, Sings Wotan's Farewell to Bruennhilde.

By PHILIP HALE.

The fourth Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 8, F major..........Beethoven
"Non piu andrai"....................Mozart
Suite No. 2, for flute and strings........Bach
Wotan's Farewell and Magic Fire....Wagner

Beethoven characterized his eighth symphony as "a little symphony" and in the same letter spoke of the seventh as a great one; yet if Czerny is to be believed the composer was vexed because the audience was cool when the eighth was first performed. He said: "Because it is much better" than the seventh, which was played at the same concert. Authors often pronounce strange judgments on their works, as parents often favor a stupid or unpleasant child; but this composer had a right to be proud of the little Benjamin—the colossal ninth was not then born—for the eighth symphony is charged with the spirit of the greater Beethoven.

Some commentators have endeavored to read a program into the symphony, thinking perhaps thus to give it greater importance. One speaks of the symphony as a "military trilogy"; another thinks the allegretto is a parody of Rossini's manner, but the movement was written in 1812 and Vienna did not go mad over the Olympian Rossini until after that year. We even find the sane Vincent d' Indy citing the eighth as revealing impressions of Nature made on the composer's soul; the trio of the pompous minuet is to M. d'Indy a representation in grotesque fashion of a peasant band, and the Hungarian theme in the Finale, the hymn of Hunyadi, denotes the arrival of gypsy musicians in the mist of a festival.

The Symphony needs not such support to excite extraneous interest. In the music we find Beethoven in reckless mood, whimsical, delighting in abrupt contrasts, shouting his joy, ready to play a practical joke. There is, no doubt, the absence of the "fine taste" which Debussy misses in the case of Beethoven and finds ruling the musical life of Bach and Mozart. No, Beethoven was not Paterian in a struggle after taste. He was an elemental person, coarse in his life, with an enormous capacity for hard work. There are others who have been condemned for a lack of taste; Euripides, Rabelais, Shakespeare, Verdi, Walt Whitman. De Quincey, a stylist, found Goethe lacking in taste when he wrote "Wilhelm Meister."

And in this symphony characterized by mad jollity, and a playfulness that at times approaches buffoonery, there are exquisite musical thoughts; there are passages that for a moment sound the depths and reach the heights.

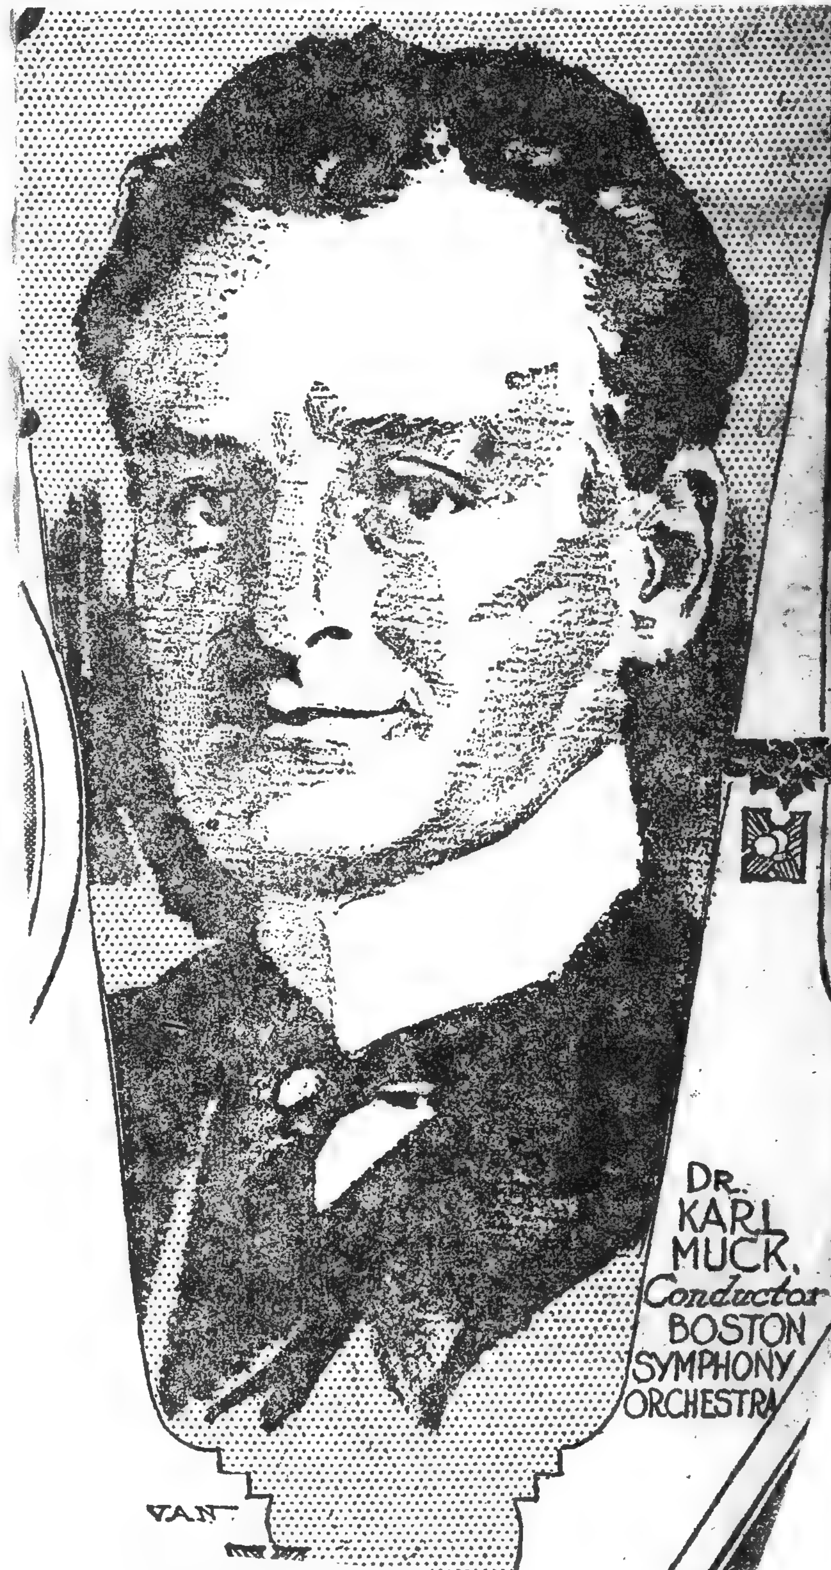
It was a pleasure to hear the symphony read yesterday by Dr. Muck and performed by the orchestra in a manner that revealed the genius of the composition. It was also a pleasure to hear Bach's suite again in Buelow's version and with Mr. Maquarre as the flutist. The solo passages were played fluently and with the musical sensitiveness and taste that distinguish Mr. Maquarre's art, and in the pages for strings alone or in accompaniment there was always admirable proportion. The Sarabande in which the flute and solo 'cello (Mr. Warnke) are in canon was singularly beautiful, but all the movements in dance form had an old-time grace.

Mr. Herbert Witherspoon sang Figaro's air to Cherubino and Wotan's farewell to Bruennhilde. He was more fortunate as Figaro than as Wotan, although in "Non piu andrai" his upper tones were thin and evidently attained with difficulty. Wotan should have had a more sonorous voice. Mr. Witherspoon sang Figaro's air with spirit and Wotan's music with mental dignity, but in Wagner's music also the upper tones lacked [illegible], and although Mr. Muck's

Mr. Wi[illegible] one to be treated respectfully. I do not intend to slight him when I state the general proposition that such excerpts from operas have no place in a symphony program. Figaro's air is far more effective when we see him and the Scapegrace Cherubino on the stage. It demands a dramatic situation and action. Wotan's scene calls imperatively for the previous preparation, the sight of the disobedient yet dearly beloved heroine, the flashing of the encompassing and protecting flames.

There will be no concerts next week. The program of the concerts Nov. 15-16 will be as follows: Sibelius, Symphany No. 1; Glazounoff, solemn overture; Tschaikowsky, piano concerto No. 2 (Mr. Proctor, pianist); Chabrier, "Espana."

From WORLD
Address: New York
Date .... NOV 3-



Boston Symphony.

Dr. Karl Muck will make his reappearance after an absence of four years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the first pair of concerts of the orchestra, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The programme for Thursday evening is the same as that with which he opened the Boston season. It is as follows:

Symphony in E major, No. 3, "Eroica" ....Beethoven
Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," ....Berlioz
"Mazeppa," Symphonic Poem.....Liszt
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" .... Wagner

The programme for Saturday afternoon will begin with the Symphony in E Major, by Hermann Bischoff, which Dr. Muck brought here as a novelty five years ago next spring. This, in Dr. Muck's opinion, is quite the most important work of the younger German composers, and when he played it here five years ago it made a deep impression on those who heard it. Moreover, it gives an orchestra full opportunity to display its virtuosity. The programme in order for Saturday afternoon is as follows:

Symphony in E major, No. 16..Bischoff
"Siegfried Idyl" ....Wagner
"Euryanthe" .... Weber

From POST
Address: New York
Date ....

Dr. Karl Muck will make his reappearance after an absence of four years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the first pair of concerts of the Orchestra to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The evening concert will begin as usual at 8:15 and the matinée at 2:30. The programme for Thursday evening is the same as that with which he opened the Boston season. It includes Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony; Berlioz's overture, "Le Carnaval Romain"; Liszt's "Mazeppa," symphonic poem, and Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The programme for Saturday afternoon will begin with the symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff, which Dr. Muck brought here as a novelty five years ago next spring. This in Dr. Muck's opinion is quite the most important work of the younger German composers, and when he played it here five years ago it was very loud. It also gives an orchestra full opportunity to display its virtuosity. The programme for Saturday afternoon includes, besides that symphony, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture.

[64]

PASTE OVER

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 2 1912

Establi

MUSIC NOTES OF INTEREST

Boston Orchestra Here on Friday Night.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS TO BEGIN NEXT SATURDAY

Philharmonic Will Offer Several Novelties—Irving Place Theatre Concert To-Morrow—Many Recitals Scheduled for Near Future.

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Nov. 8. Old-time friends of the orchestra will note a number of changes in the personnel, for this year it has six new members, and, of course, the center of attraction will be Dr. Karl Muck, who makes his first appearance here after an absence of four years. Judging from the reception the work of the orchestra has received in Boston, it has gained new life and brilliancy under the leadership of Dr. Muck, and during the term of his service, which will be at least five years, it may be fair to assume that the Boston Orchestra will reach greater artistic heights than ever before.

At this concert in Brooklyn, Dr. Muck will give a most interesting programme. It comprises, in order, the Symphony No. 8 of Beethoven, which makes up the first half of the programme; the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz; the "Mazeppa" Symphonic poem of Liszt and the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." All of these are familiar except the Liszt symphonic poem, which has been played very seldom in this country. It is the sixth of the series of symphonic poems by Liszt and was composed as a study for piano in 1836. This study was enlarged in 1837 and 1841, and about 1850 it was arranged and orchestrated by the composer. It was inspired not by Byron's poem, but by Victor Hugo's poem of the same name, which was written in 1828, and published in "Les Orientales" in 1829. The first performance of the work was on Easter Sunday, April 16, 1854, in the Grand Ducal Theatre at Weimar, at a charity concert of the Court Orchestra. Liszt conducted from manuscript. It is a work exceedingly characteristic of the composer, and in merit ranks high among the compositions of its class.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 3 1912

Est 1884

THE first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, November 8, 8:15 o'clock. Old-time friends of the orchestra will note a number of changes in the personnel for this year, it has sixteen new members. Dr. Karl Muck is to make his first appearance here after an absence of four years. Judging from the reception that the work of the orchestra received recently in Boston, it has gained new life and brilliancy under the leadership of Dr. Muck. During the term of his service, which will be at least for five years, it can well be assumed that the Boston Orchestra will reach greater artistic heights than ever before. At the incoming concert Dr. Muck will provide interesting numbers. There will be, in order, the "Symphony No. 8," of Beethoven, which makes the first half of the programme; the "Roman Carnival" overture by Berlioz; the "Mazeppa" symphonic poem by Liszt and the prelude to "The Master Singers of Nuremberg.'

All of the foregoing are familiar, except the Liszt symphonic poem, which has been played very seldom in this country. It is the sixth of the series of symphonic poems by Liszt and was composed as a study for piano in 1836. That composition was enlarged in 1837 and 1841, and, about 1850, it was arranged and orchestrated by the composer. It was inspired not by Byron's poem but by Victor Hugo's poem of the same name, which was written in 1828 and published in "Les Orientales" in 1829. The first performance of the work was on Easter Sunday, April 16, 1854, in the Grand Ducal Theatre at Weimar, at a charity concert of the Court Orchestra. Liszt conducted from manuscript. It is exceedingly characteristic of the composer and in merit ranks high among the compositions of its class.

From PRESS
Address: New York
Date NOV 3 1912

rk, 1884

Dr. Karl Muck will make his reappearance after an absence of four years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the first pair of concerts of the orchesta to be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The evening concert will begin as usual at 8.15 and the matinee at 2.30. The programme for Thrusday evening is the same as that with which he opened the Boston season: Beethoven, Symphony in E-major, No. 3, "Eroica"; Berlioz, overture, "Le Carnaval Romain"; Liszt, "Mazeppa," symphonic poem; Wagner, prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

The programme for Saturday afternoon will begin with the symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff, which Dr. Muck brought here as a novelty five years ago. This, in Dr. Muck's opinion, is quite the most important work of the younger German composers, and when he played it here it made a deep impression. Moreover, it gives an orchestra full opportunity to display its virtuosity. Other numbers on the programme will be Wagner's "Siegried Idyll" and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture.

TELEGRAPH
From Philadelphia, Pa.
Address
Date

Est 884

THE first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music Monday evening, at 8.15. Old-time friends of the orchestra will note a number of changes in the personnel for this year; it has sixteen new members. But, of course, the centre of attraction will be Dr. Karl Muck, who makes his first appearance here after an absence of four years. At this first concert in Philadelphia Dr. Muck will play the same program as that with which he opened his season in Boston. It comprises in order the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, which makes the first half of the program; the "Roman Carnival," Overture of Berlioz; the "Mazeppa" symphonic poem of Liszt, and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." All of these are familiar except the Liszt symphonic poem, which has been played seldom in this country. it is the sixth of the series of symphonic poems by Liszt and was composed as a study for piano in 1836. This study was enlarged in 1837 and 1841 and about 1850 was orchestrated by the composer. It was inspired not by Byron's poem, but by Victor Hugo's poem, written in 1828, and published in "Les Orientales" in 1829. The first performance of the work was on Easter Sunday, April 16, 1854. It is characteristic of the composer.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date 1912

Es , 1884

these concerts.

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Nov. 8. Old-time friends of the Orchestra will note a number of changes in the personnel, for this year it has sixteen new members and, of course, the centre of attraction will be Dr. Karl Muck, who makes his first appearance here after an absence of four years. Judging from the reception the work of the Orchestra has received in Boston it has gained new life and brilliancy under the skilled leadership of Dr. Muck, and during the term of his service, which will be at least for five years, it may be fair to assume that the Boston Orchestra will reach greater artistic heights than ever before. At this first concert in Brooklyn Dr. Muck will play a most interesting programme. It comprises in order the Symphony No. 8 of Beethoven, which makes the first half; the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz; the "Mazeppa" symphonic poem of Liszt, and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." All of these are familiar except the Liszt symphonic poem, which has been played very seldom in this country. It is the sixth of the series of symphonic poems by Liszt, and was composed as a study for piano in 1836. This study was enlarged in 1837 and 1841, and about 1850 it was arranged and orchestrated by the composer. It was inspired not by Byron's poem, but by Victor Hugo's poem of the same name, which was written in 1826 and published in "Les Orientales" in 1829. The first performance of the work was on Easter Sunday, April 16, 1854, in the Grand Ducal Theatre at Weimar, at a charity concert of the Court Orchestra. Liszt conducted from manuscript. It is a work exceedingly characteristic of the composer, and in merit ranks high among the compositions of its class.

John McCormack, the Irish

From TIMES
Address: New York
Date

Established:

MUSIC HERE A

DR. KARL MUCK will make his reappearance after an absence of four years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the first pair of concerts of the orchestra, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, Nov. 7, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 9. The evening concert will begin as usual at 8:15 and the matinee at 2:30. The programme for Thursday evening is the same as that with which he opened the Boston season. It is as follows:

Symphony in E major, No. 3, "Eroica"	Beethoven
Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain"	Berlioz
"Mazeppa," symphonic poem	Liszt
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"	Wagner

The programme for Saturday afternoon will begin with the Symphony in E Major, by Hermann Bischoff, which Dr. Muck brought here as a novelty five years ago next Spring. The programme in order for Saturday afternoon is as follows:

Symphony in E major, No. 16	Bischoff
"Siegfried Idyl"	Wagner
"Euryanthe"	Weber

⁂

George Hamlin will give a song recital

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. The center of attraction will be Dr. Karl Muck, who makes his first appearance here after an absence of four years. Doctor Muck will play the same program as that with which he opened his season in Boston. It comprises in order the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, which makes the first half of the program; the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz, the "Mazeppa" symphonic poem of Liszt and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

All of these are familiar except the Liszt symphonic poem, which has been played seldom in this country. It is the sixth of the series of symphonic poems by Lizst and was composed as a study for piano in 1836. This study was enlarged in 1837 and 1841 and about 1850 it was arranged and orchestrated by the composer. It was inspired not by Byron's poem but by Victor Hugo's poem of the same name, which was written in 1828 and published in "Les Orientales" in 1829. The first performance of the work was on Easter Sunday, April 16, 1854, in the Grand Ducal Theater, at Weimar, at a charity concert of the court orchestra. Liszt conducted from manuscript. It is a work exceedingly characteristic of the composer and in merit ranks high among the compositions of its class

---

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 2 1912

Est 1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is accustomed to say that one of the most satisfactory concert halls in this country for sound is the Lyric Theater, and that he got more satisfaction out of brilliant works here than from almost any other hall he was acquainted with, either in Amerca or in Europe. At the first concert of the Boston Orchestra, on next Wednesday evening, Dr. Muck will place the acoustics of the Lyric at a test with Biwchoff's Symphony in E major, which Baltimore will hear for the first time. It is a work of great technical difficulty, extraordinary complexity and, under favorable conditions, it "sounds" magnificently. In the Lyric Theater the effects of parts of it should be nothing less than gorgeous.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York
Date

, 1884

Dr. Karl Muck will make his New York reappearance, after an absence of four years, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday evening. The programme will include Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Berlioz's "Carnival Romain" overture, Lizst's "Mazeppa" music and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." On Saturday afternoon the famous Boston orchestra will play Bischoff's Symphony in E major, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe."

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 3 1912

Estab

The usual series of lecture recitals preliminary to the philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and on their programmes, will be given this season. The first is set in the lecture hall, Academy of Music, on Thursday of this week, at 4 o'clock. Louis C. Elson of Boston will discuss the music, and Alfred De Voto, pianist, will be the assisting artist.

PASTE OVER

From STAATS-ZEITUNG

Address: New York.

Date

Establis

Erſtes Konzert der „Boſtoner".

Das erſte Konzert der neuen Saiſon giebt das rühmlichſt bekannte Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſter am nächſten Freitag Abend im Opernſaale der Academy of Muſic unter den Auſpizien der Brooklyner Philharmoniſchen Geſellſchaft und des Brooklyn Inſtituts für Künſte und Wiſſenſchaften. Mit dem Konzerte wird ein Empfang für den genialen Dr. Karl Muck den neuerdings zum Leiter des Orcheſters erkorenen hervorragenden Muſiker, verbunden ſein, der von ſeiner früheren Thätigkeit als Leiter der „Boſtoner" her zahlreiche Freunde und Verehrer in Brooklyn hat. Das Konzertprogramm enthält Nummern von Beethoven, Berlioz, Liszt und Wagner.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From HERALD

Address: New York

Date NOV 3 1912

Establis

IT will not be a local orchestra that will open the season of symphonic music here this year. On the contrary, the first big gun will be fired in Carnegie Hall on Thursday night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck directing. As has been its custom for years, the Boston Symphony will give its concerts here in pairs and the mate to Thursday night's concert will be played on Saturday afternoon. These concerts will mark the reappearance of Dr. Muck after an absence of four years.

Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and compositions by Berlioz, Liszt and Wagner will have places on the programme on Thursday night. Bischoff's E major symphony will be the principal work played on Saturday afternoon. It has not been heard here in five years.

From WORLD

Address New York

Date NOV 3 1912

The welcome to Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be given next Friday evening at the Academy of Music, when the Boston Symphony will be heard in the first of the five Philharmonic concerts to be given under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, and the Department of Music of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. The Executive Committee of the Woman's Auxiliary Board for these much-heralded concerts includes: Mrs. Camden C. Dike, ex-officio; Mrs. Frank M. Lupton, Mrs. Charles F. Pray, Mrs. Dwight P. Clapp, Miss Katherine S. Dreier, Mrs. Thomas R. French, Mrs. A. Augustus Healy, Mrs. Otto Heinicke, Mrs. John S. Frothingham, Mrs. Otto Goepel, Mrs. Franklin W. Hooper, Mrs. William S. Packer, Mrs. George W. Notman, Mrs. Lowell M. Palmer, Mrs. Thomas Prosser, Mrs. J. H. Recknagel, Miss Marion J. Terry, Mrs. John Van B. Thayer, Mrs. J. Eliott Langstaff, Mrs. Paul Lichtenstein, Mrs. Henry R. Mallory, Mrs. George W. Wingate and Mrs. E. J. Grant.

From TRIBUNE

Address: New York.

Date

, 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Dr. Karl Muck will make his reappearance, after an absence of four years, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the first pair of concerts of the orchestra to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, November 7, and Saturday afternoon, November 9. The evening concert will begin as usual at 8:15, and the matinee at 2:30. The programme for Thursday evening is the same as that with which he opened the Boston season. It is as follows:

Symphony in E major, No. 3, "Eroica," ....Beethoven
Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain"........Berlioz
Symphonic poem, "Mazeppa"..............Liszt
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ....Wagner

The programme for Saturday afternoon will begin with the Symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff, which Dr. Muck brought here as a novelty five years ago next spring. This, in Dr. Muck's opinion, is quite the most important work of the younger German composers, and when he played it here five years ago it made a deep impression on those who heard it. Moreover, it gives an orchestra full opportunity to display its virtuosity. The programme in order for Saturday afternoon is as follows:

Symphony in E major, No. 16..........Bischoff
"Siegfried Idyl" ....Wagner
"Euryanthe" ....Weber

From SUN

Address: New York

Date NOV 3 - 1912

1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY THIS WEEK.

Karl Muck's Orchestra Will Give First Pair of Concerts.

Dr. Karl Muck will make his reappearance after an absence of four years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the first pair of concerts of the orchestra to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, November 7, and Saturday afternoon, November 9. The evening concert will begin as usual at 8:15 and the matinée at 2:30. The programme for Thursday evening is the same as that with which he opened the Boston season. It is as follows:

CONCERTS OF THE WEEK

SUNDAY;
George Hamlin, song recital, Aeolian Hall, 3 P. M.

MONDAY:
Blanche Arral, song recital, Aeolian Hall, 3 P. M.

THURSDAY:
Beatrice Wainwright, song recital, Carnegie Lyceum, 3:15 P. M.
Charles H. Granville, song recital, Aeolian Hall, 8:15 P. M.
:15 P. M.
3:10 P. M.
P. M.
30 P. M.
30 P. M.

From SUN

Address: New York

Date NOV 3 - 1912

Establis 1884

The return of Dr. Carl Muck to the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the most pregnant incidents of the current season. Dr. Muck was the director of this same orchestra in 1906-07 and the following season, but his engagement with the royal proprietor of the Berlin Opera, namely, the King of Prussia, better known to the world as the German Emperor, compelled him to give up the American position and return to the cheerful shades of Unter den Linden. Max Fiedler came to occupy the Bostonian podium until such time as Dr. Muck could be released from the rule of the iron hand.

It has been an open secret for at least two years that he was to return, but newsmongers were prayerfully besought not to publish the fact lest the very publication might drive the Kaiser to rescind his permission to the great musician to leave Germany. That his departure is a distinct loss to Berlin may be readily understood. The deprivation of the Royal Opera by his absence is precisely as great as that which would be experienced by the Metropolitan Opera House if Mr. Toscanini should leave it.

Dr. Muck is in the full vigor of his physical and intellectual life. He was born in the charming city of Wurzburg on October 22, 1859. His father, a councillor of Bavaria, was a genuine lover of music and also a musician of fine accomplishments. He gave his son lessons in violin and piano forte playing, and also in stern theoretic matters. At the unripe age of 11 the child was permitted to appear in public as a pianist.

But it does not appear that anything happened to induce the father to keep the child before the world. He went forward with the customary training of a German youth. When he had finished his gymnasium course he spent two years in the University of Heidelberg and next, from 1877 to 1879, studied philosophy, classic philology and history of music at the University of Leipsic. In the last named city he also entered the conservatory, being in the classes of E. F. Richter and the father of so many musicians, Karl Reinecke. He made his adult debut as a pianist at a Gewandhaus concert in February, 1880, and in the same year the University of Leipsic gave him the degree of doctor of philosophy. He was genuinely successful as a pianist, but the ambition to be a conductor was already stirring within him, and he departed from Leipsic to become a chorus director in the Stadt Theatre at Zurich.

In 1881 he became conductor of opera at Salzburg, where he saturated himself in the worship of Mozart. From 1882 to 1884 he conducted the opera at Brunn and then went to the Gratz opera for two years. From 1886 to 1892 he was the conductor of the German Theatre in Prague conducted by Angelo Neumann, the friend of Wagner and the projector of the famous travelling Wagner theatre. Dr. Muck also conducted the Prague philharmonic concerts. He went with the Neumann travelling Wagner theatre to Russia, where he conducted the performances of "Der Ring des Nibelungen" in St. Petersburg and Moscow in 1889. In his "Personal Recollections of Wagner" Neumann wrote:

"I had sent the conductor on ahead for careful preparatory rehearsals, and Dr. Muck acquitted himself magnificently of his task. I can safely say that, as far as orchestra was concerned, our 'Nibelungen' performances in St. Petersburg compared most favorably with Bayreuth itself. Aside from Muck's understanding of his subject he gave himself up to the work with such genuine eagerness and such an unselfish devotion to his art that he deserved the highest praise and called for the admiration and appreciation of all."

In 1891, under Neumann's management, Dr. Muck conducted the first performances in Berlin of "Cavalleria Rusticana," Weber's "Drei Pintos," as arranged by Gustave Mahler, and Peter Cornelius's opera "The Barber of Bagdad," which had some presentations at the Metropolitan Opera House and ought to be revived. But that is another story.

It was at this time that the Kaiser looked with royal favor upon Dr. Muck and engaged him, of course through his intendant, to conduct at the Berlin opera. He became also conductor of the oratorio concerts given by the opera chorus and the concerts of the Wagner Society. He made many excursions as "guest" and as such directed orchestral concerts in St. Petersburg, Moscow, Copenhagen and Paris. He also went to Spain to conduct court concerts by the royal orchestra, and had a similar engagement in Budapest. In London he conducted performances of the Philharmonic Society and also the representations of "Der Ring des Nibelungen" at Covent Garden. He was called to Bayreuth in 1901 to direct the performances of "Parsifal" and he directed them again in 1902, 1904 and 1906 and every summer since that.

It is pretty safe to say that Dr. Muck is delighted to return to Boston. This is perhaps not so much because he revels in the atmosphere of Copley Square or Newberry street, where the highbrows gather to tell the things which ought to be, but rather because he will once more have opportunity to play upon his favorite instrument and not be troubled by the egotism of opera singers.

Whether Dr. Muck has ever said it or not, he is credited with having whispered once in the inmost privacy of his domicile that in his humble opinion the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the best orchestra in the world. There are two or three other men in Europe who have had the hardihood to say this same thing when they have been where they were sure that no Berlin reporter could hear them. Of course no one takes the trouble to say such a thing secretly in Paris, for there is no mortal power which can make a Frenchman believe that anything outside of his country is as good as anything inside of it.

But in Germany they have of late been worried. They have heard Caruso fairly often and they have given up untold marks with cheerful alacrity. They have opened their own eyes to the disconcerting fact that an appreciable number of their best opera singers are Americans and that on the other hand those who used to be their best are now delighting the inhabitants of the Western Hemisphere. So if it were to leak out that so eminent an authority as Dr. Muck had said that the Boston Symphony was the leading orchestra of the world the Berliners would be just a little worried, because they naturally think that there cannot possibly be anything to equal the Berlin Philharmonic under Arthur Nikisch.

Neverth[illegible] sure that when Dr. Muck took up again the baton to direct a rehearsal of the gentlemen of Boston despite the fact that he missed some of the old faces and found some unfamiliar ones in front of him his artistic soul experienced a splendid moment. For he found that old fountain of glorious musical tone yet fresh and generous, and he must have realized that it was within his grasp to fashion into perfect form the dreams of his musical imagination.

As for the music lovers of this city they are to be warmly congratulated. Nothing in deprecation of the admirable conducting of Mr. Fiedler need be said. He earned and in this place he received plenty of warm praise. But it is an indisputable fact that the two greatest masters of the baton in Germany to-day are Nikisch and Muck, and it is therefore a cause for rejoicing that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a truly American institution, is to be under the command of this brilliant and experienced general.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is fortunate in many things. It is happy, secure and apparently perennial in its support by the open hand of Henry L. Higginson. This man has deserved well of his country. He served her in war, but peace has brought him a greater victory. In keeping the Boston Symphony Orchestra independent and wholly devoted to art he has bestowed upon his fellow countrymen a gift more precious than valor on the battlefield, for it is incontrovertible that a thing of beauty is a joy forever.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's personnel has undergone many changes, but the high level of its excellence has never been permitted to sag. Indeed it is not wronging the splendid players of early days to say that the orchestra was never more uniform in ability and worth than it is now. And this condition is due partly to the liberality of Col. Higginson. The best man in Europe is the standard for every new engagement. If there is a better man in this country and he is available, he is the man for the post. But conditions which exist here put many excellent musicians out of competition for places in the Boston orchestra.

Union musicians are naturally not wanted. Some years back an attempt was made to bring the pressure of the musical union to bear on the Boston organization, but Col. Higginson put an end to the proceedings in a summary manner. He declared for publication that on the day when the Boston Symphony Orchestra became a union orchestra he would disband it forever. Nothing more was heard about unionizing it.

And because it is not a union orchestra the highest results are obtainable. The labor union principle is radically hostile to art. It is the worm at the root of musical affairs in this city. Let us then be grateful that Boston can send us its free orchestra and that we can enjoy its playing under the direction of a man conceded to be one of the foremost powers in the world of tonal art.

A subtle, active, penetrating intellect is the chief characteristic of Dr. Muck. To look at him one would believe that his greatest delight might be entangling an opponent in debate in a web of specious sophistry and smiling a wicked smile when too late the opponent discovered the trick. Perhaps the good doctor does this sort of thing in the smoky retirement of the St. Botolph Club, where the learned Thebans of Boston sit in the gray atmosphere and weave the threads of fate which they afterward split. But those who have heard great orchestral compositions performed under Muck know that there is something more than cold intellectual analysis in his readings. There is splendid and communicative musical enthusiasm. Who can forget the plaudits of that Carnegie Hall audience which recalled him eight times after a reading of the C minor symphony of Brahms? Never did the grand composition sound more vital and more poetic. Let us hope that we shall hear such things often.

Some there are who have sat in the gloom and silence of the sacred Festspielhaus at Bayreuth when Dr. Muck conducted "Parsifal." There too one could quickly learn that the Mephistophelian countenance of Muck was only a mask to disguise noble feelings. After conducting "Parsifal" the doctor could eat a substantial supper, which showed him to be a man. Furthermore he could eat another solid meal the next night after hearing "Lohengrin" conducted by Siegfried Wagner, and that came pretty near to proving him to be superman.

NOVEMBER 7.
TRANSCRIPT.

NEWS OF MUSIC

Pensions and the Symphony Orchestra

FROM the offices of the Symphony Orchestra comes this note of gentle admonition and striking comparison about its Pension Fund: "The importance of the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra steadily increases, and within the next few years the claims upon it will be difficult to fill unless the friends of the orchestra give most loyal support to the two concerts undertaken each season to increase it. The gradual retirement of the older members of the orchestra must continue if it is to be maintained at its present high standard, and it is only just that their reward in the shape of a pension should be secure. When one compares the Pension Fund of the Boston Orchestra with that possessed by several orchestras in Germany, the result is wholly in favor of the Germans. For example, the Tönhalle Orchestra, organized in Munich a few years ago to take the place of the Kaim Orchestra, has now a pension fund of over $250,000, all subscribed by friends of the organization. A few scattered gifts have been made to the Pension Fund of the Boston Orchestra, but the bulk of it has come from the assessments of the members themselves and from the two concerts each season to swell it."

TRANSCRIPT.
NOVEMBER 8, 1912

l Plays

Dr. Muck in New York Again

The Conductor Reappears with Warm Applause and Hearty Praise

FOR the first time since Dr. Muck returned to the Boston Orchestra, he conducted last evening in New York, where the band reappeared for the first concert in its annual series. His programme was that of his first pair of concerts in Boston, viz.: Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony; Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival;" Liszt's tone-poem, "Mazeppa," and Wagner's prelude to his opera, "Die Meistersinger." Carnegie Hall was occupied to the last place in seat and standing room. The audience was most cordial to the returning conductor and the reviewers for the New York newspapers are as warm in praise this morning—when they have finished reciting the ancient history of Dr. Muck's past achievements and adventures.

Says the Times, by the pen of Mr. Aldrich: "There was a real and beautiful rejoicing last evening in Carnegie Hall, expressed with unmistakable enthusiasm, when Dr. Karl Muck appeared upon the platform to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the first concert of its twenty-seventh season in New York. There was an enormous audience, as large a one as the hall will accommodate, most of whose members had memories of the two seasons in which Dr. Muck was previously at the head of the Boston Orchestra. Their memories made them justly eager to welcome him back to the position which he filled then with such preëminent distinction.

"The conductor had shown his power to raise the Boston Orchestra to its highest technical efficiency and to employ its powers to the finest ends. He had revealed his wide musical sympathies, his readiness to assimilate music of the most diverse tendencies, his devotion to the interests of the composer in bringing his work to the fullest realization, his eagerness to expend all his skill to that effect, even when his own personal likings were not wholly engaged. Always he stood as an interpreter of the composer's work, never as one displaying himself, his personality, his temperament, or impressing them upon the music, or endeavoring to find in it something that no one else had found, or anything that the composer had not put there.

"Such Dr. Muck showed himself again last evening to be; and in some of these respects he differs markedly from some other modern conductors. He is now, as he was then, a man of power and authority, a musician of subtle and sensitive feeling, a conductor of the highest skill, a wonder worker with the marvellous instrument he controls. The orchestra itself showed a few new forces; but its quality has not changed.

"The performance of the symphony was of splendid virility, breadth, and eloquence. It revealed nothing new; but it revealed the 'Eroica' symphony. It was nobly proportioned, dignified, full of poetry and marked by exquisite finish, finesse, and innumerable subtleties of accent, phrasing, and dynamics. One of its most notable qualities was its rhythmic vitality. Dr. Muck was free in his modifications of the tempo, and in the symphony as in the other items of the programme he did not hesitate to let loose the full power of the orchestra. But these things were all for a purpose, and the purpose was superbly fulfilled. Dr. Muck was again and again recalled, and he finally caused the whole orchestra to rise and share the applause with him."

TRANSCRIPT,
NOVEMBER 4,

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

THE DRUMS OF BEETHOVEN AND A MORAL

Another Victory for Critical Freedom—The New Æolian Hall Opened and Tested—Gottfried Galston Proves an Interesting and Notable Pianist—Posthumous Dvorak in Chicago—Approaching Opera Singers—Mr. Godowsky's Plans—Bakst Expelled from Russia—Items and Opinions

NOWADAYS we listeners would count the performance of a symphony by Beethoven tame, if the kettledrums were not smitten in it with large and telling emphasis. The text-books of music like to say that Beethoven found the drum a noise and left it a solo instrument, and they cite instance after instance in which he used it with musical and dramatic imagination and significance. The conductors of our time have taken the composer and the pedagogues at their word and they are not content unless the drum-beats are as lusty as they were at Symphony Hall in the eighth symphony on Saturday evening, or as Mahler bade them be in some of his performances of Beethoven's music. He seemed sometimes to wish for tympanists with the strength and the accuracy of steam-hammers. Dr. Muck halts at a more temperate and sensitive, but still a very vigorous, beating. The tympanist, as Mr. Neumann did last week, rejoices accordingly. For is he not for the moment, the soloist of his solo instrument?

Only the very pedantic object to this lusty smiting, this emphatic prominence, of the kettledrums in Beethoven's music. Almost in spite of themselves, they have submitted to the unconquerable fact that Beethoven was not a genteel spirit; that he could be boisterous and that he loved the power of sound. The imaginative, being a self-willed folk, have even rejoiced that conductors, like Mahler and Dr. Muck, have at last felt the poignancy and the power of Beethoven's drums and have set themselves and their drummers to realize it. All goes well, then, with the strenuous and the penetrating Beethovenian drumbeats. But when a contemporary composer, especially an "advanced" and innovating composer, releases his kettledrums with imagination, insistence and power, daring bold technical feats and unusual emphasis or suggestion, he—poor devil!—is only making a "cacophonous" and "unpleasant" din in ears that listen in tranquil enjoyment to their hallowed Beethoven. Yet, what these "ultra-moderns" are doing with their drums is exactly what Beethoven did in his day. The "conservatives" raised the like objections and professed the same acute suffering. In the world of music, as in other worlds, "the more it changes, the more is it the same thing." H. T. P.

The Overlooked Casals

Now that the Symphony Orchestra is annually calling some virtuoso from Europe to play at ten or a dozen of its concerts in Boston and other cities, as it summoned Mr. Hofmann last winter and as it will soon bring Mr. Kreisler, the wonder is that it still overlooks Mr. Casals. By common consent, he is the most eminent of living violoncellists, whose qualities as an executive and interpetative musician do not merely quicken adepts and reviewers but stir the average audience in Germany, in England, in France, to an appreciation and an excitement that no other violoncellist in present memory has kindled. Mr. Casals is not only a master of his instrument, excelling all his brethren in quality and diversity; he is not only a musician of sensitive and deep feeling; he is also a man of highly reflective, imaginative and introspective mind which gives his playing a curious "personal note." By common consent also, there is no audience for violoncellists in America. But there is an audience for the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in every city and so Mr. Casals would be assured of a public worthy of him. To bring him hither, next season, would be an enterprise worthy of the orchestra. And he has not appeared in America since he was the obscure violoncellist of the forgotten Emma Nevada's itinerant concert company.

MERCURY,
, OCTOBER 30, 1912.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

First Concert of Its Present Season Given at the Theatre.

At the New Bedford Theatre last evening the Boston Symphony orchestra gave the first concert of its present season, the occasion serving to introduce Dr. Carl Muck, the new conductor, to a local audience. The soloist was Sylvain Noack, violinist and second concert master of the orchestra, and the programme was as follows:

Sgambati—Symphony in D major, N
1, Op. 16.
I. Allegro vivace, non troppo
II. Andante Mesto.
III. Scherzo, Presto: Trio un poco meno.
IV. Serenata: Andante.
V. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.
Pfitzner—Ovevture to Das Christ-Elflein (The Little Christ-Elf), a Christmas Fairy Story in Three acts by Ilse von Stach, Op. 20.
Mozart—Concerto for Violin, in D Major, No. 4, (K. 218.)
I. Allegro.
II. Andante cantabile.
III. Rondo. Andantino grazioso.
[illegible]

It is with real sorrow that it is recorded that there were many empty chairs in the theatre last evening, for to have an orchestra like the Boston Symphony visit the city each season is one of the greatest artistic privileges that New Bedford can hope to enjoy. Audiences at high-class concerts are made up of varied elements; there are the real lovers of music who have the money to spend to gratify their tastes, and who sit in what are considered the most desirable seats, and there are those whose love of music is equally intense, but who, from motives of economy must occupy the cheaper places. Then there are the people who think it is "the thing" to be seen at these affairs and as snobbishness is a powerful motive in human actions these dear souls are very likely to be present. Then there are a few present of the large class who, so they will say, "passionately love music"—did ever a real music lover use the banal phrase?—but who are most conspicuous by their absence at musical performances where anything more than a nominal charge is made for admission. These people have multifarious excuses—somebody was ill in the family, they had a previous engagement, or, the old standby, somebody said there was not a seat to be had. The true reason is probably that the real musical appreciation of the "passionate lovers" is very tepid, and that a thousand uses for their money come ahead of the simple determination to buy a ticket for a good concert and let some other gratification go hang.

Private entertaining is often a potent enemy of public performances. A hostess, no matter how insignificant she may be, enjoys a certain distinction when she receives people in her home and offers them meat and drink. Except in circles, the most sophisticated, the host or hostess cannot be ignored, and with that unconscious and uncanny ability to seize the main chance, that characterizes most of human nature, the dear soul, passionately fond of music, spends her spare cash on a little entertainment where for a few brief hours she can be the one who cannot be ignored, the star, the centre of the stage. While many whom one would expect to be there last evening were conspicuous by their absence yet there was a large and enthusiastic audience present who awaited the new and famous conductor with interest, greeted him cordially and expressed much satisfaction in his splendid leadership.

Dr. Muck, tall and lithe, of alert significant action, with a tremondous profile—the profile of a real leader—led his band in the masterly way which his reputation had led one to expect, but in the selection of the programme of this particular concert he left something to be desired. To publics who have symphony concerts for many weeks each season, year in and year out, there is probably a certain relief in hearing an occasional symphony that must be called second best, for the sake of its novelty, but here in New Bedford while appreciative of, and ever craving novelty, we could wish it to be something not only previously unheard but very very good as well. Of course Sgambati's work has many points of excellence, it is graceful, not too facile, and charmingly scored, but scarcely the work to fill three-quarters of an hour of an evening that to many is an important and unusual event. The serenade, for instance, promised well; it was well constructed, there was the proper romantic preparation, the plucked strings, the flowing, diminishing tone, and then when the expected melody came, it seemed to have neither romantic inspiration nor classic elevation. It was like a curtain raised with great ceremony only to reveal an empty stage, and the allegro con fuoco into which the Serenata led was little more than well ordered and rythmic noise. We are told that this is the only Italian symphony played outside Italy. The fact that it is played shows the eagerness of conductors to get hold of meritorious works and that Italians in spite of their great work in opera, are not symphonists of the best class.

The second number , the overture, by Pfitzner began to be interesting only as it was ending and it was only in the Mozart Concerto that real pleasure began. This concerto, in spite of its stilted cadenzas with their obvious show-off qualities, contains some of the loveliness that is inseparable from Mozart's music, and its beautiful, clear-cut little melodies with their gaiety and hints of sadness, their beauty of outline and their crystalline delicacy of tone, made an excellent vehicle for the exhibition of Mr. Noank's finished playing. The player kept his interpretation steadily in line with the formal character of the music he played and won his auditors by the perfection of his work, a perfection that refused to stoop to any concert tricks or lapses of taste. He was warmly greeted by his fellows in the orchestra and equally warmly received by the audience.

There were a number of new players in the band and it was interesting as well as instructive to watch how carefully they followed the conductor's slightest motion, while among the more seasoned musicians there was not nearly so much nodding and glancing and smiling as formerly characterized them. A new broom is evidently to be respected, and for a final mixing of metaphors, let the new broom but call the flowers that form its bouquet and combine them with a little greater harmony of colors and delicacy of contrast, and all will be well.

MONITOR,
NOVEMBER 9,

George Proctor, pianist, will be the soloist at the fifth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra Nov. 8 and 9. Mr. Proctor will be heard in Tschaikowsky's second piano concerto in G major. This work is named but once in the catalogue of performances which is kept in the orchestra library, having been presented at a concert of the season of 1897-98, when Alexander Siloti was the soloist. The first piano concerto of Tschaikowsky's, in B flat minor, is recorded in the catalogue as having been played on an average once a year.

The "Pathetic" symphony and the B minor concerto have come to be regarded as Tschaikowsky's most important contributions to music. They command the attention of an audience before which they are played in the same compelling way that Beethoven's fifth symphony and "Leonora" overture, No. 3, command it. No revival of the early symphonies of Tschaikowsky ever makes the public change its mind about the superior emotional value of his last achievement. On the other hand, no revival of the G major concerto is likely to lessen the popularity of the early B minor concerto. Freshness, elesticity and assurance of inspiration characterize the favorite piano work; correspondingly, nature insight, perfect command of technique and unerring style characterize the favorite orchestral work. But these are not good reasons for an organization that presents 24 programs a year neglecting Tschaikowsky's other efforts in the same forms of composition. For a composer's productions of the first order are understood only in their relation to those of the second order. A public that knows why the "Pathetic" symphony is a greater work than the Symphony No. 4 has the artistic advantage over one that only knows that the "Pathetic" is one in the best half dozen orchestral pieces ever written. A local artist could do no higher service than Mr. Proctor will do in enlarging the opportunity of Symphony listeners for comparative listening by his study of the neglected piano concerto.

Works named in association with the solo piece are the first symphony of Sibelius, which was presented by Dr. Muck, the only time it was ever given at the Symphony concerts in 1907; Glazounoff's "Overture sollennelle" and Charbrier's "Espana" rhapsody.

* * *

In making out the Wagner program for the first pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be given in Symphony hall Sunday evening, Nov. 17, Dr. Muck has set aside the usual overture to "Tannhauser," and has taken the Paris version, which includes the introduction and bacchanale. He will present the Funeral music from "Goetterdaemmerung," the overtures to "Rienzi," and the "Flying Dutchman," and the Preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," "Die Meistersinger" and "Parsifal."

* * *

The second concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Cambridge will be given Thursday evening, Nov. 14, in Sanders Theatre with Miss Florence Hinkle as soloist. Miss Hinkle will sing "Depuis le jour" from Charpentier's opera "Louise," and Micaela's air from the third act of "Carmen." The orchestral numbers will be Sgambati's symphony in D major, the "Siegfried Idyl" of Wa[illegible] and the "Euryanthe" overt[illegible]

AMERICAN-
NOVEMBER 10,

FIFTH SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

Selections from Tschaikowsky and Glazounoff This Week.

While the fifth Symphony program for the coming week to be played on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening is not entirely Slavic, it has a strong Northern tinge, for it contains a symphony by Sibelius, an overture by Glazounoff and a piano concerto by Tschaikowsky. These are offset by the final number, Chabrier's "Espana" Rhapsody.

Although none of the three works referred to will be new to Boston audiences, they are seldom played, and so long a time has elapsed since their last performances, that to a majority of the hearers they will come as novelties. The symphony in Sibelius's first in E-minor. This composition had its first and only performances in Boston under Dr. Muck on January 4 and 5, 1907.

Glazounoff will be represented by his "Ouverture Solennelle." He is today, since the death of Rimsky-Korsakoff, the foremost figure in Russian music, but it is said of him that he has not entirely justified the promise held out by his earlier works.

Tschaikowsky's Concerto for Piano in G-major, which Mr. Proctor, the soloist, has elected to play, has been on a Symphony program but once, and that fourteen years ago, so for the vast majority of patrons it will be absolutely new.

The order of the programme is as follows: Sibelius, Symphony No. 1 in E-minor; Glazounoff, [illegible] opus 73; Tschaikowsk[illegible] in G-major; [illegible]

Cambridge Symphony.

The second symphony concert in Cambridge will be given next Thursday evening in Sanders Theatre with Miss Florence Hinkle as soloist. Miss Hinkle is gratefully remembered by all those who heard the Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto last Winter for her exquisite singing of the solo part in the "Libera Me" of Verdi's 'Requiem." In Cambridge she will sing two numbers—first the charming air, "Depuis le jour," from Charpentier's opera "Louise," and second Micaela's air from the third act of "Carmen."

The orchestral numbers will be Sgambati's symphony in D-major, the "Siegfried Idyl" of Wagner, and "Euryanthe" overture of Weber. The Sgambeti Symphony, which Dr. Muck revived at the Boston concerts a few weeks ago, had unexpected success, and doubtless its reputation in Cambridge will attract to that concert a number of the regular Boston patrons who wish to hear it again. It was generally conceded that the "Siegfried Idyl" had never had a more beautiful performance than that given it by Dr. Muck. The concert in Cambridge begins at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY LAUDED BY CRITIC

New Yorker Finds Much to Commend in Orchestra and Conductor Muck.

W. J. Henderson, the learned music critic of the New York Sun, has been saying some pleasant things about our own orchestra and its conductor, Dr. Muck. They follow:

> The return of Dr. Carl Muck to the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the most pregnant incidents of the current season.
>
> Whether Dr. Muck has ever said it or not, he is credited with having whispered once in the inmost privacy of his domicile that in his humble opinion the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the best orchestra in the world. There are two or three other men in Europe who have had the hardihood to say this same thing when they have been where they were sure that no Berlin reporter could hear them. Of course, no one takes the trouble to say such a thing secretly in Paris, for there is no mortal power which can make a Frenchman believe that anything outside of his country is as good as anything inside of it.
>
> If it were to leak out that so eminent an authority as Dr. Muck had said that the Boston Symphony was the leading orchestra of the world the Berliners would be just a little worried, because they naturally think that there cannot possibly be anything to equal the Berlin Philharmonic under Arthur Nikisch.
>
> Nevertheless one may be reasonably sure that when Dr. Muck took up again the baton to direct a reheasal of the gentlemen of Boston, despite the fact that he missed some of the old faces and found some unfamiliar ones in front of him, his artistic soul experienced a splendid moment. For he found that old fountain of glorious musical tones yet fresh and generous, and he must have realized that it was within his grasp to fashion into perfect form the dreams of his musical imagination.
>
> As for the music lovers of this city they are to be warmly congratulated. Nothing in deprecation of the admirable conducting of Mr. Fiedler need be said. He earned and in this place he received plenty of warm praise. But it is an indisputable fact that the two greatest masters of the baton in Germany today are Nikisch and Muck, and it is therefore a cause for rejoicing that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a truly American institution, is to be under the command of this brilliant and experienced general.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is fortunate in many things. It is happy, secure and apparently perennial in its support by the open hand of Henry L. Higginson. This man has deserved well of his country. He served her in war, but peace has brought him a greater victory. In keeping the Boston Symphony Orchestra independent and wholly devoted to art he has bestowed upon his fellow countrymen a gift more precious than valor on the battlefield, for it is incontrovertible that a thing of beauty is a joy forever.

UNUSUAL OFFERINGS IN PENSION CONCERTS

Attractive Programs Arranged Every Year for Benefit of Symphony Pension Fund.

The pension fund of the symphony orchestra has had the warm support of the conductors of the orchestra since it was founded. Mr. Gericke, Dr. Muck, Mr. Fiedler and now again Dr. Muck have given their best efforts to the preparation of attractive programs. In consequence, the two annual pension fund concerts usually present some unusual features th[illegible] are missed in the regular series of Sym[illegible]phony Concerts. In Dr. Muck's first year here in 1906-7 he twice gave a Wagner program comprising various preludes and overtures to the different music dramas and each time Symph[illegible] was crowded to [illegible] utmost [illegible] other conductors may regard the subject, Dr. Muck's artistic conscience is against the idea of performing Wagner's music in the concert hall, yet again this year he has consented to make such a program for the reason of the great attraction it has for the general public. The program which will be played next Saturday evening virtually covers the whole field of Wagner's musical development from the Meyerbeerish stage of "Rienzi" to the unique position he occupied when he wrote "Parsifal."

---

The program differs only in one respect from that given in Dr. Muck's first year in Boston. Then he played the overtures to "Tannhauser," but next week he will play in place of this the much more attractive and thrilling Venusberg music preceded by the introduction.

When Wagner was arranging for the tragical performances of "Tannhauser" that were given in Paris in 1861 he was compelled by the conventions of the grand opera to insert a ballet. This he did in the first act, changing the formal overture into an introduction which ran directly into the Bacchanale which opens the opera.

This version is now commonly used in all except the most conservative opera houses of Germany and has not been played in this form by the Symphony Orchestra since the 31st of December, 1890, at a special Wagner concert under Arthur Nikisch. It has, of course, been heard here at the different performances of "Tannhauser" given by the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The program as arranged begins with the overture to "Rienzi," which will be followed by the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," and then the introduction and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser." The second part of the program will comprise the preludes to "Lohengrin," Tristan and Isolde" (but not the Liebestod and "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," [illegible]neral music from "Gotterdamme[illegible] the prelude to "Parsifal."

NOVEMBER 10, HERALD,

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The concerts given in aid of the pension fund of the Symphony Orchestra assume each year a greater importance not only in respect to the orchestra itself but to its patrons in this city. Under the conditions existing in music today this pension fund is a factor which adds greatly to the ease with which the services of distinguished musicians from Europe are secured. The great orchestras of Germany and Austria have such funds, some of them supported by the government, others given by friends of the orchestra and in most cases the German orchestras (such as can be compared with the Boston Symphony) are much better off in this respect. The Toukuenstler Orchestra of Munich, for example, organized within the last four years and not to be compared with the Boston Symphony, has already a pension fund nearly double the size of the Boston fund, all of which has been given by friends of music in Munich. The Boston pension fund has received comparatively few gifts. It relies almost wholly on the two concerts given each year for its benefit and upon the assessments paid by the members of the orchestra themselves. Each year the number of pensioners must necessarily increase and from now on it will be a constant struggle to keep the fund in a healthy condition.

The pension fund has had the warm support of the conductors and of the orchestra since it was founded. In Dr. Muck's first year here in 1906-07 he gave twice a Wagner program comprising various preludes and overtures to the different music dramas and each time Symphony Hall was crowded to its utmost capacity. Dr. Muck's artistic conscience is against the idea of performing Wagner's music in a concert hall, yet again this year he has consented to make such a program for the reason of the great attraction it has for the general public. The program which will be played next Sunday evening virtually covers the whole field of Wagner's musical development from the Meyerbeerish stage of "Rienzi" to the position he occupied when he wrote "Parsifal."

The program will begin with the overture to "Rienzi," which will be followed by the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" and then the introduction and bacchanale from "Tannhauser." The second part of the [illegible] will comprise the prelude [illegible] "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde" (but not the "Liebestod") and [illegible] Mastersingers of Nuremb[illegible] the funeral music from "[illegible]daemmerung" and the prelude to "Parsifal."

FIFTH SYMPHONY PROGRAM

While the Symphony program for the coming week to be played on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening is not entirely Slavic, it has a strong Northern tinge, for it contains a symphony by Sibelius, an overture by Glazounoff and a piano concerto by Tschaikowsky. These are offset by the final number, Chabrier's "Espana" rhapsody.

Although none of the three works referred to will be new to Boston audiences, they are so seldom played and so long a time has elapsed since their last performances, that, to a majority of the hearers they will come as novelties. The symphony is Sibelius's first in E minor. This composition had its first and only performances in Boston under Dr. Muck on Jan. 4 and 5, 1907. Mr. Fiedler played the second symphony which had already been played by Mr. Gericke, but he passed over the first which, in the opinion of many, is the greater of the two. The third and fourth symphonies are rated as failures.

Glazounoff will be represented by his "Ouverture Solennelle," which was written under the name of Festival overture for one of the series of Russian symphony concerts which a band of Russian composers gave in St. Petersburg through the nineties. Its only performance here was under Mr Gericke [illegible]

G major, which Mr. Proctor, the soloist, has elected to play, has been on a Symphony program but once and that 14 years ago, so for the vast majority of patrons it will be absolutely new. It was played here by Alexander Siloti, who, to the regret of many, never returned to this country. The repertoire of pianoforte concertos is not so large that it cannot bear additions of this kind. The order is as follows: Sibelius, Symphony No. 1 in E minor; Glazounoff, Overture Solennelle, opus 73; Tschaikowsky, concerto for pianoforte in G major; Chabrier, rhapsody for orchestra, "Espana."

SYMPHONY IN CAMBRIDGE

The second Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given next Thursday evening in Sanders Theatre, with Miss Florence Hinkle as soloist. She is gratefully remembered by all those who heard the Mendelssohn choir of Toronto last winter for her exquisite singing. In Cambridge she will sing "Depuis le jour" from "Louise" and Micaela's air from "Carmen." The orchestral numbers will be Sgambati's symphony in D-major, the "Siegfried Idyl" and "Euryanthe" overture. The Sgambati symphony which Dr. Muck revived at the Boston concerts a few weeks ago had unexpected success. It was generally conceded that the "Siegfried Idyl" had never had a more beautiful performance than that given it by Dr. Muck. The concert in Cambridge begins at 8 o'clock.

NOVEMBER 10 GLOBE

Unfamiliar Works At The Symphony Concerts

Dr Muck's numbers at the Symphony concerts this week will bear the guise of novelties, although they are not actually such. There will be three works from Northern composers: The first symphony in E Minor by Sebelius, Glazounoff's "Ouverture Solennelle" and Tschaikowsky's G Major concerto for piano played by George Proctor as soloist. The final number will be Chabrier's "Espana" Rhapsody.

Dr Muck gave the Sebelius symphony its first and only performances in Boston in January, 1907. Mr Fiedler, although liberal in his choice of Sibelius on his programs, did not repeat it, and it is said the more recent third and fourth symphonies are not considered successes.

The only performances of the Glazounow in Boston were under Mr Gericke in February, 1902. The piano concerto has been on a symphony program but once, and that 14 years ago, when it was played by the Russian pianist, Siloti. Abroad as in America the more popular concerto in B flat minor [illegible]perseded it.

All Wagner Program At Pension Fund Concert

The concerts given in aid of the pension fund of the Symphony Orchestra assume each year a greater importance not only in respect to the orchestra itself but to its patrons in this city. Under the conditions existing in music today this pension fund is a factor which adds greatly to the ease with which the services of distinguished musicians from Europe are secured. The great orchestras of Germany and Austria have such funds, some of them supported by the Government, others given by friends of the orchestra, and in most cases the German orchestras (such as can be compared with the Boston Symphony, are much better off in this respect.

The Ton Kunstler Orchestra at Munich, for example, organized within the last four years and not to be compared with the Boston Symphony, has already a pension fund nearly double the size of the Boston fund, all of which has been given by friends of music in Munich. The Boston pension fund has received comparatively few gifts and it must rely almost entirely upon the two concerts given each year for its benefit and upon the assessments paid by the members of the orchestra themselves. Each year the number of pensioners must necessarily increase and from now on it will be a constant struggle to keep the fund in a healthy condition.

The Pension Fund concerts usually present some unusual features that are missed in the regular series of Symphony concerts. In Dr Muck's first year here in, 1906-07, he gave twice a Wagner program comprising various preludes and overtures to the different music dramas and each time Symphony Hall was crowded to its utmost capacity. However other conductors may regard the subject, Dr Muck's artistic conscience is against the idea of performing Wagner's music in the concert hall, yet again this year he has consented to make such a program for the reason of the great attraction it has for the general public.

The program which will be played next Sunday evening virtually covers the whole field of Wagner's musical development from the Meyerbeerish stage of "Rienzi" to the unique position he occupied when he wrote "Parsifal." The program differs only in one respect from that given in Dr Muck's first year in Boston. Then he played the overture to "Tannhauser," but next week he will play in place of this the much more attractive and thrilling Venusberg music, preceded by the introduction.

When Wagner was arranging for the tragical performances of "Tannhauser" that were given in Paris in 1861 he was compelled by the conventions of the grand opera to insert a ballet. This he did in the first act, changing the formal overture into an introduction, which ran directly into the Bacchanale which opens the opera. This version is now commonly used in all except the most conservative opera houses of Germany and has not been played in this form by the Symphony Orchestra since the 31st of December, 1890, at a special Wagner concert, under Arthur Nikisch. It has, of course, been heard here at the different performances of "Tannhauser" given by the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The program as arranged begins with the overture to "Rienzi," which will be followed by the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" and then the introduction and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser." The second part of the program will comprise the preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde" (but not the Liebestod) and "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," the funeral music from "Gotterdammerung" and the prelude to "Parsifal."

SUNDAY POST, NOVMEBER 10,

The opening month of the concert season in Boston has been the most uneventful in many years. The coming week, however, offers a number of concerts of uncommon interest. This afternoon the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, with Mr. Stransky conducting, and Mischa Elman as a very popular soloist, will undoubtedly draw its audience, and for the following Sunday the pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with a Wagner programme, will make its certain appeal. The Symphony programmes of the week are the most interesting that Dr. Muck has so far devised. The Symphony of Sibelius, No. 1, in E minor, has been heard only once in Boston. It is not so great a work as the second symphony, but it is a work full of talent and originality, even if that originality shows itself through a somewhat conventional mask, even if it is far from full-fledged.

In addition at the concerts this week Mr. George Proctor has had the laudable initiative to elect to play the little known second piano concerto of Tschaikowsky, a work not perhaps so great as the familiar concerto in B flat minor, but nevertheless full of color, melodic appeal, and concluding in a whirling finale. The Rhapsody of Chabrier, a work of remarkable genius, has not been heard here, unfortunately, since Dr. Muck left the city. To appear at its best this scintillating score requires exactly such a conductor for its greatest possible effect. With his finesse and the electric energy which Dr. Muck can infuse into his players, the Rhapsody on Spanish dance tunes will be remembered by those who hear it next Friday and Saturday.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The concerts given in aid of the pension fund of the Symphony Orchestra assume each year a greater importance not only in respect to the orchestra itself, but to its patrons in this city. Under the conditions existing in music today this pension fund is a factor which adds greatly to the ease with which the services of distinguished musicians from Europe are secured. The great orchestras of Germany and Austria have such funds, some of them supported by the government, others given by friends of the orchestra, and in most cases the German orchestras (such as can be compared with the Boston Symphony) are much better off in this respect. The Ton Kunstler orchestra of Munich, for example, organized within the last four years, and not to be compared with the Boston Symphony, has already a pension fund nearly double the size of the Boston fund, all of which has been given by friends of music in Munich. The Boston pension fund has received comparatively few gifts, and it must rely almost entirely upon the two concerts given each year for its benefit and upon the assessments paid by the members of the orchestra themselves. Each year the number of pensioners must necessarily increase, and from now on it will be a constant struggle to keep the fund in a healthy condition.

The programme which will be played next Sunday evening virtually covers the whole field of Wagner's musical development, from the Meyerbeerish stage of "Rienzi" to the unique position he occupied when he wrote "Parsifal."

The programme as arranged begins with the overture to "Rienzi," which will be followed by the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" and then the introduction and bacchanale from "Tannhauser." The second part of the programme will offer the preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde" (but not the Liebestod) and "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"; the funeral music from "Gotterdammerung" and the prelude to "Parsifal."

NOVEMBER 8, EVENING SUN,

Music and Musicians

Why New York and U. S. Hat Boston's Orchestra.

Because some benighted folk still fanc Boston's virtuoso orchestra is carryin coal to Newcastle when it adds ten t New York's hundred symphony concert in a year, there was a special significanc in last night's royal welcome at Carnegi Hall to Karl Muck and the wise men o the East. The deluge beat upon tha house, yet every last seat was bought and paid for weeks ago for the entire season. Prolonged applause greeted Dr. Muck's entrance when W. H. Brennan, the business-like manager, at 8:17 o'clock precisely gave the signal from the outer doors. It was the personal sort of applause that rose, died down, and again swelled to mild tumult as the conductor turned and bowed. The first pause in Beethoven's "Hero" symphony was noisy with late comers and talk, and the leader had to rap cruelly on the open score with his baton to gain silence. The scherzo, like the play of shadows from tinted foliage on an unruffled pool, stirred the audience to applause for the orchestra players. The same happened mildly after the Berlioz "Roman Car[illegible]," and uproariously after the Lizst "Mazeppa's Ride," where all the king's horses came under the wire neck and neck by a hair. Such polyphony in perfect unison as marked the Wagner "Meistersinger" prelude at [illegible] less impaired by the borrowing of prima donnas and kidnapping of tenors from its stage for an Italian opera régime in New York than by the threat of bringing the world's orchestral primacy overseas. With Muck and Weingartner, the two ablest minds of the age in their specialty, both in Boston at adjoining theatres this winter, musical Germany is keenly aware of the Hub of the Universe. It crops up in the annals of the Kaiser's merry musical wars like the world's sore thumb on another imperial majesty in the Balkans. There were those Philistines in New York last night who asked "How old is Dr. Muck?" The dignity of that spare and sensitive frame of his was amazing. He had just celebrated a birthday in Boston, it happens, and he was born at Wurzburg on Oct. 22, 1859. Muck led his first orchestra the year the Boston band was founded. He has served twenty-one seasons in Berlin alone, except the two of 1906-8 in Boston, and for a decade he has been persona grata at Bayreuth.

Every orchestra leader knows what the Boston Orchestra has done to stimulate the cultivation of symphonic music here. How far the Boston candle throws its beams is a growing wonder to other cities. The light that has never failed musical America at large, since the German revolutionaries of the '40s came to fill New York, Cincinnati, Chicago and the Northwest with melodies of the Fatherland, has found its leading luminary at the Hub, where the old Germania Orchestra furnished a nucleus of the Boston Symphony. Practically endowed by Mr. Higginson for thirty-three years, the premier band of 100 men gives fifty concerts in its home town annually, and sixty more in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore, Cambridge, Providence and a dozen more.

The splendid Thomas Orchestra under Fred Stock does as much both in and out of Chicago, where the great Western organization also has a hall of its own. The Cincinnati Orchestra of eighty players has begun its seventeenth year by planning thirty concerts under Dr. Ernest Kunwald of Vienna. Twin cities of Minnesota furnish the unique example of maintaining rival orchestras side by side, that in St. Paul in its second season under Walter Rothwell, through the influential presidency of Louis W. Hill, affording twenty-two concerts, while Emil Oberhoffer in Minneapolis conducts thirty-three, besides many tours.

New York alone has the continuing tradition of the veteran Philharmonic fathers, some of whom yet recall the ancients who played here in 1842. In its seventy-first year, the Philharmonic under Stransky has forty-five concerts here and forty afield. The New York Symphony, founded by Leopold Damrosch and led by his son, now has thirty-five matinees in Manhattan and Brooklyn, besides fifty on tour. The Russian Orchestra, Modest Altschuler's nine-year-old band, finds its travels allow only three appearances here. The Volpe and the People's Symphony are each four times heard, and the Young Men's and other new enterprises raise the total of New York orchestra concerts easily above a hundred.

The Philadelphia Orchestra after twelve seasons has taken a new lease of life under Leopold Stokowski, who publishes fifty programmes in advance for his eighty-five men at the old Academy. A Pittsburgh orchestra under Herbert and Paur died a natural death. So did one in Washington under DeKoven. It is hoped to soon revive interest in music among the citizens of the nation's capital. Louisville is to resurrect under Karl Schmidt its Philharmonic, started in the '80s. Indianapolis projects eight concerts by a Hoosier band, with one Ernestinoff as head Hoosier.

Half a continent away, St. Louis has fifty concerts by Max Zach of Boston and sixty-five men, though the supporting society is "rather inactive." The women of Kansas City guarantee seven performances by a new orchestra there. Six women of Denver have raised $15,000 to pay five years' deficit on a band led by Horace Turlman, to which the Denver Chamber of Commerce also will lend a hand. Salt Lake, "most unfortunate in its orchestra," after efforts since 1891, has forty men still playing under Anton Freber. Seattle by cooperative methods is "trying to solve the problem" of continuing the Symphony Society suspended last year under John Spargur of New York.

From Portland, with a band of fifty its second season, the Pacific coast ints with pride to a wonderful sec year symphonic assembly under y Hadley at the Cort Theatre. Berkeley, Cal., has its own uni orchestra under Paul Steindorf. Angeles boasts sixteen years of phonies led by Harley Hamilton. he symphony orchestra as a de ment of American life has come

It will never be known how fforts of less enlightened commu have been inspired by the exam lajor Higginson's princely gene to the people of one New England.

W. B. CHASE.

Cambridge Symphony.

The second symphony concert in Cambridge will be given next Thursday evening in Sanders Theatre with Miss Florence Hinkle as soloist. Miss Hinkle is gratefully remembered by all those who heard the Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto last Winter for her exquisite singing of the solo part in the "Libera Me" of Verdi's 'Requiem." In Cambridge she will sing two numbers—first the charming air, "Depuis le jour," from Charpentier's opera "Louise," and second Micaela's air from the third act of "Carmen."

The orchestral numbers will be Sgambati's symphony in D-major, the "Siegfried Idyl" of Wagner, and "Euryanthe" overture of Weber. The Sgambeti Symphony, which Dr. Muck revived at the Boston concerts a few weeks ago, had unexpected success, and doubtless its reputation in Cambridge will attract to that concert a number of the regular Boston patrons who wish to hear it again. It was generally conceded that the "Siegfried Idyl" had never had a more beautiful performance than that given it by Dr. Muck. The concert in Cambridge begins at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY LAUDED BY CRITIC

New Yorker Finds Much to Commend in Orchestra and Conductor Muck.

W. J. Henderson, the learned music critic of the New York Sun, has been saying some pleasant things about our own orchestra and its conductor, Dr. Muck. They follow:

> The return of Dr. Carl Muck to the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the most pregnant incidents of the current season.
>
> Whether Dr. Muck has ever said it or not, he is credited with having whispered once in the inmost privacy of his domicile that in his humble opinion the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the best orchestra in the world. There are two or three other men in Europe who have had the hardihood to say this same thing when they have been where they were sure that no Berlin reporter could hear them. Of course, no one takes the trouble to say such a thing secretly in Paris, for there is no mortal power which can make a Frenchman believe that anything outside of his country is as good as anything inside of it.
>
> If it were to leak out that so eminent an authority as Dr. Muck had said that the Boston Symphony was the leading orchestra of the world the Berliners would be just a little worried, because they naturally think that there cannot possibly be anything to equal the Berlin Philharmonic under Arthur Nikisch.
>
> Nevertheless one may be reasonably sure that when Dr. Muck took up again the baton to direct a rehearsal of the gentlemen of Boston, despite the fact that he missed some of the old faces and found some unfamiliar ones in front of him, his artistic soul experienced a splendid moment. For he found that old fountain of glorious musical tones yet fresh and generous, and he must have realized that it was within his grasp to fashion into perfect form the dreams of his musical imagination.
>
> As for the music lovers of this city they are to be warmly congratulated. Nothing in deprecation of the admirable conducting of Mr. Fiedler need be said. He earned and in this place he received plenty of warm praise. But it is an indisputable fact that the two greatest masters of the baton in Germany today are Nikisch and Muck, and it is therefore a cause for rejoicing that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a truly American institution, is to be under the command of this brilliant and experienced general.
>
> The Boston Symphony Orchestra is fortunate in many things. It is happy, secure and apparently perennial in its support by the open hand of Henry L. Higginson. This man has deserved well of his country. He served her in war, but peace has brought him a greater victory. In keeping the Boston Symphony Orchestra independent and wholly devoted to art he has bestowed upon his fellow countrymen a gift more precious than valor on the battlefield, for it is incontrovertible that a thing of beauty is a joy forever.

UNUSUAL OFFERINGS IN PENSION CONCERTS

Attractive Programs Arranged Every Year for Benefit of Symphony Pension Fund.

The pension fund of the symphony orchestra has had the warm support of the conductors of the orchestra since it was founded. Mr. Gericke, Dr. Muck, Mr. Fiedler and now again Dr. Muck have given their best efforts to the preparation of attractive programs. In consequence the two annual pension fund concerts usually present some unusual features that are missed in the regular series of Symphony Concerts. In Dr. Muck's first year here in 1906-7 he twice gave a Wagner program comprising various preludes and overtures to the different music dramas and each time Symph[illegible] was crowded to [illegible]most

---

[illegible] other conductors may regard the subject, Dr. Muck's artistic conscience is against the idea of performing Wagner's music in the concert hall, yet again this year he has consented to make such a program for the reason of the great attraction it has for the general public. The program which will be played next Saturday evening virtually covers the whole field of Wagner's musical development from the Meyerbeerish stage of "Rienzi" to the unique position he occupied when he wrote "Parsifal."

The program differs only in one respect from that given in Dr. Muck's first year in Boston. Then he played the overtures to "Tannhauser," but next week he will play in place of this the much more attractive and thrilling Venusberg music preceded by the introduction.

When Wagner was arranging for the tragical performances of "Tannhauser" that were given in Paris in 1861 he was compelled by the conventions of the grand opera to insert a ballet. This he did in the first act, changing the formal overture into an introduction which ran directly into the Bacchanale which opens the opera.

This version is now commonly used in all except the most conservative opera houses of Germany and has not been played in this form by the Symphony Orchestra since the 31st of December, 1890, at a special Wagner concert under Arthur Nikisch. It has, of course, been heard here at the different performances of "Tannhauser" given by the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The program as arranged begins with the overture to "Rienzi," which will be followed by the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," and then the introduction and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser." The second part of the program will comprise the preludes to "Lohengrin." Tristan and Isolde" (but not the Liebestod and "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," [illegible]neral music from "Gotterdamme[illegible] the prelude to "Parsifal."

NOVEMBER 10,
HERALD,

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The concerts given in aid of the pension fund of the Symphony Orchestra assume each year a greater importance not only in respect to the orchestra itself but to its patrons in this city. Under the conditions existing in music today this pension fund is a factor which adds greatly to the ease with which the services of distinguished musicians from Europe are secured. The great orchestras of Germany and Austria have such funds, some of them supported by the government, others given by friends of the orchestra and in most cases the German orchestras (such as can be compared with the Boston Symphony) are much better off in this respect. The Toukuenstler Orchestra of Munich, for example, organized within the last four years and not to be compared with the Boston Symphony, has already a pension fund nearly double the size of the Boston fund, all of which has been given by friends of music in Munich. The Boston pension fund has received comparatively few gifts. It relies almost wholly on the two concerts given each year for its benefit and upon the assessments paid by the members of the orchestra themselves. Each year the number of pensioners must necessarily increase and from now on it will be a constant struggle to keep the fund in a healthy condition.

The pension fund has had the warm support of the conductors and of the orchestra since it was founded. In Dr. Muck's first year here in 1906-07 he gave twice a Wagner program comprising various preludes and overtures to the different music dramas and each time Symphony Hall was crowded to its utmost capacity. Dr. Muck's artistic conscience is against the idea of performing Wagner's music in a concert hall, yet again this year he has consented to make such a program for the reason of the great attraction it has for the general public. The program which will be played next Sunday evening virtually covers the whole field of Wagner's musical development from the Meyerbeerish stage of "Rienzi" to the position he occupied when he wrote "Parsifal."

The program will begin with the overture to "Rienzi," which will be followed by the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" and then the introduction and bacchanale from "Tannh[illegible]r." The second part of the [illegible] will comprise the prelude[illegible] Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isold[illegible]out not the "Liebestod") and [illegible]he Mastersingers of Nuremb[illegible] the funeral music from "[illegible]daemmerung" and the prelude [illegible]Parsifal."

FIFTH SYMPHONY PROGRAM

While the Symphony program for the coming week to be played on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening is not entirely Slavic, it has a strong Northern tinge, for it contains a symphony by Sibelius, an overture by Glazounoff and a piano concerto by Tschaikowsky. These are offset by the final number, Chabrier's "Espana" rhapsody.

Although none of the three works referred to will be new to Boston audiences, they are so seldom played and so long a time has elapsed since their last performances, that to a majority of the hearers they will come as novelties. The symphony is Sibelius's first in E minor. This composition had its first and only performances in Boston under Dr. Muck on Jan. 4 and 5, 1907. Mr. Fiedler played the second symphony which had already been played by Mr. Gericke, but he passed over the first which, in the opinion of many, is the greater of the two. The third and fourth symphonies are rated as failures.

Glazounoff will be represented by his "Ouverture Solennelle," which was written under the name of Festival overture for one of the series of Russian symphony concerts which a band of Russian composers gave in St. Petersburg through the nineties. Its [illegible] performance [illegible] was under Mr.

Tschaikowsky's concerto for piano in G major, which Mr. Proctor, the soloist, has elected to play, has been on a Symphony program but once and that 14 years ago, so for the vast majority of patrons it will be absolutely new. It was played here by Alexander Siloti, who, to the regret of many, never returned to this country. The repertoire of pianoforte concertos is not so large that it cannot bear additions of this kind. The order is as follows: Sibelius, Symphony No. 1 in E minor; Glazounoff, Overture Solennelle, opus 73; Tschaikowsky, concerto for pianoforte in G major; Chabrier, rhapsody for orchestra, "Espana."

SYMPHONY IN CAMBRIDGE

The second Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given next Thursday evening in Sanders Theatre, with Miss Florence Hinkle as soloist. She is gratefully remembered by all those who heard the Mendelssohn choir of Toronto last winter for her exquisite singing. In Cambridge she will sing "Depuis le jour" from "Louise" and Micaela's air from "Carmen." The orchestral numbers will be Sgambati's symphony in D-major, the "Siegfried Idyl" and "Euryanthe" overture. The Sgambati symphony which Dr. Muck revived at the Boston concerts a few weeks ago had unexpected success. It was generally conceded that the "Siegfried Idyl" had never had a more beautiful performance than that given it by Dr. Muck. The concert in Cambridge begins at 8 o'clock.

NOVEMBER 10
GLOBE

Unfamiliar Works At The Symphony Concerts

Dr Muck's numbers at the Symphony concerts this week will bear the guise of novelties, although they are not actually such. There will be three works from Northern composers: The first symphony in E Minor by Sebelius, Glazounoff's "Ouverture Solennelle" and Tschaikowsky's G Major concerto for piano played by George Proctor as soloist. The final number will be Chabrier's "Espana" Rhapsody.

Dr Muck gave the Sebelius symphony its first and only performances in Boston in January, 1907. Mr Fiedler, although liberal in his choice of Sibelius on his programs, did not repeat it, and it is said the more recent third and fourth symphonies are not considered successes.

The only performances of the Glazounow in Boston were under Mr Gericke in February, 1902. The piano concerto has been on a symphony program but once, and that 14 years ago, when it was played by the Russian pianist, Siloti. Abroad as in America the more popular concerto in B flat minor [illegible]perseded it.

All Wagner Program At Pension Fund Concert

The concerts given in aid of the pension fund of the Symphony Orchestra assume each year a greater importance not only in respect to the orchestra itself but to its patrons in this city. Under the conditions existing in music today this pension fund is a factor which adds greatly to the ease with which the services of distinguished musicians from Europe are secured. The great orchestras of Germany and Austria have such funds, some of them supported by the Government, others given by friends of the orchestra, and in most cases the German orchestras (such as can be compared with the Boston Symphony, are much better off in this respect.

The Ton Kunstler Orchestra at Munich, for example, organized within the last four years and not to be compared with the Boston Symphony, has already a pension fund nearly double the size of the Boston fund, all of which has been given by friends of music in Munich. The Boston pension fund has received comparatively few gifts and it must rely almost entirely upon the two concerts given each year for its benefit and upon the assessments paid by the members of the orchestra themselves. Each year the number of pensioners must necessarily increase and from now on it will be a constant struggle to keep the fund in a healthy condition.

The Pension Fund concerts usually present some unusual features that are missed in the regular series of Symphony concerts. In Dr Muck's first year here in, 1906-07, he gave twice a Wagner program comprising various preludes and overtures to the different music dramas and each time Symphony Hall was crowded to its utmost capacity. However other conductors may regard the subject, Dr Muck's artistic conscience is against the idea of performing Wagner's music in the concert hall, yet again this year he has consented to make such a program for the reason of the great attraction it has for the general public.

The program which will be played next Sunday evening virtually covers the whole field of Wagner's musical development from the Meyerbeerish stage of "Rienzi" to the unique position he occupied when he wrote "Parsifal." The program differs only in one respect from that given in Dr Muck's first year in Boston. Then he played the overture to "Tannhauser," but next week he will play in place of this the much more attractive and thrilling Venusberg music, preceded by the introduction.

When Wagner was arranging for the tragical performances of "Tannhauser" that were given in Paris in 1861 he was compelled by the conventions of the grand opera to insert a ballet. This he did in the first act, changing the formal overture into an introduction, which ran directly into the Bacchanale which opens the opera. This version is now commonly used in all except the most conservative opera houses of Germany and has not been played in this form by the Symphony Orchestra since the 31st of December, 1890, at a special Wagner concert, under Arthur Nikisch. It has, of course, been heard here at the different performances of "Tannhauser" given by the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The program as arranged begins with the overture to "Rienzi," which will be followed by the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" and then the introduction and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser." The second part of the program will comprise the preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde" (but not the Liebestod) and "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," the funeral music from "Gotterdammerung" and the prelude to "Parsifal."

SUNDAY POST,
NOVMEBER 10,

The opening month of the concert season in Boston has been the most uneventful in many years. The coming week, however, offers a number of concerts of uncommon interest. This afternoon the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, with Mr. Stransky conducting, and Mischa Elman as a very popular soloist, will undoubtedly draw its audience, and for the following Sunday the pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with a Wagner programme, will make its certain appeal. The Symphony programmes of the week are the most interesting that Dr. Muck has so far devised. The Symphony of Sibelius, No. 1, in E minor, has been heard only once in Boston. It is not so great a work as the second symphony, but it is a work full of talent and originality, even if that originality shows itself through a somewhat conventional mask, even if it is far from full-fledged.

In addition at the concerts this week Mr. George Proctor has had the laudable initiative to elect to play the little known second piano concerto of Tschaikowsky, a work not perhaps so great as the familiar concerto in B flat minor, but nevertheless full of color, melodic appeal, and concluding in a whirling finale. The Rhapsody of Chabrier, a work of remarkable genius, has not been heard here, unfortunately, since Dr. Muck left the city. To appear at its best this scintillating score requires exactly such a conductor for its greatest possible effect. With his finesse and the electric energy which Dr. Muck can infuse into his players, the Rhapsody on Spanish dance tunes will be remembered by those who hear it next Friday and Saturday.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The concerts given in aid of the pension fund of the Symphony Orchestra assume each year a greater importance not only in respect to the orchestra itself, but to its patrons in this city. Under the conditions existing in music today this pension fund is a factor which adds greatly to the ease with which the services of distinguished musicians from Europe are secured. The great orchestras of Germany and Austria have such funds, some of them supported by the government, others given by friends of the orchestra, and in most cases the German orchestras (such as can be compared with the Boston Symphony) are much better off in this respect. The Ton Kunstler orchestra of Munich, for example, organized within the last four years, and not to be compared with the Boston Symphony, has already a pension fund nearly double the size of the Boston fund, all of which has been given by friends of music in Munich. The Boston pension fund has received comparatively few gifts, and it must rely almost entirely upon the two concerts given each year for its benefit and upon the assessments paid by the members of the orchestra themselves. Each year the number of pensioners must necessarily increase, and from now on it will be a constant struggle to keep the fund in a healthy condition.

The programme which will be played next Sunday evening virtually covers the whole field of Wagner's musical development, from the Meyerbeerish stage of "Rienzi" to the unique position he occupied when he wrote "Parsifal."

The programme as arranged begins with the overture to "Rienzi," which will be followed by the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" and then the introduction and bacchanale from "Tannhauser." The second part of the programme will offer the preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde" (but not the Liebestod) and "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"; the funeral music from "Gotterdammerung" and the prelude to "Parsifal."

NOVEMBER 8,
EVENING SUN,

Music and Musicians

Why New York and U. S. Hat Boston's Orchestra.

Because some benighted folk still fanc Boston's virtuoso orchestra is carryin coal to Newcastle when it adds ten t New York's hundred symphony concert in a year, there was a special significanc in last night's royal welcome at Carnegi Hall to Karl Muck and the wise men o the East. The deluge beat upon th house, yet every last seat was bought an paid for weeks ago for the entire seaso Prolonged applause greeted Dr. Muck entrance when W. H. Brennan, the bu ness-like manager, at 8:17 o'clock precise gave the signal from the outer doors. was the personal sort of applause th rose, died down, and again swelled mild tumult as the conductor turned a bowed. The first pause in Beethoven "Hero" symphony was noisy with la comers and talk, and the leader had rap cruelly on the open score with baton to gain silence. The scherzo, the play of shadows from tinted fol on an unruffled pool, stirred the audi to applause for the orchestra play The same happened mildly after the Berlioz "Roman Carn[illegible]," and uproariously after the Lisz[illegible] "Mazeppa's Ride," where all the king's horses came under the wire neck and neck by a hair. Such polyphony in perfe[illegible] unison as marked the Wagner "Meistersinger" prel[illegible]

[illegible] less impaired by the borrowing of prima donnas and kidnapping of tenors from its stage for an Italian opera régime in New York than by the threat of bringing the world's orchestral primacy oversea. With Muck and Weingartner, the two ablest minds of the age in their specialty, both in Boston at adjoining theatres this winter, musical Germany is keenly aware of the Hub of the Universe. It crops up in the annals of the Kaiser's merry musical wars like the world's sore thumb on another imperial majesty in the Balkans. There were those Philistines in New York last night who asked "How old is Dr. Muck?" The dignity of that spare and sensitive frame of his was amazing. He had just celebrated a birthday in Boston, it happens, and he was born at Wurzburg on Oct. 22, 1859. Muck led his first orchestra the year the Boston band was founded. He has served twenty-one seasons in Berlin alone, except the two of 1906-8 in Boston, and for a decade he has been persona grata at Bayreuth.

Every orchestra leader knows what the Boston Orchestra has done to stimulate the cultivation of symphonic music here. How far the Boston candle throws its beams is a growing wonder to other cities. The light that has never failed musical America at large, since the German revolutionaries of the '40s came to fill New York, Cincinnati, Chicago and the Northwest with melodies of the Fatherland, has found its leading luminary at the Hub, where the old Germania Orchestra furnished a nucleus of the Boston Symphony. Practically endowed by Mr. Higginson for thirty-three years, the premier band of 100 men gives fifty concerts in its home town annually, and sixty more in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore, Cambridge, Providence and a dozen more.

The splendid Thomas Orchestra under Fred Stock does as much both in and out of Chicago, where the great Western organization also has a hall of its own. The Cincinnati Orchestra of eighty players has begun its seventeenth year by planning thirty concerts under Dr. Ernest Kunwald of Vienna. Twin cities of Minnesota furnish the unique example of maintaining rival orchestras side by side, that in St. Paul in its second season under Walter Rothwell, through the influential presidency of Louis W. Hill, affording twenty-two concerts, while Emil Oberhoffer in Minneapolis conducts thirty-three, besides many tours.

New York alone has the continuing tradition of the veteran Philharmonic fathers, some of whom yet recall the ancients who played here in 1842. In its seventy-first year, the Philharmonic under Stransky has forty-five concerts here and forty afield. The New York Symphony, founded by Leopold Damrosch and led by his son, now has thirty-five matinees in Manhattan and Brooklyn, besides fifty on tour. The Russian Orchestra, Modest Altschuler's nine-year-old band, finds its travels allow only three appearances here. The Volpe and the People's Symphony are each four times heard, and the Young Men's and other new enterprises raise the total of New York orchestra concerts easily above a hundred.

The Philadelphia Orchestra after twelve seasons has taken a new lease of life under Leopold Stokowski, who publishes fifty programmes in advance for his eighty-five men at the old Academy. A Pittsburgh orchestra under Herbert and Paur died a natural death. So did one in Washington under DeKoven. It is hoped to soon revive interest in music among the citizens of the nation's capital. Louisville is to resurrect under Karl Schmidt its Philharmonic, started in the '80s. Indianapolis projects eight concerts by a Hoosier band, with one Ernestinoff as head Hoosier.

Half a continent away, St. Louis has fifty concerts by Max Zach of Boston and sixty-five men, though the supporting society is "rather inactive." The women of Kansas City guarantee seven performances by a new orchestra there. Six women of Denver have raised $15,000 to pay five years' deficit on a band led by Horace Turlman, to which the Denver Chamber of Commerce also will lend a hand. Salt Lake, "most unfortunate in its orchestra," after efforts since 1891, has forty men still playing under Anton Freber. Seattle by cooperative methods is "trying to solve the problem" of continuing the Symphony Society suspended last year under John Spargur of New York.

From Portland, with a band of fifty in its second season, the Pacific coast points with pride to a wonderful second-year symphonic assembly under Henry Hadley at the Cort Theatre, while Berkeley, Cal., has its own university orchestra under Paul Steindorf. Los Angeles boasts sixteen years of symphonies led by Harley Hamilton.

The symphony orchestra as a department of American life has come to stay. It will never be known how the efforts of less enlightened communities have been inspired by the example of Major Higginson's princely generosity to the people of one New England town.

W. B. CHASE.

NOVEMBER 8 MAIL

DR. MUCK IS WARMLY WELCOMED ON RETURN

By EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

After an absence of four years Dr. Karl Muck returned to America again to become the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. That he was not forgotten was evident from the royal welcome accorded him at Carnegie Hall as he entered, and at the close of the first number there was an ovation that expressed extreme delight of the large audience over his admirable offering.

After the first measures of the Beethoven "Eroica" it was obvious that the great orchestra had again come into its own former glory so far as elasticity and quality of tone were concerned, and the reading of this third symphony was one which delighted alike the most critical adherent to tradition and the most modern in spirit.

In direct contrast of effect was the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" in which all the themes were set forth with the greatest clarity and they rippled in and out of the masses of orchestration, in which a masterly balance was preserved. The other numbers were the "Roman Carnival" by Berlioz and the Liszt "Mazeppa" tone poem, in both of which there were wonderful masses of tone, superb nuances and innumerable details that were as charming as they were bewildering.

Dr. Muck is a great gift from Germany, one which places us under unqualified gratitude, for that country has nothing greater to give. The men played with evident inspiration and there was no trace of the fact that the personnel has been changed in not less than eighteen men, all of whom seem to fit directly into the ensemble of this wonderful body of musicians. There was no soloist, but there did not seem to be less interest in the concert for this reason. The auditorium was filled to its capacity, as it will be for the season, as all the seats have already been sold by subscription.

Charles Norman Granville, a local baritone, who has not sung in New York for several years, returned to the concert platform last night in Aeolian Hall, when he created a highly favorable impression by the excellence of many details which make for artistic singing. He has primarily a voice of agreeable quality, full and resonant, an unusually good diction and his interpretations were both interesting and musicianly.

Charles Gilbert Spross, who played his accompaniments, was also on the programme as composer of a song full of fire and vigor. This was a setting of "Lorraine, Lorraine Lorree," which earned the well-deserved applause of an audience of goodly size. In addition to two groups of English songs Mr. Granville's programme included numbers by Schumann, Schubert, Franz, Strauss, Ries and a group of old Italian and French numbers.

Kurt Schindler, organizer and conductor of the Schola Cantorum, until this season known as the MacDowell Chorus, gave an illustrated lecture this morning at the Hotel Plaza before a large and interested audience. This was the first of a series which will be given by Mr. Schindler and others to make clear certain technical phases of musical subjects.

Mr. Schindler spoke on the Russian opera, "Boris Godenoff," which will be one of the early offerings at the Metropolitan Opera House, and his illustrations at the piano were not the least attractive phases of his presentation. Moussorgsky as a song writer has been heard on the programmes of several singers and his orchestral works have been played by the Russian Symphony Orchestra upon numerous occasions.

STANDARD,
OCTOBER 30

THE SYMPHONY PLAYS.

DR. CARL MUCK'S GRACEFUL RETURN AT OPENING CONCERT.

Sylvain Noack, Violinist and Second Concert Master, Makes Masterly Denouement in Mozart's Concerto—Euryanthe Overture the Real Treat.

> "I was all ear
> And took in strains that might create a soul
> Under the ribs of Death."

The Boston Symphony orchestra on Tuesday evening presented in New Bedford theatre the opening concert of the winter series. The thin audience which greeted the musicians, by its applause welcomed also the return to this country of Dr. Karl Muck, its former conductor, who begins again his old duties as preceptor of Boston's famous orchestra. He was received with enthusiasm, and was insistently recalled at the end of the first number and given what was for a New Bedford audience an ovation.

Upon the program for this opening concert appears the names of four composers: Sgambati, an Italian; Pfitzner, a Russian-German; and the more familar names of Mozart and Weber. The thin poetry of the opening number; the simplicity and mystery of the second, and the sudden proclamation of the full orchestra, introducing the soloist, Sylvain Noack, in the third, paved the way with melody for the final climax and mastery of the last number, the overture of Weber's most finished opera. It was as if the orchestra, returning to New Bedford for another season with a personnel so altered, wisely chose, like a man in a race, to husband its strength for the last, that the final impression might be all-in-all.

The soft stirring of many violas and clarinets, through and through which wound the violins, and oboes and flutes, whose liquid notes now mount, now fall, now die; then the crescendo of the full orchestra, followed by a call of horns and the pom-pom of kettledrums; and with these stirrings of melody that began with a sigh and passed through the crashing splendor of the full orchestra back to the chromatic sighing again, the minds of the audience, possessed by the music, forgot the gossip of the day, the petty wrangling of politics, the cares of the home, the lures of ambition,—forgot hope and the death of hope, sorrow and gladness, pain and health, labor and play.

The symphony sang to them with one voice. The walls of the theatre, trivial and ordinary enough, melted into pearl-gray oblivion. Time, for tor the moment, ceased. A hundred minds, leaving their egos, groped after the soul-stirring chords that moved them out of themselves. A canvas of dancing colors, prism-glowing, changing, immaterial, formless, seemed to be woven by the swinging shuttles of the bows; and music was the warp, crossed by melody, the theme. Now the full orchestra, having husbanded its strength, joined in shaking the night with a fanfarronade, and the mind returned to self, the canvas melted,—there stood the black, slim form of Dr. Muck among the 99 who moved obedient to his sceptre.

Sgambati himself never heard the Boston Symphony orchestra in the year of grace, 1912,—or he would be astonished at his own music. A poet, he wrote music and influenced the musical taste of Italy. But Giovanni Sgambati, pupil of Liszt and admirer of Wagner, would have last evening applauded more because of Dr. Muck and his musicians' skill, if he were honest, than his composition which they played.

"The Little Christ Elf" of Hans Pfitzner, opening so simply and gently, and passing through its element of mystery,—its fairy tones like the voice of the Christ Elf itself in haunted woods, caused the audience to forget self again. Now there was heard a flutter of cherubim wings; and the music seemed to be telling what Raphael's brush told in color,—a message of roseate clouds and winged heads of infants, and reaches of blue sky beyond,—with that intangible fancy, the Christ Elf, dancing like a sunbeam across the infinity. The silver cling-cling! of the triangle, the mellow notes of the horn, the sweet insistance of the strings,—and then two louder, sadder notes from the strings, and silence. Those who did not know the story went away each with a story of his own. What did it mean? What does the sunset mean? Or the hills of autumn? Or the flowers of spring?

Now a little man, smiling, dark-haired, stands out from the midst of the other musicians, and, younger than most of them, audaciously waves with the tip of his dancing bow such a graceful mesmerism, that all who watch and hear are hypnotized, and forget the sustaining concord. There is poetry, there is warmth, there is color, there is the admirable certainty of mastery in his pose, in the careless way with which he brings instrument and bow together, and distils from it a honey of sound. Sylvain Noack chose a sweet and [illegible] part for his wonderful violin, when he played in Mozart's Concerto in D major. His pose and his playing were flourishes, and the only romantic flourishes,—and the only ramantic touch he gave to his apearance was when, at his recall, he turned and impetuously gave his hand to Dr. Muck, while all the orchestra and the audience were applauding him.

Of Weber's Euryanthe, little need be said. To the writer, it seemed the most charming number on the program. The musician tells, in this masterpiece (the overture to which, written, as the custom is after the opera, was heard last evening), the same story that Shakespeare chose, with some minor variations, for his Cymbeline. At one place in the overture there comes that impressive point at which it is said to be the custom, in grand opera, to raise the curtain and disclose the scene in the death vault, which is the centre of the story. The overture opens with a hurrying impetuosity of sound; it passes on through various phases, to that effective point where the sounds die away, until there stirs only a thread of notes, quivering like a wind-harp, now perceptible, now intangible, now lost. The air is filled with little, wandering airs that grope about like the ghosts of Emma, in the story of Euryanthe, who drank poison from a ring, and wandered until that fatal ring was "wet by the tears of an innocent maiden in her time of danger and extreme need." Upon this work, it has been written, Weber "Exhausted all the treasures of his genius. . . . It was the most finished and scholarly work which Weber ever attained." There is in it his love of old German folk-songs,—the "immemorial airs which resound in every village and hamlet," which he has caught and made to sing again for time immemorial, to please just such an audience as applauded them last night. The ultimate conception of Weber was a fitting close to a charming evening of music.

The program follows:

Sgambati—Symphony in D major, No. 1, Op. 16.
- I. Allegro vivace, non troppo
- II. Andante Mesto.
- III. Scherzo, Presto: Trio un poco meno.
- IV. Serenata: Andante.
- V. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

Pfitzner—Overture to Das Christ-Elflein (The Little Christ-Elf), a Christmas Fairy Story in Three acts by lse von Stach, Op. 20.

Mozart—Concerto for Violin, in D Major, No. 4, (K. 218.)
- I. Allegro.
- II. Andante cantabile.
- III. Rondo. Andantino grazioso.

Weber—Overture to Euryanthe.

TRANSCRIPT
NOVEMBER 9,

Symphony Hall—Symphony Concerts

Dr. Muck has "unified" the next pair of Symphony Concerts by making the first three items of his programme of the music of northern composers, and, since the last two of these happen to be brilliantly colored, by adding tc them the instrumentality and rhythmically glowing "España" of the Latin Chabrier. The northern music begins with Sibelius's symphony in E minor, unheard here since Dr. Muck's first term as conductor, and written with the terseness of voice, the economy of means, the gaunt and sombre imagination and the penetrating or the clashing melody of the Finnish composer. Next will follow the full-bodied, pompous-voiced and richly colored "Solemn Overture" of Glazounoff for "official" Russian music; and then Mr. George Proctor, appearing for the first times at the Symphony Concerts, will revive Tschaikowsky's little known piano concerto in G major. Scarcely a pianist in recent years has seemed aware of its existence. To no audiences is it familiar. The more interesting then, will it be to compare it with Tschaikowsky's earlier and insistent piano concerto in B-flat minor.

Sanders Theatre—Symphony Concert

Paying the second visit of the season to Cambridge, the Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Muck will play in Sanders Theatre on Thursday evening three pieces from its recent programmes in Boston—Sgambati's pleasurable symphony in D; Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," in which the band attains an exquisite loveliness of tone, and Weber's overture to his opera, "Euryanthe." Between whiles Miss Florence Hinkle, an accomplished concert singer, will be heard in Louise's ecstatic air from Charpentier's like-named opera, and in Michaela's blue and white tune from the third [illegible]men."

THE WORLD:
NOVEMBER 8.

DR. MUCK HAS TRIUMPH AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Orchestra Shows Improvement in Playing Under Returned Conductor.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first New York concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night and for once was momentarily relegated to secondary importance. Dr. Karl Muck, one of the half dozen great symphonic conductors of his time, was responsible for the visiting band's subordination and no one would have had it otherwise.

Dr. Muck's entrance was the signal for applause from an audience filling every seat in the hall. Nor would the crowd permit the starting of the programme until it had fully expressed its satisfaction of again having the recent Berlin musical giant at his old post after a three years' absence.

There was no marked change in the methods or accomplishments of this distinguished leader. His old-time authority was once more a conspicuous factor, and he used it to still the conversation that sprang up between the first and second movements of the opening composition.

But it is doubtful if this splendid musical organization has been heard to better advantage since Dr. Muck departed for Europe than in last evening's programme, which included the Beethoven "Eroica" symphony, Berlioz's "Le Carnaval Romain" overture, Liszt's symphonic poem "Mazeppa," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

There seemed to be more life and vitality in the work of the orchestra men—the probable reflection of the returned director—and a unity of effort in technical precision beyond reproach.

Reasonable music lovers could not wish for better orchestral playing or conducting than that found at Carnegie Hall last night. Only the finicky would discover unimportant flaws

---

NEW YORK HERALD.
NOVEMBER 8, 1912.

Musical Populace Heartily Greets Dr. Muck Again

Finds Little Change in Famous German Conductor When He Returns with Boston Orchestra.

Three thousand concert goers in Carnegie Hall last night seemed to be of the uniform opinion that the German Emperor had lost a remarkable conductor and that the Boston Symphony had gained one. It was the first concert here this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the first appearance here, after an absence of four years, of Dr. Karl Muck, conductor.

Dr. Muck swung the baton over this noted orchestra from Boston when enjoying a leave of absence granted by the German Emperor several years ago, but four years ago his duties to the Berlin Roya Opera called him there again Not until this summer did he obtain his release i Berlin, and now he is the "permanent" conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at least for five years.

A notable audience raised its hands t applaud when Dr. Muck stepped out o the platform. Mr. Henry L. Higginson founder of the orchestra, had travelle from Boston for the occasion. Miss Geraldine Farrar represented the Metropolita opera contingent and was most enthusiastic. Musicians, lovers of music, musica critics and Mr., Mrs. and Miss Concer Goer, they were all there last night. I was a night not to be missed by any on in "Who's Who in Music." And in th intermission the lobby that leads to th artists' room was lined with the army o devotees of music, puffing cigarettes an discussing "reading," "tempo" and the lik and all singing praise of orchestra an conductor.

Little Change in Dr. Muck.

To the eye Dr. Muck has not aged a da in his absence; to the ear he seems t have broadened. His quick, elastic trea the slim body, the military bearing "at attention" and the eagle like glance that h casts over audience and orchestra—thes were familiar traits of the eminent Germa conductor. Nor has he changed at all i his manner of conducting. The movements of his baton are still small, th baton itself is moderately short and ver slender, but he commands his men in ever detail.

There were times in the "Meistersinger prelude last night when he stopped beating entirely and permitted the orchestr to play alone, then catching it again wit his baton, he would dictate every nuanc by an eloquent gesture of hand or wand. Still there was never anything spectacular. He conducted always for the benefit of the orchestra and not for the audience.

Rousing applause at his entrance, even more after the Beethoven symphony, in acknoweldging which Dr. Muck asked ovation at the close—these were the chief ovation at the close, these were the chief expressions of approval by the audience.

Temperature Too High.

It was a muggy night and Carnegie Hall was a sultry place, and the audience and orchestra mopped brows. These conditions doubtless had a tendency to dampen enthusiasm to some extent, but they affected no one's enjoyment of the orchestra's playing. Since last season several new players have been added to the ensemble. Almost every choir had its newcomers. The result is that the Boston Orchestra last night played even better than in past years. The delicacy with which it played the scherzo of the Beethoven "Eroica" sympathy was breathtaking and its clarity was exquisite. The "Funeral March" was charged with sentiment but free of exaggerations, and the close of the symphony was jubilation itself.

Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" was brilliantly done, as was the somewhat bana Liszt "Mazeppa." The final number was Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude, beautifully played and conducted.

In the intermission friends streamed back to congratulate the conductor. He appeared overwhelmed and voiced his sentiments by remarking:—

"All I can say is that I am very, very happy to be back in America."

There was a real and heartfelt rejoi last evening in Carnegie Hall, expre with unmistakable enthusiasm, when Karl Muck appeared upon the platfo conduct the Boston Symphony Orch at the first concert of its twenty-seve season in New York. There was an eno mous audience, as large a one as th will accommodate, most of whose m bers had memories of the two season which Dr. Muck was previously at th head of the Boston orchestra—those 1906-7 and 1907-8. Their memories m them justly eager to welcome him b to the position which he filled then w such pre-eminent distinction. It is a familiar story how, after his two year leave of absence in Boston, he was summoned by royal authority back to Berli to fulfill his contract as conductor of Royal Opera House there; and how, the expiration of that contract, he found the way back to Boston and Mr. Higginson's superb orchestra tempting and easy. He had shown his power to raise that organization to its highest technical efficiency and to employ its powers to the finest ends; he had revealed his wide musical sympathies, his readiness to assimilate music of the most diverse tendencies, his devotion to the interests of the composer in bringing his work to the fullest realization, his eagerness to expend all his skill to that effect, even when his own personal likings were not wholly engaged. Always he stood as an interpreter of the composer's work, never as one displaying himself, his personality, his temperament, or impressing them upon the music, or endeavoring to find in it something that no one else had found, or anything that the composer had not put there.

Such Dr. Muck showed himself again last evening to be; and in some of these respects he differs markedly from some other modern conductors. He is now, as he was then, a man of power and authority, a musician of subtle and sensitive feeling, a conductor of the highest skill, a wonder worker with the marvelous instrument he controls. The orchestra itself showed a few new forces; but its quality has not changed.

In the programme last evening there was no soloist, and nothing to divert the attention of the audience from its performance. The music was familiar: Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Berlioz's overture, "Le Carnival Romain"; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger." The performance of the symphony was of splendid virility, breadth, and eloquence. It revealed nothing new; but it revealed the "Eroica" Symphony. It was nobly proportioned, dignified, full of poetry and marked by exquisite finish, finesse, and innumerable subtleties of accent, phrasing, and dynamics. One of its most notable qualities was its rhythmic vitality. Dr. Muck was free in his modifications of the tempo, and in the symphony, as in the other works on the programme, he did not hestitate to let loose the full power of the orchestra. But these things were all for a purpose, and the purpose was superbly fulfilled.

Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture sounds a little dryer in its melodic invention and its harmonic quality every time it is heard; but its orchestration holds its own in brilliancy, and the performance let none of its brilliancy be lost. A stirring effect was given to Liszt's "Mazeppa," and its wearisome thundering in the index, its intolerably long preparations to say something, were made to seem almost significant. The performance of the symphony deeply stirred the audience. Dr. Muck was again and again recalled, and he finally caused the whole orchestra to rise and share the applause with him.

NOVEMBER 8,
THE SUN,

KARL MUCK RETURNS WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Old Conductor's Influence Is Perceptible at Once in Velvety Tones.

SUPERB IN BEETHOVEN

Directs the "Eroica" Symphony With Sincerity and Affection.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of its current season in this city at Carnegie Hall last night. Despite the uproarious misbehavior of Jupiter Pluvius there was an audience which stretched the walls of the building and there were all those manifestations of real pleasure which are customarily associated with the visits of this organization.

The interest of the evening was intensified by the reappearance in this city of Dr. Karl Muck, the distinguished conductor, who was formerly at the head of this orchestra, but was recalled to his post at the Berlin Opera by royal and imperial mandate.

Dr. Muck made his last previous appearances here at the concerts of March 19 and 21, 1909. At the former of these he con[illegible]ucted Frederick S. Converse's dramatic [illegible]nes entitled "Joan of Arc," Charles [illegible]tin Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" for or[illegible]ra, piano, English horn and three [illegible]ts obligato, and Edward MacDow[illegible]dian Suite." At the final matinee [illegible]ed Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, [illegible] "Nozze di Figaro" overture and [illegible] Fourth symphony. Dr. Muck [illegible]d in the following November [illegible], who retained the post till [illegible]ason.

[illegible] master of the baton was [illegible]ning in a manner which [illegible] him with no doubt as to [illegible] regard for him.

NOVEMBER 8.
TIMES.

FIRST CONCERT OF BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Dr. Karl Muck Returns as Its Conductor and Is Greeted Enthusiastically.

PROGRAMME WITHOUT SOLOS

Fine Performances of Beethoven's Eroica Symphony and Pieces by Berlioz, Liszt, and Wagner.

NOVEMBER 8 MAIL

DR. MUCK IS WARMLY WELCOMED ON RETURN

By EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

After an absence of four years Dr. Karl Muck returned to America again to become the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. That he was not forgotten was evident from the royal welcome accorded him at Carnegie Hall as he entered, and at the close of the first number there was an ovation that expressed extreme delight of the large audience over his admirable offering.

After the first measures of the Beethoven "Eroica" it was obvious that the great orchestra had again come into its own former glory so far as elasticity and quality of tone were concerned, and the reading of this third symphony was one which delighted alike the most critical adherent to tradition and the most modern in spirit.

In direct contrast of effect was the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" in which all the themes were set forth with the greatest clarity and they rippled in and out of the masses of orchestration, in which a masterly balance was preserved. The other numbers were the "Roman Carnival" by Berlioz and the Liszt "Mazeppa" tone poem, in both of which there were wonderful masses of tone, superb nuances and innumerable details that were as charming as they were bewildering.

Dr. Muck is a great gift from Germany, one which places us under unqualified gratitude, for that country has nothing greater to give. The men played with evident inspiration and there was no trace of the fact that the personnel has been changed in not less than eighteen men, all of whom seem to fit directly into the ensemble of this wonderful body of musicians. There was no soloist, but there did not seem to be less interest in the concert for this reason. The auditorium was filled to its capacity, as it will be for the season, as all the seats have already been sold by subscription.

Charles Norman Granville, a local baritone, who has not sung in New York for several years, returned to the concert platform last night in Aeolian Hall, when he created a highly favorable impression by the excellence of many details which make for artistic singing. He has primarily a voice of agreeable quality, full and resonant, an unusually good diction and his interpretations were both interesting and musicianly.

Charles Gilbert Spross, who played his accompaniments, was also on the programme as composer of a song full of fire and vigor. This was a setting of "Lorraine, Lorraine Lorree," which earned the well-deserved applause of an audience of goodly size. In addition to two groups of English songs Mr. Granville's programme included numbers by Schumann, Schubert, Franz, Strauss, Ries and a group of old Italian and French numbers.

Kurt Schindler, organizer and conductor of the Schola Cantorum, until this season known as the MacDowell Chorus, gave an illustrated lecture this morning at the Hotel Plaza before a large and interested audience. This was the first of a series which will be given by Mr. Schindler and others to make clear certain technical phases of musical subjects.

Mr. Schindler spoke on the Russian opera, "Boris Godenoff," which will be one of the early offerings at the Metropolitan Opera House, and his illustrations at the piano were not the least attractive phases of his presentation. Moussorgsky as a song writer has been heard on the programmes of several singers and his orchestral works have been played by the Russian Symphony Orchestra upon numerous occasions.

STANDARD,
OCTOBER 30

THE SYMPHONY PLAYS.

DR. CARL MUCK'S GRACEFUL RETURN AT OPENING CONCERT.

Sylvain Noack, Violinist and Second Concert Master, Makes Masterly Denouement in Mozart's Concerto—Euryanthe Overture the Real Treat.

"I was all ear
And took in strains that might create a soul
Under the ribs of Death."

The Boston Symphony orchestra on Tuesday evening presented in New Bedford theatre the opening concert of the winter series. The thin audience which greeted the musicians, by its applause welcomed also the return to this country of Dr. Karl Muck, its former conductor, who begins again his old duties as preceptor of Boston's famous orchestra. He was received with enthusiasm, and was insistently recalled at the end of the first number and given what was for a New Bedford audience an ovation.

Upon the program for this opening concert appears the names of four composers: Sgambati, an Italian; Pfitzner, a Russian-German; and the more familar names of Mozart and Weber. The thin poetry of the opening number; the simplicity and mystery of the second, and the sudden proclamation of the full orchestra, introducing the soloist, Sylvain Noack, in the third, paved the way with melody for the final climax and mastery of the last number, the overture of Weber's most finished opera. It was as if the orchestra, returning to New Bedford for another season with a personnel so altered, wisely chose, like a man in a race, to husband its strength for the last, that the final impression might be all-in-all.

The soft stirring of many violas and clarinets, through and through which sound the violins, and oboes and flutes, whose liquid notes now mount, now fall, now die; then the crescendo of the full orchestra, followed by a call of horns and the pom-pom of kettledrums; and with these stirrings of mel- [illegible] through the crashing splendor of the full orchestra back to the chromatic sighing again, the minds of the audience, possessed by the music, forgot the gossip of the day, the petty wrangling of politics, the cares of the home, the lures of ambition,—forgot hope and the death of hope, sorrow and gladness, pain and health, labor and play.

The symphony sang to them with one voice. The walls of the theatre, trivial and ordinary enough, melted into pearl-gray oblivion. Time, for tor the moment, ceased. A hundred minds, leaving their egos, groped after the soul-stirring chords that moved them out of themselves. A canvas of dancing colors, prism-glowing, changing, immaterial, formless, seemed to be woven by the swinging shuttles of the bows; and music was the warp, crossed by melody, the theme. Now the full orchestra, having husbanded its strength, joined in shaking the night with a fanfarronade, and the mind returned to self, the canvas melted,—there stood the black, slim form of Dr. Muck among the 99 who moved obedient to his sceptre.

Sgambati himself never heard the Boston Symphony orchestra in the year of grace, 1912,—or he would be astonished at his own music. A poet, he wrote music and influenced the musical taste of Italy. But Giovanni Sgambati, pupil of Liszt and admirer of Wagner, would have last evening applauded more because of Dr. Muck and his musicians' skill, if he were honest, than his composition which they played.

"The Little Christ Elf" of Hans Pfitzner, opening so simply and gently, and passing through its element of mystery,—its fairy tones like the voice of the Christ Elf itself in haunted woods, caused the audience to forget self again. Now there was heard a flutter of cherubim wings; and the music seemed to be telling what Raphael's brush told in color,—a message of roseate clouds and winged heads of infants, and reaches of blue sky beyond,—with that intangible fancy, the Christ Elf, dancing like a sunbeam across the infinity. The silver cling-cling! of the triangle, the mellow notes of the horn, the sweet insistance of the strings,—and then two louder, sadder notes from the strings, and silence. Those who did not know the story went away each with a story of his own. What did it mean? What does the sunset mean? Or the hills of autumn? Or the flowers of spring?

Now a little man, smiling, dark-haired, stands out from the midst of the other musicians, and, younger than most of them, audaciously waves with the tip of his dancing bow such a graceful mesmerism, that all who watch and hear are hypnotized, and forget the sustaining concord. There is poetry, there is warmth, there is color, there is the admirable certainty of mastery in his pose, in the careless way with which he brings instrument and bow together, and distils from it a honey of sound. Sylvain Noack chose a sweet and deli[illegible] part for his wonderful violi[illegible] he played in Mozart's Concerto in D major. His pose and his playing were flourishes, and the only romantic flourishes,—and the only ramantic touch he gave to his apearance was when, at his recall, he turned and impetuously gave his hand to Dr. Muck, while all the orchestra and the audience were applauding him.

Of Weber's Euryanthe, little need be said. To the writer, it seemed the most charming number on the program. The musician tells, in this masterpiece (the overture to which, written, as the custom is after the opera, was heard last evening), the same story that Shakespeare chose, with some minor variations, for his Cymbeline. At one place in the overture there comes that impressive point at which it is said to be the custom, in grand opera, to raise the curtain and disclose the scene in the death vault, which is the centre of the story. The overture opens with a hurrying impetuosity of sound; it passes on through various phases, to that effective point where the sounds die away, until there stirs only a thread of notes, quivering like a wind-harp, now perceptible, now intangible, now lost. The air is filled with little, wandering airs that grope about like the ghosts of Emma, in the story of Euryanthe, who drank poison from a ring, and wandered until that fatal ring was "wet by the tears of an innocent maiden in her time of danger and extreme need." Upon this work, [illegible] been written, Weber "Exhausted all the treasures of his genius. . . . It was the most finished and scholarly work which Weber ever attained." There is in it his love of old German folk-songs,—the "immemorial airs which resound in every village and hamlet," which he has caught and made to sing again for time immemorial, to please just such an audience as applauded them last night. The ultimate conception of Weber was a fitting close to a charming evening of music.

The program follows:

Sgambati—Symphony in D major, No. 1, Op. 16.
I. Allegro vivace, non troppo
II. Andante Mesto.
III. Scherzo, Presto: Trio un poco meno.
IV. Serenata: Andante.
V. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.
Pfitzner—Overture to Das Christ-Elflein (The Little Christ-Elf), a Christmas Fairy Story in Three acts by Ilse von Stach, Op. 20.
Mozart—Concerto for Violin, in D Major, No. 4, (K. 218.)
I. Allegro.
II. Andante cantabile.
III. Rondo. Andantino grazioso.
Weber—Overture to Euryanthe.

TRANSCRIPT
NOVEMBER 9,

Symphony Hall—Symphony Concerts

Dr. Muck has "unified" the next pair of Symphony Concerts by making the first three items of his programme of the music of northern composers, and, since the last two of these happen to be brilliantly colored, by adding tc them the instrumentality and rhythmically glowing "España" of the Latin Chabrier. The northern music begins with Sibelius's symphony in E minor, unheard here since Dr. Muck's first term as conductor, and written with the terseness of voice, the economy of means, the gaunt and sombre imagination and the penetrating or the clashing melody of the Finnish composer. Next will follow the full-bodied, pompous-voiced and richly colored "Solemn Overture" of Glazounoff for "official" Russian music; and then Mr. George Proctor, appearing for the first times at the Symphony Concerts, will revive Tschaikowsky's little known piano concerto in G major. Scarcely a pianist in recent years has seemed aware of its existence. To no audiences is it familiar. The more interesting then, will it be to compare it with Tschaikowsky's earlier and insistent piano concerto in B-flat minor.

Sanders Theatre—Symphony Concert

Paying the second visit of the season to Cambridge, the Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Muck will play in Sanders Theatre on Thursday evening three pieces from its recent programmes in Boston—Sgambati's pleasurable symphony in D; Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," in which the band attains an exquisite loveliness of tone, and Weber's overture to his opera, "Euryanthe." Between whiles Miss Florence Hinkle, an accomplished concert singer, will be heard in Louise's ecstatic air from Charpentier's like-named opera, and in Michaela's blue and white tune from the third [illegible] men."

THE WORLD:
NOVEMBER 8.

DR. MUCK HAS TRIUMPH AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Orchestra Shows Improvement in Playing Under Returned Conductor.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first New York concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night and for once was momentarily relegated to secondary importance. Dr. Karl Muck, one of the half dozen great symphonic conductors of his time, was responsible for the visiting band's subordination and no one would have had it otherwise.

Dr. Muck's entrance was the signal for applause from an audience filling every seat in the hall. Nor would the crowd permit the starting of the programme until it had fully expressed its satisfaction of again having the recent Berlin musical giant at his old post after a three years' absence.

There was no marked change in the methods or accomplishments of this distinguished leader. His old-time authority was once more a conspicuous factor, and he used it to still the conversation that sprang up between the first and second movements of the opening composition.

But it is doubtful if this splendid musical organization has been heard to better advantage since Dr. Muck departed for Europe than in last evening's programme, which included the Beethoven "Eroica" symphony, Berlioz's "Le Carnaval Romain" overture, Liszt's symphonic poem "Mazeppa," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

There seemed to be more life and vitality in the work of the orchestra men—the probable reflection of the returned director—and a unity of effort in technical precision beyond reproach.

Reasonable music lovers could not wish for better orchestral playing or conducting than that found at Carnegie Hall last night. Only the finicky would discover [illegible] flaws.

NEW YORK HERALD.
NOVEMBER 8, 1912.

Musical Populace Heartily Greets Dr. Muck Again

Finds Little Change in Famous German Conductor When He Returns with Boston Orchestra.

Three thousand concert goers in Carnegie Hall last night seemed to be of the uniform opinion that the German Emperor had lost a remarkable conductor and that the Boston Symphony had gained one. It was the first concert here this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the first appearance here, after an absence of four years, of Dr. Karl Muck, conductor.

Dr. Muck swung the baton over this noted orchestra from Boston when enjoying a leave of absence granted by the German Emperor several years ago, but four years ago his duties to the Berlin Royal Opera called him there again. Not until this summer did he obtain his release in Berlin, and now he is the "permanent" conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at least for five years.

A notable audience raised its hands to applaud when Dr. Muck stepped out on the platform. Mr. Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, had travelled from Boston for the occasion. Miss Geraldine Farrar represented the Metropolitan opera contingent and was most enthusiastic. Musicians, lovers of music, music critics and Mr., Mrs. and Miss Concert Goer, they were all there last night. It was a night not to be missed by any one in "Who's Who in Music." And in the intermission the lobby that leads to the artists' room was lined with the army of devotees of music, puffing cigarettes and discussing "reading," "tempo" and the like and all singing praise of orchestra and conductor.

Little Change in Dr. Muck.

To the eye Dr. Muck has not aged a day in his absence; to the ear he seems to have broadened. His quick, elastic tread, the slim body, the military bearing "at attention" and the eagle like glance that he casts over audience and orchestra—these were familiar traits of the eminent German conductor. Nor has he changed at all in his manner of conducting. The movements of his baton are still small, the baton itself is moderately short and very slender, but he commands his men in every detail.

There were times in the "Meistersinger" prelude last night when he stopped beating entirely and permitted the orchestra to play alone, then catching it again with his baton, he would dictate every nuance by an eloquent gesture of hand or wand. Still there was never anything spectacular. He conducted always for the benefit of the orchestra and not for the audience.

Rousing applause at his entrance, even more after the Beethoven symphony, in acknoweldging which Dr. Muck asked ovation at the close—these were the chief ovation at the close, these were the chief expressions of approval by the audience.

Temperature Too High.

It was a muggy night and Carnegie Hall was a sultry place, and the audience and orchestra mopped brows. These conditions doubtless had a tendency to dampen enthusiasm to some extent, but they affected no one's enjoyment of the orchestra's playing. Since last season several new players have been added to the ensemble. Almost every choir had its newcomers. The result is that the Boston Orchestra last night played even better than in past years. The delicacy with which it played the scherzo of the Beethoven "Eroica" symphony was breathtaking and its clarity was exquisite. The "Funeral March" was charged with sentiment but free of exaggerations, and the close of the symphony was jubilation itself.

Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" was brilliantly done, as was the somewhat bana Liszt "Mazeppa." The final number was Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude, beautifully played and conducted.

In the intermission friends streamed back to congratulate the conductor. He appeared overwhelmed and voiced his sentiments by remarking:—

"All I can say is that I am very, very happy to be back in America."

NOVEMBER 8.
TIMES.

FIRST CONCERT OF BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Dr. Karl Muck Returns as Its Conductor and Is Greeted Enthusiastically.

PROGRAMME WITHOUT SOLO

Fine Performances of Beethoven's Eroica Symphony and Pieces by Berlioz, Liszt, and Wagner.

There was a real and heartfelt rejoi last evening in Carnegie Hall, expressed with unmistakable enthusiasm, when Dr. Karl Muck appeared upon the platform to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the first concert of its twenty-seventh season in New York. There was an enormous audience, as large a one as the hall will accommodate, most of whose members had memories of the two seasons in which Dr. Muck was previously at the head of the Boston orchestra—those of 1906-7 and 1907-8. Their memories made them justly eager to welcome him back to the position which he filled then with such pre-eminent distinction. It is a familiar story how, after his two years leave of absence in Boston, he was summoned by royal authority back to Berlin to fulfill his contract as conductor of the Royal Opera House there; and how, at the expiration of that contract, he found the way back to Boston and Mr. Higginson's superb orchestra tempting and easy. He had shown his power to raise that organization to its highest technical efficiency and to employ its powers to the finest ends; he had revealed his wide musical sympathies, his readiness to assimilate music of the most diverse tendencies, his devotion to the interests of the composer in bringing his work to the fullest realization, his eagerness to expend all his skill to that effect, even when his own personal likings were not wholly engaged. Always he stood as an interpreter of the composer's work, never as one displaying himself, his personality, his temperament, or impressing them upon the music, or endeavoring to find in it something that no one else had found, or anything that the composer had not put there.

Such Dr. Muck showed himself again last evening to be; and in some of these respects he differs markedly from some other modern conductors. He is now, as he was then, a man of power and authority, a musician of subtle and sensitive feeling, a conductor of the highest skill, a wonder worker with the marvelous instrument he controls. The orchestra itself showed a few new forces; but its quality has not changed.

In the programme last evening there was no soloist, and nothing to divert the attention of the audience from its performance. The music was familiar: Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Berlioz's overture, "Le Carnival Romain"; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger." The performance of the symphony was of splendid virility, breadth, and eloquence. It revealed nothing new; but it revealed the "Eroica" Symphony. It was nobly proportioned, dignified, full of poetry and marked by exquisite finish, finesse, and innumerable subtleties of accent, phrasing, and dynamics. One of its most notable qualities was its rhythmic vitality. Dr. Muck was free in his modifications of the tempo, and in the symphony, as in the other works on the programme, he did not hesitate to let loose the full power of the orchestra. But these things were all for a purpose, and the purpose was superbly fulfilled.

Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture sounds a little dryer in its melodic invention and its harmonic quality every time it is heard; but its orchestration holds its own in brilliancy, and the performance let none of its brilliancy be lost. A stirring effect was given to Liszt's "Mazeppa," and its wearisome thundering in the index, its intolerably long preparations to say something, were made to seem almost significant. The performance of the symphony deeply stirred the audience. Dr. Muck was again and again recalled, and he finally caused the whole orchestra to rise and share the applause with him.

NOVEMBER 8,
THE SUN,

KARL MUCK RETURNS WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Old Conductor's Influence Is Perceptible at Once in Velvety Tones.

SUPERB IN BEETHOVEN

Directs the "Eroica" Symphony With Sincerity and Affection.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of its current season in this city at Carnegie Hall last night. Despite the uproarious misbehavior of Jupiter Pluvius there was an audience which stretched the walls of the building and there were all those manifestations of real pleasure which are customarily associated with the visits of this organization.

The interest of the evening was intensified by the reappearance in this city of Dr. Karl Muck, the distinguished conductor, who was formerly at the head of this orchestra, but was recalled to his post at the Berlin Opera by royal and imperial mandate.

Dr. Muck made his last previous appearances here at the concerts of March 19 and 21, 1909. At the former of these he conducted Frederick S. Converse's dramatic scenes entitled "Joan of Arc," Charles Martin Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" for orchestra, piano, English horn and three trumpets obligato, and Edward MacDowell's "Indian Suite." At the final matinée he directed Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, Mozart's "Nozze di Figaro" overture and Beethoven's Fourth symphony. Dr. Muck was succeeded in the following November by Max Fiedler, who retained the post till the end of last season.

The eminent master of the baton was received last evening in a manner which could have left him with no doubt as to New York's regard for him.

The programme which he offered for the pleasure of his admirers consisted of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Berlioz's "Carneval Romain" overture, Liszt's symphonic poem; "Mazeppa" and Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude. These four numbers formed a series which swept the opulent field of orchestral development from the last days of the purely classic to the full splendor of the modern romantic.

It was, however, not a programme in which perfect evenness of interest was present, for the two middle numbers fell considerably below the other two in merit. Liszt's "Mazeppa" can hardly be regarded as a work of heroic proportions and the wild horse was assuredly not a "Tartar of the Ukraine breed." It might therefore be wise to fall back on a learned discussion of the conductor's reading of the "Eroica." But to what end?

If a director makes of a Beethoven symphony a field for the parade of his idiosyncrasies or the exhibition of his especial feats in distortion of inner passages in order to disclose "hitherto unsuspected beauties," perhaps there would be excellent reason for an application of the whip of analysis. But when he respects the letter of the text and indulges only in a few characteristic accentuations, not at all revolutionary, the summary of thematter must be that he discharged his duties honorably.

Dr. Muck was never a sensationalist. Whatever he does bears the stamp of culture, of scholarly sincerity. His reading of the "Eroica" was above all things honest. He takes the funeral march very slowly and he dwells with affection on the broad phrases of the finale, but from beginning to end his reading is consistent and is subservient to the general plan of the composer.

The orchestra naturally lacked a trifle of its wonted brilliancy of tone last night, but on the other hand every melodic fragment in the score was brought out with perfect clearness. The finish, the elegance, the smooth certainty of the performance all brought delight to the hearts of music lovers. The audience was not slow to recognize the beauty of this symphonic song and there was an abundance of applause.

The "Roman Carnival" overture is one of the brilliant products of the pen of Berlioz and it was played admirably last evening. Most noticeable was the delicacy of the delivery of the string passages, while in the sonorous pages given to the brass there was a splendid resonance entirely free of blatancy. Similar qualities were found in the presentation of Liszt's pretentious and banal composition. It was treated much better than it deserved to be.

It was apparent that under the guidance of Dr. Muck the orchestra had set out toward a recovery of that peculiarly velvety quality of tone which it used to have and which was partly obscured under the ardent outreachings of the spirit of Mr. Fiedler. It will perhaps be needful to wait yet a little before we hear the old tone in all its nobility, but much of the exquisite finesse of the orchestra was already in evidence last night. The transparency of the tutti passages showed the presence of the hand of a great master.

It is good to have Dr. Muck back. He is one of the foremost musical minds of this time.

NOVEMBER 8.

NEW YORK PRESS.

DR. MUCK BACK WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Conductor's Personality Has Made Big Change in Organization.

MUSIC LOVERS WELCOME HIM

Orchestra Gives a Deeply Impressive Rendition of Wagner and Beethoven.

An audience that filled Carnegie Hall completely, despite the weather, welcomed Dr. Karl Muck back to New York last night as head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There was nothing boisterous in the reception accorded to the famous conductor. Subscribers to the Boston orchestra's concerts do not display their feelings in that way, and Dr. Muck is not the kind of man to invite such demonstrations. Yet there can be no doubt that the great majority of those who applauded the man when he made his first entrance and induced him to bow two or three times after every number meant what their hands expressed sincerely and deeply.

After an absence of several years as musical director in the Berlin Opera House, where he was held by the Emperor's will, though he himself longed to be in America, Dr. Muck at last had returned to the orchestra with which he was so brilliantly identified in the past. The men from Boston needed him, as was shown by their performance last night. The musical public of this city also needed him—needed his quiet yet forceful influence, so opposed to everything sensational. No wonder every one last night felt happy.

Possibly Dr. Muck might have chosen a better programme for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first concert in New York this season, though the absence of a soloist was distinctly agreeable. Something more substantial than Berlioz's "Carnaval Romains" overture, which was grouped with Liszt's symphonic poem "Mezeppa" and Wagner's "Meistersinger" overture in the second part of the evening, would have been welcome. The beautiful reading Dr. Muck gave of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, however, and the finely sonorous and dignified performance of the "Meistersinger" overture, which closed the programme, offered ample compensation.

It was to be expected that Dr. Muck would impress his artistic personality on the Boston Symphony Orchestra before long. So great a change at the very beginning of the season as one observed last night, however, came as a surprise.

There had been a tendency in the past few years, it must be confessed, to break away from the best traditions, to sacrifice euphony, clearness, precision, for rude vigor or emotional effusiveness. That tendency, evidently, Dr. Muck has stopped short. More still, in the brief time he has had the orchestra in hand since his return he seems to have eradicated the damage done during his absence. Smoothness of tone, transparency, delicacy of phrasing, unanimity—those were the leading characteristics of the orchestra's playing last night, as they were of yore.

Dr. Karl Muck is far from old-fashioned in his interpretations. Our forefathers, no doubt, would have been shocked at his reading of the "Eroica" symphony. A man of culture and refinement, however, the German conductor never seems to have the temptation to be over-emphatic, to indulge in rude exaggerations. It is easy to understand that this reserve—so unusual in this age—might create the impression of coldness. Yet though Dr. Muck does not permit his passions to flare up and steers clear of all effects which could be construed as vulgar, his nature is not cold. Surely the reading he gave of the Funereal movement of the Beethoven symphony, which he took at an unusually slow pace, lacked nothing in pathos. It was deeply and convincingly moving—not a complaint but a tragedy.

It was the scherzo of the symphony, though, played with exquisite delicacy and finish, that delighted the auditors most. They had heard it given with more rollicking humor, perhaps, but hardly with more contagious merriment and charm.

Among those who visited Dr. Muck in the intermission were Geraldine Farrar, who, of course, has sung under the conductor's baton in Berlin. The Boston Orchestra's next concert will take place on Thursday evening, December 5.

EVENING POST:

NOVEMBER 8, 1912.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston rejoices once more in the possession of a conductor of the very first rank. Neither in the concert hall nor the opera house (except for a few weeks) has she owned one in recent years. But now Dr. Carl Muck is back at the head of the Symphony Orchestra, and everybody rejoices. It is an open secret that under his predecessor this orchestra, which is one of the best in the world, had lost some of its polish. Dr. Muck will doubtless soon restore its full lustre; last night, already, a change was noticeable, although the depressingly damp atmosphere, which made the auditors feel as if they were all taking a Turkish bath, prevented the orchestra from displaying its usual brilliancy.

The opening piece was Beethoven's colossal "Eroica" symphony—a work which has done so much good and so much harm in the musical world. The good it has done consists in the delight it has given to millions of true music lovers during the hundred and six years since it was first performed, and in the inspiration it gave to the great masters that came after him by its wealth of new melodies, rhythms, and forms. The harm it has done was due to its excessive length. Haydn and Mozart had written symphonies of just about the right dimensions. Beethoven doubled and trebled the duration, and while he himself, with his consummate genius, was able to paint a picture on such a huge canvas, those who came after him deemed it necessary to follow his example, the result being that nine-tenths of all symphonic works written since the "Eroica" are too long. "Less would have been more" is true of all of them; and for this Beethoven is to blame. Even his works would gain by being edited; certainly the "Eroica" would; there are tiresome stretches in it which it would be well to eliminate. All theatrical managers shorten and edit the plays of Shakespeare, and the operas of Wagner are greatly improved by being shortened in the way Anton Seidl did it. The day will doubtless come when Beethoven's symphonies will also get the benefit of the judicious editing of an Anton Seidl of the future.

The performance of the "Eroica" last night had the good qualities to be expected of the Boston Orchestra; it was smooth, accurate, delicate, and vigorous in turn, nicely colored, and altogether in the approved classical style. There was little reading between the lines; the most academically-minded could find no reason to complain on that score. Yet the emotional side was not neglected, and in the funeral march there was a grand climax of grief eloquently voiced.

Dr. Muck is one of the regular conductors at Bayreuth, and in the "Meistersinger" prelude, at the close of the programme, he was therefore quite at home. Between the Beethoven and the Wagner the band played Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, which gave it a chance to display its brilliant virtuosity, and Liszt's splendid "Mazeppa," which contains stirring ideas as well as brilliancy (and also some moments of dulness). This symphonic poem was one of the works which impressed Wagner by their "extraordinary wealth of musical productive power," and the mere reading of which caused him to be "overwhelmed with emotion and joy," to use his own words. Both Wagner and Liszt would have embraced Dr. Muck for the eloquent way in which he brought out the tragedy of this masterwork, of which Wagner further wrote: "I was quite out of breath after reading it through the first time. I feel sorry, too, for the poor horse: how cruel are nature and the world." It is to be hoped that Dr. Muck will give us some more of his fine Liszt interpretations during the season. He and Josef Stransky, the leader of our Philharmonic, are close friends, and one of their bonds of friendship is their love of Liszt.

"Snow White."

~~The boys and girls of the city—the little boys and girls—have been long and strangely overlooked in the general theatrical scheme of Christmas entertainment, and doubtless will rejoice greatly in the fairy tale of "Snow White," which Mr. Winthrop Ames, following the example of the German Theatre, has put on the stage of his Little Theatre for their especial delectation. Most of them doubtless are more or less familiar with the popular Grimm story, or, rather, stories, of which it is an expansion. The adaptor is Jesse Braham White, whose work will doubtless prove entirely satisfactory from the juvenile point of view, although it is not enriched by any special graces of imagination. It is emphatically a show for children, not including those of larger growth. A special audience, Wednesday afternoon, consisted largely of diminutive youngsters, whose intense interest in and amazement at some of the ancient stage illusions were delightful to watch. They were aghast at the vengeful jealousy of the wicked queen, enthralled by the enchantments wrought by the ugly old witch and enthusiastic in their sympathy with the pretty little heroine in her tribulations and ultimate triumph. Nothing pleased them more than the impunity with which the witch sat upon a flaming brazier, and it is possible that the impression created by this particular illusion may lead to perilous domestic experiments in the future. The most successful scenes, perhaps, were those which occurred in the abode of the seven dwarfs where the simplicity and naturalness of the incidents were more productive of illusion than the more pretentious supernatural business. But the juvenile audience evidently saw everything with the eyes of perfect faith, and doubtless profited by the spectacle of defeated vice and victorious virtue. The piece is prettily staged and well enough acted, the children players having been diligently trained and entering into their parts with unflagging spirits. There is nothing in it to call for serious comment, but the show is a good one of its kind, fulfils its obvious purpose, and deserves to be and probably will be prosperous.~~

Rent for the Barber London House.

~~WASHINGTON, November [illegible]—Executors of the late Amzi L. Barber, a leading figure in the Asphalt trade, are confronted with a bill of $50,35[illegible] for rent of the Barber London house. William Henry Colbran has brought suit, based on a twenty-[illegible] lease of the house to Barber, who, after paying for three years, failed to comply with the terms of the lease. The annual rental, according to Colbran, was to have been $7,819. The executors will fight the claim.~~

NEW-YORK TRIBUNE,

NOVEMBER 8.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

A Welcome for Dr. Muck at Carnegie Hall.

The greeting which the Boston Orchestra received at its first concert for this season in Carnegie Hall last night could have been no heartier had the country's metropolis had a proprietary interest in the orchestra instead of New England's capital. But this is characteristic of New York. Civic pride plays no part in its appreciation of artistic offerings. It cares nothing for the native habitat of those who contribute to its enjoyment and refuses to believe that it is a duty to affect to admire the mediocre because it is of home production, or to give small measure of appreciation to the excellent because it is not. And yet without appeal to the sentiment which is preached in so many places as an essential to culture it manages to maintain a pretty high standard of appreciative interest in art. In nothing is this demonstrated more convincingly than in its delight in the Boston Orchestra. With a hundred other orchestra concerts to listen to every season it makes a gala occasion out of every visit of Major Higginson's organization. It accepts its programmes without murmur, even when they repeat compositions which have just been heard from local orchestras, and rejoices unaffectedly and wholeheartedly in every manifestation of remarkable skill by the leader or his men. And its opportunities to do so are frequent, largely because the performances have always been kept free from vagaries or strivings after sensational effect. Neither the performances of the bandsmen nor the readings of their leaders have become mannerisms here, and so without yielding their privilege to discriminate the people of New York have noted the phases through which the Boston Orchestra has passed in the course of more than a quarter of a century, placed an estimate upon them all and frankly and enthusiastically paid tribute to all which made appeal to its æsthetic judgment. The achievements of the men have received as full a recognition as that given to their leaders, from Gericke to Fiedler. All of the conductors live in the admiration of New York's music lovers, none more puissantly than Dr. Muck, whose return was celebrated last night. There was no artificial effusiveness in the welcome extended to him, for the audiences of the Boston Orchestra are lovers of music, not worshippers of men; but Dr. Muck was made to feel that musical New York was glad of his presence and of the assurance which that presence gave of refined pleasures, haply for a long time to come.

The gracious ceremony over, the audience settled down to present enjoyment. It came in more than expected measure in spite, or perhaps because, of the familiarity of all the music on the programme. In a way the list might have been described as conventional as well as familiar. A tribute to the great symphonist—him who was, who is and who shall be, let us hope, in sæcula sæculorum—Beethoven, began it. Dr. Muck gave us the "Heroic" symphony. Then the men must show their "virtuosity" in Berlioz's overture "Carnaval Romaine" and Liszt's "Mazeppa," and to bring back an appreciation of the sound and healthy in the art the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." When the ideal day comes for orchestral music it may be that a symphony by Beethoven will be permitted to stand for an evening's enjoyment alone, or with only an introductory piece to attune the mind for its appreciation. Then such beauties as marked last night's performance of the "Eroica" will be carried away as a lovely memory to be dwelt on with joy and to be cherished as an uplifting experience. What was there in all the glitter of the Berlioz and Liszt music to match the music of the symphony which Dr. Muck evoked for its own sake rather than to exploit the skill of the musicians? Was there anywhere such exquisite pathos as that which spoke out of the concluding measures of the funeral march when the music apparently borders on childishness in its simplicity, and then seizes upon heart and imagination as it grows until one feels the falling clods and joins in the lamentations and the choked sighs? Here was the emotional climax of last night's music. Before it the ear had been ravished with the purity of the instrumental tone, and, in the first movement especially, with the transparency of the harmonies, each instrument contributing its quality, but leaving the balance undisturbed; also with the exquisite finesse of the dynamic effects, the delightful propulsion of the dainty sforzatos, the equability in quantity and quality with which interrupted phrases were taken up and continued by an instrumental companion, but in the coda of the march poetical expression was supreme, and there, to many, perhaps, was the climax of the evening, despite the pure loveliness of the scherzo and the glorious flight in the concluding variations.

There did not seem to be an unoccupied chair in the great hall. H. E. K.

BROOKLYN EDIT

From HERALD
Address: New York
Date NOV 3 - 1912
Estab

Brooklyn will welcome Dr. Karl Muck, who will return with the Boston Symphony Orchestra after an absence of two years, Friday evening in the opera house of the Academy of Music, for the first concert of the season. The concert will be in the nature of a welcome to Dr. Muck and there will be no soloist. This programme will be given:—

Symphony No. 8, F major, op. 93; allegro vivace e con brio, allegretto scherzando, tempo di menuetto, allegro vivace. Beethoven
Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," op. 9 .. Berlioz
"Mazeppa," symphonic poem No. 9 (after Victor Hugo) .... Liszt
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg" .... Wagner

---

From TIMES
Address Brooklyn, N.Y.
Date NOV 4 1912
Esta ... 38

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

On Friday evening November 8 the first of the five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy will have a special character in that Mr. Fiedler's successor, Dr. Karl Muck will conduct. The programme includes the Beethoven Symphony No. 8, the Berlioz "Carnaval Romain" op 9, Liszt's symphonic poem "Mazeppa" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg." Dr. Muck is acknowledged as one of the really great conductors of the musical world. His qualities are known and appreciated here. A warm welcome awaits him.

From SUN
Address: New York
Date NOV 8 - 1912
Estab ... 34

KARL MUCK RETURNS WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Old Conductor's Influence Is Perceptible at Once in Velvety Tones.

SUPERB IN BEETHOVEN

Directs the "Eroica" Symphony With Sincerity and Affection.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of its current season in this city at Carnegie Hall last night. Despite the uproarious misbehavior of Jupiter Pluvius there was an audience which stretched the walls of the building and there were all those manifestations of real pleasure which are customarily associated with the visits of this organization.

The interest of the evening was intensified by the reappearance in this city of Dr. Karl Muck, the distinguished conductor, who was formerly at the head of this orchestra, but was recalled to his post at the Berlin Opera by royal and imperial mandate.

Dr. Muck made his last previous appearances here at the concerts of March 19 and 21, 1909. At the former of these he conducted Frederick S. Converse's dramatic scenes entitled "Joan of Arc," Charles Martin Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" for orchestra, piano, English horn and three trumpets obligato, and Edward MacDowell's "Indian Suite." At the final matinée he directed Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, Mozart's "Nozze di Figaro" overture and Beethoven's Fourth symphony. Dr. Muck was succeeded in the following November by Max Fiedler, who retained the post till the end of last season.

The eminent master of the baton was received last evening in a manner which could have left him with no doubt as to New York's regard for him.

The programme which he offered for the pleasure of his admirers consisted of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Berlioz's "Carneval Romain" overture, Liszt's symphonic poem "Mazeppa" and Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude. These four numbers formed a series which swept the opulent field of orchestral development from the last days of the purely classic to the full splendor of the modern romantic.

It was, however, not a programme in which perfect evenness of interest was present, for the two middle numbers fell considerably below the other two in merit. Liszt's "Mazeppa" can hardly be regarded as a work of heroic proportions and the wild horse was assuredly not a "Tartar of the Ukraine breed." It might therefore be wise to fall back on a learned discussion of the conductor's reading of the "Eroica." But to what end?

If a director makes of a Beethoven symphony a field for the parade of his idiosyncrasies or the exhibition of his especial feats in distortion of inner passages in order to disclose "hitherto unsuspected beauties," perhaps there would be excellent reason for application of the whip of analysis. [illegible] he [illegible] the letter of the text [illegible] characteristic [illegible] revolutionary, [illegible] must be that he [illegible]

Dr. Muck was never a sensationalist. Whatever he does bears the stamp of culture, of scholarly sincerity. His reading of the "Eroica" was above all things honest. He takes the funeral march very slowly and he dwells with affection on the broad phrases of the finale, but from beginning to end his reading is consistent and is subservient to the general plan of the composer.

The orchestra naturally lacked a trifle of its wonted brilliancy of tone last night, but on the other hand every melodic fragment in the score was brought out with perfect clearness. The finish, the elegance, the smooth certainty of the performance all brought delight to the hearts of music lovers. The audience was not slow to recognize the beauty of this symphonic song and there was an abundance of applause.

The "Roman Carnival" overture is one of the brilliant products of the pen of Berlioz and it was played admirably last evening. Most noticeable was the delicacy of the delivery of the string passages, while in the sonorous pages given to the brass there was a splendid resonance entirely free of blatancy. Similar qualities were found in the presentation of Liszt's pretentious and banal composition. It was treated much better than it deserved to be.

It was apparent that under the guidance of Dr. Muck the orchestra had set out toward a recovery of that peculiarly velvety quality of tone which it used to have and which was partly obscured under the ardent outreachings of the spirit of Mr. Fiedler. It will perhaps be needful to wait yet a little before we hear the old tone in all its nobility, but much of the exquisite finesse of the orchestra was already in evidence last night. The transparency of the tutti passages showed the presence of the hand of a great master.

It is good to have Dr. Muck back. He is one of the foremost musical minds of this time.

CALL

From
Address: New York City
Date NOV 8 - 1912
Esta ... 34

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA WILL GIVE ITS FIRST CONCERT THIS EVENING AT THE BROOKLYN ACADEMY.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Dr. Karl Muck is the conductor, will be given this evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The program:

Symphony No. 8, F Major, Op. 93 .. Beethoven
  Allegro vivace e con brio
  Allegretto scherzando
  Tempo di menuetto
  Allegro vivace
Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Op. 9, Berlioz
"Mazeppa," Symphonic Poem No. 6 ..... Liszt
Prelude to "The Meistersinger" .... Wagner

There will be a ten-minute intermission after the symphony.

The operatic department of the Von Ende School of Music, at 58 West 90th street, announces the engagement of Maestro Fernando Tanara, in association with Ludwig Hess, the famous German tenor, teacher of voice placement, German opera and German lieder; Mme. Adrienne Remenyi, the eminent French soprano, teacher of voice culture, French diction, style and interpretation, and Miss Beatrice McCue, the well known contralto, teacher of voice culture and English diction.

Tanara has conducted in the principal opera houses of the world—Covent Garden of London, the Lyceum of Barcelona, Grand Opera House of Buenos Aires, San Carlo Opera Company, the Manhattan Opera Company, and for three years with Sig. Toscanini at the Metropolitan Opera House. He is the teacher of Tamagno, Caruso, Bonci, Zenatello, Slezak, Martin, Jadlowker, Bassi, Karl John, Geraldine Farrar, Emmy Destin, Gadski, Alma Gluck, Frances Alda, Louise Homer, Marie Rappold, Titta Ruffo, Amato, Dinh Gilly, Ancona Sammarco, Putnam Griswold, William Hinshaw, Didur and others.

Tanara will specialize in classical interpretation of Italian and French grand opera, voice placement, preparation for the stage, diction and mise-en-scene.

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York.
Date NOV 8 1912
Est ... 84

Dr. Muck und die Boſtoner.

Dr. Karl Muck, der neue Dirigent der Boſtoner, der zum Glück eine gute alte Bekanntſchaft iſt — hat er das Meiſterorcheſter doch ſchon früher zwei Jahre lang mit Ehren angeführt — ſtellte ſich dem New Yorker Publikum geſtern Abend in Carnegie Hall vor gänzlich beſetztem Saal zum erſten Mal vor. Sich und ſein Orcheſter, das damit den Reigen der Symphonie-Konzerte in der eben begonnenen Saiſon eröffnete. Mit vollem Glanz eröffnete, wie gleich geſagt ſein ſoll, und woran wohl Niemand gezweifelt hatte. Ein warmer, immer wieder anſchwellender Applaus empfing den Dirigenten bei ſeinem erſten Erſcheinen, und den ganzen Abend über wurden ihm und ſeinem herrlichen Orcheſter die rauſchendſten Ovationen [illegible]

Muck hatte ein höchſt intereſſantes Programm gewählt. Er begann mit Beethoven's „Eroica", einem der genialſten und ſtimmungsvollſten Werke, das je geſchrieben wurde. Es war eine große Leiſtung, wenn man auch nicht in allem und jedem mit dem Dirigenten einverſtanden ſein mochte. Für meinen Geſchmack z. B. nahm Muck den erſten Satz anfangs gleich zu heldenhaft, während das erſte Thema recht weich und ſanft und auch das zweite ſchmeichelnd genommen werden ſoll, um das Erheben des trotzigen Jupiterhauptes ſpäter wirkungsvoller erſcheinen zu laſſen. Das heldenhafte Ringen und Siegen fand den Dirigenten in wundervollſter Stimmung. Der Trauermarſch gelang in ſtiller ſchmerzhaft-düſterem Kolorit überaus eindrucksvoll, erhebend wirkte das troſtvolle Aufblicken in das Jenſeits, und wenn zum Schluß das Hauptthema gleichſam in ſeine Beſtandtheile zerfällt, da glich es halb erſtickten Thränen. Das Scherzo athmete ſtatt der frohen Zuverſicht, wie ſie ſo häufig angedeutet wird in Muck's Auffaſſung mehr düſteren Humor und phantaſtiſches Leben, und zwar nicht zum Nachtheil des Ganzen, wie mich dünken will. Wundervoll gelangen da die ſchwierigen, kriegeriſchen Hörnerrufe, wie denn die Bläſer geſtern überhaupt ihren großen Tag hatten. Das Glücksgefühl der beruhigten Seele, die Variationen des letzten Satzes und die Dankſagungen im Fugate beſchloſſen die Darbietung in beſter Weiſe.

Unerhörte Virtuoſität entfalteten Dirigent und Orcheſter in den drei Nummern der zweiten Abtheilung, Beliоz' „Römiſcher Karneval"-Ouverture, Liszt's „Mazeppa" und dem Vorſpiel zu den „Meiſterſingern". Die pikante Melodik, die ſprudelnde Luſtigkeit und der galliſche Eſprit der Berlioz'ſchen Ouverture wurde mit bewunderungswürdiger Klarheit und lebensvollem Schwung gegeben. In Liszt's Kompoſition entfaltete das Orcheſter berauſchende Klangfülle, und Dr. Muck ſtandirte das Heldengedicht mit warmer Hingabe und Farbenreichthum. Die Krone des Konzerts aber war das unſterbliche „Meiſterſinger"-Vorſpiel, deſſen freudiger C-Dur-Klang großzügig und ſchlicht, innig und brillant durch den Saal brauſte, in allen ſeinen Phaſen meiſterhaft geſtaltet und von rauſchendem Jubelklang gekrönt.

Muck iſt „der Alte" geblieben, und das iſt das größte Lob, das man ihm ſpenden kann. Dieſelbe Kombination von Temperament und ſorgſam abwägendes und ausgleichendes Formgefühl, derſelbe Reſpekt vor dem Kunſtwerk, der doch gelegentlich eigene Heraustreten nicht ausſchließt. Dieſelbe Durchſichtigkeit des Gewebes, die gewohnte liebevolle Herausſtreichung des Melos und dieſelbe federnde Eleganz und Elaſtizität der Technik. Womöglich noch gewachſen iſt ſeine Rhythmik, die größere Freiheit dem Tempo gegenüber zeigt. Die ſparſame und elegante Gebärdenſprache wirbt noch für den vornehmen, gezügelten Muſiker. Es war ein großer Anfang. Die Boſtoner werden uns unter ſolcher Führung doppelt willkommen ſein. H.

NOV 8 - 1912

Muck Again Leader of the Boston Orchestra

SYLVESTER RAWLING.

THERE was a warm welcome for Dr. Karl Muck at Carnegie Hall last night as he entered upon the stage to conduct the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's twenty-seventh season in New York. Many of the boxes were empty at the time and there were vacant places on the orchestra floor. No matter what hour may be fixed for the beginning of a concert in New York, a number of subscribers are sure to be late. After the first movement of the symphony, however, every seat was occupied. Long ago, in fact, the house was sold out. It is four years since Dr. Muck directed the superb body of players that constitute this orchestra. Recalled to Berlin by the German Emperor, his reign had been all too brief. His worth had been acknowledged everywhere and regret for his departure was universal. Now he is returned for a long engagement and great things are expected of him.

Dr. Muck selected Beethoven's great third symphony, "The Eroica," for his reappearance. Perhaps it was due to the effect of the weather upon the strings, but in the first movement undue prominence seemed to be given to the brasses. At any rate, the playing of it was not entirely satisfactory. With the funeral march, however, the spell of these musicians reasserted itself, and by the time the finale was reached everybody was under its influence. The rest of the programme consisted of Berlioz's overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger," each and all played with the compelling power and brilliancy to which this orchestra has accustomed [illegible]

From TOWN & COUNTRY
Address: New York City.
Date NOV 9 1912
Establi

Mr. Philip Hale

In writing of musical criticism, Mr. Henry Krehbiel says: "There never was a time when musical criticism stood higher in the United States than it does to-day. The reviewers for the daily newspapers of Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago and New York, as a rule, are men of learning, taste, good judgment and honesty, who know what they are writing about and who present the fruits of their trained knowledge attractively, pleasantly, without arrogance and without fear. A critic who is fortunate in being able to extend his influence far beyond the circle of his newspaper readers," continues Mr. Krehbiel, "is Mr. Philip Hale." This is apropos of Mr. Hale's historical and descriptive notes for the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Hale is the critic for the Boston Herald. He was born in 1854 in Norwich, Vt., and he was graduated at Yale and admitted to the Bar at Albany. His musical studies were made in Berlin, Munich, Stuttgart and Paris.

From EVG. SUN
Address: New York
Date NOV 7 - 1912
, 1884

Those clever Greeks of the Athens of America, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, come bearing Beethoven to Carnegie Hall at the revival of music there this evening. The symphony, as already announced, is the "Eroica."

That Dr. Muck may have the welcome to himself, the Boston manager, C. A. Ellis, announces there will be "no soloist."

Hermann Bischoff's symphony, once heard, is a semi-novelty for Carnegie Hall's Saturday matinée, with Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe."

From PRESS
Address: New York
Date NOV 8 1912
blished

DR. MUCK BACK WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Conductor's Personality Has Made Big Change in Organization.

MUSIC LOVERS WELCOME HIM

Orchestra Gives a Deeply Impressive Rendition of Wagner and Beethoven.

An audience that filled Carnegie Hall completely, despite the weather, welcomed Dr. Karl Muck back to New York last night as head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There was nothing boisterous in the reception accorded to the famous conductor. Subscribers to the Boston orchestra's concerts do not display their feelings in that way, and Dr. Muck is not the kind of man to invite such demonstrations. Yet there can be no doubt that the great majority of those who applauded the man when he made his first entrance and induced him to bow two or three times after every number meant what their hands expressed sincerely and deeply.

After an absence of several years as musical director in the Berlin Opera House, where he was held by the Emperor's will, though he himself longed to be in America, Dr. Muck at last had returned to the orchestra with which he was so brilliantly identified in the past. The men from Boston needed him, as was shown by their performance last night. The musical public of this city also needed him—needed his quiet yet forceful influence, so opposed to everything sensational. No wonder every one

BROOKLYN EDI

From HERALD
Address: New York
Date NOV 3 - 1912
Estab

Brooklyn will welcome Dr. Karl Muck, who will return with the Boston Symphony Orchestra after an absence of two years, Friday evening in the opera house of the Academy of Music, for the first concert of the season. The concert will be in the nature of a welcome to Dr. Muck and there will be no soloist. This programme will be given:—

Symphony No. 8, F major, op. 93; allegro vivace e con brio, allegretto scherzando, tempo di menuetto, allegro vivace. Beethoven
Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," op. 9...Berlioz
"Mazeppa," symphonic poem No. 9 (after Victor Hugo) ....Liszt
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg" ....Wagner

---

From TIMES
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 1 1912
Esta 38

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

On Friday evening November 8 the first of the five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy will have a special character in that Mr. Fiedler's successor, Dr. Karl Muck will conduct. The programme includes the Beethoven Symphony No. 8, the Berlioz "Carnaval Romain" op 9, Liszt's symphonic poem "Mazeppa" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg." Dr. Muck is acknowledged as one of the really great conductors of the musical world. His qualities are known and appreciated here. A warm welcome awaits him.

From SUN
Address: New York
Date NOV 8 - 1912
Establ 34

KARL MUCK RETURNS WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Old Conductor's Influence Is Perceptible at Once in Velvety Tones.

SUPERB IN BEETHOVEN

Directs the "Eroica" Symphony With Sincerity and Affection.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of its current season in this city at Carnegie Hall last night. Despite the uproarious misbehavior of Jupiter Pluvius there was an audience which stretched the walls of the building and there were all those manifestations of real pleasure which are customarily associated with the visits of this organization.

The interest of the evening was intensified by the reappearance in this city of Dr. Karl Muck, the distinguished conductor, who was formerly at the head of this orchestra, but was recalled to his post at the Berlin Opera by royal and imperial mandate.

Dr. Muck made his last previous appearances here at the concerts of March 19 and 21, 1909. At the former of these he conducted Frederick S. Converse's dramatic scenes entitled "Joan of Arc," Charles Martin Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" for orchestra, piano, English horn and three trumpets obligato, and Edward MacDowell's "Indian Suite." At the final matinée he directed Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, Mozart's "Nozze di Figaro" overture and Beethoven's Fourth symphony. Dr. Muck was succeeded in the following November by Max Fiedler, who retained the post till the end of last season.

The eminent master of the baton was received last evening in a manner which could have left him with no doubt as to New York's regard for him.

The programme which he offered for the pleasure of his admirers consisted of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Berlioz's "Carneval Romain" overture, Liszt's symphonic poem "Mazeppa" and Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude. These four numbers formed a series which swept the opulent field of orchestral development from the last days of the purely classic to the full splendor of the modern romantic.

It was, however, not a programme in which perfect evenness of interest was present, for the two middle numbers fell considerably below the other two in merit. Liszt's "Mazeppa" can hardly be regarded as a work of heroic proportions and the wild horse was assuredly not a "Tartar of the Ukraine breed." It might therefore be wise to fall back on a learned discussion of the conductor's reading of the "Eroica." But to what end?

If a director makes of a Beethoven symphony a field for the parade of his idiosyncrasies or the exhibition of his especial feats in distortion of inner passages in order to disclose "hitherto unsuspected beauties," perhaps there would be excellent reason for an application of the whip of analysis. But when he respects the letter of the text and indulges only in a few characteristic accentuations, not at all revolutionary, the summary of the matter must be that he discharged his duties honorably.

Dr. Muck was never a sensationalist. Whatever he does bears the stamp of culture, of scholarly sincerity. His reading of the "Eroica" was above all things honest. He takes the funeral march very slowly and he dwells with affection on the broad phrases of the finale, but from beginning to end his reading is consistent and is subservient to the general plan of the composer.

The orchestra naturally lacked a trifle of its wonted brilliancy of tone last night, but on the other hand every melodic fragment in the score was brought out with perfect clearness. The finish, the elegance, the smooth certainty of the performance all brought delight to the hearts of music lovers. The audience was not slow to recognize the beauty of this symphonic song and there was an abundance of applause.

The "Roman Carnival" overture is one of the brilliant products of the pen of Berlioz and it was played admirably last evening. Most noticeable was the delicacy of the delivery of the string passages, while in the sonorous pages given to the brass there was a splendid resonance entirely free of blatancy. Similar qualities were found in the presentation of Liszt's pretentious and banal composition. It was treated much better than it deserved to be.

It was apparent that under the guidance of Dr. Muck the orchestra had set out toward a recovery of that peculiarly velvety quality of tone which it used to have and which was partly obscured under the ardent outreachings of the spirit of Mr. Fiedler. It will perhaps be needful to wait yet a little before we hear the old tone in all its nobility, but much of the exquisite finesse of the orchestra was already in evidence last night. The transparency of the tutti passages showed the presence of the hand of a great master.

It is good to have Dr. Muck back. He is one of the foremost musical minds of this time.

From
Address: New York City
Date NOV 8
Esta 34

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA WILL GIVE ITS FIRST CONCERT THIS EVENING AT THE BROOKLYN ACADEMY.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Dr. Karl Muck is the conductor, will be given this evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The program:

Symphony No. 8, F Major, Op. 93...Beethoven
  Allegro vivace e con brio
  Allegretto scherzando
  Tempo di menuetto
  Allegro vivace
Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Op. 9. Berlioz
"Mazeppa," Symphonic Poem No. 6......Liszt
Prelude to "The Meistersinger"........Wagner

There will be a ten-minute intermission after the symphony.

The operatic department of the Von Ende School of Music, at 58 West 90th street, announces the engagement of Maestro Fernando Tanara, in association with Ludwig Hess, the famous German tenor, teacher of voice placement, German opera and German lieder; Mme. Adrienne Remenyi, the eminent French soprano, teacher of voice culture, French diction, style and interpretation, and Miss Beatrice McCue, the well known contralto, teacher of voice culture and English diction.

Tanara has conducted in the principal opera houses of the world—Covent Garden of London, the Lyceum of Barcelona, Grand Opera House of Buenos Aires, San Carlo Opera Company, the Manhattan Opera Company, and for three years with Sig. Toscanini at the Metropolitan Opera House. He is the teacher of Tamagno, Caruso, Borgi, Zenatello, Slezak, Martin, Jadlowker, Bassi, Karl John, Geraldine Farrar, Emmy Destin, Gadski, Alma Gluck, Frances Alda, Louise Homer, Marie Rappold, Titta Ruffo, Amato, Dinh Gilly, Ancona Sammarco, Putnam Griswold, William Hinshaw, Didur and others.

Tanara will specialize in classical interpretation of Italian and French grand opera, voice placement, preparation for the stage, diction and mise-en-scene.

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York.
Date
Esta 184

Dr. Muck und die Boſtoner.

Dr. Karl Muck, der neue Dirigent der Boſtoner, der zum Glück eine gute alte Bekanntſchaft iſt — hat er das Meiſterorcheſter doch ſchon früher zwei Jahre lang mit Ehren angeführt — ſtellte ſich dem New Yorker Publikum geſtern Abend in Carnegie Hall vor gänzlich beſetztem Saal zum erſten Mal vor. Sich und ſein Orcheſter, das damit den Reigen der Symphonie-Konzerte in der eben begonnenen Saiſon eröffnete. Mit vollem Glanz eröffnete, wie gleich geſagt ſein ſoll, und woran wohl Niemand gezweifelt hatte. Ein warmer, immer wieder anſchwellender Applaus empfing den Dirigenten bei ſeinem erſten Erſcheinen, und den ganzen Abend über wurden ihm und ſeinem herrlichen Orcheſter die rauſchendſten Ovationen dargebracht.

Muck hatte ein höchſt intereſſantes Programm gewählt. Er begann mit Beethoven's „Eroica", einem der genialſten und ſtimmungsvollſten Werke, das je geſchrieben wurde. Es war eine große Leiſtung, wenn man auch nicht in allem und jedem mit dem Dirigenten einverſtanden ſein mochte. Für meinen Geſchmack z. B. nahm Muck den erſten Satz anfangs gleich zu heldenhaft, während das erſte Thema recht weich und ſanft und auch das zweite ſchmeichelnd genommen werden ſoll, um das Erheben des trotzigen Jupiterhauptes ſpäter wirkungsvoller erſcheinen zu laſſen. Das heldenhafte Ringen und Siegen fand den Dirigenten in wundervollſter Stimmung. Der Trauermarſch gelang in ſtiller ſchmerzhaft-düſterem Kolorit überaus eindrucksvoll, erhebend wirkte das troſtvolle Aufblicken in das Jenſeits, und wenn zum Schluß das Hauptthema gleichſam in ſeine Beſtandtheile zerfällt, da glich es halb erſtickten Thränen. Das Scherzo athmete ſtatt der frohen Zuverſicht, wie ſie ſo häufig angedeutet wird in Muck's Auffaſſung mehr düſteren Humor und phantaſtiſches Leben, und zwar nicht zum Nachtheil des Ganzen, wie mich dünken will. Wundervoll gelangen da die ſchwierigen, kriegeriſchen Hörnerrufe, wie denn die Bläſer geſtern überhaupt ihren großen Tag hatten. Das Glücksgefühl der beruhigten Seele, die Variationen des letzten Satzes und die Dankſagungen im Fugate beſchloſſen die Darbietung in beſter Weiſe.

Unerhörte Virtuoſität entfalteten Dirigent und Orcheſter in den drei Nummern der zweiten Abtheilung, Belioz' „Römiſcher Karneval"-Ouverture, Liszt's „Mazeppa" und dem Vorſpiel zu den „Meiſterſingern". Die pikante Melodik, di ſprudelnde Luſtigkeit und der galliſch Eſprit der Berlioz'ſchen Ouverture wurd mit bewunderungswürdiger Klarheit un lebensvollem Schwung gegeben. In Liszt's Kompoſition entfaltete das Orcheſter berauſchende Klangfülle, und Dr. Muck ſkandirte das Heldengedicht mit warmer Hingabe und Farbenreichthum. Die Krone des Konzerts aber war das unſterbliche „Meiſterſinger"-Vorſpiel, deſſen freudiger C-Dur-Klang großzügig und ſchlicht, innig und brillant durch den Saal brauſte, in allen ſeinen Phaſen meiſterhaft geſtaltet und von rauſchendem Jubelklang gekrönt.

Muck iſt „der Alte" geblieben, und das iſt das größte Lob, das man ihm ſpenden kann. Dieſelbe Kombination von Temperament und ſorgſam abwägendes und ausgleichendes Formgefühl, derſelbe Reſpekt vor dem Kunſtwerk, der doch d gelegentlich eigene Heraustreten nicht au ſchließt. Dieſelbe Durchſichtigkeit d Gewebes, die gewohnte liebevolle Herau ſtreichung des Melos und dieſelbe federn Eleganz und Elaſtizität der Techn Womöglich noch gewachſen iſt ſeine Rhyt mik, die größere Freiheit dem Tempo gegenüber zeigt. Die ſparſame und elegante Gebärdenſprache wirbt noch fü den vornehmen, gezügelten Muſiker. Es war ein großer Anfang. Die Boſtoner werden uns unter ſolcher Führung doppelt willkommen ſein. H.

NOV 8 - 1912

uck Again eader of the n Orchestra

ESTER RAWLING.

THERE was a warm welcome for Dr. Karl Muck at Carnegie Hall last night as he entered upon the stage to conduct the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's twenty-seventh season in New York. Many of the boxes were empty at the time and there were vacant places on the orchestra floor. No matter what hour may be fixed for the beginning of a concert in New York, a number of subscribers are sure to be late. After the first movement of the symphony, however, every seat was occupied. Long ago, in fact, the house was sold out. It is four years since Dr. Muck directed the superb body of players that constitute this orchestra. Recalled to Berlin by the German Emperor, his reign had been all too brief. His worth had been acknowledged everywhere and regret for his departure was universal. Now he is returned for a long engagement and great things are expected of him.

Dr. Muck selected Beethoven's great third symphony, "The Eroica," for his reappearance. Perhaps it was due to the effect of the weather upon the strings, but in the first movement undue prominence seemed to be given to the brasses. At any rate, the playing of it was not entirely satisfactory. With the funeral march, however, the spell of these musicians reasserted itself, and by the time the finale was reached everybody was under its influence. The rest of the programme consisted of Berlioz's overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger," each and all played with the compelling power and brilliancy to which this orchestra has accustomed us.

From TOWN & COUNTRY
Address: New York City.
Date 1912
Establi

Mr. Philip Hale

In writing of musical criticism, Mr. Henry Krehbiel says: "There never was a time when musical criticism stood higher in the United States than it does to-day. The reviewers for the daily newspapers of Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago and New York, as a rule, are men of learning, taste, good judgment and honesty, who know what they are writing about and who present the fruits of their trained knowledge attractively, pleasantly, without arrogance and without fear. A critic who is fortunate in being able to extend his influence far beyond the circle of his newspaper readers," continues Mr. Krehbiel, "is Mr. Philip Hale." This is apropos of Mr. Hale's historical and descriptive notes for the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Hale is the critic for the Boston Herald. He was born in 1854 in Norwich, Vt., and he was graduated at Yale and admitted to the Bar at Albany. His musical studies were made in Berlin, Munich, Stuttgart and Paris.

From EVG. SUN
Address: New York
Date NOV 7 - 1912
k, 1884

Those clever Greeks of the Athens of America, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, come bearing Beethoven to Carnegie Hall at the revival of music there this evening. The symphony, as already announced, is the "Eroica."

That Dr. Muck may have the welcome to himself, the Boston manager, C. A. Ellis, announces there will be "no soloist."

Hermann Bischoff's symphony, once heard, is a semi-novelty for Carnegie Hall's Saturday matinée, with Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe."

From PRESS
Address: New York
Date NOV 8 1912
blished

DR. MUCK BACK WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Conductor's Personality Has Made Big Change in Organization.

MUSIC LOVERS WELCOME HIM

Orchestra Gives a Deeply Impressive Rendition of Wagner and Beethoven.

An audience that filled Carnegie Hall completely, despite the weather, welcomed Dr. Karl Muck back to New York last night as head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There was nothing boisterous in the reception accorded to the famous conductor. Subscribers to the Boston orchestra's concerts do not display their feelings in that way, and Dr. Muck is not the kind of man to invite such demonstrations. Yet there can be no doubt that the great majority of those who applauded the man when he made his first entrance and induced him to bow two or three times after every number meant what their hands expressed sincerely and deeply.

After an absence of several years as musical director in the Berlin Opera House, where he was held by the Emperor's will, though he himself longed to be in America, Dr. Muck at last had returned to the orchestra with which he was so brilliantly identified in the past. The men from Boston needed him, as was shown by their performance last night. The musical public of this city also needed him—needed his quiet yet forceful influence, so opposed to everything sensational. No wonder every one last night felt happy.

BROOKLYN EDI

From HERALD
Address: New York
Date NOV 3-1912

Brooklyn will welcome Dr. Karl Muck, who will return with the Boston Symphony Orchestra after an absence of two years, Friday evening in the opera house of the Academy of Music, for the first concert of the season. The concert will be in the nature of a welcome to Dr. Muck and there will be no soloist. This programme will be given:—

Symphony No. 8, F major, op. 93; allegro vivace e con brio, allegretto scherzando, tempo di menuetto, allegro vivace. Beethoven
Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," op. 9...Berlioz
"Mazeppa," symphonic poem No. 9 (after Victor Hugo)..........Liszt
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg"..........Wagner

Estab

From TIMES
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date 1912

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

On Friday evening November 8 the first of the five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy will have a special character in that Mr. Fiedler's successor, Dr. Karl Muck will conduct. The programme includes the Beethoven Symphony No. 8, the Berlioz "Carnaval Romain" op 9, Liszt's symphonic poem "Mazeppa" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg." Dr. Muck is acknowledged as one of the really great conductors of the musical world. His qualities are known and appreciated here. A warm welcome awaits him.

Esta 38

From SUN
Address: New York
Date 1912

KARL MUCK RETURNS WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Establ 34

Old Conductor's Influence Is Perceptible at Once in Velvety Tones.

SUPERB IN BEETHOVEN

Directs the "Eroica" Symphony With Sincerity and Affection.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of its current season in this city at Carnegie Hall last night. Despite the uproarious misbehavior of Jupiter Pluvius there was an audience which stretched the walls of the building and there were all those manifestations of real pleasure which are customarily associated with the visits of this organization.

The interest of the evening was intensified by the reappearance in this city of Dr. Karl Muck, the distinguished conductor, who was formerly at the head of this orchestra, but was recalled to his post at the Berlin Opera by royal and imperial mandate.

Dr. Muck made his last previous appearances here at the concerts of March 19 and 21, 1909. At the former of these he conducted Frederick S. Converse's dramatic scenes entitled "Joan of Arc," Charles Martin Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" for orchestra, piano, English horn and three trumpets obligato, and Edward MacDowell's "Indian Suite." At the final matinée he directed Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, Mozart's "Nozze di Figaro" overture and Beethoven's Fourth symphony. Dr. Muck was succeeded in the following November by Max Fiedler, who retained the post till the end of last season.

The eminent master of the baton was received last evening in a manner which could have left him with no doubt as to New York's regard for him.

The programme which he offered for the pleasure of his admirers consisted of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Berlioz's "Carneval Romain" overture, Liszt's symphonic poem "Mazeppa" and Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude. These four numbers formed a series which swept the opulent field of orchestral development from the last days of the purely classic to the full splendor of the modern romantic.

It was, however, not a programme in which perfect evenness of interest was present, for the two middle numbers fell considerably below the other two in merit. Liszt's "Mazeppa" can hardly be regarded as a work of heroic proportions and the wild horse was assuredly not a "Tartar of the Ukraine breed." It might therefore be wise to fall back on a learned discussion of the conductor's reading of the "Eroica." But to what end?

If a director makes of a Beethoven symphony a field for the parade of his idiosyncrasies or the exhibition of his especial feats in distortion of inner passages in order to disclose "hitherto unsuspected beauties," perhaps there would be excellent reason for an application of the whip of analysis. But when he respects the letter of the text and indulges only in a few characteristic accentuations, not at all revolutionary, the summary of the matter must be that he discharged his duties honorably.

Dr. Muck was never a sensationalist. Whatever he does bears the stamp of culture, of scholarly sincerity. His reading of the "Eroica" was above all things honest. He takes the funeral march very slowly and he dwells with affection on the broad phrases of the finale, but from beginning to end his reading is consistent and is subservient to the general plan of the composer.

The orchestra naturally lacked a trifle of its wonted brilliancy of tone last night, but on the other hand every melodic fragment in the score was brought out with perfect clearness. The finish, the elegance, the smooth certainty of the performance all brought delight to the hearts of music lovers. The audience was not slow to recognize the beauty of this symphonic song and there was an abundance of applause.

The "Roman Carnival" overture is one of the brilliant products of the pen of Berlioz and it was played admirably last evening. Most noticeable was the delicacy of the delivery of the string passages, while in the sonorous pages given to the brass there was a splendid resonance entirely free of blatancy. Similar qualities were found in the presentation of Liszt's pretentious and banal composition. It was treated much better than it deserved to be.

It was apparent that under the guidance of Dr. Muck the orchestra had set out toward a recovery of that peculiarly velvety quality of tone which it used to have and which was partly obscured under the ardent outreachings of the spirit of Mr. Fiedler. It will perhaps be needful to wait yet a little before we hear the old tone in all its nobility, but much of the exquisite finesse of the orchestra was already in evidence last night. The transparency of the tutti passages showed the presence of the hand of a great master.

It is good to have Dr. Muck back. He is one of the foremost musical minds of this time.

Newspaper

From
Address: New York City
Date

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA WILL GIVE ITS FIRST CONCERT THIS EVENING AT THE BROOKLYN ACADEMY.

Esta 34

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Dr. Karl Muck is the conductor, will be given this evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The program:

Symphony No. 8, F Major, Op. 93...Beethoven
  Allegro vivace e con brio
  Allegretto scherzando
  Tempo di menuetto
  Allegro vivace
Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Op. 9. Berlioz
"Mazeppa," Symphonic Poem No. 6......Liszt
Prelude to "The Meistersinger"........Wagner

There will be a ten-minute intermission after the symphony.

The operatic department of the Von Ende School of Music, at 58 West 90th street, announces the engagement of Maestro Fernando Tanara, in association with Ludwig Hess, the famous German tenor, teacher of voice placement, German opera and German lieder; Mme. Adrienne Remenyi, the eminent French soprano, teacher of voice culture, French diction, style and interpretation, and Miss Beatrice McCue, the well known contralto, teacher of voice culture and English diction.

Tanara has conducted cipal opera houses of Covent Garden of Lon ceum of Barcelona, House of Buenos Aire Opera Company, the Ma Company, and for thre Sig. Toscanini at the Opera House. He is th Tamagno, Caruso, Bo Slezak, Martin, Jadlowk John, Geraldine Farrar, Gadski, Alma Gluck, Louise Homer, Marie R Ruffo, Amato, Dinh Sammarco, Putnam Gris Hinshaw, Didur and othe Tanara will specialize in classical interpretation of Italian and French grand opera, voice placement, preparation for the stage, diction and mise-en-scene.

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York.
Date

Esta 84

Dr. Muck und die Boſtoner.

Dr. Karl Muck, der neue Dirigent der Boſtoner, der zum Glück eine gute alte Bekanntſchaft iſt — hat er das Meiſterorcheſter doch ſchon früher zwei Jahre lang mit Ehren angeführt — ſtellte ſich dem New Yorker Publikum geſtern Abend in Carnegie Hall vor gänzlich beſetztem Saal zum erſten Mal vor. Sich und ſein Orcheſter, das damit den Reigen der Symphonie-Konzerte in der eben begonnenen Saiſon eröffnete. Mit vollem Glanz eröffnete, wie gleich geſagt ſein ſoll, und woran wohl Niemand gezweifelt hatte. Ein warmer, immer wieder anſchwellender Applaus empfing den Dirigenten bei ſeinem erſten Erſcheinen, und den ganzen Abend über wurden ihm und ſeinem herrlichen Orcheſter die rauſchendſten Ovationen dargebracht.

Muck hatte ein höchſt intereſſantes Programm gewählt. Er begann mit Beethoven's „Eroica“, einem der genialſten und ſtimmungsvollſten Werke, das je geſchrieben wurde. Es war eine große Leiſtung, wenn man auch nicht in allem und jedem mit dem Dirigenten einverſtanden ſein mochte. Für meinen Geſchmack z. B. nahm Muck den erſten Satz anfangs gleich zu heldenhaft, während das erſte Thema recht weich und ſanft und auch das zweite ſchmeichelnd genommen werden ſoll, um das Erheben des trotzigen Jupiterhauptes ſpäter wirkungsvoller erſcheinen zu laſſen. Das heldenhafte Ringen und Siegen fand den Dirigenten in wundervollſter Stimmung. Der Trauermarſch gelang in ſtiller ſchmerzhaft-düſterem Kolorit überaus eindrucksvoll, erhebend wirkte das troſtvolle Aufblicken in das Jenſeits, und wenn zum Schluß das Hauptthema gleichſam in ſeine Beſtandtheile zerfällt, da glich es halb erſtickten Thränen. Das Scherzo athmete ſtatt der frohen Zuverſicht, wie ſie ſo häufig angedeutet wird in Muck's Auffaſſung mehr düſteren Humor und phantaſtiſches Leben, und zwar nicht zum Nachtheil des Ganzen, wie mich dünken will. Wundervoll gelangen da die ſchwierigen, kriegeriſchen Hörnerrufe, wie denn die Bläſer geſtern überhaupt ihren großen Tag hatten. Das Glücksgefühl der beruhigten Seele, die Variationen des letzten Satzes und die Dankſagungen im Fugate beſchloſſen die Darbietung in beſter Weiſe.

Unerhörte Virtuoſität entfalteten Dirigent und Orcheſter in den drei Nummern der zweiten Abtheilung, Belioz' „Römiſcher Karneval“-Ouverture, Liſzt's „Mazeppa“ und dem Vorſpiel zu den „Meiſterſingern“. Die pikante Melodik, di ſprudelnde Luſtigkeit und der galliſch Eſprit der Berlioz'ſchen Ouverture wurd mit bewunderungswürdiger Klarheit und lebensvollem Schwung gegeben. In Liſzt's Kompoſition entfaltete das Orcheſter berauſchende Klangfülle, und Dr. Muck ſtandirte das Heldengedicht mit warmer Hingabe und Farbenreichthum. Die Krone des Konzerts aber war das unſterbliche „Meiſterſinger“-Vorſpiel, deſſen freudiger C-Dur-Klang großzügig und ſchlicht, innig und brillant durch den Saal brauſte, in allen ſeinen Phaſen meiſterhaft geſtaltet und von rauſchendem Jubelklang gekrönt.

Muck iſt „der Alte“ geblieben, und das iſt das größte Lob, das man ihm ſpenden kann. Dieſelbe Kombination von Temperament und ſorgſam abwägendes und ausgleichendes Formgefühl, derſelbe Reſpekt vor dem Kunſtwerk, der doch d gelegentlich eigene Heraustreten nicht au ſchließt. Dieſelbe Durchſichtigkeit d Gewebes, die gewohnte liebevolle Herau ſtreichung des Melos und dieſelbe federn Eleganz und Elaſtizität der Techn Womöglich noch gewachſen iſt ſeine Rhyt mik, die größere Freiheit dem Tempo genüber zeigt. Die ſparſame und gante Gebärdenſprache wirbt noch den vornehmen, gezügelten Muſiker. war ein großer Anfang. Die Boſton werden uns unter ſolcher Führung d pelt willkommen ſein.

H.

From EVG. WORLD
Address: New York
Date NOV - 1912

Established: Lon

Dr. Muck Again As Leader of the Boston Orchestra

BY SYLVESTER RAWLING.

THERE was a warm welcome for Dr. Karl Muck at Carnegie Hall last night as he entered upon the stage to conduct the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's twenty-seventh season in New York. Many of the boxes were empty at the time and there were vacant places on the orchestra floor. No matter what hour may be fixed for the beginning of a concert in New York, a number of subscribers are sure to be late. After the first movement of the symphony, however, every seat was occupied. Long ago, in fact, the house was sold out. It is four years since Dr. Muck directed the superb body of players that constitute this orchestra. Recalled to Berlin by the German Emperor, his reign had been all too brief. His worth had been acknowledged everywhere and regret for his departure was universal. Now he is returned for a long engagement and great things are expected of him.

Dr. Muck selected Beethoven's great third symphony, "The Eroica," for his reappearance. Perhaps it was due to the effect of the weather upon the strings, but in the first movement undue prominence seemed to be given to the brasses. At any rate, the playing of it was not entirely satisfactory. With the funeral march, however, the spell of these musicians reasserted itself, and by the time the finale was reached everybody was under its influence. The rest of the programme consisted of Berlioz's overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger," each and all played with the compelling power and brilliancy to which this orchestra has accustomed us.

From TOWN & COUNTRY
Address: New York City.
Date

Establi

Mr. Philip Hale

In writing of musical criticism, Mr. Henry Krehbiel says: "There never was a time when musical criticism stood higher in the United States than it does to-day. The reviewers for the daily newspapers of Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago and New York, as a rule, are men of learning, taste, good judgment and honesty, who know what they are writing about and who present the fruits of their trained knowledge attractively, pleasantly, without arrogance and without fear. A critic who is fortunate in being able to extend his influence far beyond the circle of his newspaper readers," continues Mr. Krehbiel, "is Mr. Philip Hale." This is apropos of Mr. Hale's historical and descriptive notes for the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Hale is the critic for the Boston Herald. He was born in 1854 in Norwich, Vt., and he was graduated at Yale and admitted to the Bar at Albany. His musical studies were made in Berlin, Munich, Stuttgart and Paris.

From EVG. SUN
Address: New York
Date NOV 7 - 1912

Those clever Greeks of the Athens of America, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, come bearing Beethoven to Carnegie Hall at the revival of music there this evening. The symphony, as already announced, is the "Eroica."

That Dr. Muck may have the welcome to himself, the Boston manager, C. A. Ellis, announces there will be "no soloist."

Hermann Bischoff's symphony, once heard, is a semi-novelty for Carnegie Hall's Saturday matinée, with Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe."

k, 1884

From PRESS
Address: New York
Date NOV 8

Established:

DR. MUCK BACK WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Conductor's Personality Has Made Big Change in Organization.

MUSIC LOVERS WELCOME HIM

Orchestra Gives a Deeply Impressive Rendition of Wagner and Beethoven.

An audience that filled Carnegie Hall completely, despite the weather, welcomed Dr. Karl Muck back to New York last night as head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There was nothing boisterous in the reception accorded to the famous conductor. Subscribers to the Boston orchestra's concerts do not display their feelings in that way, and Dr. Muck is not the kind of man to invite such demonstrations. Yet there can be no doubt that the great majority of those who applauded the man when he made his first entrance and induced him to bow two or three times after every number meant what their hands expressed sincerely and deeply.

After an absence of several years as musical director in the Berlin Opera House, where he was held by the Emperor's will, though he himself longed to be in America, Dr. Muck at last had returned to the orchestra with which he was so brilliantly identified in the past. The men from Boston needed him, as was shown by their performance last night. The musical public of this city also needed him—needed his quiet yet forceful influence, so opposed to everything sensational. No wonder every one last night felt happy.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Possibly Dr. Muck might have chosen a better programme for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first concert in New York this season, though the absence of a soloist was distinctly agreeable. Something more substantial than Berlioz's "Carnaval Romains" overture, which was grouped with Liszt's symphonic poem "Mezeppa" and Wagner's "Meistersinger" overture in the second part of the evening, would have been welcome. The beautiful reading Dr. Muck gave of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, however, and the finely sonorous and dignified performance of the "Meistersinger" overture, which closed the programme, offered ample compensation.

It was to be expected that Dr. Muck would impress his artistic personality on the Boston Symphony Orchestra before long. So great a change at the very beginning of the season as one observed last night, however, came as a surprise.

There had been a tendency in the past few years, it must be confessed, to break away from the best traditions, to sacrifice euphony, clearness, precision, for rude vigor or emotional effusiveness. That tendency evidently, Dr. Muck has stopped short. More still, in the brief time he has had the orchestra in hand since his return he seems to have eradicated the damage done during his absence. Smoothness of tone transparency, delicacy of phrasing unanimity—those were the leading characteristics of the orchestra's playing last night, as they were of yore.

Dr. Karl Muck is far from old-fashioned in his interpretations. Our forefathers, no doubt, would have been shocked at his reading of the "Eroica" symphony. A man of culture and refinement, however, the German conductor never seems to have the temptation to be over-emphatic, to indulge in rude exaggerations. It is easy to understand that this reserve—so unusual in this age—might create the impression of coldness. Yet though Dr. Muck does not permit his passions to flare up and steers clear of all effects which could be construed as vulgar, his nature is not cold. Surely the reading he gave of the Funereal movement of the Beethoven symphony, which he took at an unusually slow pace, lacked nothing in pathos. It was deeply and convincingly moving—not a complaint but a tragedy.

It was the scherzo of the symphony, though, played with exquisite delicacy and finish, that delighted the auditors most. They had heard it given with more rollicking humor, perhaps, but hardly with more contagious merriment and charm.

Among those who visited Dr. Muck in the intermission were Geraldine Farrar, who, of course, has sung under the conductor's baton in Berlin. The Boston Orchestra's next concert will take place on Thursday evening, December 5.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.
Date NOV 8

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

A Welcome for Dr. Muck at Carnegie Hall.

The greeting which the Boston Orchestra received at its first concert for this season in Carnegie Hall last night could have been no heartier had the country's metropolis had a proprietary interest in the orchestra instead of New England's capital. But this is characteristic of New York. Civic pride plays no part in its appreciation of artistic offerings. It cares nothing for the native habitat of those who contribute to its enjoyment and refuses to believe that it is a duty to affect to admire the mediocre because it is of home production, or to give small measure of appreciation to the excellent because it is not. And yet without appeal to the sentiment which is preached in so many places as an essential to culture it manages to maintain a pretty high standard of appreciative interest in art. In nothing is this demonstrated more convincingly than in its delight in the Boston Orchestra. With a hundred other orchestra concerts to listen to every season it makes a gala occasion out of every visit of Major Higginson's organization. It accepts its programmes without murmur, even when they repeat compositions which have just been heard from local orchestras, and rejoices unaffectedly and wholeheartedly in every manifestation of remarkable skill by the leader or his men. And its opportunities to do so are frequent, largely because the performances have always been kept free from vagaries or strivings after sensational effect. Neither the performances of the bandsmen nor the readings of their leaders have become mannerisms here, and so without yielding their privilege to discriminate the people of New York have noted the phases through which the Boston Orchestra has passed in the course of more than a quarter of a century, placed an estimate upon them all and frankly and enthusiastically paid tribute to all which made appeal to its æsthetic judgment. The achievements of the men have received as full a recognition as that given to their leaders, from Gericke to Fiedler. All of the conductors live in the admiration of New York's music lovers, none more puissantly than Dr. Muck, whose return was celebrated last night. There was no artificial effusiveness in the welcome extended to him, for the audiences of the Boston Orchestra are lovers of music, not worshippers of men; but Dr. Muck was made to feel that musical New York was glad of his presence and of the assurance which that presence gave of refined pleasures, haply for a long time to come.

The gracious ceremony over, the audience settled down to present enjoyment. It came in more than expected measure in spite, or perhaps because, of the familiarity of all the music on the programme. In a way the list might have been described as conventional as well as familiar. A tribute to the great symphonist—him who was, who is and who shall be, let us hope, in sæcula sæculorum—Beethoven, began it. Dr. Muck gave us the "Heroic" symphony. Then the men must show their "virtuosity" in Berlioz's overture "Carnaval Romaine" and Liszt's "Mazeppa," and to bring back an appreciation of the sound and healthy in the art the prelude to "Die Meistersinger.". When the ideal day comes for orchestral music it may be that a symphony by Beethoven will be permitted to stand for an evening's enjoyment alone, or with only an introductory piece to attune the mind for its appreciation. Then such beauties as marked last night's performance of the "Eroica" will be carried away as a lovely memory to be dwelt on with joy and to be cherished as an uplifting experience. What was there in all the glitter of the Berlioz and Liszt music to match the music of the symphony which Dr. Muck evoked for its own sake rather than to exploit the skill of the musicians? Was there anywhere such exquisite pathos as that which spoke out of the concluding measures of the funeral march when the music apparently borders on childishness in its simplicity, and then seizes upon heart and imagination as it grows until one feels the falling clods and joins in the lamentations and the choked sighs? Here was the emotional climax of last night's music. Before it the ear had been ravished with the purity of the instrumental tone, and, in the first movement especially, with the transparency of the harmonies, each instrument contributing its quality, but leaving the balance undisturbed; also with the exquisite finesse of the dynamic effects, the delightful propulsion of the dainty sforzatos, the equability in quantity and quality with which interrupted phrases were taken up and continued by an instrumental companion, but in the coda of the march poetical expression was supreme, and there, to many, perhaps, was the climax of the evening, despite the pure loveliness of the scherzo and the glorious flight in the concluding variations.

There did not seem to be an unoccupied chair in the great hall. H. E. K.

From TIMES
Address: New York
Date

FIRST CONCERT OF BOSTON ORCHESTR

Dr. Karl Muck Returns as Conductor and Is Greeted Enthusiastically.

PROGRAMME WITHOUT SOLC

Fine Performances of Beethoven Eroica Symphony and Pieces by Berlioz, Liszt, and Wagner.

There was a real and heartfelt rejoicing last evening in Carnegie Hall, expressed with unmistakable enthusiasm, when Dr. Karl Muck appeared upon the platform to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the first concert of its twenty-seventh season in New York. There was an enormous audience, as large a one as the hall will accommodate, most of whose members had memories of the two seasons in which Dr. Muck was previously at the head of the Boston orchestra—those of 1906-7 and 1907-8. Their memories made them justly eager to welcome him back to the position which he filled then with such pre-eminent distinction. It is a familiar story how, after his two years' leave of absence in Boston, he was summoned by royal authority back to Berlin to fulfill his contract as conductor of the Royal Opera House there; and how, at the expiration of that contract, he found the way back to Boston and Mr. Higginson's superb orchestra tempting and easy. He had shown his power to raise that organization to its highest technical efficiency and to employ its powers to the finest ends; he had revealed his wide musical sympathies, his readiness to assimilate music of the most diverse tendencies, his devotion to the interests of the composer in bringing his work to the fullest realization, his eagerness to expend all his skill to that effect, even when his own personal likings were not wholly engaged. Always he stood as an interpreter of the composer's work, never as one displaying himself, his personality, his temperament, or impressing them upon the music, or endeavoring to find in it something that no one else had found, or anything that the composer had not put there.

Such Dr. Muck showed himself again last evening to be; and in some of these respects he differs markedly from some other modern conductors. He is now, as he was then, a man of power and authority, a musician of subtle and sensitive feeling, a conductor of the highest skill, a wonder worker with the marvelous instrument he controls. The orchestra itself showed a few new forces; but its quality has not changed.

In the programme last evening there was no soloist, and nothing to divert the attention of the audience from its performance. The music was familiar: Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Berlioz's overture, "Le Carnival Romain"; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger." The performance of the symphony was of splendid virility, breadth, and eloquence. It revealed nothing new; but it revealed the "Eroica" Symphony. It was nobly proportioned, dignified, full of poetry and marked by exquisite finish, finesse, and innumerable subtleties of accent, phrasing, and dynamics. One of its most notable qualities was its rhythmic vitality. Dr. Muck was free in his modifications of the tempo, and in the symphony, as in the other works on the programme, he did not hestitate to let loose the full power of the orchestra. But these things were all for a purpose, and the purpose was superbly fulfilled.

Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture sounds a little dryer in its melodic invention and its harmonic quality every time it is heard; but its orchestration holds its own in brilliancy, and the performance let none of its brilliancy be lost. A stirring effect was given to Liszt's "Mazeppa," and its wearisome thundering in the index, its intolerably long preparations to say something, were made to seem almost significant. The performance of the symphony deeply stirred the audience. Dr. Muck was again and again recalled, and he finally caused the whole orchestra to rise and share the applause with him.

4

From WORLD
Address: New York
Date 1912

DR. MUCK HAS TRIPH AT SYMPHONY CO

Boston Orchestra Shows Improvement in Playing Under Returned Conductor.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first New York concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night and for once was momentarily relegated to secondary importance. Dr. Karl Muck, one of the half dozen great symphonic conductors of his time, was responsible for the visiting band's subordination and no one would have had it otherwise.

Dr. Muck's entrance was the signal for applause from an audience filling every seat in the hall. Nor would the crowd permit the starting of the programme until it had fully expressed its satisfaction of again having the recent Berlin musical giant at his old post after a three years' absence.

There was no marked change in the methods or accomplishments of this distinguished leader. His old-time authority was once more a conspicuous factor, and he used it to still the conversation that sprang up between the first and second movements of the opening composition.

But it is doubtful if this splendid musical organization has been heard to better advantage since Dr. Muck departed for Europe than in last evening's programme, which included the Beethoven "Eroica" symphony, Berlioz's "Le Carnaval Romain" overture, Liszt's symphonic poem "Mazeppa," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

There seemed to be more life and vitality in the work of the orchestra men—the probable reflection of the returned director—and a unity of effort in technical precision beyond reproach.

Reasonable music lovers could not wish for better orchestral playing or conducting than that found at Carnegie Hall last night. Only the finicky would discover unimportant flaws.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York. NOV 8 - 1912
Date

IT must have taken even damper weather than that of last night to discourage the music lovers of this city from turning out to welcome the great orchestra from Boston.

Besides, there was a double inducement that helped to crowd Carnegie Hall. Dr. Karl Muck after an absence of several years made his reappearance at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

As formerly, he is the least affected and most effective of leaders. He conducts as Charles Dana Gibson used to draw—with the elimination of all superfluous lines. A glance from Dr. Muck's eye and the violins take their cue. A quick staccato gesture from his left hand and a choir that has been unduly increasing its dynamics subsides.

The best music of the evening opened and closed the programme—Beethoven's Heroic Symphony, given with a unanimity such as only the Boston players know, and Wagner's Mastersinger Prelude, so familiar that in one or two places Dr. Muck gave up any pretence at conducting.

Nay, more, his able reading lent dignity even to the banalities of Liszt's "Mazeppa." Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," with Berliozian wealth of orchestral color, was the only other number on the programme.

As usual, the orchestra played with great wealth of tone and presented a superb ensemble.

And it was a particularly bad night for fiddle strings!

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. NOV 7 1912

The Brooklyn Concert Season.

Those who have been rasped by the asperities or defeats of politics can turn for consolation to "music, heavenly maid,' who has never bloomed with more effulgence or allurement in Brooklyn in all the long history of the town than this winter.

Opera singers make more noise and they take up more space in the newspapers at this season, when they are about to emphasize their triumphal return to the Metropolitan Opera House and to the Brooklyn Academy, than all other musical artists put together. But the judicious find their highest enjoyment in orchestral concerts, which are to precede the opera singers in their joyous return "to our midst." The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will make its bow tomorrow night, has become a Brooklyn institution whose welcome is only limited by the size of our Academy of Music. Every seat for its series of five concerts has been sold for some weeks now, and for the most part the same families gather year after year to rest their tired spirits in its harmonies. This week the concert will have a special significance in the return of Karl Muck, a conductor who was greatly liked during the seasons when he led this orchestra. The programme which Dr. Muck has selected is especially suited to a festival occasion, opening with the Eighth, the most sparkling and joyous of the Beethoven symphonies, and containing Berlioz's "Roman Carnival," Liszt's "Mazeppa" and Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger." As a prelude to a brilliant season nothing could be better than this.

But if the Boston Orchestra is the head and front of our musical feast, it does not offer anything like the whole menu. The New York Symphony, under Walter Damrosch, which follows it on Saturday afternoon, has made also a warm place for itself in the affections of Brooklyn. It will open its season this week with a memorial concert to Massenet, the composer who has done so much to win a following in this city for French operas. This concert, unlike that from Boston, will employ soloists, and the programme will include airs which the opera companies have made popular. A little later we shall have Sunday afternoon concerts by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, under the militant young Russian, Stransky, and, better yet, concerts by the Brooklyn Philharmonic, under the energetic Mr. Glasson. This last is the ideal fruit of our musical enthusiasm. When we are able to build up not merely audiences for musicians from abroad, but to support an organization of our own, devoted to making the best music familiar, Brooklyn can indeed boast of a sturdy musical life. That is the happy period of development upon which we are about to enter.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS ITS N. Y. SEASON

Warm Welcome for the Director, Dr. Carl Muck, So Favorably Known Here.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of its New York season last night at Carnegie Hall. The occasion signalized the return of Dr. Carl Muck, as conductor. He has taken the place of Dr. Fiedler for a term of five years. The programme contained works by Beethoven, Liszt, Berlioz and Wagner, so no less than four schools of musical thought were fully satisfied.

Dr. Muck's interpretations of Beethoven are poetical though not over-exciting. The orchestra, which has been called an orchestra of virtuosos, was also at its best in the Eroica Symphony. The Berlioz Roman Carnival number was played with a neatness and finish that might have been devoted to it by a French orchestra of great merit and experience. The Mazeppa of Liszt is a glittering and superficial composition of no significance, and might well have been omitted in favor of another and more valuable number, which music lovers have little opportunity of hearing.

The concert concluded with a spirited rendering of the overture to "Die Meistersinger," with which audiences are getting rather familiar.

Dr. Muck was warmly welcomed back to New York. The house was crowded and enthusiastic.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York
Date NOV 8 - 1912
Established:

MUCK BACK WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Without ingratitude to Mr. Fiedler, one may congratulate the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the return of Dr. Karl Muck. Its late conductor had some very useful qualities, but he had not the daring mind or varied moods which mark the newest great director of the orchestra. Nor had he his illuminating power.

Last night when the Boston Symphony organization gave its first concert of the season, at Carnegie Hall, every seat had long been sold. It might be difficult to say with truth whether this was more a tribute to the Boston Orchestra or to its present head. Perhaps it would be safe, though, to assume that it did honor to them both.

On his appearance Dr. Muck was welcomed back with every mark of sympathy. He has not greatly changed in looks since his departure from these shores three years ago. He still reminds one very forcibly of Loge, the fleet god of tricks and fire. He is as expressive when he lifts his baton as he used to be, and as compelling in his personal appeal.

Yet in his rendering of some parts of the "Eroica," with which he opened the first concert of the Bostonian season in New York, there were moments when the writer did not find him quite as impressive as when he was seen here last. The weather, to be sure, was most depressing. And this—besides some mood—may have explained a certain want of vividness and eloquence which was observable in his interpretation of some passages in the Beethoven symphony.

At several stages of the second and fourth movements Dr. Muck departed slightly from the readings which we have come to accept as right. Towards the close, indeed, he rose to splendid heights. But, on the whole, he did not quite do himself justice.

He was vastly more contenting in the great Berlioz "Carnaval Romain" overture, to which he gave the contrasted beauty and brilliancy the work demands. He did even better with the "Mazeppa" poem of Liszt, which, as he played it, was both picturesque and tragic. And, at the end of a most fascinating programme, he delighted all by the splendid rhythmic sense, the warmth, the poetry, with which he informed The Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

During the concert Dr. Muck had many proofs of the esteem and admiration he deserves. He will no doubt have many more before, five years from now, he leaves his present post—if he should leave it.

From EVG. SUN
Address: New York
Date NOV
Establi 34

Music and Musicians

Why New York and U. S. Hail Boston's Orchestra.

Because some benighted folk still fancy Boston's virtuoso orchestra is carrying coal to Newcastle when it adds ten to New York's hundred symphony concerts in a year, there was a special significance in last night's royal welcome at Carnegie Hall to Karl Muck and the wise men of the East. The deluge beat upon that house, yet every last seat was bought and paid for weeks ago for the entire season. Prolonged applause greeted Dr. Muck's entrance when W. H. Brennan, the business-like manager, at 8:17 o'clock precisely gave the signal from the outer doors. It was the personal sort of applause that rose, died down, and again swelled to mild tumult as the conductor turned and bowed. The first pause in Beethoven's "Hero" symphony was noisy with late comers and talk, and the leader had to rap cruelly on the open score with his baton to gain silence. The scherzo, like the play of shadows from tinted foliage on an unruffled pool, stirred the audience to applause for the orchestra players. The same happened mildly after the Berlioz "Roman Carnival," and uproariously after the Lizst "Mazeppa's Ride," where all the king's horses came under the wire neck and neck by a hair. Such polyphony in perfect unison as marked the Wagner "Meistersinger" prelude at 10:15 deserved to bring—and did—the whole orchestra upstanding.

Berlin may well find its self-complacence less impaired by the borrowing of prima donnas and kidnapping of tenors from its stage for an Italian opera régime in New York than by the threat of bringing the world's orchestral primacy oversea. With Muck and Weingartner, the two ablest minds of the age in their specialty, both in Boston at adjoining theatres this winter, musical Germany is keenly aware of the Hub of the Universe. It crops up in the annals of the Kaiser's merry musical wars like the world's sore thumb on another imperial majesty in the Balkans. There were those Philistines in New York last night who asked "How old is Dr. Muck?" The dignity of that spare and sensitive frame of his was amazing. He had just celebrated a birthday in Boston, it happens, and he was born at Wurzburg on Oct. 22, 1859. Muck led his first orchestra the year the Boston band was founded. He has served twenty-one seasons in Berlin alone, except the two of 1906-8 in Boston, and for a decade he has been persona grata at Bayreuth.

Every orchestra leader knows what the Boston Orchestra has done to stimulate the cultivation of symphonic music here. How far the Boston candle throws its beams is a growing wonder to other cities. The light that has never failed musical America at large, since the German revolutionaries of the '40s came to fill New York, Cincinnati, Chicago and the Northwest with melodies of the Fatherland, has found its leading luminary at the Hub, where the old Germânia Orchestra furnished a nucleus of the Boston Symphony. Practically endowed by Mr. Higginson for thirty-three years, the premier band of 100 men gives fifty concerts in its home town annually, and sixty more in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore, Cambridge, Providence and a dozen more.

The splendid Thomas Orchestra under Fred Stock does as much both in and out of Chicago, where the great Western organization also has a hall of its own. The Cincinnati Orchestra of eighty players has begun its seventeenth year by planning thirty concerts under Dr. Ernest Kunwald of Vienna. Twin cities of Minnesota furnish the unique example of maintaining rival orchestras side by side, that in St. Paul in its second season under Walter Rothwell, through the influential presidency of Louis W. Hill, affording twenty-two concerts, while Emil Oberhoffer in Minneapolis conducts thirty-three, besides many tours.

New York alone has the continuing tradition of the veteran Philharmonic fathers, some of whom yet recall the ancients who played here in 1842. In its seventy-first year, the Philharmonic under Stransky has forty-five concerts here and forty afield. The New York Symphony, founded by Leopold Damrosch and led by his son, now has thirty-five matinees in Manhattan and Brooklyn, besides fifty on tour. The Russian Orchestra, Modest Altschuler's nine-year-old band, finds its travels allow only three appearances here. The Volpe and the People's Symphony are each four times heard, and the Young Men's and other new enterprises raise the total of New York orchestra concerts easily above a hundred.

The Philadelphia Orchestra after twelve seasons has taken a new lease of life under Leopold Stokowski, who publishes fifty programmes in advance for his eighty-five men at the old Academy. A Pittsburgh orchestra under Herbert and Paur died a natural death. So did one in Washington under DeKoven. It is hoped to soon revive interest in music among the citizens of the nation's capital. Louisville is to resurrect under Karl Schmidt its Philharmonic, started in the '80s. Indianapolis projects eight concerts by a Hoosier band, with one Ernestinoff as head Hoosier.

Half a continent away, St. Louis has fifty concerts by Max Zach of Boston and sixty-five men, though the supporting society is "rather inactive." The women of Kansas City guarantee seven performances by a new orchestra there. Six women of Denver have raised $15,000 to pay five years' deficit on a band led by Horace Turlman, to which the Denver Chamber of Commerce also will lend a hand. Salt Lake, "most unfortunate in its orchestra," after efforts since 1891, has forty men still playing under Anton Freber. Seattle by cooperative methods is "trying to solve the problem" of continuing the Symphony Society suspended last year under John Spargur of New York.

From Portland, with a band of fifty in its second season, the Pacific coast points with pride to a wonderful second-year symphonic assembly under Henry Hadley at the Cort Theatre, while Berkeley, Cal., has its own university orchestra under Paul Steindorf. Los Angelés boasts sixteen years of symphonies led by Harley Hamilton.

The symphony orchestra as a department of American life has come to stay. It will never be known how far the efforts of less enlightened communities have been inspired by the example of Major Higginson's princely generosity to the people of one New England town.

W. B. CHASE.

From HERALD
Address: New York IOV 8 1
Date
Established:

Musical Populac Heartily Greets Dr. Muck Agai

◆

Finds Little Change in Famous G man Conductor When He Returns with Boston Orchestra.

◆

Three thousand concert goers in Carnegie Hall last night seemed to be of the uniform opinion that the German Emperor had lost a remarkable conductor and that the Boston Symphony had gained one. It was the first concert here this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the first appearance here, after an absence of four years, of Dr. Karl Muck, conductor.

Dr. Muck swung the baton over this noted orchestra from Boston when enjoying a leave of absence granted by the German Emperor several years ago, but four years ago his duties to the Berlin Royal Opera called him there again Not until this summer did he obtain his release in Berlin, and now he is the "permanent" conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at least for five years.

A notable audience raised its hands to applaud when Dr. Muck stepped out on the platform. Mr. Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, had travelled from Boston for the occasion. Miss Geraldine Farrar represented the Metropolitan opera contingent and was most enthusiastic. Musicians, lovers of music, musical critics and Mr., Mrs. and Miss Concert Goer, they were all there last night. It was a night not to be missed by any one in "Who's Who in Music." And in the intermission the lobby that leads to the artists' room was lined with the army of devotees of music, puffing cigarettes and discussing "reading," "tempo" and the like and all singing praise of orchestra and conductor.

Little Change in Dr. Muck.

To the eye Dr. Muck has not aged a day in his absence; to the ear he seems to have broadened. His quick, elastic tread, the slim body, the military bearing "at attention" and the eagle like glance that he casts over audience and orchestra—these were familiar traits of the eminent German conductor. Nor has he changed at all in his manner of conducting. The movements of his bation are still small, the baton itself is moderately short and very slender, but he commands his men in every detail.

There were times in the "Meistersinger" prelude last night when he stopped beating entirely and permitted the orchestra to play alone, then catching it again with his baton, he would dictate every nuance by an eloquent gesture of hand or wand. Still there was never anything spectacular. He conducted always for the benefit of the orchestra and not for the audience.

Rousing applause [illegible] entrance, even more after the Beethoven symphony, in acknoweldging which Dr. Muck asked ovation at the close—these were the chief ovation at the close, these were the chief expressions of approval by the audience.

Temperature Too High.

It was a muggy night and Carnegie Hall was a sultry place, and the audience and orchestra mopped brows. These conditions doubtless had a tendency to dampen enthusiasm to some extent, but they affected no one's enjoyment of the orchestra's playing. Since last season several new players have been added to the ensemble. Almost every choir had its newcomers. The result is that the Boston Orchestra last night played even better than in past years. The delicacy with which it played the scherzo of the Beethoven "Eroica" sympathy was breathtaking and its clarity was exquisite. The "Funeral March" was charged with sentiment but free of exaggerations, and the close of the symphony was jubilation itself.

Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" was brilliantly done, as was the somewhat banal Liszt "Mazeppa." The final number was Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude, beautifully played and conducted.

In the intermission friends streamed back to congratulate the conductor. He appeared overwhelmed and voiced his sentiments by remarking:—

"All I can say is that I am very, very happy to be back in America."

◆

From
Address
Date NOV 8 - 1912
Est 1884

Unter Leitung des Dr. Karl Muck hielt geſtern das Boſton Symphonie Orcheſter in der Carnegie Hall das erſte Konzert in der 27. Saiſon in New York ab. Die Halle war bis auf den letzten Platz gefüllt und die ausgezeichneten Vorträge wurden vom Publikum herzlich und enthuſiaſtiſch aufgenommen.

From CITIZENS
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV - 1912
Esta

DR. MUCK HERE THIS EVENING

Boston Orchestra to Open Brooklyn Season.

LECTURE-RECITAL ON TO-NIGHT'S PROGRAMME

Messrs. Elson and De Voto Discuss Works Which Will Be Played To-Night at the Academy of Music.

Louis C. Elson and Alfred De Voto, of Boston, interpreted in lecture recital in Lecture Hall, Academy of Music, yesterday afternoon, the programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give this evening in the opera house of that building. It was the first lecture recital this season in the series which for several years has accompanied the concerts, and is, like them, under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute. In this series Messrs. Elson and De Voto have a number of times appeared.

"Beethoven's postcript is like that to a woman's letter. It often holds the best of the matter," said Mr. Elson in commenting on the codas in the composer's Eighth Symphony, which is that in F major, opus 93: "I should call this a contra bass, bassoon and kettle drum symphony," he said, in telling over the list of instruments in the "classical" orchestra which is employed in giving it, a list that is much shorter than is required for modern compositions. The symphony itself takes but half an hour in the playing, a delightful fact which composers of over-long modern symphonies were urged to observe. It was written as the result of Beethoven's falling in love. He had a habit of falling in love—a love that was platonic, pure, idealistic—and this always resulted in beautiful music. Mr. Elson said that Dr. Muck will not try to individualize in his reading of this symphony to-night, but will employ the old reading, as presumably that which Beethoven favored.

The symphony will open the programme. It was discussed last, however, by Mr. Elson and more time given to the study of it than to the other numbers which will come after the intermission—Overture, "Le Carneval Romain," opus 9, by Berlioz; "Mazeppa," symphonic poem No. 9, after Victor Hugo's poem of that name, by Liszt, and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," by Wagner. It was noted that the four show some form of festivity. The symphony is gay. The "Carnival" has the brilliant music of the saltarello, the Roman dance; in "Mazeppa" comes the closing barbaric music of the coronation march, and the "Meistersinger" is joyous.

In pointing out themes, much was said of that in the "Carnival" where the violas lead and give the air, this instrument being called "a sort of poor relation in the orchestra, a Cinderella," whose beauty is not realized by the casual listener. The Hugo version of "Mazeppa" makes the story allegory, and the horse is genius, who carries a man where it will, yet to victory. From the time where a wild shriek of the piccolos tells the departure of the horse until it falls exhausted among the Cossacks and different instruments in a few notes each express Mazeppa's despair the sound of galloping is ever present in the music.

"There are two things we can do very well in orchestral music," said Mr. Elson. "The firse is a thunderstorm, the second the galloping of a horse, this heard, perhaps in its most wonderful expression, in the wild ride of the Valkyrior, and next in nearness to reality in the "Damnation of Faust," where Mephistopheles and Faust gallop down the road to Hell."

As another remarkable bit of realism, M. Elston bade his hearers observe tonight the striking of the strings with the k of the bow in "Mazeppa" in imita- of the whirring and striking of bats' s about Mazeppa during the night It is also said to imitate the flap- of owls' wings and the striking of rse's hoofs upon the hard ground. e Mr. Elson gave the first presen- of the themes, Mr. De Voto, on piano, played their enlargement ly passages from the numbers, ich gave much pleasure.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York
Date NOV 8 - 1912

Established:

MUCK BACK WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Without ingratitude to Mr. Fiedler, one may congratulate the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the return of Dr. Karl Muck. Its late conductor had some very useful qualities, but he had not the daring mind or varied moods which mark the newest great director of the orchestra. Nor had he his illuminating power.

Last night when the Boston Symphony organization gave its first concert of the season, at Carnegie Hall, every seat had long been sold. It might be difficult to say with truth whether this was more a tribute to the Boston Orchestra or to its present head. Perhaps it would be safe, though, to assume that it did honor to them both.

On his appearance Dr. Muck was welcomed back with every mark of sympathy. He has not greatly changed in looks since his departure from these shores three years ago. He still reminds one very forcibly of Loge, the fleet god of tricks and fire. He is as expressive when he lifts his baton as he used to be, and as compelling in his personal appeal.

Yet in his rendering of some parts of the "Eroica," with which he opened the first concert of the Bostonian season in New York, there were moments when the writer did not find him quite as impressive as when he was seen here last. The weather, to be sure, was most depressing. And this—besides some mood—may have explained a certain want of vividness and eloquence which was observable in his interpretation of some passages in the Beethoven symphony.

At several stages of the second and fourth movements Dr. Muck departed slightly from the readings which we have come to accept as right. Towards the close, indeed, he rose to splendid heights. But, on the whole, he did not quite do himself justice.

He was vastly more contenting in the great Berlioz "Carnaval Romain" overture, to which he gave the contrasted beauty and brilliancy the work demands. He did even better with the "Mazeppa" poem of Liszt, which, as he played it, was both picturesque and tragic. And, at the end of a most fascinating programme, he delighted all by the splendid rhythmic sense, the warmth, the poetry, with which he informed The Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

During the concert Dr. Muck had many proofs of the esteem and admiration he deserves. He will no doubt have many more before, five years from now, he leaves his present post—if he should leave it.

From EVG. SUN
Address: New York
Date

Music and Musicians

Establi 34

Why New York and U. S. Hail Boston's Orchestra.

Because some benighted folk still fancy Boston's virtuoso orchestra is carrying coal to Newcastle when it adds ten to New York's hundred symphony concerts in a year, there was a special significance in last night's royal welcome at Carnegie Hall to Karl Muck and the wise men of the East. The deluge beat upon that house, yet every last seat was bought and paid for weeks ago for the entire season. Prolonged applause greeted Dr. Muck's entrance when W. H. Brennan, the business-like manager, at 8:17 o'clock precisely gave the signal from the outer doors. It was the personal sort of applause that rose, died down, and again swelled to mild tumult as the conductor turned and bowed. The first pause in Beethoven's "Hero" symphony was noisy with late comers and talk, and the leader had to rap cruelly on the open score with his baton to gain silence. The scherzo, like the play of shadows from tinted foliage on an unruffled pool, stirred the audience to applause for the orchestra players. The same happened mildly after the Berlioz "Roman Carnival," and uproariously after the Lizst "Mazeppa's Ride," where all the king's horses came under the wire neck and neck by a hair. Such polyphony in perfect unison as marked the Wagner "Meistersinger" prelude at 10:15 deserved to bring—and did—the whole orchestra upstanding.

Berlin may well find its self-complacence less impaired by the borrowing of prima donnas and kidnapping of tenors from its stage for an Italian opera régime in New York than by the threat of bringing the world's orchestral primacy oversea. With Muck and Weingartner, the two ablest minds of the age in their specialty, both in Boston at adjoining theatres this winter, musical Germany is keenly aware of the Hub of the Universe. It crops up in the annals of the Kaiser's merry musical wars like the world's sore thumb on another imperial majesty in the Balkans. There were those Philistines in New York last night who asked "How old is Dr. Muck?" The dignity of that spare and sensitive frame of his was amazing. He had just celebrated a birthday in Boston, it happens, and he was born at Wurzburg on Oct. 22, 1859. Muck led his first orchestra the year the Boston band was founded. He has served twenty-one seasons in Berlin alone, except the two of 1906-8 in Boston, and for a decade he has been persona grata at Bayreuth.

Every orchestra leader knows what the Boston Orchestra has done to stimulate the cultivation of symphonic music here. How far the Boston candle throws its beams is a growing wonder to other cities. The light that has never failed musical America at large, since the German revolutionaries of the '40s came to fill New York, Cincinnati, Chicago and the Northwest with melodies of the Fatherland, has found its leading luminary at the Hub, where the old Germânia Orchestra furnished a nucleus of the Boston Symphony. Practically endowed by Mr. Higginson for thirty-three years, the premier band of 100 men gives fifty concerts in its home town annually, and sixty more in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore, Cambridge, Providence and a dozen more.

The splendid Thomas Orchestra under Fred Stock does as much both in and out of Chicago, where the great Western organization also has a hall of its own. The Cincinnati Orchestra of eighty players has begun its seventeenth year by planning thirty concerts under Dr. Ernest Kunwald of Vienna. Twin cities of Minnesota furnish the unique example of maintaining rival orchestras side by side, that in St. Paul in its second season under Walter Rothwell, through the influential presidency of Louis W. Hill, affording twenty-two concerts, while Emil Oberhoffer in Minneapolis conducts thirty-three, besides many tours.

New York alone has the continuing tradition of the veteran Philharmonic fathers, some of whom yet recall the ancients who played here in 1842. In its seventy-first year, the Philharmonic under Stransky has forty-five concerts here and forty afield. The New York Symphony, founded by Leopold Damrosch and led by his son, now has thirty-five matinees in Manhattan and Brooklyn, besides fifty on tour. The Russian Orchestra, Modest Altschuler's nine-year-old band, finds its travels allow only three appearances here. The Volpe and the People's Symphony are each four times heard, and the Young Men's and other new enterprises raise the total of New York orchestra concerts easily above a hundred.

The Philadelphia Orchestra after twelve seasons has taken a new lease of life under Leopold Stokowski, who publishes fifty programmes in advance for his eighty-five men at the old Academy. A Pittsburgh orchestra under Herbert and Paur died a natural death. So did one in Washington under DeKoven. It is hoped to soon revive interest in music among the citizens of the nation's capital. Louisville is to resurrect under Karl Schmidt its Philharmonic, started in the '80s. Indianapolis projects eight concerts by a Hoosier band, with one Ernestinoff as head Hoosier.

Half a continent away, St. Louis has fifty concerts by Max Zach of Boston and sixty-five men, though the supporting society is "rather inactive." The women of Kansas City guarantee seven performances by a new orchestra there. Six women of Denver have raised $15,000 to pay five years' deficit on a band led by Horace Turlman, to which the Denver Chamber of Commerce also will lend a hand. Salt Lake, "most unfortunate in its orchestra," after efforts since 1891, has forty men still playing under Anton Freber. Seattle by cooperative methods is "trying to solve the problem" of continuing the Symphony Society suspended last year under John Spargur of New York.

From Portland, with a band of fifty in its second season, the Pacific coast points with pride to a wonderful second-year symphonic assembly under Henry Hadley at the Cort Theatre, while Berkeley, Cal., has its own university orchestra under Paul Steindorf. Los Angelês boasts sixteen years of symphonies led by Harley Hamilton.

The symphony orchestra as a department of American life has come to stay. It will never be known how far the efforts of less enlightened communities have been inspired by the example of Major Higginson's princely generosity to the people of one New England town.

W. B. CHASE.

From HERALD
Address: New York NOV 8 19
Date

Established:

Musical Populac Heartily Greets Dr. Muck Agai

Finds Little Change in Famous G man Conductor When He Returns with Boston Orchestra.

Three thousand concert goers in Carnegie Hall last night seemed to be of the uniform opinion that the German Emperor had lost a remarkable conductor and that the Boston Symphony had gained one. It was the first concert here this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the first appearance here, after an absence of four years, of Dr. Karl Muck, conductor.

Dr. Muck swung the baton over this noted orchestra from Boston when enjoying a leave of absence granted by the German Emperor several years ago, but four years ago his duties to the Berlin Royal Opera called him there again Not until this summer did he obtain his release in Berlin, and now he is the "permanent" conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at least for five years.

A notable audience raised its hands to applaud when Dr. Muck stepped out on the platform. Mr. Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, had travelled from Boston for the occasion. Miss Geraldine Farrar represented the Metropolitan opera contingent and was most enthusiastic. Musicians, lovers of music, musical critics and Mr., Mrs. and Miss Concert Goer, they were all there last night. It was a night not to be missed by any one in "Who's Who in Music." And in the intermission the lobby that leads to the artists' room was lined with the army of devotees of music, puffing cigarettes and discussing "reading," "tempo" and the like and all singing praise of orchestra and conductor.

Little Change in Dr. Muck.

To the eye Dr. Muck has not aged a day in his absence; to the ear he seems to have broadened. His quick, elastic tread, the slim body, the military bearing "at attention" and the eagle like glance that he casts over audience and orchestra—these were familiar traits of the eminent German conductor. Nor has he changed at all in his manner of conducting. The movements of his bation are still small, the baton itself is moderately short and very slender, but he commands his men in every detail.

There were times in the "Meistersinger" prelude last night when he stopped beating entirely and permitted the orchestra to play alone, then catching it again with his baton, he would dictate every nuance by an eloquent gesture of hand or wand. Still there was never anything spectacular. He conducted always for the benefit of the orchestra and not for the audience.

Rousing applause [illegible] entrance, even more after the Beethoven symphony, in acknoweldging which Dr. Muck asked ovation at the close—these were the chief ovation at the close, these were the chief expressions of approval by the audience.

Temperature Too High.

It was a muggy night and Carnegie Hall was a sultry place, and the audience and orchestra mopped brows. These conditions doubtless had a tendency to dampen enthusiasm to some extent, but they affected no one's enjoyment of the orchestra's playing. Since last season several new players have been added to the ensemble. Almost every choir had its newcomers. The result that the Boston Orchestra last night played even better than in past years. The delicacy with which it played the scherzo of the Beethoven "Eroica" sympathy was breathtaking and its clarity was exquisite. The "Funeral March" was charged with sentiment but free of exaggerations, and the close of the symphony was jubilation itself.

Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" was brilliantly done, as was the somewhat banal Liszt "Mazeppa." The final number was Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude, beautifully played and conducted.

In the intermission friends streamed back to congratulate the conductor. He appeared overwhelmed and voiced his sentiments by remarking:—

"All I can say is that I am very, very happy to be back in America."

From CITIZENS
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 1912

Esta

DR. MUCK HERE THIS EVENING

Boston Orchestra to Open Brooklyn Season.

LECTURE-RECITAL ON TO-NIGHT'S PROGRAMME

Messrs. Elson and De Voto Discuss Works Which Will Be Played To-Night at the Academy of Music.

Louis C. Elson and Alfred De Voto, of Boston, interpreted in lecture recital in Lecture Hall, Academy of Music, yesterday afternoon, the programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give this evening in the opera house of that building. It was the first lecture recital this season in the series which for several years has accompanied the concerts, and is, like them, under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute. In this series Messrs. Elson and De Voto have a number of times appeared.

"Beethoven's postcript is like that to a woman's letter. It often holds the best of the matter," said Mr. Elson in commenting on the codas in the composer's Eighth Symphony, which is that in F major, opus 93: "I should call this a contra bass, bassoon and kettle drum symphony," he said, in telling over the list of instruments in the "classical" orchestra which is employed in giving it, a list that is much shorter than is required for modern compositions. The symphony itself takes but half an hour in the playing, a delightful fact which composers of over-long modern symphonies were urged to observe. It was written as the result of Beethoven's falling in love. He had a habit of falling in love—a love that was platonic, pure, idealistic—and this always resulted in beautiful music. Mr. Elson said that Dr. Muck will not try to individualize in his reading of this symphony to-night, but will employ the old reading, as presumably that which Beethoven favored.

The symphony will open the programme. It was discussed last, however, by Mr. Elson and more time given to the study of it than to the other numbers which will come after the intermission—Overture, "Le Carneval Romain," opus 9, by Berlioz; "Mazeppa," symphonic poem No. 9, after Victor Hugo's poem of that name, by Liszt, and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," by Wagner. It was noted that the four show some form of festivity. The symphony is gay. The "Carnival" has the brilliant music of the saltarello, the Roman dance; in "Mazeppa" comes the closing barbaric music of the coronation march, and the "Meistersinger" is joyous.

In pointing out themes, much was said of that in the "Carnival" where the violas lead and give the air, this instrument being called " a sort of poor relation in the orchestra, a Cinderella," whose beauty is not realized by the casual listener. The Hugo version of "Mazeppa" makes the story allegory, and the horse is genius, who carries a man where it will, yet to victory. From the time where a wild shriek of the piccolos tells the departure of the horse until it falls exhausted among the Cossacks and different instruments in a few notes each express Mazeppa's despair the sound of galloping is ever present in the music.

"There are two things we can do very well in orchestral music," said Mr. Elson. "The firse is a thunderstorm, the second the galloping of a horse, this heard, perhaps in its most wonderful expression, in the wild ride of the Valkyrior, and next in nearness to reality in the "Damnation of Faust," where Mephistopheles and Faust gallop down the road to Hell."

As another remarkable bit of realism, M. Elston bade his hearers observe tonight the striking of the strings with the back of the bow in "Mazeppa" in imitation of the whirring and striking of bats' wings about Mazeppa during the night ride. It is also said to imitate the flapping of owls' wings and the striking of the horse's hoofs upon the hard ground.

While Mr. Elson gave the first presentation of the themes, Mr. De Voto, on another piano, played their enlargement and many passages from the numbers, all of which gave much pleasure.

"MAHOMED REFORMED".

From
Address
Date V 8 - 1912

Est

Unter Leitung des Dr. Karl Muck hiel geſtern das Boſton Symphonie Orcheſte in der Carnegie Hall das erſte Konzert in der 27. Saiſon in New York ab. Die Halle war bis auf den letzten Platz gefüllt und die ausgezeichneten Vorträge wurden vom Publikum herzlich und enthuſiaſtiſch aufgenommen.

1884

STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 8 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY LECTURE RECITAL

Louis C. Elson and Alfred De Voto Interpret Programme to Be Given To-night.

'MOHAMMED, THE REFORMER'

Subject of Mr. Martin's Last Institute Discourse.

Louis C. Elson and Alfred De Voto, of Boston, interpreted in lecture recital in lecture hall, Academy of Music, yesterday afternoon, the programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give this evening in the opera house of that building. It was the first lecture recital this season in the series, which for several years has accompanied the concerts, and is, like them, under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute. In this series Messrs. Elson and De Voto have a number of times appeared.

"Beethoven's postscript is like that to a woman's letter. It often holds the best of the matter," said Mr. Elson, when commenting on the codas in that master's eighth symphony, which is that in F major, Opus 93. "I should call this a contra bass, bassoon and kettle drum symphony," he said, in telling over the list of instruments in the "classical" orchestra which is employed in giving it—a list that is much shorter than is required for modern compositions. The symphony itself takes but half an hour in the playing—a delightful fact which composers of over long modern symphonies were urged to observe. It was written as the result of Beethoven's falling in love. He had a habit of falling in love—a love that was platonic, pure, idealistic—and this always resulted in beautiful music. Mr. Elson said that Dr. Muck will not try to individualize in his reading of this symphony to-night, but will employ the old reading as, presumably, that which Beethoven favored.

The symphony will open the programme. It was discussed last, however, by Mr. Elson and more time given to the study of it than to the other numbers, which will come after the intermission: Overture, "Le Carnaval Romains," Opus 9, by Berlioz; "Mazeppa," Symphonic Poem No. 9, after Victor Hugo's poem of that name, by Liszt, and the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," by Wagner. It was noted that the four show some form of festivity. The symphony is gay. The "Carnival" has the brilliant music of the saltarello, the Roman dance; in "Mazeppa" comes the closing barbaric music of the coronation march, and the "Meistersinger" is joyous.

In pointing out themes, much was said of that in the "Carnaval" where the violas lead and give the air, this instrument being called "a sort of poor relation in the orchestra, a Cinderella," whose beauty is not realized by the casual listener to music. The Hugo version of "Mazeppa," makes the story an allegory, and the horse is genius, who carries a man where it will, yet to victory. From the time where a wild shriek of the piccolos give the departure of the horse until it falls exhausted among the Cossacks and different instruments in a few notes each express Mazeppa's despair, the sound of galloping is ever present in the music. "There are two things we can do very well in orchestral music," said Mr. Elson. "The first is a thunderstorm, the second the galloping of a horse, this heard perhaps in its most wonderful expression in the wild ride of the Valkyries, and next in nearness to reality in the "Damnation of Faust," where Mephistopheles and Faust gallop down the road to hell." As another remarkable bit of realism, Mr. Elson bade his hearers observe to-night the striking of the strings with the back of the bow in "Mezeppa" in imitation of the whirring and striking of bats' wings about Mazeppa during the night ride. It is also said to imitate the flapping of owls' wings and the striking of the horses' hoofs upon the hard ground.

While Mr. Elson gave the first presentation of the themes, Mr. De Voto, on another piano, played their enlargement and many passages from the numbers, all of which gave much pleasure.

In his Brooklyn Institute lecture on "Mohammed: The Reformer," in lecture hall, Academy of Music, last evening, Alfred W. Martin, M.A., of the Ethical Culture School, Manhattan, gave a vivid description of Mohammed's idea of the soul approaching the judgment seat. Those who have wronged in trade shall find themselves weighed down by the instruments of their trade, hung about their necks.

The Koran is being subjected to higher criticism like the bibles of the other great creeds of the world. It is the only sacred book writen by one author. While it is the source of information about Mohammed, yet a good history of him has yet to be written. There is no authentic portrait of him, although from what the Koran says it is possible to have a clear mental picture of a man of medium height, large head, abundant black hair, restless eyes, and aquiline nose. As long as Kadijah lived, he had no other wives, and it must be remembered, Dr. Martin said, that many of his wives were widows of followers, whom he took for their protection. Still, it was acknowledged that he had great fondness for beautiful women. Kadijah was fifteen years older than Mohammed, yet there is nothing to show that the couple were unhappy. "It is well worth while to remember this," Dr. Martin said, "because there is a popular prejudice against marrying a woman older than one's self." When speaking of how much Kadijah did for her husband, Dr. Martin said: "Did you ever notice that when a man succeeds he is responsible for his success. But if he fails he ascribes it to fate, destiny or his wife."

Mohammed was afflicted with a peculiar nervous trouble that caused periods of unconsciousnes and visions. At the time he lived the Christians of Arabia had sunk to a degraded level and worshiped the Trinity as three gods; the Jews had become idolators, idolizing even Ezra, the scribe, and the Arabians were astrologers, believing in the astronomical gods and practicing the grossest immorality. Mohammed resolved to go back of all these religions to that of Abraham, a Semmite, Semmites being the earliest known people. Whatever was good and useful in each religion he decided to insert in the new belief, whose message was "Islam," that is, "submission," this meaning four things—abjuring idolatry, extending the empire of Allah by force if necessary, because rebellion against Allah is treason; seeing that one's moral account is square on the judgment day, and the observance of "the five pillars," which include reciting the creed, saying one's prayers, abstinence, fasting and a pilgrimage to Mecca. He laid special stress on temperance and kindness to animals. Gen. Lew Wallace said that in his twenty years' residence in Oriental lands he never saw a Mohammedan drunk. Kindness to animals is shown in this, as one instance. On the Turkish tombs are cut small grooves ending in a tiny reservoir from which birds may drink.

Dr. Martin combatted the idea that Mohammed advocated polygamy and slavery, and said that it must not be forgotten that these were hoary evils at the time Mohammed appeared toward the close of the sixth century, and he made every effort to regulate them. He observed that it was not very proper for Americans, considering how recent, as history goes, is the Emancipation Proclamation made by Lincoln, to find fault on this score of slavery with Mahomiet.

The lecture closed Dr. Martin's Brooklyn Institute course on "Great Moral Teachers of the Orient."

EVG. MAIL
New York.

DR. MUCK IS WARMLY WELCOMED ON RETURN

By EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

After an absence of four years Dr. Karl Muck returned to America again to become the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. That he was not forgotten was evident from the royal welcome accorded him at Carnegie Hall as he entered, and the close of the first number the was an ovation that expressed extreme delight of the large audien over his admirable offering.

After the first measures of the Beethoven "Eroica" it was obviou that the great orchestra had agai come into its own former glory so fa as elasticity and quality of tone wer concerned, and the reading of this third symphony was one which delighted alike the most critical adherent to tradition and the most modern in spirit.

In direct contrast of effect was the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" in which all the themes were set forth with the greatest clarity and they rippled in and out of the masses of orchestration, in which a masterly balance was preserved. The other numbers were the "Roman Carnival" by Berlioz and the Liszt "Mazeppa" tone poem, in both of which there were wonderful masses of tone, superb nuances and innumerable details that were as charming as they were bewildering.

Dr. Muck is a great gift from Germany, one which places us under unqualified gratitude, for that country has nothing greater to give. The men played with evident inspiration and there was no trace of the fact that the personnel has been changed in not less than eighteen men, all of whom seem to fit directly into the ensemble of this wonderful body of musicians. There was no soloist, but there did not seem to be less interest in the concert for this reason. The auditorium was filled to its capacity, as it will be for the season, as all the seats have already been sold by subscription.

From TIMES
Address: New York.
Date NOV [illegible] - 1912

TOO MUCH WAGNER.

Should Boston Symphony Orchestra Choose Works of Subtler Beauty?

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The announcement of the programmes for the first pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city next week prompts me to a word of criticism which I was inclined to utter last season, but the necessity for which I hoped would be obviated through the change of conductors. The Thursday evening programme consists of four numbers, one of them the Meistersinger prelude; the Saturday afternoon programme of three numbers, one of them the Siegfried Idyl. This would seem to portend a continuance of last season's policy of giving us Wagner on every or almost every programme. At one of the concerts last Winter, indeed, for which a Wagner overture was regularly scheduled, the soloist announced being detained through illness, and a second Wagnerian selection was substituted. Of course the Boston men play this music superbly, and an occasional Wagner overture would be welcome, but I can see no legitimate ground for making the works of a composer of music-drama a constant feature.

Wagner's compositions have become universally popular. Even Tristan and Isolde will hold an immense throng until midnight. There is considerable justification for orchestras that are competing for audiences to include many selections that appeal to average musical appreciation, but the Boston Symphony Orchestra has long outgrown this stage. The entire seating capacity of Carnegie Hall has been sold out by subscription for all their concerts. It is safe to say that the majority of this vast clientele would prefer to hear Wagner played not quite so well but still very acceptably elsewhere, and that the Bostonians should devote their efforts in what is at best a small number of short programmes to works of more subtle beauty. Their rendering of the Cesar Franck symphony last Winter, for example, was an important musical event.

A far better systematic rule than playing Wagner on all possible occasions would be to include something either new or at least locally unfamiliar in each programme. An interpretation by the Bostonians is the best possible aid to grasping the spirit of modern orchestral compositions at a first hearing.

WILBUR LARREMORE.

New York, Oct. 30, 1912.

From Address PROVIDENCE,
Date

Second Symphony Concert.

The second Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Nov. 19. The soloist at this concert will be Fritz Kreisler, who will make his only appearance of the year in this city at that time. Kreisler is the greatest, by all odds, of the younger violinists. Particularly is he supreme in the great classics of musical literature, and as he is to play here the Beethoven Concerto the concert assumes from that fact an importance difficult to exaggerate. Sets for this concert outside of the regular subscription will go on sale at Steinert's, 505 Westminster street, on Saturday, Nov. 16.

From
Address: New York City.
Date

— Dr. Karl Muck, der in dieſer Saiſon das Boſtoner Symphonie Orcheſter leitet, beſcheerte geſtern Abend den New Yorkern in der Carnegie Hall das erſte große muſikaliſche Ereigniß der Saiſon. Ein Monſtre-Programm hatte der den New Yorkern wohlbekannte Dirigent zuſammengeſtellt und beſonders mit Beethoven's „Eroica", Liszt's „Mazeppa" und dem Vorſpiel zu Wagner's „Meiſterſingern" bot er der begeiſterten Kunſtgemeinde ganz Außerordentliches. Dr. Muck ſowohl als auch das Orcheſter waren in allerbeſter Verfaſſung, ſodaß jede einzelne Programmnummer zu einer muſikaliſchen Offenbarung wurde.

From EVENING GLOBE
Address New York
Date NOV 8 - 1912

Dr. Karl Muck Welcomed Back at Carnegie Hall

Crowded House for the First New York Concert This Season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra — Brilliant Performance of Romantic Programme.

TO-DAY.

Aeolian Hall—3.10 P. M., concert of the Symphony Society; 8.15 P. M., song recital by Miss Emma Loeffler, soprano.

Hotel Plaza—11 A. M., lecture-recital by Kurt Schindler.

TO-MORROW.

Aeolian Hall—2.30 P. M., violin recital by Louis Persinger; 8.30 P. M., concert under the auspices of the Order of Rostradamus.

Carnegie Hall—2.30 P. M., concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Carnegie Lyceum—8.15 P. M., Bernardo Olshansky's concert.

After an absence of four years and a half, Dr. Karl Muck reappeared at Carnegie Hall last night as the conductor once more of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The occasion was the Boston orchestra's first New York concert of the season. The programme was the same chosen for the opening concert in Boston: Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Berlioz's "Carnaval Romain" overture, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude. Dr. Muck, since last seen here, has not changed in appearance. He is tall, spare, Mephistophelian as of old. His unassuming dignity in the presence of an audience, his avoidance when he conducts of unnecessary gesticulation are also as of old. In an age of sensationalism at the conductor's desk what a pleasure to find at the head of the premier orchestra of the world a conductor indisputably of the first rank, whose eminence does not advertise itself in acrobatic feats, is not writ large upon the circumambient air! The audience, a "capacity house," welcomed Dr. Muck on his entrance with the cordiality of old friendship. At the conclusion of the symphony it accorded him what is often described as an ovation. After bowing several times in response, he signalled to his men to rise and acknowledge with him the applause.

Dr. Muck when in this country before entertained on the subject of programme-making certain definite ideas, which he put into practice relentlessly. He was then an apostle of what has been termed the unified programme. Evidently he is still. The programme last night was distinctly a romantic programme, for the Beethoven of the "Eroica" symphony is a romantic, and Berlioz, Liszt, and Wagner are high priests of romanticism. This programme did not, however, suffer from the bane of unified programmes, monotony. In its romanticism there was variety of subject, mood, expression.

It is hardly necessary now to go into the characteristics of Dr. Muck as a conductor. He is remembered here too vividly for that. And yet it must have struck some hearers with pleasurable surprise last night to observe to what a rare degree he combines authority and temperament, the power to polish a performance to the last detail, and yet to keep the red blood racing through its veins, the gift of summoning from an orchestra music that is at once overwhelmingly beautiful and overwhelmingly vital. Page after page last night by Beethoven, by Berlioz, by Liszt, by Wagner was of a vivified perfection.

One might well doubt if the scherzo and the finale of the "Eroica" symphony were ever before in a long history of performances played here so superbly. Liszt's "Mazeppa" was a tour de force. ~~It should have marked the Liszt centenary. And how glad one was to hear the "Mazeppa," played thus! It has its faults, but less of them than some of the better known symphonic poems and, performed as it was last night you forgot about faults.~~ Superbly played, too, were the Berlioz and the Wagner pieces. There is no need of going into details. It was an occasion for general rejoicing. We count on Dr. Muck and his men from Boston to give us many more such in the years to come.

PITTS SANBORN.

3

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 8 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY LECTURE RECITAL

Louis C. Elson and Alfred De Voto Interpret Programme to Be Given To-night.

'MOHAMMED, THE REFORMER'

Subject of Mr. Martin's Last Institute Discourse.

Louis C. Elson and Alfred De Voto, of Boston, interpreted in lecture recital in lecture hall, Academy of Music, yesterday afternoon, the programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give this evening in the opera house of that building. It was the first lecture recital this season in the series, which for several years has accompanied the concerts, and is, like them, under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute. In this series Messrs. Elson and De Voto have a number of times appeared.

"Beethoven's postscript is like that to a woman's letter. It often holds the best of the matter," said Mr. Elson, when commenting on the codas in that master's eighth symphony, which is that in F major, Opus 93. "I should call this a contra bass, bassoon and kettle drum symphony," he said, in telling over the list of instruments in the "classical" orchestra which is employed in giving it—a list that is much shorter than is required for modern compositions. The symphony itself takes but half an hour in the playing—a delightful fact which composers of over long modern symphonies were urged to observe. It was written as the result of Beethoven's falling in love. He had a habit of falling in love—a love that was platonic, pure, idealistic—and this always resulted in beautiful music. Mr. Elson said that Dr. Muck will not try to individualize in his reading of this symphony to-night, but will employ the old reading as, presumably, that which Beethoven favored.

The symphony will open the programme. It was discussed last, however, by Mr. Elson and more time given to the study of it than to the other numbers, which will come after the intermission: Overture, "Le Carnaval Romains," Opus 9, by Berlioz; "Mazeppa," Symphonic Poem No. 9, after Victor Hugo's poem of name, by Liszt, and the Prelud "Die Meistersinger von Nurnb by Wagner. It was noted that four show some form of festi The symphony is gay. The "Ca val" has the brilliant music of saltarello, the Roman dance; in " zeppa" comes the closing barb music of the coronation march, the "Meistersinger" is joyous.

In pointing out themes, much said of that in the "Carnaval" w the violas lead and give the air, instrument being called "a sor poor relation in the orchestra, a derella," whose beauty is not real by the casual listener to music. Hugo version of "Mazeppa," ma the story an allegory, and the ho is genius, who carries a man where it will, yet to victory. From the time where a wild shriek of the piccolos give the departure of the horse until it falls exhausted among the Cossacks and different instruments in a few notes each express Mazeppa's despair, the sound of galloping is ever present in the music. "There are two things we can do very well in orchestral music," said Mr. Elson. "The first is a thunderstorm, the second the galloping of a horse, this heard perhaps in its most wonderful expression in the wild ride of the Valkyries, and next in nearness to reality in the "Damnation of Faust," where Mephistopheles and Faust gallop down the road to hell." As another remarkable bit of realism, Mr. Elson bade his hearers observe to-night the striking of the strings with the back of the bow in "Mezeppa" in imitation of the whirring and striking of bats' wings about Mazeppa during the night ride. It is also said to imitate the flapping of owls' wings and the striking of the horses' hoofs upon the hard ground.

While Mr. Elson gave the first presentation of the themes, Mr. De Voto, on another piano, played their enlargement and many passages from the numbers, all of which gave much pleasure.

In his Brooklyn Institute lecture on "Mohammed: The Reformer," in lecture hall, Academy of Music, last evening, Alfred W. Martin, M.A., of the Ethical Culture School, Manhattan, gave a vivid description of Mohammed's idea of the soul approaching the judgment seat. Those who have wronged in trade shall find themselves weighed down by the instruments of their trade, hung about their necks.

The Koran is being subjected to higher criticism like the bibles of the other great creeds of the world. It is the only sacred book writen by one author. While it is the source of information about Mohammed, yet a good history of him has yet to be written. There is no authentic portrait of him, although from what the Koran says it is possible to have a clear mental picture of a man of medium height, large head, abundant black hair, restless eyes, and aquiline nose. As long as Kadijah lived, he had no other wives, and it must be remembered, Dr. Martin said, that many of his wives were widows of followers, whom he took for their protection. Still, it was acknowledged that he had great fondness for beautiful women. Kadijah was fifteen years older than Mohammed, yet there is nothing to show that the couple were unhappy. "It is well worth while to remember this," Dr. Martin said, "because there is a popular prejudice against marrying a woman older than one's self." When speaking of how much Kadijah did for her husband, Dr. Martin said: "Did you ever notice that when a man succeeds he is responsible for his success. But if he fails he ascribes it to fate, destiny or his wife."

Mohammed was afflicted with a peculiar nervous trouble that caused periods of unconsciousnes and visions. At the time he lived the Christians of Arabia had sunk to a degraded level and worshiped the Trinity as three gods; the Jews had become idolators, idolizing even Ezra, the scribe, and the Arabians were astrologers, believing in the astronomical gods and practicing the grossest immorality. Mohammed resolved to go back of all these religions to that of Abraham, a Semmite, Semmites being the earliest known people. Whatever was good and useful in each religion he decided to insert in the new belief, whose message was "Islam," that is, "submission," this meaning four things—abjuring idolatry, extending the empire of Allah by force if necessary, because rebellion against Allah is treason; seeing that one's moral account is square on the judgment day, and the observance of "the five pillars," which include reciting the creed, saying one's prayers, abstinence, fasting and a pilgrimage to Mecca. He laid special stress on temperance and kindness to animals. Gen. Lew Wallace said that in his twenty years' residence in Oriental lands he never saw a Mohammedan drunk. Kindness to animals is shown in this, as one instance. On the Turkish tombs are cut small grooves ending in a tiny reservoir from which birds may drink.

Dr. Martin combatted the idea that Mohammed advocated polygamy and slavery, and said that it must not be forgotten that these were hoary evils at the time Mohammed appeared toward the close of the sixth century, and he made every effort to regulate them. He observed that it was not very proper for Americans, considering how recent, as history goes, is the Emancipation Proclamation made by Lincoln, to find fault on this score of slavery with Mahomiet.

The lecture closed Dr. Martin's Brooklyn Institute course on "Great Moral Teachers of the Orient."

From TIMES
Address: New York.
Date NOV 9 - 1912

TOO MUCH WAGNER.

Should Boston Symphony Orchestra Choose Works of Subtler Beauty?

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The announcement of the programmes for the first pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city next week prompts me to a word of criticism which I was inclined to utter last season, but the necessity for which I hoped would be obviated through the change of conductors. The Thursday evening programme consists of four numbers, one of them the Meistersinger prelude; the Saturday afternoon programme of three numbers, one of them the Siegfried Idyl. This would seem to portend a continuance of last season's policy of giving us Wagner on every or almost every programme. At one of the concerts last Winter, indeed, for which a Wagner overture was regularly scheduled, the soloist announced being detained through illness, and a second Wagnerian selection was substituted. Of course the Boston men play this music superbly, and an occasional Wagner overture would be welcome, but I can see no legitimate ground for making the works of a composer of music-drama a constant feature.

Wagner's compositions have become universally popular. Even Tristan and Isolde will hold an immense throng until midnight. There is considerable justification for orchestras that are competing for audiences to include many selections that appeal to average musical appreciation, but the Boston Symphony Orchestra has long outgrown this stage. The entire seating capacity of Carnegie Hall has been sold out by subscription for all their concerts. It is safe to say that the majority of this vast clientele would prefer to hear Wagner played not quite so well but still very acceptably elsewhere, and that the Bostonians should devote their efforts in what is at best a small number of short programmes to works of more subtle beauty. Their rendering of the Cesar Franck symphony last Winter, for example, was an important musical event.

A far better systematic rule than playing Wagner on all possible occasions would be to include something either new or at least locally unfamiliar in each programme. An interpretation by the Bostonians is the best possible aid to grasping the spirit of modern orchestral compositions at a first hearing.

WILBUR LARREMORE.
New York, Oct. 30, 1912.

Es 1884

Cutting Bureau in the World

From
Address PROVIDENCE, R.
Date

Second Symphony Concert.

The second Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Nov. 19. The soloist at this concert will be Fritz Kreisler, who will make his only appearance of the year in this city at that time. Kreisler is the greatest, by all odds, of the younger violinists. Particularly is he supreme in the great classics of musical literature, and as he is to play here the Beethoven Concerto the concert assumes from that fact an importance difficult to exaggerate. Sets for this concert outside of the regular subscription will go on sale at Steinert's, 505 Westminster street, on Saturday, Nov. 16.

E 1884

From EVG. MAIL
Address: New York.
Date NOV 8 1912

Established: Lo

DR. MUCK IS WARMLY WELCOMED ON RETURN

By EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

After an absence of four years Dr. Karl Muck returned to America again to become the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. That he was not forgotten was evident from the royal welcome accorded him at Carnegie Hall as he entered, and the close of the first number the was an ovation that expressed e treme delight of the large audien over his admirable offering.

After the first measures of t Beethoven "Eroica" it was obvio that the great orchestra had aga come into its own former glory so as elasticity and quality of tone we concerned, and the reading of th third symphony was one which d lighted alike the most critical adhe ent to tradition and the most mode in spirit.

In direct contrast of effect was the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" in which all the themes were set forth with the greatest clarity and they rippled in and out of the masses of orchestration, in which a masterly balance was preserved. The other numbers were the "Roman Carnival" by Berlioz and the Liszt "Mazeppa" tone poem, in both of which there were wonderful masses of tone, superb nuances and innumerable details that were as charming as they were bewildering.

Dr. Muck is a great gift from Germany, one which places us under unqualified gratitude, for that country has nothing greater to give. The men played with evident inspiration and there was no trace of the fact that the personnel has been changed in not less than eighteen men, all of whom seem to fit directly into the ensemble of this wonderful body of musicians. There was no soloist, but there did not seem to be less interest in the concert for this reason. The auditorium was filled to its capacity, as it will be for the season, as all the seats have already been sold by subscription.

From GERMAN HEROLD
Address: New York City.
Date

— Dr. Karl Muck, der in dieſer Saiſon das Boſtoner Symphonie Orcheſter leitet, beſcheerte geſtern Abend den New Yorkern in der Carnegie Hall das erſte große muſikaliſche Ereigniß der Saiſon. Ein Monſtre=Programm hatte der den New Yorkern wohlbekannte Dirigent zuſammengeſtellt und beſonders mit Beethoven's „Eroica", Liszt's „Mazeppa" und dem Vorſpiel zu Wagner's „Meiſterſingern" bot er der begeiſterten Kunſtgemeinde ganz Außerordentliches. Dr. Muck ſowohl als auch das Orcheſter waren in allerbeſter Verfaſſung, ſodaß jede einzelne Programmnummer zu einer muſikaliſchen Offenbarung wurde.

ork, 1884

From EVENING GLOBE
Address New York
Date NOV 8 - 1912

Dr. Karl Muck Welcomed Back at Carnegie Hall

rk, 1884

Crowded House for the First New York Concert This Season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra — Brilliant Performance of Romantic Programme.

TO-DAY.

Aeolian Hall—3.10 P. M., concert of the Symphony Society; 8.15 P. M., song recital by Miss Emma Loeffler, soprano.

Hotel Plaza—11 A. M., lecture-recital by Kurt Schindler.

TO-MORROW.

Aeolian Hall—2.30 P. M., violin recital by Louis Persinger; 8.30 P. M., concert under the auspices of the Order of Rostradamus.

Carnegie Hall—2.30 P. M., concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Carnegie Lyceum—8.15 P. M., Bernardo Olshansky's concert.

After an absence of four years and a half, Dr. Karl Muck reappeared at Carnegie Hall last night as the conductor once more of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The occasion was the Boston orchestra's first New York concert of the season. The programme was the same chosen for the opening concert in Boston: Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Berlioz's "Carnaval Romain" overture, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude. Dr. Muck, since last seen here, has not changed in appearance. He is tall, spare, Mephistophelian as of old. His unassuming dignity in the presence of an audience, his avoidance when he conducts of unnecessary gesticulation are also as of old. In an age of sensationalism at the conductor's desk what a pleasure to find at the head of the premier orchestra of the world a conductor indisputably of the first rank, whose eminence does not advertise itself in acrobatic feats, is not writ large upon the circumambient air! The audience, a "capacity house," welcomed Dr. Muck on his entrance with the cordiality of old friendship. At the conclusion of the symphony it accorded him what is often described as an ovation. After bowing several times in response, he signalled to his men to rise and acknowledge with him the applause.

Dr. Muck when in this country before entertained on the subject of programme-making certain definite ideas, which he put into practice relentlessly. He was then an apostle of what has been termed the unified programme. Evidently he is still. The programme last night was distinctly a romantic programme, for the Beethoven of the "Eroica" symphony is a romantic, and Berlioz, Liszt, and Wagner are high priests of romanticism. This programme did not, however, suffer from the bane of unified programmes, monotony. In its romanticism there was variety of subject, mood, expression.

It is hardly necessary now to go into the characteristics of Dr. Muck as a conductor. He is remembered here too vividly for that. And yet it must have struck some hearers with pleasurable surprise last night to observe to what a rare degree he combines authority and temperament, the power to polish a performance to the last detail, and yet to keep the red blood racing through its veins, the gift of summoning from an orchestra music that is at once overwhelmingly beautiful and overwhelmingly vital. Page after page last night by Beethoven, by Berlioz, by Liszt, by Wagner was of a vivified perfection.

One might well doubt if the scherzo and the finale of the "Eroica" symphony were ever before in a long history of performances played here so superbly. Liszt's "Mazeppa" was a tour de force. ~~It should have marked the Liszt centenary. And how glad one was to hear the "Mazeppa" played thus! It has its faults, but less of them than some of the better known symphonic poems and, performed as it was last night you forgot about faults.~~ Superbly played, too, were the Berlioz and the Wagner pieces. There is no need of going into details. It was an occasion for general rejoicing. We count on Dr. Muck and his men from Boston to give us many more such in the years to come.

PITTS SANBORN.

3

[74]

From POST
Address: New York
Date NOV 8 1912

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston rejoices once more in the possession of a conductor of the very first rank. Neither in the concert hall nor the opera house (except for a few weeks) has she owned one in recent years. But now Dr. Carl Muck is back at the head of the Symphony Orchestra, and everybody rejoices. It is an open secret that under his predecessor this orchestra, which is one of the best in the world, had lost some of its polish. Dr. Muck will doubtless soon restore its full lustre; last night, already, a change was noticeable, although the depressingly damp atmosphere, which made the auditors feel as if they were all taking a Turkish bath, prevented the orchestra from displaying its usual brilliancy.

The opening piece was Beethoven's colossal "Eroica" symphony—a work which has done so much good and so much harm in the musical world. The good it has done consists in the delight it has given to millions of true music lovers during the hundred and six years since it was first performed, and in the inspiration it gave to the great masters that came after him by its wealth of new melodies, rhythms, and forms. The harm it has done was due to its excessive length. Haydn and Mozart had written symphonies of just about the right dimensions. Beethoven doubled and trebled the duration, and while he himself, with his consummate genius, was able to paint a picture on such a huge canvas, those who came after him deemed it necessary to follow his example, the result being that nine-tenths of all symphonic works written since the "Eroica" are too long. "Less would have been more" is true of all of them; and for this Beethoven is to blame. Even his works would gain by being edited; certainly the "Eroica" would; there are tiresome stretches in it which it would be well to eliminate. All theatrical managers shorten and edit the plays of Shakespeare, and the operas of Wagner are greatly improved by being shortened in the way Anton Seidl did it. The day will doubtless come when Beethoven's symphonies will also get the benefit of the judicious editing of an Anton Seidl of the future.

The performance of the "Eroica" last night had the good qualities to be expected of the Boston Orchestra; it was smooth, accurate, delicate, and vigorous in turn, nicely colored, and altogether in the approved classical style. There was little reading between the lines; the most academically-minded could find no reason to complain on that score. Yet the emotional side was not neglected, and in the funeral march there was a grand climax of grief eloquently voiced.

Dr. Muck is one of the regular conductors at Bayreuth, and in the "Meistersinger" prelude, at the close of the programme, he was therefore quite at home. Between the Beethoven and the Wagner the band played Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, which gave it a chance to display its brilliant virtuosity, and Liszt's splendid "Mazeppa," which contains stirring ideas as well as brilliancy (and also some moments of dulness). This symphonic poem was one of the works which impressed Wagner by their "extraordinary wealth of musical productive power," and the mere reading of which caused him to be "overwhelmed with emotion and joy," to use his own words. Both Wagner and Liszt would have embraced Dr. Muck for the eloquent way in which he brought out the tragedy of this masterwork, of which Wagner further wrote: "I was quite out of breath after reading it through the first time. I feel sorry, too, for the poor horse: how cruel are nature and the world." It is to be hoped that Dr. Muck will give us some more of his fine Liszt interpretations during the season. He and Josef Stransky, the leader of our Philharmonic, are close friends, and one of their bonds of friendship is their love of Liszt.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 8 1912

BEETHOVEN SUBJECT OF LECTURE RECITAL

With Other Members by Boston Symphony Orchestra, This Evening, at Academy.

CONCERTS IN MANHATTAN.

Charles Norman Granville Strong in [illegible] Work—Beatrice Wain-

Louis C. Elson and Alfred De Voto of Boston interpreted in lecture recital in the lecture hall in the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon the programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give this evening in the opera house of the Academy. It was the first lecture recital, this season, in the series which for years has accompanied the Boston Symphony's concerts, under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute.

"Beethoven's postscript is like that to a woman's letter. It often holds the best of the matter," said Mr. Elson, when commenting on the codas in that master's "Eighth Symphony," which is that in F major, opus. 93. "I should call this a contra bass, bassoon and kettle-drum symphony," he said, in giving the list of instruments in the "classical" orchestra which is to give it—a list much shorter than that which is required for modern compositions. The symphony requires half an hour in the playing, a fact which composers of over-long modern symphonies were urged to observe. It was written as the result of Beethoven's falling in love. He had a habit of falling in love—a love that was platonic, pure, idealistic—and it always resulted in beautiful music. Mr. Elson said that Dr. Muck will not try to individualize in his reading of this symphony, but will employ the old reading, as presumably that which Beethoven favored.

The symphony is to be first on the programme. It was discussed last, however, by Mr. Elson, and more time given to the study of it than to the numbers which will come after the intermission: Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," opus 9, by Berlioz; "Mazeppa," symphonic poem No. 9, after Victor Hugo's poem of that name, by Liszt, and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," by Wagner. It was noted that the four show some form of festivity. The symphony is gay. The "Carnaval" has the brilliant music of the saltarello, the Roman dance; in "Mazeppa" comes the closing barbaric music of the coronation march, and the "Meistersinger" is joyous.

In pointing out themes, much was said of the theme in the "Carnaval," where violas lead and give the air, that instrument being called "a sort of poor relation in the orchestra, a Cinderella," whose beauty is not realized by the casual listener. The Hugo version of "Mazeppa" makes the story an allegory, and the horse is "genius," which carries a man where it will, yet to victory. From the time where a wild shriek of the piccolos gives the departure of the horse until it falls, exhausted, among the Cossacks and different instruments in a few notes each express Mazeppa's despair, the sound of galloping is ever present.

"There are two things that we can very well do in orchestral music," said Mr. Elson. "The first is a thunderstorm, the second the galloping of a horse, this latter heard, perhaps, in its most wonderful expression, in the wild ride of the Valkyrie, and next in nearness to reality in the 'Damnation of Faust,' where Mephistopheles and Faust gallop down the road to Hell." As another remarkable bit of realism, Mr. Elson called on his hearers to observe tonight the striking of the strings with the back of the bow in "Mazeppa," in imitation of the whirring and striking of bats' wings about Mazeppa during the night ride. It is also said to imitate the flapping of owls' wings and the striking of the horse's hoofs upon hard ground.

While Mr. Elson gave the first presentation of the themes, Mr. De Voto, on another piano, played their enlargement and many passages from the numbers, all of which gave much pleasure.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 5 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Karl Muck Again at the Head of Famous Organization.

At the opening concert of the Philadelphia series, given at the Academy of Music last evening, Dr. Karl Muck, the masterly leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, managed to combine within a program of five numbers three musical selections which must have been somewhat trying to the old-fashioned music-lovers not particularly enamored of instruments of percussion.

The symphony itself, with which the concert opened, must have appealed to all, for it was the "Eroica" of Beethoven, played in superb fashion; but the second part of the program consisted of compositions by Berlioz, Liszt and Wagner, a group which produces pretty strong pabulum for the musically inclined.

"Le Carnival Romain" was the Belioz selection, the chief thematic material of which was taken by the composer from his opera of "Benvenuto Cellini." The beginning of this Roman carnival music is beautiful, but the continuation, with its scraps of dance music and the hurly-burly of the development, is not particularly interesting, save, strangely enough, by the fact that some of the scraps of melody call to mind the more recent "Jewels of the Madonna." As for Liszt's musical version of Victor Hugo's poem, "Mazeppa," it is an orchestral tour de force which excites admiration rather than liking, despite the magnificence of the triumphal concluding march. Compared to the Vorspiel of Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," with which the program concluded, the Berlioz and the Liszt numbers sink into insignificance.

One of the most melodious of the German master's compositions, with its exquisite lyrical episodes, especially that which expresses Walther's love for Eva, it has always been a favorite with concert goers. It was played last evening in a manner which would have satisfied the composer himself and which brought enthusiastic applause from the audience.

The Beethoven symphony, as has been said already, was played superbly. Particularly appreciated was the second movement, the funeral march, given with both strength and tenderness, with a refinement of rendering which made the listener hold his breath and produced almost a feeling of awe. There is no better interpreter of Beethoven than Dr. Muck and he lived up to his reputation last evening. His return to the post of conductor of the Boston Orchestra should be a matter of felicitation for all those interested in the continued musical

---

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 5 - 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS HEARD, WITH DR. MUCK

Orchestra Under His Leadership Plays Superbly and With Freedom

A 'STANDARD' PROGRAM

Supreme Beauties of Beethoven's 'Eroica' Revealed by the Players

THE large audience at the Academy of Music last evening welcomed an old friend in Dr. Carl Muck, who has returned to his distinguished post as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Doctor Muck has been absent in Germany for several years, during which period his position was assumed by Max Fiedler. Imperial permission to come back having been at last secured, the gifted conductor once more graces the realm of American instrumental music.

In former years the conductor, for all his incontrovertible ability was accused of a sort of unyielding militarism of method that opposed the most poetic interpretation of musical imaginative masterpieces. The old precision, the impeccable, authoritative methods, are still present, but side by side with them is richer and more varied conception of his art than was previously revealed.

Last night's program, which was distinctly of "standard" composition, gave repeated evidence of this. The orchestra, under Doctor Muck's baton, played superbly, of course, but it played, as well, with a freeedom and splendid intensity that easily justified the management in re-engaging the erstwhile leader.

There were no novelties in the concert, and the symmetry of the program was happily not compromised by the presence of a soloist. Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony opened the proceedings. It is idle word-spilling to write analytically of Beethoven's first great symphonic work today. The Boston players left nothing of its supreme beauties unrevealed, emphasizing with compelling beauty the dignity of the funeral march, the airy grace of the scherzo, the melodic charm of the allegro and the joyful gaiety of the finale. It was a reading eminently worthy of the subject matter in hand, and higher praise cannot be written.

Carl Pohlig used to give Liszt's stirring symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," based upon Victor Hugo's poem, tracing back to Byron and older legend, but the work, graphically romantic, in the best spirit of its composer, has not been offered here by the Boston orchestra in some years. It was eloquently interpreted.

Berlioz's bright, but not especially notable, overture, "Carnaval Romaine," derived from themes from his renaissance opera, "Benuenuto Cellini," and the indestructible "Meistersinger" prelude, were the other numbers of a most attractive concert.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. Old-time friends of the orchestra will note a number of changes in the personnel, as there are 16 new members. Of course, the centre of attraction will be Dr. Karl Muck, who makes his first appearance here after an absence of four years. Judging from the reception the orchestra has had in Boston, new life and brilliancy have come under the leadership of Dr. Muck. The term of his service will be at least five years.

At this first concert in Philadelphia Dr. Muck will play the program which opened the season in Boston. It comprises the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz, the "Mazeppa" symphonic poem of Liszt and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." All of these are familiar except the Liszt symphonic poem. It is the sixth of a series of symphonic poems by that composer, and was composed in 1836 as a study for piano. This study was enlarged in 1837 and 1841, and about 1850 was arranged and orchestrated by the composer. It was inspired not by Byron's poem, but by Victor Hugo's poem of the same name, which was written in 1828 and was published in "Les Orientales" in 1829. The first performance of the work was on Easter Sunday, April 16, 1854, in the Grand Ducal Theatre, at Weimar, at a charity concert of the Court Orchestra. Liszt conducted from manuscript. It is a work characteristic of the composer, and in merit ranks high among compositions of its class.

From PRESS
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 5 - 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS ITS SEASON

First Appearance of Dr. Muck After Four Years' Absence Pleasantly Welcomed.

PROGRAM.
Beethoven—Symphony No. 3 in E Flat Major, "Eroica."
Berlioz—Overture, "Le Carnival Romain."
Liszt—"Mazeppa," Symphonic Poem, No. 6.
Wagner—Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."
Conductor, Dr. Karl Muck.

It was the inevitable that the beginning of the twenty-eighth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia, marking as it did the return of Dr. Karl Muck, should find the Academy nearly filled with an audience whose manifest pleasure over the return of one whom it had come to regard in the two years that he was here before—from 1906 to 1908—as a sterling conductor, fitted for the task of leading the pioneer virtuoso orchestra in the United States, was tempered with a proper decorum.

Dr. Muck's program was made up of numbers that naturally revealed the Boston players at their best, the one curious feature of the program being the "Mazeppa" symphonic poem of Liszt, which Dr. Muck announced sometime ago he intended to play this year "as one of a number of important but neglected works which he believed should be restored to modern programs." The work has not been as much neglected in Philadelphia as apparently it has been in Boston, since it figured in the Philadelphia Orchestra programs of October 14-15, 1910, and again this past year on March 8-9, in connection with the Liszt anniversary program. However, a rehearing of it, even when revived by Dr. Muck, does not change the general estimate in which the composition is held, of being one of Liszt's interesting but not particularly inspired works.

Program Ran Easily.

The complete orchestral program being a repetition of the first concert given in Boston four weeks ago, naturally ran off the reel very easily. One can always see the things that have been suggested or what one is looking for, and great claims have been made in Boston that the return of Dr. Muck has meant a remaking and a revivification of the orchestral band in all particulars. Curiously enough, the extremists in the matter of the Bostonians often praise it for absolutely opposed conditions; it is held up to be an essentially unchanging unit, when, as a matter of fact, there are constant changes in its personnel; while, on the other hand, its relatively frequent change of conductors and concertmeisters is pointed out as a virtue.

Serene and Blithe.

All these things may be reconciled perhaps, and, of course, with the Bostonians, as is the case with the Philadelphia Orchestra, one is dealing with one of the leading orchestras in the world, while Dr. Muck as an authoritative leader has a unique position, even if at times he seems to be one upon whom the Prussian military spirit has more or less, to paraphrase an old remark, "stamped its iron heel." Dr. Muck, however, is probably more serene and blithe, genial and spontaneous, more poetic and more temperamental than certain features of his conducting would suggest, and it is always agreeable to hear an organization, especially after twenty-eight years of development, that assumes authority in all lines, even if in all particulars one cannot admit every claim.

As for the symphony, the second movement, the funeral march, had a singularly unpoetic reading and the whole seemed "icily regular, faultlessly fine," in a somewhat balanced pianoistic, metronomic idiom. Pohlig had small excuse, Muck less, for the "Mazeppa" resurrection, and the "Carnival Romain" had more of the North German than the Gallic or Latin spirit; it did not smack of the Corso or the "Piazza Venezia." The orchestral tone and volume in the "Meistersinger" were rich and cumulative in the climaxes, but the audience was not overwhelmed or transported.

BULLETIN
From
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Date NOV 1912

The first local concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Academy of Music on Monday evening next. The orchestra this year has sixteen new members, and Dr. Karl Muck will make his first appearance here after an absence of four years.

At this concert Dr. Muck will play the same program with which he opened the season in Boston. It comprises the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz, the symphonic poem "Mazeppa" of Liszt and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." All of these are familiar except to the Liszt number, which has been played very seldom in this country, but which is said to be highly characteristic of the composer.

From POST
Address: New York
Date NOV 8 1912

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston rejoices once more in the possession of a conductor of the very first rank. Neither in the concert hall nor the opera house (except for a few weeks) has she owned one in recent years. But now Dr. Carl Muck is back at the head of the Symphony Orchestra, and everybody rejoices. It is an open secret that under his predecessor this orchestra, which is one of the best in the world, had lost some of its polish. Dr. Muck will doubtless soon restore its full lustre; last night, already, a change was noticeable, although the depressingly damp atmosphere, which made the auditors feel as if they were all taking a Turkish bath, prevented the orchestra from displaying its usual brilliancy.

The opening piece was Beethoven's colossal "Eroica" symphony—a work which has done so much good and so much harm in the musical world. The good it has done consists in the delight it has given to millions of true music lovers during the hundred and six years since it was first performed, and in the inspiration it gave to the great masters that came after him by its wealth of new melodies, rhythms, and forms. The harm it has done was due to its excessive length. Haydn and Mozart had written symphonies of just about the right dimensions. Beethoven doubled and trebled the duration, and while he himself, with his consummate genius, was able to paint a picture on such a huge canvas, those who came after him deemed it necessary to follow his example, the result being that nine-tenths of all symphonic works written since the "Eroica" are too long. "Less would have been more" is true of all of them; and for this Beethoven is to blame. Even his works would gain by being edited; certainly the "Eroica" would; there are tiresome stretches in it which it would be well to eliminate. All theatrical managers shorten and edit the plays of Shakespeare, and the operas of Wagner are greatly improved by being shortened in the way Anton Seidl did it. The day will doubtless come when Beethoven's symphonies will also get the benefit of the judicious editing of an Anton Seidl of the future.

The performance of the "Eroica" last night had the good qualities to be expected of the Boston Orchestra; it was smooth, accurate, delicate, and vigorous in turn, nicely colored, and altogether in the approved classical style. There was little reading between the lines; the most academically-minded could find no reason to complain on that score. Yet the emotional side was not neglected, and in the funeral march there was a grand climax of grief eloquently voiced.

Dr. Muck is one of the regular conductors at Bayreuth, and in the "Meistersinger" prelude, at the close of the programme, he was therefore quite at home. Between the Beethoven and the Wagner the band played Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, which gave it a chance to display its brilliant virtuosity, and Liszt's splendid "Mazeppa," which contains stirring ideas as well as brilliancy (and also some moments of dulness). This symphonic poem was one of the works which impressed Wagner by their "extraordinary wealth of musical productive power," and the mere reading of which caused him to be "overwhelmed with emotion and joy," to use his own words. Both Wagner and Liszt would have embraced Dr. Muck for the eloquent way in which he brought out the tragedy of this masterwork, of which Wagner further wrote: "I was quite out of breath after reading it through the first time. I feel sorry, too, for the poor horse: how cruel are nature and the world." It is to be hoped that Dr. Muck will give us some more of his fine Liszt interpretations during the season. He and Josef Stransky, the leader of our Philharmonic, are close friends, and one of their bonds of friendship is their love of Liszt.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 8 1912

BEETHOVEN SUBJECT OF LECTURE RECITAL

With Other Members by Boston Symphony Orchestra, This Evening, at Academy.

CONCERTS IN MANHATTAN.

Charles Norman Granville Strong in Dramatic Work—Beatrice Wainwright in Coloratura.

Louis C. Elson and Alfred De Voto of Boston interpreted in lecture recital in the lecture hall in the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon the programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give this evening in the opera house of the Academy. It was the first lecture recital, this season, in the series which for years has accompanied the Boston Symphony's concerts, under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute.

"Beethoven's postscript is like that to a woman's letter. It often holds the best of the matter," said Mr. Elson, when commenting on the codas in that master's "Eighth Symphony," which is that in F major, opus. 93. "I should call this a contra bass, bassoon and kettle-drum symphony," he said, in giving the list of instruments in the "classical" orchestra which is to give it—a list much shorter than that which is required for modern compositions. The symphony requires half an hour in the playing, a fact which composers of over-long modern symphonies were urged to observe. It was written as the result of Beethoven's falling in love. He had a habit of falling in love—a love that was platonic, pure, idealistic—and it always resulted in beautiful music. Mr. Elson said that Dr. Muck will not try to individualize in his reading of this symphony, but will employ the old reading, as presumably that which Beethoven favored.

The symphony is to be first on the programme. It was discussed last, however, by Mr. Elson, and more time given to the study of it than to the numbers which will come after the intermission: Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," opus 9, by Berlioz; "Mazeppa," symphonic poem No. 9, after Victor Hugo's poem of that name, by Liszt, and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," by Wagner. It was noted that the four show some form of festivity. The symphony is gay. The "Carnaval" has the brilliant music of the saltarello, the Roman dance; in "Mazeppa" comes the closing barbaric music of the coronation march, and the "Meistersinger" is joyous.

In pointing out themes, much was said of the theme in the "Carnaval," where violas lead and give the air, that instrument being called "a sort of poor relation in the orchestra, a Cinderella," whose beauty is not realized by the casual listener. The Hugo version of "Mazeppa" makes the story an allegory, and the horse is "genius," which carries a man where it will, yet to victory. From the time where a wild shriek of the piccolos gives the departure of the horse until it falls, exhausted, among the Cossacks and different instruments in a few notes each express Mazeppa's despair, the sound of galloping is ever present.

"There are two things that we can very well do in orchestral music," said Mr. Elson. "The first is a thunderstorm, the second the galloping of a horse, this latter heard, perhaps, in its most wonderful expression, in the wild ride of the Valkyrie, and next in nearness to reality in the 'Damnation of Faust,' where Mephistopheles and Faust gallop down the road to Hell." As another remarkable bit of realism, Mr. Elson called on his hearers to observe tonight the striking of the strings with the back of the bow in "Mazeppa," in imitation of the whirring and striking of bats' wings about Mazeppa during the night ride. It is also said to imitate the flapping of owls' wings and the striking of the horse's hoofs upon hard ground.

While Mr. Elson gave the first presentation of the themes, Mr. De Voto, on another piano, played their enlargement and many passages from the numbers, all of which gave much pleasure.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Karl Muck Again at the Head of Famous Organization.

At the opening concert of the Philadelphia series, given at the Academy of Music last evening, Dr. Karl Muck, the masterly leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, managed to combine within a program of five numbers three musical selections which must have been somewhat trying to the old-fashioned music-lovers not particularly enamored of instruments of percussion.

The symphony itself, with which the concert opened, must have appealed to all, for it was the "Eroica" of Beethoven, played in superb fashion; but the second part of the program consisted of compositions by Berlioz, Liszt and Wagner, a group which produces pretty strong pabulum for the musically inclined.

"Le Carnival Romain" was the Belioz selection, the chief thematic material of which was taken by the composer from his opera of "Benvenuto Cellini." The beginning of this Roman carnival music is beautiful, but the continuation, with its scraps of dance music and the hurly-burly of the development, is not particularly interesting, save, strangely enough, by the fact that some of the scraps of melody call to mind the more recent "Jewels of the Madonna." As for Liszt's musical version of Victor Hugo's poem, "Mazeppa," it is an orchestral tour de force which excites admiration rather than liking, despite the magnificence of the triumphal concluding march. Compared to the Vorspiel of Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," with which the program concluded, the Berlioz and the Liszt numbers sink into insignificance.

One of the most melodious of the German master's compositions, with its exquisite lyrical episodes, especially that which expresses Walther's love for Eva, it has always been a favorite with concert goers. It was played last evening in a manner which would have satisfied the composer himself and which brought enthusiastic applause from the audience.

The Beethoven symphony, as has been said already, was played superbly. Particularly appreciated was the second movement, the funeral march, given with both strength and tenderness, with a refinement of rendering which made the listener hold his breath and produced almost a feeling of awe. There is no better interpreter of Beethoven than Dr. Muck and he lived up to his reputation last evening. His return to the post of conductor of the Boston Orchestra should be a matter of felicitation for all those interested in the continued musical

---

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 5 - 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS HEARD, WITH DR. MUCK

Orchestra Under His Leadership Plays Superbly and With Freedom

A 'STANDARD' PROGRAM

Supreme Beauties of Beethoven's 'Eroica' Revealed by the Players

THE large audience at the Academy of Music last evening welcomed an old friend in Dr. Carl Muck, who has returned to his distinguished post as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Doctor Muck has been absent in Germany for several years, during which period his position was assumed by Max Fiedler. Imperial permission to come back having been at last secured, the gifted conductor once more graces the realm of American instrumental music.

In former years the conductor, for all his incontrovertible ability was accused of a sort of unyielding militarism of method that opposed the most poetic interpretation of musical imaginative masterpieces. The old precision, the impeccable, authoritative methods, are still present, but side by side with them is richer and more varied conception of his art than was previously revealed.

Last night's program, which was distinctly of "standard" composition, gave repeated evidence of this. The orchestra, under Doctor Muck's baton, played superbly, of course, but it played, as well, with a freeedom and splendid intensity that easily justified the management in re-engaging the erstwhile leader.

There were no novelties in the concert, and the symmetry of the program was happily not compromised by the presence of a soloist. Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony opened the proceedings. It is idle word-spilling to write analytically of Beethoven's first great symphonic work today. The Boston players left nothing of its supreme beauties unrevealed, emphasizing with compelling beauty the dignity of the funeral march, the airy grace of the scherzo, the melodic charm of the allegro and the joyful gaiety of the finale. It was a reading eminently worthy of the subject matter in hand, and higher praise cannot be written.

Carl Pohlig used to give Liszt's stirring symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," based upon Victor Hugo's poem, tracing back to Byron and older legend, but the work, graphically romantic, in the best spirit of its composer, has not been offered here by the Boston orchestra in some years. It was eloquently interpreted.

Berlioz's bright, but not especially notable, overture, "Carnaval Romaine," derived from themes from his renaissance opera, "Benuenuto Cellini," and the indestructible "Meistersinger" prelude, were the other numbers of a most attractive concert.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

* * *

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. Old-time friends of the orchestra will note a number of changes in the personnel, as there are 16 new members. Of course, the centre of attraction will be Dr. Karl Muck, who makes his first appearance here after an absence of four years. Judging from the reception the orchestra has had in Boston, new life and brilliancy have come under the leadership of Dr. Muck. The term of his service will be at least five years.

At this first concert in Philadelphia Dr. Muck will play the program which opened the season in Boston. It comprises the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz, the "Mazeppa" symphonic poem of Liszt and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." All of these are familiar except the Liszt symphonic poem. It is the sixth of a series of symphonic poems by that composer, and was composed in 1836 as a study for piano. This study was enlarged in 1837 and 1841, and about 1850 was arranged and orchestrated by the composer. It was inspired not by Byron's poem, but by Victor Hugo's poem of the same name, which was written in 1828 and was published in "Les Orientales" in 1829. The first performance of the work was on Easter Sunday, April 16, 1854, in the Grand Ducal Theatre, at Weimar, at a charity concert of the Court Orchestra. Liszt conducted from manuscript. It is a work characteristic of the composer, and in merit ranks high among compositions of its class.

* * *

From PRESS
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date 5 - 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS ITS SEASON

First Appearance of Dr. Muck After Four Years' Absence Pleasantly Welcomed.

PROGRAM.
Beethoven—Symphony No. 3 in E Flat Major, "Eroica."
Berlioz—Overture, "Le Carnival Romain."
Liszt—"Mazeppa," Symphonic Poem, No. 6.
Wagner—Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."
Conductor, Dr. Karl Muck.

It was the inevitable that the beginning of the twenty-eighth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia, marking as it did the return of Dr. Karl Muck, should find the Academy nearly filled with an audience whose manifest pleasure over the return of one whom it had come to regard in the two years that he was here before—from 1906 to 1908—as a sterling conductor, fitted for the task of leading the pioneer virtuoso orchestra in the United States, was tempered with a proper decorum.

Dr. Muck's program was made up of numbers that naturally revealed the Boston players at their best, the one curious feature of the program being the "Mazeppa" symphonic poem of Liszt, which Dr. Muck announced sometime ago he intended to play this year "as one of a number of important but neglected works which he believed should be restored to modern programs." The work has not been as much neglected in Philadelphia as apparently it has been in Boston, since it figured in the Philadelphia Orchestra programs of October 14-15, 1910, and again this past year on March 8-9, in connection with the Liszt anniversary program. However, a rehearing of it, even when revived by Dr. Muck, does not change the general estimate in which the composition is held, of being one of Liszt's interesting but not particularly inspired works.

Program Ran Easily.

The complete orchestral program being a repetition of the first concert given in Boston four weeks ago, naturally ran off the reel very easily. One can always see the things that have been suggested or what one is looking for, and great claims have been made in Boston that the return of Dr. Muck has meant a remaking and a revivification of the orchestral band in all particulars. Curiously enough, the extremists in the matter of the Bostonians often praise it for absolutely opposed conditions; it is held up to be an essentially unchanging unit, when, as a matter of fact, there are constant changes in its personnel; while, on the other hand, its relatively frequent change of conductors and concertmeisters is pointed out as a virtue.

Serene and Blithe.

All these things may be reconciled perhaps, and, of course, with the Bostonians, as is the case with the Philadelphia Orchestra, one is dealing with one of the leading orchestras in the world, while Dr. Muck as an authoritative leader has a unique position, even if at times he seems to be one upon whom the Prussian military spirit has more or less, to paraphrase an old remark, "stamped its iron heel." Dr. Muck, however, is probably more serene and blithe, genial and spontaneous, more poetic and more temperamental than certain features of his conducting would suggest, and it is always agreeable to hear an organization, especially after twenty-eight years of development, that assumes authority in all lines, even if in all particulars one cannot admit every claim.

As for the symphony, the second movement, the funeral march, had a singularly unpoetic reading and the whole seemed "icily regular, faultlessly fine," in a somewhat balanced pianoistic, metronomic idiom. Pohlig had small excuse, Muck less, for the "Mazeppa" resurrection, and the "Carnival Romain" had more of the North German than the Gallic or Latin spirit; it did not smack of the Corso or the "Piazza Venezia." The orchestral tone and volume in the "Meistersinger" were rich and cumulative in the climaxes, but the audience was not overwhelmed or transported.

From Address PHILA
Date

The first local concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Academy of Music on Monday evening next. The orchestra this year has sixteen new members, and Dr. Karl Muck will make his first appearance here after an absence of four years.

At this concert Dr. Muck will play the same program with which he opened the season in Boston. It comprises the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven; the "Roman Carnival" overture of [illegible]; the symphonic poem "Mazeppa" of Liszt and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." All of these are familiar except to the Liszt number, which has been played very seldom in this country, but which is said to be highly characteristic of the composer.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 5 - 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS SEASON HERE

Dr. Karl Muck Leads Orchestra for First Time in Three Years.

WORK OF STRINGS FINE

PROGRAMME.

Symphony No. 3, Eroica	Beethoven
Overture, "Carnaval Romain"	Berlioz
Symphonic Poem, "Mazeppa"	Liszt
Prelude, "Meistersinger"	Wagner

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first of this season's series of concerts here last evening, under its distinguished conductor, Dr. Karl Muck. Doctor Muck has returned to resume the leadership of the Boston Orchestra after a three years' absence in Germany. He was cordially welcomed on his appearance.

Doctor Muck is pre-eminently the scholar among musicians, and is recognized as such in all the musical centres of Europe. As might be expected, his rendering of the Beethoven Symphony was unanswerable. There is but one way to play Beethoven and Doctor Muck plays him in that way. The first movement was taken by him in a rather more rapid tempo than that to which we have been accustomed, which gave it a most spirited effect. Perhaps the most noticeable feature in the rendering of the second movement—the funeral march—was the oboe of M. Longy, whose marvelous phrasing and tone it is always a delight to hear. The scherzo was perfectly played, but in no way different from what is would have been by our own orchestra.

Indeed, the idea of certain quasi-musical people that the Boston Orchestra is vastly superior to our own is entirely without substantial foundation.

The rendition of the Berlioz overture was more perfect than inspiring. The "Mazeppa" symphonic poem, seldom heard in Philadelphia, was not interesting by reason of the obvious influence it had upon the third act of Wagner's "Tristan," which was being composed at the time Wagner received the score from Liszt. Some portions of the "Ride of the Valkyries" also bear a striking resemblance to it. The greatness of Liszt as a composer consisted rather in what he suggested to others than in what he accomplished himself. The first part was played without the wild fervor suggested by the accompanying poem. The "Meistersinger" prelude was played faster than usual, and the brass at the end was so held down that the effect of the climax was somewhat lost.

The string instruments in this orchestra, particularly the first violins, have always been remarkable for beauty and breadth of tone and perfect and delicate phrasing. This was particularly noticeable in the rapid contrapuntal passages in the last movement of the symphony.

From Address PHILADELPHIA
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Before an audience which filled the Academy of Music and demonstrated its cordiality by repeated applause, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, once more under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, opened the first of the season's series of concerts last night with a notable presentation of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony.

During the past three years, in which Dr. Muck filled a contract with the Royal Opera in Berlin, the orchestra has been conducted by Max Fiedler. But with the expiration of the contract and the Emperor's express consent, Dr. Muck returns to take a permanent place in the realm of American instrumental music.

The program last night, which included "Le Carnival Romain" of Berlioz; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," was one which supplied in nobility of theme and superb rendition what it lacked in novelty.

The symphony which the composer described tersely in the one word "Buonparte," on the title page, looms colossal among the compositions of all time.

Dr. Muck's interpretation of Beethoven, which the hypercritical might describe as somewhat pedantic, though adhering rigidly to preconceived standards, was marked with a splendid intensity and read with an intellectual appreciation that won deserved tribute at the end of each movement.

The quickened tempo of the Allegro gave it a most spirited effect. The second movement—the funeral march—was not particularly well done, the contrapuntal developments dragging somewhat under the rigidly imposed interpretation of the director. The oboe passages of M. Longy were commendable, both for phrasing and perfect tone. The light, rippling sherzo, however, was beautifully played, showing the strings in their full perfection, while the inspiring climaxes of the finale swept up to the heights of joyous ecstacy.

Berlioz, unlightened by any particular qualities of temperament or imagination, on the part of Dr. Muck, held no musical message of import in "Le Carnival Romain." "Mazeppa," on the other hand, rich in brass effects, tinkling away to a rhythm suggestive of the rhapsodies and reminiscent in parts of the Wagner school, was well received. The magnificent triumphal march with which it concludes brought forth much applause. But "Die Meistersinger," which rounded out the program, at once melodious and tender, full of the lyric love of Walther for Eva, was so exquisitely played that both Liszt and Berlioz dwindled into insignifi

---

From INQUIRER
Address. Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, November 4, at 8.15 o'clock. Old-time friends of the orchestra will note a number of changes in the personnel, for this year it has sixteen new members and, of course, the centre of attraction will be Dr. Karl Muck, who makes his first appearance here after an absence of four years.

At this first concert in Philadelphia Dr. Muck will play the same program as that with which he opened his season in Boston. It comprises in order, the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, which makes the first half of the program; the "Roman Carnival" Overture of Berlioz; the "Mazeppa" symphonic poem of Liszt and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

All of these are familiar except the Liszt symphonic poem which has been played very seldom in this country. It is the sixth of the series of symphonic poems by Liszt and was composed as a study for piano in 1836. This study was enlarged in 1837 and 1841 and about 1850 it was arranged and orchestrated by the composer. It was inspired not by Byron's poem, but Victor Hugo's poem of the same name which was written in 1828 and published in "Les Orientales" in 1829.

The first performance of the work was on Easter Sunday, April 16, 1854, in the Grand Ducal Theatre, at Weimer, at a charity concert of the Court Orchestra. Liszt conducted from manuscript. It is a work exceedingly characteristic of the composer and in merit ranks high among the compositions of its class.

KARL MUCK, CONDUCTOR BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

MRS. KARL MUCK and MRS. WILLIAM M. BAUGH were entertained by Mr. and Mrs. Richard Y. Cook in their box at the Boston Symphony concert at the Academy of Music.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 5

at their town house, 1006 Clinton street.

Mrs. Karl Muck and Mrs. William M. Baugh were entertained by Mr. and Mrs. Richard Y. Cook in their box at the Boston Symphony concert at the Academy of Music last night.

From INQUIRER
Address. Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Its First Concert for the Season at the Academy Last Evening

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert for the season at the Academy of Music last night in the presence of one of those brilliant and crowded audiences such as it used years ago to attract. Dr. Karl Muck's reappearance on the conductor's stand was the feature of the occasion. He had a reception whose heartiness indicated the prevailing satisfaction at his return, and under his inspiring leadership the playing of the orchestra was more than ever eloquent in expression, beautiful in tone and dazzling in brilliancy. The principal number on the program was the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, which was interpreted with a keenly penetrative insight and a splendidly illuminative power. Other selections were Berlioz's "Carnival Romain," Liszt's tone poem of "Mazeppa" and Wagner's "Meistersinger" overture.

From TELEGRAPH
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 5 - 1912

Concert by Boston Symphony.

That admirable aggregation of musicians, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opened its twenty-eighth season in Philadelphia last night in the Academy of Music. Dr. Karl Muck, after an absence of several years, reappeared as wielder of the baton so recently yielded by Max Fiedler, and the applause of the audience seemed to be as much a greeting to the conductor as an appreciation of the excellent music.

Beethoven's wonderful symphony No. 3, the "Eroica," was the chief feature of the program. Dr. Muck followed the advice of Beethoven, given in the Italian introduction to the original, that this symphony should be used to open a concert rather than as a middle or closing number. Consequently this number led the program, and the overture took second place.

There are plenty of purists, musical "standpatters," who have had fits of horror over alleged "personal" readings of Beethoven selections in the past. Perhaps Dr. Muck gave a personal tinge last night to parts of the symphony; it is hard to say, as the average concert patron does not memorize the musical ands and buts for the purpose of seeing if any are left out. Suffice it to say that the great symphony, supposed to typify Napoleon the Great, was given in a manner worthy of its legendary subject and of its author, the Shakespeare of music.

All the old-time smoothness of the orchestra was again apparent, all the delicacy of touch and phrasing which has been so noticeable in past work of the Boston musicians was again displayed. The second movement, with its funeral march, and the third movement, which sounds almost like an inspiration for Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream," were magnificently done. These passages alone, with their characters so radically different, and with their renditions, each so fine of its kind, give an index to the capacity of the orchestra under Dr. Muck.

The overture was Berlioz's "Le Carnaval Romain," and while almost anything tastes flat after the profound harmonies of Beethoven, the full possibilities of the piece were well brought out. Rattle and smash were added to the program by Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and the vorspiel to Wagner's "Meistersinger" completed the list.

Address Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 6 - 1912

SOCIETY IN FO BOSTON SYMP

THE German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff, who have taken a box for the season for the Boston Symphony concerts at the National Theater, had among their guests yesterday Mrs. Beekman Winthrop, Mrs. Norman Williams, Capt. Boy-Ed, of the embassy staff, and Mr. Masirevich, of the Austro-Hungarian embassy.

Miss May Williams occupied a box, and had among her guests the French Ambassador and Mme. Jusserand, Mrs. Robert Hitt, Mrs. Reynolds Hill, and Baroness von Reibnitz, of the German embassy.

In Mrs. Leiter's box were Mrs. Howard Reeside, Dr. and Mrs. Buckner Randolph, Mrs. Walter Tuckerman, and Mr. and Mrs. Randolph, of Baltimore.

Mrs. Calderon Carlisle had as guests in her box Mrs. Sanger, Mrs. Bruce Howe, and Mrs. Mandeville Carlisle.

In Mrs. I. T. Mann's box were Mr. and Mrs. Charles Campbell, Mrs. Brinton Stone, the Misses Hickey, and Mme. de Quesada.

The Rev. and Mrs. Ward F. Denys occupied the President's box. Their guests were Mrs. Henry E. Pellew and Mrs. Ralph Cross Johnson and their daughters, Miss Dorothea Denys and Miss Gwendolyn Denys.

Mr. and Mrs. A. Lisner had as their guests in their box Mrs. Daniel Thew Wright, Mrs. D. Percy Hickling, and Mrs. Earl Ambrose.

Elsewhere in the audience were the British Ambassador and Mrs. Bryce, the Minister of the Netherlands and Mme. Loudon, the Attorney General and Mrs. Wickersham, the Swedish Minister and Mrs. Ekengren, Mrs. Charles Nagel, the bishop of Washington, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mr. and Mrs. Arnold Hague, th Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Randolph McKim, Dr and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, Mrs. Howlan Chase, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, Mrs George Howard, Miss Audenried, Miss Sophy Siebert, Miss Letterman, Miss Squire Miss Isabelle Hagner, Mrs. Alexande Britton, Miss Margaret Britton, Mrs. M Lewis Clark, Mrs. Richard Weightman Mrs. W. H. Wilmer, Mrs. Livingston Hunt, Mr. William Bowie Clark, Mrs Hennen Jennings, Miss Jennings, Miss Dorothy Williams, Mrs. Robert Hinckley, Miss Hinckley, Mrs. Theodore Noyes, Mrs. Corbin, Mrs. A. F. Magruder, Mme. de Kraft, Mrs. Charles B. Howry, Mr. and Mrs. Christian Hemmick, the Rev. William A. Hemmick, Mrs. Krogstad, Miss Brodie, the Misses Sedgely, Mrs. George Bettis, Miss Ruth R. Patterson, Miss Millan, Mr. Justice and Mrs. McKenna, Mrs. Gordon Cumming, Mrs. Gould Lincoln, Mrs. Henry H. Ward, Mrs. John Hay, Miss Mabel Boardman, Mrs. Robert Ely, Mr. and Mme. Okabi, of the Japanese embassy; Mrs. William F. Dennis, Countess de Chambrun, Mrs. James Lowndes, Miss Laurette Ellward Smith, Mrs. Nichols Anderson, the Misses Dove, Admiral Brownson, Miss Mary McCauley, Mrs. Carl Droop, Mrs. Emile Montgomery, and Mr. John B. Henderson, jr.

TIMES
Washington, D. C.
NOV 6 - 19

OSTON SYMPHONY DRAWS SOCIETY TO NATIONAL THEATER

Dr. Karl Muck Leads Famous Orchestra to Satisfaction of Big Audience.

Musical Washington cordially welcomed Dr. Karl Muck back to the directorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in the National Theater, a brilliant and fashionable audience filling the house. Two great masters of music divided honors in position on the program, a Beethoven symphony having the conventional place and a Wagner number being placed as a concluding number. Berlioz and Liszt were the composers of the intervening numbers.

The Eighth Symphony has won its way slowly, being less characteristic than other symphonic compositions of Beethoven, but it is now well established in the favor of musicians. As given yesterday the volume and resonance were admirably adapted to the size of the theater, more so than when, a few years since, I heard the same composition in the Academy of Music in Philadelphia, when the strains were rather too delicate for the space in which it was played.

The second movement of the Eighth Symphony is the most novel, while the minuet which was played yesterday in the tempo of symphonies—faster than that of the dance—was pleasing through its pretty air and the pizzicato accompaniment. Prolonged applause greeted the conclusion of the symphony from an audience made up of members of the official and diplomatic circles and many young women.

Carnival Music.

In Berlioz's 'Overture to the Roman Carnival" three is accorded a Frenchman's conception of a dance and a love song, combined with the confusion incidental to a masked ball on Shrove Tuesday in Rome. Needless to say, the music surpasses the period and it was enhanced by a perfect rendition yesterday.

Listz's "Mazeppa" is descriptive music, pure, but not simple. Everyone ought to know the story of Mazeppa and suffice it to say that he was a miscreant bound on the back of an untamed horse which carried him, suffering, to a far country, of which he ultimately became the king. Victor Hugo and Bryon have given the story poetic form and the Abbe Franz expresses it on the piano.

Later, it was divided among the instruments of an orchestra. Every scherzo and rondo is outdone if the tempo employed to represent the flying horse, and diminished sevenths and an almost involved theme indicate the agony of the rider and the mad gait of the horse. The later royalty of the rider is also suitably expressed. Listz treated the story as an allegory, calling the rider "Genius," who comes off conqueror after much buffeting and many struggles.

Wagnerian Prelude.

The opening chord of Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg" seems a herald's call, and successive measures a grand procession, so sonorous and martial are they. As Dr. Muck led his men through the mighty Wagnerian harmonies yesterday it occurred to one to ask that if Beethoven is called the master of absolute music—music intelligible to music lovers the world over—what we ought to call Wagner, who to his own noble words set such music, so expressive of mighty deeds, mindful the while of the underlying allegory.

If the supremacy in the East of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been threatened in recent times by rivals, the return of Dr. Muck, as evinced by yesterday's concert, seems the best step its friends could wish.

JULIA MURDOCK.

---

rom HERALD
ddress: Washington, D. C. ate V 6 - 12

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the season to a capacity audience in the National Theater yesterday afternoon. The German Ambassador and the Countess von Bernstorff entertained the Assistant Secretary of Commerce and Labor and Mrs. Nagel, Brig. Gen. Crozier, Mrs. Reynolds Hitt, and Mme. Jusserand, wife of the French Ambassador. Dr. and Mrs. Buckner Randolph had as their guests in their box Mrs. Walter Tuckerman, and Mr. and Mrs. Howard Randolph of Baltimore. Mrs. Calderon Carlisle and her daughter, Mrs. Walter Howe, occupied one of the stage boxes. Mr. and Mrs. Charles Campbell, Mrs. Brinton Stone, and Miss Belle Hagner were also in the boxes. Mr. and Mrs. Abraham Listner entertained a box party.

Among the many appreciative music lovers in the audience were Mrs. John Hay, Mr. and Mrs. Christian Hemmick, Dr. and Mrs. Randolph McKim, Mr. and Mrs. Duncan McKim, Miss Mabel Boardman, Mrs. Hennen Jennings, Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, Mrs. Robert Hinckley, Miss Gladys Hinckley, Miss Angelica Remey, Rear Admiral O'Neal, U. S. N., retired, Mr. Antoine de Geoffroy, Mr. George Appleby, and Mr. William Bowie Clarke.

[76]

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 5 - 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS SEASON HERE

Dr. Karl Muck Leads Orchestra for First Time in Three Years.

WORK OF STRINGS FINE

PROGRAMME.

Symphony No. 3, Eroica	Beethoven
Overture, "Carnaval Romain"	Berlioz
Symphonic Poem, "Mazeppa"	Liszt
Prelude, "Meistersinger"	Wagner

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first of this season's series of concerts here last evening, under its distinguished conductor, Dr. Karl Muck. Doctor Muck has returned to resume the leadership of the Boston Orchestra after a three years' absence in Germany. He was cordially welcomed on his appearance.

Doctor Muck is pre-eminently the scholar among musicians, and is recognized as such in all the musical centres of Europe. As might be expected, his rendering of the Beethoven Symphony was unanswerable. There is but one way to play Beethoven and Doctor Muck plays him in that way. The first movement was taken by him in a rather more rapid tempo than that to which we have been accustomed, which gave it a most spirited effect. Perhaps the most noticeable feature in the rendering of the second movement—the funeral march—was the oboe of M. Longy, whose marvelous phrasing and tone it is always a delight to hear. The scherzo was perfectly played, but in no way different from what is would have been by our own orchestra.

Indeed, the idea of certain quasi-musical people that the Boston Orchestra is vastly superior to our own is entirely without substantial foundation.

The rendition of the Berlioz overture was more perfect than inspiring. The "Mazeppa" symphonic poem, seldom heard in Philadelphia, was not interesting by reason of the obvious influence it had upon the third act of Wagner's "Tristan," which was being composed at the time Wagner received the score from Liszt. Some portions of the "Ride of the Valkyries" also bear a striking resemblance to it. The greatness of Liszt as a composer consisted rather in what he suggested to others than in what he accomplished himself. The first part was played without the wild fervor suggested by the accompanying poem. The "Meistersinger" prelude was played faster than usual, and the brass at the end was so held down that the effect of the climax was somewhat lost.

The string instruments in this orchestra, particularly the first violins, have always been remarkable for beauty and breadth of tone and perfect and delicate phrasing. This was particularly noticeable in the rapid contrapuntal passages in the last movement of the symphony.

From Address PHILADELPHIA
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Before an audience which filled the Academy of Music and demonstrated its cordiality by repeated applause, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, once more under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, opened the first of the season's series of concerts last night with a notable presentation of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony.

During the past three years, in which Dr. Muck filled a contract with the Royal Opera in Berlin, the orchestra has been conducted by Max Fiedler. But with the expiration of the contract and the Emperor's express consent, Dr. Muck returns to take a permanent place in the realm of American instrumental music.

The program last night, which included "Le Carnival Romain" of Berlioz; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," was one which supplied in nobility of theme and superb rendition what it lacked in novelty.

The symphony which the composer described tersely in the one word "Buonparte," on the title page, looms colossal among the compositions of all time.

Dr. Muck's interpretation of Beethoven, which the hypercritical might describe as somewhat pedantic, though adhering rigidly to preconceived standards, was marked with a splendid intensity and read with an intellectual appreciation that won deserved tribute at the end of each movement.

The quickened tempo of the Allegro gave it a most spirited effect. The second movement—the funeral march—was not particularly well done, the contrapuntal developments dragging somewhat under the rigidly imposed interpretation of the director. The oboe passages of M. Longy were commendable, both for phrasing and perfect tone. The light, rippling sherzo, however, was beautifully played, showing the strings in their full perfection, while the inspiring climaxes of the finale swept up to the heights of joyous ecstacy.

Berlioz, unlightened by any particular qualities of temperament or imagination, on the part of Dr. Muck, held no musical message of import in "Le Carnival Romain." "Mazeppa," on the other hand, rich in brass effects, tinkling away to a rhythm suggestive of the rhapsodies and reminiscent in parts of the Wagner school, was well received. The magnificent triumphal march with which it concludes brought forth much applause. But "Die Meistersinger," which rounded out the program, at once melodious and tender, full of the lyric love of Walther for Eva, was so exquisitely played that both Liszt and Berlioz dwindled into insignif

---

From INQUIRER
Address. Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, November 4, at 8.15 o'clock. Old-time friends of the orchestra will note a number of changes in the personnel, for this year it has sixteen new members and, of course, the centre of attraction will be Dr. Karl Muck, who makes his first appearance here after an absence of four years.

At this first concert in Philadelphia Dr. Muck will play the same program as that with which he opened his season in Boston. It comprises in order, the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, which makes the first half of the program; the "Roman Carnival" Overture of Berlioz; the "Mazeppa" symphonic poem of Liszt and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

All of these are familiar except the Liszt symphonic poem which has been played very seldom in this country. It is the sixth of the series of symphonic poems by Liszt and was composed as a study for piano in 1836. This study was enlarged in 1837 and 1841 and about 1850 it was arranged and orchestrated by the composer. It was inspired not by Byron's poem, but Victor Hugo's poem of the same name which was written in 1828 and published in "Les Orientales" in 1829.

The first performance of the work was on Easter Sunday, April 16, 1854, in the Grand Ducal Theatre, at Weimer, at a charity concert of the Court Orchestra. Liszt conducted from manuscript. It is a work exceedingly characteristic of the composer and in merit ranks high among the compositions of its class.

KARL MUCK, CONDUCTOR BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

MRS. KARL MUCK and MRS. WILLIAM M. BAUGH were entertained by Mr. and Mrs. Richard Y. Cook in their box at the Boston Symphony concert at the Academy of Music.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

at their town house, 1006 Clinton street.

Mrs. Karl Muck and Mrs. William M. Baugh were entertained by Mr. and Mrs. Richard Y. Cook in their box at the Boston Symphony concert at the Academy of Music last night.

From INQUIRER
Address. Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Its First Concert for the Season at the Academy Last Evening

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert for the season at the Academy of Music last night in the presence of one of those brilliant and crowded audiences such as it used years ago to attract. Dr. Karl Muck's reappearance on the conductor's stand was the feature of the occasion. He had a reception whose heartiness indicated the prevailing satisfaction at his return, and under his inspiring leadership the playing of the orchestra was more than ever eloquent in expression, beautiful in tone and dazzling in brilliancy. The principal number on the program was the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, which was interpreted with a keenly penetrative insight and a splendidly illuminative power. Other selections were Berlioz's "Carnival Romain," Liszt's tone poem of "Mazeppa" and Wagner's "Meistersinger" overture.

TELEGRAPH
From
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 5 -

Concert by Boston Symphony

That admirable aggregation of m cians, the Boston Symphony Orche opened its twenty-eighth season in P delphia last night in the Academy Music. Dr. Karl Muck, after an abs of several years, reappeared as wiel the baton so recently yielded by Max Fiedler, and the applause of the audience seemed to be as much a greeting to the conductor as an appreciation of the excellent music.

Beethoven's wonderful symphony No. 3, the "Eroica," was the chief feature of the program. Dr. Muck followed the advice of Beethoven, given in the Italian introduction to the original, that this symphony should be used to open a concert rather than as a middle or closing number. Consequently this number led the program, and the overture took second place.

There are plenty of purists, musical "standpatters," who have had fits of horror over alleged "personal" readings of Beethoven selections in the past. Perhaps Dr. Muck gave a personal tinge last night to parts of the symphony; it is hard to say, as the average concert patron does not memorize the musical ands and buts for the purpose of seeing if any are left out. Suffice it to say that the great symphony, supposed to typify Napoleon the Great, was given in a manner worthy of its legendary subject and of its author, the Shakespeare of music.

All the old-time smoothness of the orchestra was again apparent, all the delicacy of touch and phrasing which has been so noticeable in past work of the Boston musicians was again displayed. The second movement, with its funeral march, and the third movement, which sounds almost like an inspiration for Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream," were magnificently done. These passages alone, with their characters so radically different, and with their renditions, each so fine of its kind, give an index to the capacity of the orchestra under Dr. Muck.

The overture was Berlioz's "Le Carnaval Romain," and while almost anything tastes flat after the profound harmonies of Beethoven, the full possibilities of the piece were well brought out. Rattle and smash were added to the program by Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and the vorspiel to Wagner's "Meistorsinger" completed the list.

Address Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 6 - 1912

SOCIETY IN FO BOSTON SYMP

THE German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff, who have taken a box for the season for the Boston Symphony concerts at the National Theater, had among their guests yesterday Mrs. Beekman Winthrop, Mrs. Norman Williams, Capt. Boy-Ed, of the embassy staff, and Mr. Masirevich, of the Austro-Hungarian embassy.

Miss May Williams occupied a box, and had among her guests the French Ambassador and Mme. Jusserand, Mrs. Robert Hitt, Mrs. Reynolds Hitt and Baroness von Reibnitz, of the German embassy.

In Mrs. Leiter's box were Mrs. Howard Reeside, Dr. and Mrs. Buckner Randolph, Mrs. Walter Tuckerman, and Mr. and Mrs. Randolph, of Baltimore.

Mrs. Calderon Carlisle had as guests in her box Mrs. Sanger, Mrs. Bruce Howe, and Mrs. Mandeville Carlisle.

In Mrs. I. T. Mann's box were Mr. and Mrs. Charles Campbell, Mrs. Brinton Stone, the Misses Hickey, and Mme. de Quesada.

The Rev. and Mrs. Ward F. Denys occupied the President's box. Their guests were Mrs. Henry E. Pellew and Mrs. Ralph Cross Johnson and their daughters, Miss Dorothea Denys and Miss Gwendolyn Denys.

Mr. and Mrs. A. Lisner had as their guests in their box Mrs. Daniel Thew Wright, Mrs. D. Percy Hickling, and Mrs. Earl Ambrose.

Elsewhere in the audience were the British Ambassador and Mrs. Bryce, the Minister of the Netherlands and Mme. Loudon, the Attorney General and Mrs. Wickersham, the Swedish Minister and Mrs. Ekengren, Mrs. Charles Nagel, the bishop of Washington, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mr. and Mrs. Arnold Hague, Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Randolph McKim, and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, Mrs. How Chase, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, George Howard, Miss Audenried, Miss phy Siebert, Miss Letterman, Miss Squ Miss Isabelle Hagner, Mrs. Alexan Britton, Miss Margaret Britton, Mrs. Lewis Clark, Mrs. Richard Weightm Mrs. W. H. Wilmer, Mrs. Livingst Hunt, Mr. William Bowie Clark, Hennen Jennings, Miss Jennings, M Dorothy Williams, Mrs. Robert Hin ley, Miss Hinckley, Mrs. Theod Noyes, Mrs. Corbin, Mrs. A. F. gruder, Mme. de Kraft, Mrs. Cha B. Howry, Mr. and Mrs. Chris Hemmick, the Rev. William A. H mick, Mrs. Krogstad, Miss Brodie, Misses Sedgely, Mrs. George Bettis, Ruth R. Patterson, Miss Millan, Mr. Justice and Mrs. McKenna, Mrs. Gordon Cumming, Mrs. Gould Lincoln, Mrs. Henry H. Ward, Mrs. John Hay, Miss Mabel Boardman, Mrs. Robert Ely, Mr. and Mme. Okabi, of the Japanese embassy; Mrs. William F. Dennis, Countess de Chambrun, Mrs. James Lowndes, Miss Laurette Ellward Smith, Mrs. Nichols Anderson, the Misses Dove, Admiral Brownson, Miss Mary McCauley, Mrs. Carl Droop, Mrs. Emile Montgomery, and Mr. John B. Henderson, jr.

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 6 - 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY DRAWS SOCIETY TO NATIONAL THEATER

Dr. Karl Muck Leads Famous Orchestra to Satisfaction of Big Audience.

Musical Washington cordially welcomed Dr. Karl Muck back to the directorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in the National Theater, a brilliant and fashionable audience filling the house. Two great masters of music divided honors in position on the program, a Beethoven symphony having the conventional place and a Wagner number being placed as a concluding number. Berlioz and Liszt were the composers of the intervening numbers.

The Eighth Symphony has won its way slowly, being less characteristic than other symphonic compositions of Beethoven, but it is now well established in the favor of musicians. As given yesterday the volume and resonance were admirably adapted to the size of the theater, more so than when, a few years since, I heard the same composition in the Academy of Music in Philadelphia, when the strains were rather too delicate for the space in which it was played.

The second movement of the Eighth Symphony is the most novel, while the minuet which was played yesterday in the tempo of symphonies—faster than that of the dance—was pleasing through its pretty air and the pizzicato accompaniment. Prolonged applause greeted the conclusion of the symphony from an audience made up of members of the official and diplomatic circles and many young women.

Carnival Music.

In Berlioz's 'Overture to the Roman Carnival" three is accorded a Frenchman's conception of a dance and a love song, combined with the confusion incidental to a masked ball on Shrove Tuesday in Rome. Needless to say, the music surpasses the period and it was enhanced by a perfect rendition yesterday.

Listz's "Mazeppa" is descriptive music, pure, but not simple. Everyone ought to know the story of Mazeppa and suffice it to say that he was a miscreant bound on the back of an untamed horse which carried him, suffering, to a far country, of which he ultimately became the king. Victor Hugo and Bryon have given the story poetic form and the Abbe Franz expresses it on the piano.

Later, it was divided among the instruments of an orchestra. Every scherzo and rondo is outdone if the tempo employed to represent the flying horse, and diminished sevenths and an almost involved theme indicate the agony of the rider and the mad gait of the horse. The later royalty of the rider is also suitably expressed. Listz treated the story as an allegory, calling the rider "Genius," who comes off conqueror after much buffeting and many struggles.

Wagnerian Prelude.

The opening chord of Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg" seems a herald's call, and successive measures a grand procession, so sonorous and martial are they. As Dr. Muck led his men through the mighty Wagnerian harmonies yesterday it occurred to one to ask that if Beethoven is called the master of absolute music —music intelligible to music lovers the world over—what we ought to call Wagner, who to his own noble words set such music, so expressive of mighty deeds, mindful the while of the underlying allegory.

If the supremacy in the East of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been threatened in recent times by rivals, the return of Dr. Muck, as evinced by yesterday's concert, seems the best step its friends could wish.

JULIA MURDOCK.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date V 6 - 12

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the season to a capacity audience in the National Theater yesterday afternoon. The German Ambassador and the Countess von Bernstorff entertained the Assistant Secretary of Commerce and Labor and Mrs. Nagel, Brig. Gen. Crozier, Mrs. Reynolds Hitt, and Mme. Jusserand, wife of the French Ambassador. Dr. and Mrs. Buckner Randolph had as their guests in their box Mrs. Walter Tuckerman, and Mr. and Mrs. Howard Randolph of Baltimore. Mrs. Calderon Carlisle and her daughter, Mrs. Walter Howe, occupied one of the stage boxes. Mr. and Mrs. Charles Campbell, Mrs. Brinton Stone, and Miss Belle Hagner were also in the boxes. Mr. and Mrs. Abraham Listner entertained a box party.

Among the many appreciative music lovers in the audience were Mrs. John Hay, Mr. and Mrs. Christian Hemmick, Dr. and Mrs. Randolph McKim, Mr. and Mrs. Duncan McKim, Miss Mabel Boardman, Mrs. Hennen Jennings, Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, Mrs. Robert Hinckley, Miss Gladys Hinckley, Miss Angelica Remey, Rear Admiral O'Neal, U. S. N., retired, Mr. Antoine de Geoffroy, Mr. George Appleby, and Mr. William Bowie Clarke.

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 6 - 19

The first concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon was attended by a large gathering of society folk. With the German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff, who have taken a box for the season, were Mrs. Beekman Winthrop, Mrs. Norman Williams, Captain Boy-Ed, the naval attache of the embassy; and Mr. Masirevich, of the Austro-Hungarian embassy.

The French Ambassador and Mme. Jusserand, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor and Mrs. Nagel, were among the guests in Miss May Williams' box.

With Dr. and Mrs. Buckner Randolph were Mr. and Mrs. Harold Randolph, of Baltimore, and Mrs. Walter Tuckerman.

In Mrs. I. T. Mann's box were Mr. and Mrs. Charles Campbell, Mrs. Brinton Stone, Mme. de Quesada, and the Misses Hickey.

Mrs. Calderon Carlisle's guests were Mrs. J. P. Sanger, Mrs. Bruce Howe, and Mrs. Mandeville Carlisle.

The Rev. F. Ward Denys and Mrs. Denys occupied the Presidential box, having with them Mrs. Henry E. Pellew, Mrs. Ralph Cross Johnson, Miss Dorothea Denys, and Miss Gwendolyn Denys.

With Mr. and Mrs. A. Lisner in their box were Mrs. Daniel Thew Wright, Mrs. D. Percy Hickling, and Mrs. Earl Ambrose.

Others in the audience were the British Ambassador and Mrs. Bryce, the Minister of the Netherlands and Mme. Loudon, the Attorney General and Mrs. Wickersham, the Minister of Sweden and Mme. Ekengren, Miss Mabel Boardman, Mrs. Ely, Mrs. Gordon Cumming, Mr. and Mrs. Christian Hemmick, Mrs. George Howard, Dr. and Mrs. Randolph McKim, Mr. and Mrs. Arnold Hague, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, the Bishop of Washington, the Right Rev. Dr. Harding; Mrs. Howland Chase, Mrs. Alexander Britton, Miss Margaret Britton, Mrs. Richard Weightman, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, Miss Audenreid, Mrs. William H. Wilmer, Mrs. Hennen Jennings, Miss Jennings, Mrs. Krogstad, Miss Dorothy Williams, Mrs. Robert Hinckley, Miss Gladys Hinckley, the Misses Sedgely, Miss Millan, Mrs. William F. Dennis, Miss Mary McCauley, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Miss Letterman, Miss Squire, Mrs. Theodore Noyes, Mrs. Corbin, Mrs. Alexander F. Magruder, Mrs. James Lowndes, W. Bowie Clark, and John B. Henderson, jr.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

BOSTON ORCHESTRA GIVES CONCERT

Under Renewed Leadership of Dr. Muck, Boston Organization Is Warmly Welcomed.

The first Boston Symphony concert of the season was given yesterday afternoon at the National Theater under the management of Mrs. Katie Wilson-Greene.

Dr. Muck, who has returned to the leadership of the orchestra after an absence of several years, was warmly greeted.

It is not to be supposed, however, that the high plane of the orchestra had lowered during his absence. Mr. Fiedler is a consummate musician, and a leader of great precision and finish. He may have wanted a certain magic of personality with which Dr. Muck is endowed, but he undoubtedly made up in careful drill and truthful readings of his programmes.

Dr. Muck is powerful in imaginative and subtly poetic interpretation. His renewed regime is looked forward to with much interest.

The personnel of the orchestra, as must have been apparent to old-timers, has undergone some changes. A dozen or more of the old musicians are replaced by new. Mr. Schroeder, the 'cellist, is one of those who will be most regreted.

The season opened with a diversified programme. The Berlioz Carnival Romain is interesting, as material beautifully worked over from the themes of his opera, "Cellini." The symphonic poem of Liszt, one of a set of tremendously difficult piano etudes, arranged for orchestra, was played with vivacity. After the wild, unusual mazeppa music the beautiful Meistersinger music was grateful to the ear.

Beethoven's eighth symphony presents perilous opportunity for display of "temperament," but Dr. Muck is too sound an artist to indulge in excentricities.

The first movements was played with a skill of treatment which proves a healthy sense in both orchestra and leader of its humor. The Scherzando is dominated by the persistent tick, tick, tick rhythm characteristic of a metronome. Those concert-goers who like to have their music descriptive of something or other may, if they like, speak of this beautiful Scherzando as the Maelzel canon. The most striking movement of this symphony is the finale, dominated by a gay theme in triple rhythm. The menuetto is exquisitely lovely.

Address Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 6 - 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Dr. Karl Muck, Conductor, Cordially Welcomed by Capacity Audience.

An audience which filled every seat in the National Theater and utilized much of the standing room on the main floor, welcomed the return of Dr. Karl Muck as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the occasion of the organization's first concert of the season yesterday afternoon.

Even more quiet and reserved in his methods than when last seen at the head of this splendidly homogeneous body of musicians, Dr. Muck increased the esteem in which he is held by Washington music lovers for his scholastic attainments, his depth of feeling, and his rich imagination. Under Dr. Muck's direction the Boston Symphony should speedily regain the ascendant over rival organizations, which during the last three years have risen, under the leadership of the Pohligs, the Mahlers, the Stranskys, and the Oberhoffers, to positions threatening the supremacy of the brilliant group from the Hub.

The program yesterday afternoon embraced Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Berlioz's overture, "Le Carnaval Romain"; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg." The allegretto movement of the symphony was the artistic climax of the concert, but it was only second in popular approval to the prelude, which was the closing number.

In view of the lateness of the hour at which the Washington concerts begin, yesterday's program was of ideal length, the audience being dismissed a few moments after 6. It is to be hoped that Dr. Muck can arrange his future programs as satisfactorily, even when he has a soloist.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 3 1912

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first of a series of five concerts for this season, at the National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock, under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

It is now thirty-one years since the Boston Symphony Orchestra was founded, by Henry Higginson. The first twenty years was a hard struggle for existence and Mr. Higginson has many times gone down into his pocket to wipe out a deficit in the treasury. In a prospectus, issued by this organization in 1909, it is declared that the orchestra "provides music of the highest class in the most perfect manner possible," and that it is "without a peer in this country and without a superior in the world." This proud position has been attained by this organization in the space of much less than thirty years, for it has been for many years on its present high plane. The orchestra gives twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in Boston every season, and in addition some sixty or seventy concerts in other Eastern cities.

The chief number of the programme to be given by the orchestra next Tuesday afternoon, Beethoven's eighth symphony, was, apart from the great choral symphony, his pet work, although it was not for many years well received. The first and fourth movements are full of the spirit of frolic, and of a wild mood that increase in intensity, until, in the finals it becomes a boisterious mixture of tragedy, comedy, and farce. The second and third movements are serene and beautiful, the allegretto exceptionally lovely.

Following is the complete programme: Beethoven, Symphony No. 8, F major, Op. 93—I, Allegro vivace e con brio; II, Allegretto scherzando; III, Tempo di menuetto; IV, Allegro vivace; Berlioz, Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Op. 9; Liszt, "Mazeppa," Symphonic Poem No. 6 (after Victor Hugo); Wagner, Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg.

Address Washington, D. C.
Date

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the National Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock.

Old-time friends of the orchestra will note a number of changes in the personnel, for this year it has sixteen new members, and, of course, the center of attraction will be Dr. Karl Muck, who makes his first appearance here after an absence of four years.

Judging from the reception the work of the orchestra has received in Boston, it has gained new life and brilliancy under the skilled leadership of Dr. Muck, and during the term of his service, which will be at least for five years, it may be fair to assume that the Boston orchestra will reach greater artistic heights than ever before.

At this first concert in Washington Dr. Muck will play a most interesting program. It comprises in order the Symphony No. 8 of Beethoven, the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz, the "Mazeppa" symphony poem of Liszt, and the prelude to "The Meistersingers of Nuremberg."

From EVG. STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 6 - 1912

AMUSEMENTS.

Boston Symphony Concert.

A large audience attended the first concert of the season given yesterday afternoon at the National Theater by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program, which was unusually brief, included Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Berlitz's overture, "Le Carnival Romain"; "Mazeppa," Liszt's symphonic poem, and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nuremberg," and made up in merit what it lacked in length. An enthusiastic audience greeted the return of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor.

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 3 - 1912

* * *

Three musical entertainments, each equally important in its particular "line," are scheduled to take place in Baltimore this week—a symphony concert, a chamber-music recital and the opera. The first of these will be the first of the current season's Boston Symphony concerts, made particularly notable by the return of Dr. Karl Muck at the conductor's desk. There are a number of changes in the personnel of the orchestra this season, 16 new players being included in the great band, and it is intimated that the organization has taken on a new brilliancy under Dr. Muck's enthusiastic leadership.

The program selected for the first concert, which takes place at the Lyric on Wednesday evening, includes no soloist, but will be devoted to three striking compositions representing the modern and romantic schools. The major portion of the evening will be given over to the playing of the Bischoff symphony in E major, No. 16, a work which the new conductor is said to regard as one of the most important compositions that the musical world of modern Germany has produced. It is not unknown in this country, Dr. Muck having played it before during the season of 1907 and 1908.

* * *

While the symphony is not "program music" in the strict sense of the word, there being no explanatory argument included in the score, yet the composer says that while he was writing it he had in mind a young man who, after living a life of the wildest debauchery, finally meets with pure happiness when he is no longer worthy of it and cannot, therefore, possess it. From which it will be seen that the great work is rather tragic in its intent. That it will prove an entirely modern work may be gathered from the fact that Bischoff has been closely associated with Richard Strauss for a number of years in the reading of scores and the discussion of modern musical ideas. It may be said, however, that Bischoff never studied with Strauss. He is now 43 years old, but while he was a student at the Leipzig Conservatory he first heard a Strauss composition. This was in 1887 and it made a very deep impression on him and probably influenced him greatly. At the moment Bischoff is living in Munich.

From EVG. NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date - 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TONIGHT

Big Crowd Expected At The Lyric To Greet Dr. Karl Muck.

Dr. Karl Mack, successor to Max Fiedler as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be greeted by an audience that, from present indications, will fill every seat, boxes included, of the Lyric, when he returns to Baltimore tonight to conduct the initial local performance of the Orchestra this season.

Dr. Muck is by no means a stranger in Baltimore, having frequently visited the city when he was with the Orchestra from 1906 to 1908, during which time he became a general favorite. It is considered that a large portion of the interest in tonight's concert is due to the fact that it will mark Dr. Muck's first appearance here since he was appointed to succeed Mr. Fiedler, although the Boston Symphony has an enormous following in Baltimore, where it is regarded, as it is in other places, as one of the world's greatest orchestras.

The symphony of the evening will be a decided novelty, being Bischoff's in E major, Op. 16, a work that is held in high esteem, but which has never been presented in this city. It was brought to America several years ago by Dr. Muck and given under his direction in Boston, New York and Philadelphia, making a good impression each time. Other numbers tonight will be the "Siegfried Idyl" of Wagner, and the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber. As it is the introductory concert of the year, there will be no soloist.

EVG. NEWS
Baltimore, Md.
NOV 2 - 1912

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN HAPPY PROGRAM

Dr. Muck Selects Some New Features And Some Old Favorites.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of the present season will be given in the Lyric next Wednesday evening at 8.15. The Orchestra will bring its entire strength of 100, and in its personnel patrons of the Orchestra will notice several new faces, as some rather radical changes have been made in the membership since last fall.

Interest will be centered in Dr. Muck, who reappears after an absence of four years. From all accounts that have preceded him from Boston, Dr. Muck is even a greater conductor than he was when he was here before, and under his skillful leadership the Boston Symphony Orchestra is playing as it has never played in the past.

For his first program in Baltimore he has chosen a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff, which will be a novelty here; the "Siegfried Idyl" of Richard Wagner and the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber. The Bischoff symphony was brought to this country as a novelty by Dr. Muck five years ago, and was played by him twice in Boston, once in Philadelphia and once in New York, and the following year Mr. Stock did it with the Theodore Thomas Orchestra in Chicago. At all of these performances the work had a sensational success.

The lovely "Siegfried Idyl" of Wagner and the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber are so familiar to the musical public of Baltimore that they need no comment.

From EVG. SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date 7 - 1912

AN OLD FRIEND WITH A NEW HEAD

What really rises to the dignity of an "event" in the musical world is the return of Dr. Karl Muck to the conductor's desk of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as described in this morning's SUN. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has, of course, long been "the fashion," like grand opera, and its appearance is a signal to society as well as to people who love music and understand music. It is in a sense a distinction to be seen at a Boston Symphony Orchestra performance, just as it is to be seen in the company of a great man. It suggests certain desirable qualities or aspirations in the auditor, and embraces him in the general glory and inspiration.

Nevertheless, the Boston Orchestra, specially with a man of marked power and individuality at its head, is something more and better than the fashion. Baltimore has been in training for years in a musical way as well as in many others, and the Peabody Institute School has been a centre of musical education, as the Hopkins has for general educational uplift. Its musical training and influence have been felt in every quarter of the city, and every opera or symphony audience numbers not a few competent critics, as well as hundreds who can follow intelligently the new as well as old things that may be offered.

Dr. Muck brings a new element of interest to an old and famous organization, as a new and great actor does to familiar roles or to fresh dramatic creations. His work last night was so brilliant, so masterful and so full of inspiration that we shall await with great eagerness his next appearance. Reputation counts for much in all cases, but in this reality fully equals musical rumor.

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date V 6-19

The first concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon was attended by a large gathering of society folk. With the German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff, who have taken a box for the season, were Mrs. Beekman Winthrop, Mrs. Norman Williams, Captain Boy-Ed, the naval attache of the embassy; and Mr. Masirevich, of the Austro-Hungarian embassy.

The French Ambassador and Mme. Jusserand, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor and Mrs. Nagel, were among the guests in Miss May Williams' box.

With Dr. and Mrs. Buckner Randolph were Mr. and Mrs. Harold Randolph, of Baltimore, and Mrs. Walter Tuckerman.

In Mrs. I. T. Mann's box were Mr. and Mrs. Charles Campbell, Mrs. Brinton Stone, Mme. de Quesada, and the Misses Hickey.

Mrs. Calderon Carlisle's guests were Mrs. J. P. Sanger, Mrs. Bruce Howe, and Mrs. Mandeville Carlisle.

The Rev. F. Ward Denys and Mrs. Denys occupied the Presidential box, having with them Mrs. Henry E. Pellew, Mrs. Ralph Cross Johnson, Miss Dorothea Denys, and Miss Gwendolyn Denys.

With Mr. and Mrs. A. Lisner in their box were Mrs. Daniel Thew Wright, Mrs. D. Percy Hickling, and Mrs. Earl Ambrose.

Others in the audience were the British Ambassador and Mrs. Bryce, the Minister of the Netherlands and Mme. Loudon, the Attorney General and Mrs. Wickersham, the Minister of Sweden and Mme. Ekengren, Miss Mabel Boardman, Mrs. Ely, Mrs. Gordon Cumming, Mr. and Mrs. Christian Hemmick, Mrs. George Howard, Dr. and Mrs. Randolph McKim, Mr. and Mrs. Arnold Hague, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, the Bishop of Washington, the Right Rev. Dr. Harding; Mrs. Howland Chase, Mrs. Alexander Britton, Miss Margaret Britton, Mrs. Richard Weightman, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, Miss Audenreid, Mrs. William H. Wilmer, Mrs. Hennen Jennings, Miss Jennings, Mrs. Krogstad, Miss Dorothy Williams, Mrs. Robert Hinckley, Miss Gladys Hinckley, the Misses Sedgely, Miss Millan, Mrs. William F. Dennis, Miss Mary McCauley, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Miss Letterman, Miss Squire, Mrs. Theodore Noyes, Mrs. Corbin, Mrs. Alexander F. Magruder, Mrs. James Lowndes, W. Bowie Clark, and John B. Henderson, jr.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

BOSTON ORCHESTRA GIVES CONCERT

Under Renewed Leadership of Dr. Muck, Boston Organization Is Warmly Welcomed.

The first Boston Symphony concert of the season was given yesterday afternoon at the National Theater under the management of Mrs. Katie Wilson-Greene.

Dr. Muck, who has returned to the leadership of the orchestra after an absence of several years, was warmly greeted.

It is not to be supposed, however, that the high plane of the orchestra had lowered during his absence. Mr. Fiedler is a consummate musician, and a leader of great precision and finish. He may have wanted a certain magic of personality with which Dr. Muck is endowed, but he undoubtedly made up in careful drill and truthful readings of his programmes.

Dr. Muck is powerful in imaginative and subtly poetic interpretation. His renewed regime is looked forward to with much interest.

The personnel of the orchestra, as must have been apparent to old-timers, has undergone some changes. A dozen or more of the old musicians are replaced by new. Mr. Schroeder, the 'cellist, is one of those who will be most regreted.

The season opened with a diversified programme. The Berlioz Carnival Romain is interesting, as material beautifully worked over from the themes of his opera, "Cellini." The symphonic poem of Liszt, one of a set of tremendously difficult piano etudes, arranged for orchestra, was played with vivacity. After the wild, unusual mazeppa music the beautiful Meistersinger music was grateful to the ear.

Beethoven's eighth symphony presents perilous opportunity for display of "temperament," but Dr. Muck is too sound an artist to indulge in excentricities.

The first movements was played with a skill of treatment which proves a healthy sense in both orchestra and leader of its humor. The Scherzando is dominated by the persistent tick, tick, tick rhythm characteristic of a metronome. Those concert-goers who like to have their music descriptive of something or other may, if they like, speak of this beautiful Scherzando as the Maelzel canon. The most striking movement of this symphony is the finale, dominated by a gay theme in triple rhythm. The menuetto is exquisitely lovely.

Address Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 6 - 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Dr. Karl Muck, Conductor, Cordially Welcomed by Capacity Audience.

An audience which filled every seat in the National Theater and utilized much of the standing room on the main floor, welcomed the return of Dr. Karl Muck as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the occasion of the organization's first concert of the season yesterday afternoon.

Even more quiet and reserved in his methods than when last seen at the head of this splendidly homogeneous body of musicians, Dr. Muck increased the esteem in which he is held by Washington music lovers for his scholastic attainments, his depth of feeling, and his rich imagination. Under Dr. Muck's direction the Boston Symphony should speedily regain the ascendant over rival organizations, which during the last three years have risen, under the leadership of the Pohligs, the Mahlers, the Stranskys, and the Oberhoffers, to positions threatening the supremacy of the brilliant group from the Hub.

The program yesterday afternoon embraced Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Berlioz's overture, "Le Carnaval Romain"; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg." The allegretto movement of the symphony was the artistic climax of the concert, but it was only second in popular approval to the prelude, which was the closing number.

In view of the lateness of the hour at which the Washington concerts begin, yesterday's program was of ideal length, the audience being dismissed a few moments after 6. It is to be hoped that Dr. Muck can arrange his future programs as satisfactorily, even when he has a soloist.

Cutting Bureau in the World

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 3 1912

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first of a series of five concerts for this season, at the National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock, under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

It is now thirty-one years since the Boston Symphony Orchestra was founded, by Henry Higginson. The first twenty years was a hard struggle for existence and Mr. Higginson has many times gone down into his pocket to wipe out a deficit in the treasury. In a prospectus, issued by this organization in 1909, it is declared that the orchestra "provides music of the highest class in the most perfect manner possible," and that it is "without a peer in this country and without a superior in the world." This proud position has been attained by this organization in the space of much less than thirty years, for it has been for many years on its present high plane. The orchestra gives twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in Boston every season, and in addition some sixty or seventy concerts in other Eastern cities.

The chief number of the programme to be given by the orchestra next Tuesday afternoon, Beethoven's eighth symphony, was, apart from the great choral symphony, his pet work, although it was not for many years well received. The first and fourth movements are full of the spirit of frolic, and of a wild mood that increase in intensity, until, in the finals it becomes a boisterious mixture of tragedy, comedy, and farce. The second and third movements are serene and beautiful, the allegretto exceptionally lovely.

Following is the complete programme: Beethoven, Symphony No. 8, F major, Op. 93—I, Allegro vivace e con brio; II, Allegretto scherzando; III, Tempo di menuetto; IV, Allegro vivace; Berlioz, Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Op. 9; Liszt, "Mazeppa," Symphonic Poem No. 6 (after Victor Hugo); Wagner, Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg.

Address Washington, D. C.
Date

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the National Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock.

Old-time friends of the orchestra will note a number of changes in the personnel, for this year it has sixteen new members, and, of course, the center of attraction will be Dr. Karl Muck, who makes his first appearance here after an absence of four years.

Judging from the reception the work of the orchestra has received in Boston, it has gained new life and brilliancy under the skilled leadership of Dr. Muck, and during the term of his service, which will be at least for five years, it may be fair to assume that the Boston orchestra will reach greater artistic heights than ever before.

At this first concert in Washington Dr. Muck will play a most interesting program. It comprises in order the Symphony No. 8 of Beethoven, the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz, the "Mazeppa" symphony poem of Liszt, and the prelude to "The Meistersingers of Nuremberg."

From EVG. STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 6 - 1912

AMUSEMENTS.

Boston Symphony Concert.

A large audience attended the first cert of the season, given yesterda ernoon at the National Theater b
Boston Symphony Orchestra. The gram, which was unusually brie cluded Beethoven's Eighth Symp
Berlitz's overture, "Le Carnival Rom
"Mazeppa," Liszt's symphonic poem the prelude to "Die Meistersinger Nuremberg," and made up in merit it lacked in length. An enthusiastic ence greeted the return of Dr. Karl M the conductor.

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 3 - 1912

❖ ❖ ❖

Three musical entertainments, each equally important in its particular "line," are scheduled to take place in Baltimore this week—a symphony concert, a chamber-music recital and the opera. The first of these will be the first of the current season's Boston Symphony concerts, made particularly notable by the return of Dr. Karl Muck at the conductor's desk. There are a number of changes in the personnel of the orchestra this season, 16 new players being included in the great band, and it is intimated that the organization has taken on a new brilliancy under Dr. Muck's enthusiastic leadership.

The program selected for the first concert, which takes place at the Lyric on Wednesday evening, includes no soloist, but will be devoted to three striking compositions representing the modern and romantic schools. The major portion of the evening will be given over to the playing of the Bischoff symphony in E major, No. 16, a work which the new conductor is said to regard as one of the most important compositions that the musical world of modern Germany has produced. It is not unknown in this country, Dr. Muck having played it before during the season of 1907 and 1908.

❖ ❖ ❖

While the symphony is not "program music" in the strict sense of the word, there being no explanatory argument included in the score, yet the composer says that while he was writing it he had in mind a young man who, after living a life of the wildest debauchery, finally meets with pure happiness when he is no longer worthy of it and cannot, therefore, possess it. From which it will be seen that the great work is rather tragic in its intent. That it will prove an entirely modern work may be gathered from the fact that Bischoff has been closely associated with Richard Strauss for a number of years in the reading of scores and the discussion of modern musical ideas. It may be said, however, that Bischoff never studied with Strauss. He is now 43 years old, but while he was a student at the Leipzig Conservatory he first heard a Strauss composition. This was in 1887 and it made a very deep impression on him and probably influenced him greatly. At the moment Bischoff is living in Munich.

From EVG. NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date
Established:

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TONIGHT

Big Crowd Expected At The Lyric To Greet Dr. Karl Muck.

Dr. Karl Mack, successor to Max Fiedler as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be greeted by an audience that, from present indications, will fill every seat, boxes included, of the Lyric, when he returns to Baltimore tonight to conduct the initial local performance of the Orchestra this season.

Dr. Muck is by no means a stranger in Baltimore, having frequently visited the city when he was with the Orchestra from 1906 to 1908, during which time he became a general favorite. It is considered that a large portion of the interest in tonight's concert is due to the fact that it will mark Dr. Muck's first appearance here since he was appointed to succeed Mr. Fiedler, although the Boston Symphony has an enormous following in Baltimore, where it is regarded, as it is in other places, as one of the world's greatest orchestras.

The symphony of the evening will be a decided novelty, being Bischoff's in E major, Op. 16, a work that is held in high esteem, but which has never been presented in this city. It was brought to America several years ago by Dr. Muck and given under his direction in Boston, New York and Philadelphia, making a good impression each time. Other numbers tonight will be the "Siegfried Idyl" of Wagner, and the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber. As it is the introductory concert of the year, there will be no soloist.

From EVG. NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 2 - 1912

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN HAPPY PROGRAM

Dr. Muck Selects Some New Features And Some Old Favorites.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of the present season will be given in the Lyric next Wednesday evening at 8.15. The Orchestra will bring its entire strength of 100, and in its personnel patrons of the Orchestra will notice several new faces, as some rather radical changes have been made in the membership since last fall.

Interest will be centered in Dr. Muck, who reappears after an absence of four years. From all accounts that have preceded him from Boston, Dr. Muck is even a greater conductor than he was when he was here before, and under his skillful leadership the Boston Symphony Orchestra is playing as it has never played in the past.

For his first program in Baltimore he has chosen a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff, which will be a novelty here; the "Siegfried Idyl" of Richard Wagner and the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber. The Bischoff symphony was brought to this country as a novelty by Dr. Muck five years ago, and was played by him twice in Boston, once in Philadelphia and once in New York, and the following year Mr. Stock did it with the Theodore Thomas Orchestra in Chicago. At all of these performances the work had a sensational success.

The lovely "Siegfried Idyl" of Wagner and the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber are so familiar to the musical public of Baltimore that they need no comment.

From EVG. SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

AN OLD FRIEND WITH A NEW HEAD

What really rises to the dignity of an "event" in the musical world is the return of Dr. Karl Muck to the conductor's desk of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as described in this morning's SUN. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has, of course, long been "the fashion," like grand opera, and its appearance is a signal to society as well as to people who love music and understand music. It is in a sense a distinction to be seen at a Boston Symphony Orchestra performance, just as it is to be seen in the company of a great man. It suggests certain desirable qualities or aspirations in the auditor, and embraces him in the general glory and inspiration.

Nevertheless, the Boston Orchestra, specially with a man of marked power and individuality at its head, is something more and better than the fashion. Baltimore has been in training for years in a musical way as well as in many others, and the Peabody Institute School has been a centre of musical education, as the Hopkins has for general educational uplift. Its musical training and influence have been felt in every quarter of the city, and every opera or symphony audience numbers not a few competent critics, as well as hundreds who can follow intelligently the new as well as old things that may be offered.

Dr. Muck brings a new element of interest to an old and famous organization, as a new and great actor does to familiar roles or to fresh dramatic creations. His work last night was so brilliant, so masterful and so full of inspiration that we shall await with great eagerness his next appearance. Reputation counts for much in all cases, but in this reality fully equals musical rumor.

From EVG. SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 7 - 1912
Established

DR. MUCK AND BOSTON ORCHESTRA GREETED

Conductor Given Hearty Welcome At His Reappearance Here.

A very long, tedious and more or less uninteresting composition, Hermann Bischoff's Symphony in E major, Opus 16, marked last night's performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the first appearance of that organization in Baltimore this season and the first appearance here as its conductor of Dr. Karl Muck in four years.

Dr. Muck was given an enthusiastic ovation as he stepped upon the stage and throughout the performance at each pause in the program the audience seemed to be as intent on emphasizing the welcome to the conductor as in manifesting its appreciation of his fine work at the head of one of the most perfect musical organizations in the world.

A Distinctly Modern Program.

In addition to the symphony the orchestra played the "Siegfried Idyl" of Richard Wagner, and Von Weber's overture to the opera "Euryanthe," comprising a distinctly modern program.

Above all else Bischoff's symphony is a novelty. It has no "form" and is of interest chiefly because of its educational value. Its themes are by no means deeply impressive, although the composer has done some skillful improvisation. The work is supposed to represent the mental struggles of a youth steeped in debauchery, who finally encounters true love, but finds that he has met it too late for enjoyment. This the author has attempted to depict in four movements, but one finds oneself often throughout the work straying off into other paths of thought in spite of oneself.

Wagner Wrote It As A Tribute To Cosima.

The Wagner Idyl—"staircase music," as the children in the Wagner household were wont to term it—loses none of its delightfulness. The Beyreuth meister wrote it as a tribute to Cosima, his wife, and there is a pretty little story told of the composition. It first was played as a surprise to Frau Wagner, then still the estranged wife of Hans von Bulow, on a Christmas morning on a staircase. The composer, standing at the top, directed the work, while players sat and stood on the stairs, the orchestra extending all the way down. Dr. Muck gave the work an interesting poetic reading.

The Weber overture, highly characteristic of the school to which the composer belonged, and with which a large majority of the audience doubtless was familiar, served as a delightful ending to the concert. J. B. M.

From EVG. SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 6 - 1912
Establ 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY AND MUCK TONIGHT

Noted Conductor To Reappear Here After Absence Of Years.

After an absence of about five years, Dr. Karl Muck will return to Baltimore tonight as the director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its first concert of the season in this city.

Since he was last here Dr. Muck has been director of the Royal Opera in Berlin, the post which he filled previous to his accession for the first time to the conductors' desk of the Boston Symphony. He is one of the most popular of all the noted conductors who ever have visited Baltimore, and his welcome tonight therefore will be a sincerely enthusiastic one.

Tonight's program will consist of Hermann Bischoff's symphony in E major, opus 16, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" and the "Euryanthe" overture of Carl Maria von Weber. There will

---

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 7 - 1912
Established:

MUCK AND BOSTON SYMPHONY PLEASE

Large Audience Hears Concert at Lyric—Lack of Variety in Program.

Bringing with him a wonderful new symphony, Dr. Karl Muck, one of the world's greatest orchestra conductors returned to Baltimore last night afte an absence of several years. It was th occasion of the first Boston Symphon Orchestra concert of the series of fi to be given in Baltimore this season, and the Lyric was crowded.

With the exception of some enthusiastic musicians, the best thing about Dr. Muck's reception was the number of those in the audience. The entire concert was given a dignified, respectful hearing, which spoke well for the good breeding of the auditors and poorly for its appreciative capacity after a half-century of continuous opportunities for musical culture.

Of greatest moment to the musicians was the reappearance of Dr. Muck as head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Having made all feel his power, he was obliged to return to Europe. He has come again, however, and America rejoices.

Dr. Muck knows his business. If ever there were any who doubted, last night should have dispelled the shadows. A conductor by virtue of the fact that he is a fine musician with the qualities of leadership has so fitted him. He obtains results from his men by the slightest motion of a hand, materializing that subtle force for which magicians are fabled. His control of every department and every member of the orchestra is absolute—of course, it follows that they are so highly skilled as to be able to respond to his every wish. There seems to be nothing they cannot and will not do for him. This was obvious in the tremendous symphonic composition of the evening. Conductor and orchestra took the most minute care with its thousands of details. Apart, Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are unique; together, they are incomparable. There may be a better symphony organization this side of death's divide; but, with characteristic Baltimoreanish skepticism, it remains to be proven.

Dr. Muck missed considerable enthusiasm in Baltimore this time, partly by his program. Even musicians with the capacity of gourmands would have relished the evening more had there been variety to the fare, and the majority of the audience could have been moved far with some brighter works.

Dr. Muck, if it was he who was directly responsible for the choosing of the program, probably lost his perspective for the moment through close application to and enthusiasm for Bischoff's symphony. The latter are warranted, but nothing emphasizes more the need of contrasts in the numbers of general public program than the presence on it of a new work, all the more so if it be a big one, and well-known works cannot take the place entirely of works strikingly contrasted.

Something brisk, crystalline, simple should have followed this symphony, setting it off. The Wagner work was of the same general style as the symphony which preceded it, in the same key, and much too long by comparison, and the Weber overture was outclassed. Momentary loss of program perspective by musicians through individual enthusiasm will appear sometimes, however.

Hermann Bischoff's Symphony in E major, Opus 16, is marvelous music in many respects, but its appeal for the many is injured by the morbid musings the composer has associated with it. Psychological analysis may be good for the soul, but intimate association of it with music is not always beneficial to the art. Since Herr Bischoff insists upon having a program, it must be said the one at present provided is most depressing. Who cares to associate the evils of a misspent life with music? Away with such suggestions! Music is suffering now from morbidness; what the art needs is cheerfulness, vitality, something to make one feel, if need be, that life is entirely worth living; something to give the traveler on life's road renewed hope and courage and make buoyant his flagging steps. There cannot be too much brightness in anything, but it requires persistent endeavor. In the meantime, no one can be blamed for liking "ragtime" music so long as it gives a greater proportionate measure of cheer than austere and forbidding so-called true music.

Sometimes Bischoff's Symphony seems fragmentary; at other times it resembles mosaics, and fantastic sand figures born of strange vibrations. In many respects it is the most remarkable work which Baltimore has had the opportunity of hearing for years. Say what you will, shall any fault be found with it because it is subjective rather than objective music? Some fossil classicists may dispute its right to exist, but after all their contention is only a dispute.

A gigantic castle, pile upon pile of structure, it is. Even the disciple of form beholds it on the heights with awe. What will time do with it? J. N. H.

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 6 - 1912
Es 1884

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, will be given in the Lyric Theater this evening. The concert will begin promptly at 8:15 o'clock. The program comprises the Symphony in E major, Op. 16, by Hermann Bischoff; the Siegfried Idyl of Richard Wagner, and the Euryanthe Overture, by Carl Maria von Weber. There will be no soloist.

Bureau in the World

7 - 1912

Musician Here Last Night

DR. K RL MUCK
Director of the Bosn Symphony Orchestra.

From HERALD
Address: New York
Date 10 1912
Establ 4

DR. MUCK'S MEN WELL APPLAUDED

If ever an orchestra was put through its paces of virtuosity it was the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gave its first matinee performance of the season in Carnegie Hall yesterday, conducted by Dr. Karl Muck. First on the programme came a symphony, Op. 16, by Mr. Herman Bischoff, which lasted an hour and a quarter. It contains enough technical difficulties to drive the average orchestra to suicide, but the men from Boston never flinched, as Dr. Muck's slender baton lashed them to do deeds of virtuosity that left the audience almost breathless.

One felt that the applause which followed the number was lavished upon the performers and not upon the work. The symphony, which was heard here several years ago, contains some original ideas and effects which recall the work of Richard Strauss, but it is too long for a matinee programme. The scherzo is admirable in its workmanship and the best movement of the four.

The two remaining numbers, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, aroused great enthusiasm. The "Idyl" was wonderfully played, flawless in detail and poetic in effect, and the overture was made to hum in its jubilation.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From MAN HEROLD
Address: New York City.
Date N 1912

— Die „Bohemians", jene excluſive Vereinigung im Reiche der Kunſt, wird heute Abend Dr. Karl Muck, dem Dirigenten des Boſton Symphonie=Orcheſters, einen Ehren=Empfang geben.

Für das Wagner=Feſt, welches

Established: London, 1881; New York, 1884

From EVG. SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 7 - 1912

Established

DR. MUCK AND BOSTON ORCHESTRA GREETED

Conductor Given Hearty Welcome At His Reappearance Here.

A very long, tedious and more or less uninteresting composition, Hermann Bischoff's Symphony in E major, Opus 16, marked last night's performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the first appearance of that organization in Baltimore this season and the first appearance here as its conductor of Dr. Karl Muck in four years.

Dr. Muck was given an enthusiastic ovation as he stepped upon the stage and throughout the performance at each pause in the program the audience seemed to be as intent on emphasizing the welcome to the conductor as in manifesting its appreciation of his fine work at the head of one of the most perfect musical organizations in the world.

A Distinctly Modern Program.

In addition to the symphony the orchestra played the "Siegfried Idyl" of Richard Wagner, and Von Weber's overture to the opera "Euryanthe," comprising a distinctly modern program.

Above all else Bischoff's symphony is a novelty. It has no "form" and is of interest chiefly because of its educational value. Its themes are by no means deeply impressive, although the composer has done some skillful improvisation. The work is supposed to represent the mental struggles of a youth steeped in debauchery, who finally encounters true love, but finds that he has met it too late for enjoyment. This the author has attempted to depict in four movements, but one finds oneself often throughout the work straying off into other paths of thought in spite of oneself.

Wagner Wrote It As A Tribute To Cosima.

The Wagner Idyl—"staircase music," as the children in the Wagner household were wont to term it—loses none of its delightfulness. The Beyreuth meister wrote it as a tribute to Cosima, his wife, and there is a pretty little story told of the composition. It first was played as a surprise to Frau Wagner, then still the estranged wife of Hans von Bulow, on a Christmas morning on a staircase. The composer, standing at the top, directed the work, while players sat and stood on the stairs, the orchestra extending all the way down. Dr. Muck gave the work an interesting poetic reading.

The Weber overture, highly characteristic of the school to which the composer belonged, and with which a large majority of the audience doubtless was familiar, served as a delightful ending to the concert. J. B. M.

1884

From EVG. SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 6 - 1912

Establ 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY AND MUCK TONIGHT

Noted Conductor To Reappear Here After Absence Of Years.

After an absence of about five years, Dr. Karl Muck will return to Baltimore tonight as the director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its first concert of the season in this city.

Since he was last here Dr. Muck has been director of the Royal Opera in Berlin, the post which he filled previous to his accession for the first time to the conductors' desk of the Boston Symphony. He is one of the most popular of all the noted conductors who ever have visited Baltimore, and his welcome tonight therefore will be a sincerely enthusiastic one.

Tonight's program will consist of Hermann Bischoff's symphony in E major, opus 16, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" and the "Euryanthe" overture of Carl Maria von Weber. There will

---

From EVG. STA
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV

Established:

MUCK AND B SYMPHONY

Large Audience cert at Lyric—Lack of Variety in Program.

Bringing with him a wonderful new symphony, Dr. Karl Muck, one of the world's greatest orchestra conductors returned to Baltimore last night afte an absence of several years. It was th occasion of the first Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the series of fi to be given in Baltimore this season, and the Lyric was crowded.

With the exception of some enthusiastic musicians, the best thing about Dr. Muck's reception was the number of those in the audience. The entire concert was given a dignified, respectful hearing, which spoke well for the good breeding of the auditors and poorly for its appreciative capacity after a half-century of continuous opportunities for musical culture.

Of greatest moment to the musicians was the reappearance of Dr. Muck as head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Having made all feel his power, he was obliged to return to Europe. He has come again, however, and America rejoices.

Dr. Muck knows his business. If ever there were any who doubted, last night should have dispelled the shadows. A conductor by virtue of the fact that he is a fine musician with the qualities of leadership has so fitted him. He obtains results from his men by the slightest motion of a hand, materializing that subtle force for which magicians are fabled. His control of every department and every member of the orchestra is absolute—of course, it follows that they are so highly skilled as to be able to respond to his every wish. There seems to be nothing they cannot and will not do for him. This was obvious in the tremendous symphonic composition of the evening. Conductor and orchestra took the most minute care with its thousands of details. Apart, Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are unique; together, they are incomparable. There may be a better symphony organization this side of death's divide; but, with characteristic Baltimoreanish skepticism, it remains to be proven.

Dr. Muck missed considerable enthusiasm in Baltimore this time, partly by his program. Even musicians with the capacity of gourmands would have relished the evening more had there been variety to the fare, and the majority of the audience could have been moved far with some brighter works.

Dr. Muck, if it was he who was directly responsible for the choosing of the program, probably lost his perspective for the moment through close application to and enthusiasm for Bischoff's symphony. The latter are warranted, but nothing emphasizes more the need of contrasts in the numbers of general public program than the presence on it of a new work, all the more so if it be a big one, and well-known works cannot take the place entirely of works strikingly contrasted.

Something brisk, crystalline, simple should have followed this symphony, setting it off. The Wagner work was of the same general style as the symphony which preceded it, in the same key, and much too long by comparison, and the Weber overture was outclassed. Momentary loss of program perspective by musicians through individual enthusiasm will appear sometimes, however.

Hermann Bischoff's Symphony in E major, Opus 16, is marvelous music in many respects, but its appeal for the many is injured by the morbid musings the composer has associated with it. Psychological analysis may be good for the soul, but intimate association of it with music is not always beneficial to the art. Since Herr Bischoff insists upon having a program, it must be said the one at present provided is most depressing. Who cares to associate the evils of a misspent life with music? Away with such suggestions! Music is suffering now from morbidness; what the art needs is cheerfulness, vitality, something to make one feel, if need be, that life is entirely worth living; something to give the traveler on life's road renewed hope and courage and make buoyant his flagging steps. There cannot be too much brightness in anything, but it requires persistent endeavor. In the meantime, no one can be blamed for liking "ragtime" music so long as it gives a greater proportionate measure of cheer than austere and forbidding so-called true music.

Sometimes Bischoff's Symphony seems fragmentary; at other times it resembles mosaics, and fantastic sand figures born of strange vibrations. In many respects it is the most remarkable work which Baltimore has had the opportunity of hearing for years. Say what you will, shall any fault be found with it because it is subjective rather than objective music? Some fossil classicists may dispute its right to exist, but after all their contention is only a dispute.

A gigantic castle, pile upon pile of structure, it is. Even the disciple of form beholds it on the heights with awe. What will time do with it? J. N. H.

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 6 - 1912

Es 1884

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, will be given in the Lyric Theater this evening. The concert will begin promptly at 8:15 o'clock. The program comprises the Symphony in E major, Op. 16, by Hermann Bischoff; the Siegried Idyl of Richard Wagner, and the Euryanthe Overture, by Carl Maria von Weber. There will be no soloist

---

Bureau in the World

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
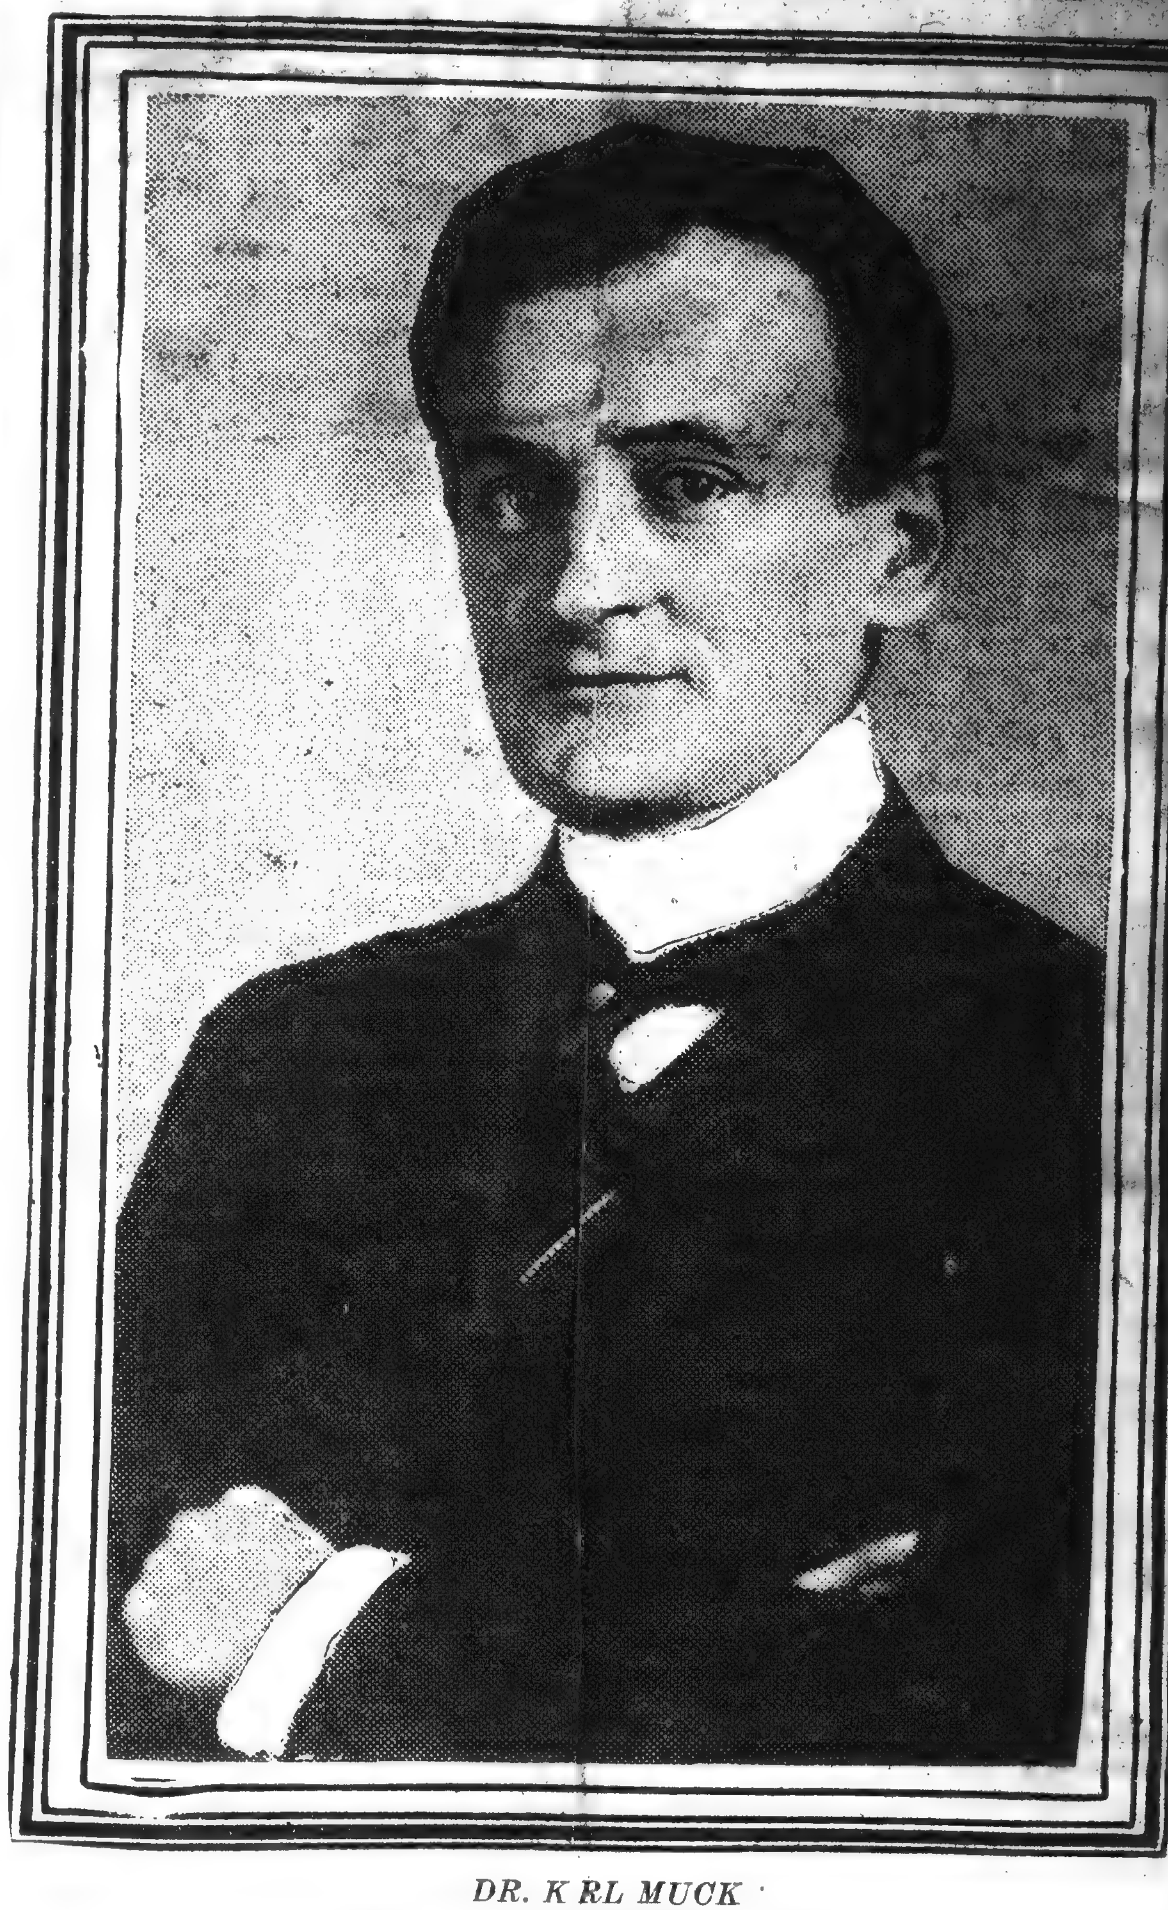
Date NOV 7 - 1912

Established: L

Noted Musician Here Last Night



DR. K RL MUCK
Director of the Boson Symphony Orchestra.

From HERALD
Address: New York
Date 10 1912

Establ 4

DR. MUCK'S MEN WELL APPLAUDED

If ever an orchestra was put through its paces of virtuosity it was the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gave its first matinee performance of the season in Carnegie Hall yesterday, conducted by Dr. Karl Muck. First on the programme came a symphony, Op. 16, by Mr. Herman Bischoff, which lasted an hour and a quarter. It contains enough technical difficulties to drive the average orchestra to suicide, but the men from Boston never flinched, as Dr. Muck's slender baton lashed them to do deeds of virtuosity that left the audience almost breathless.

One felt that the applause which followed the number was lavished upon the performers and not upon the work. The symphony, which was heard here several years ago, contains some original ideas and effects which recall the work of Richard Strauss, but it is too long for a matinee programme. The scherzo is admirable in its workmanship and the best movement of the four.

The two remaining numbers, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, aroused great enthusiasm. The "Idyl" was wonderfully played, flawless in detail and poetic in effect, and the overture was made to hum in its jubilation.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

GERMAN HEROLD

From
Address: New York City.
Date N 1912

— Die „Bohemians“, jene excluſive Vereinigung im Reiche der Kunſt, wird heute Abend Dr. Karl Muck, dem Dirigenten des Boſton Symphonie-Orcheſters, einen Ehren-Empfang geben.

Für das Wagner-Feſt, welches

Established: London, 1881; New York, 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From WORLD
Address: New York
Date NOV 10 1912

Established:

FOUR VARIED CONCERTS PLEASED NEW YORKERS

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Violinist and Singers Entertained Music Lovers.

New York had its full measure of good music yesterday in variety to suit all demands. During the afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first matinee, with a programme different from Thursday night's, and a young American violinist named Louis Persinger played his initial recital.

Betwen 8 and 11 at night a number of distinguished musicians, including Metropolitan Opera House principals, combined in presenting a programme in Aeolian Hall for the benefit of "The Order of Rostradamus." A Boston Opera Company baritone, Bernardo Olshansky, also contributed to the musical offerings of the evening.

The public was concerned, first of all, in the performance of Hermann Bischoff's E major symphony and the violinistic stature of Mr. Persinger. In both instances highly favorable verdicts were rendered.

While the Boston Symphony men played Bischoff's composition here under Dr. Karl Muck's direction four years ago, it has never been heard in this community since. Yesterday in Carnegie Hall it received fine treatment and proved to be a work worthy a place in the repertoires of representative symphony bodies.

All four movements are constructed with consummate technical skill, so much so that it might be designated as a "virtuoso piece." The symphony is genuine programme or descriptive music, and wholly unlike those of severe classic form. But it is vivid in its tonal tints, intense and dramatic. The composer seems to have remembered well his Wagner, his Strauss and his Puccini, but, then, there is little new under the sun—in creative music. The Siegfried "Idyl" and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, which closed the concert, were both as superbly played as was the symphony.

Metropolitan Opera singers—Robert Blass, Albert van Doenhoff and Sigismond Stojowski.

The Oeshansky concert was the fourth in order of importance, this baritone being the one participant entitled to serious consideration

---

From TIMES
Address Brooklyn, N. Y. 1912
Date

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Large Audience Gives Dr. Muck a Cordial Welcome.

Est 1884

Most cordial was the greeting accorded the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at the Academy of Music. The occasion was the initial concert of the present season, and had the added significance of the return of Dr. Karl Muck as conductor. Upon his entrance the audience stood and vigorously applauded him.

The programme was entirely orchestral, well chosen and most satisfying, providing medium for the expression of the superb orchestra's commanding qualifications.

The symphony was Beethoven's No. 8, commonly known as the "Little Symphony" from the composer's description in differentiating it from his famous Seventh.

It was beautifully played throughout, with perfect balance and impeccable rhythm, the transitions from one body of the instruments to another effected with an evenness and accuracy comparable only to the work of a single instrument obeying a single mind. Of the orchestra's transcendant beauty and purity of tone of the abundant vigor of the dynamic effects and the delicacy and charm of pianissimo and diminuendos, it is almost superlative to comment. But the men seemed imbued with the spirit of the occasion, and their work while to the full as musicianly as ever seemed to have a newer mellowness of quality.

The first movement was given with great spirit, the Allegretto, with its blithe sportive spirit, was a performance affording unalloyed delight. Nor were the third and fourth movements less admirably rendered.

Other numbers which served to emphasize the virtuosity of the orchestra were Belioz brilliant "Le Carnaval Romain," and Liszt's Symphonic Poem Mazeppa, with its dramatic and dazzling cumulative effects, were given with amazing technical resourcefulness and spirit.

The concluding number was the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," played with fine breadth and glorious tone. The spontaneity of the applause in recognition of the rendition was as noticeable as was its duration and volume.

Every seat in the house was occupied, as were the boxes.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVG. WORLD
Address: New York
Date NOV 11 1912

Estal 84

Dr. Muck made the feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first afternoon concert of the season at Carnegie Hall on Saturday Herman Bischoff's symphony in E major. He had presented the work here some years ago before he was recalled to Berlin. It was scarcely understood and certainly was not appreciated then. It may be doubted whether it is much more so now. Mr. Bischoff is a disciple of Richard Strauss. The composition is supposed to depict the life and reformation of a debauchee. It has movements of beauty, but many more of bewilderment and it is intolerably long—nearly an hour and a quarter long, in fact. Dr. Muck commands respect for his musical insignt no less than for his ability as a conductor, but he hasn't convinced us yet. Of the superb musicianship of the orchestra and of Dr. Muck's own great ability in directing it there is no question. He, perhaps, better than any of us knows how incomparable is the instrument of which he is again in command.

---

in the World

From
Address NOV 10 1912
Date

E rk, 1884

Dr. Karl Muck.

Concerte der vergangenen Woche.

Dr. Muck in New York.

Die Begrüßung des Dirigenten Dr Karl Muck , der am letzten Donnerſtag in Carnegie Hall zum erſten Male wieder nach einer Reihe von Jahren an der Spitze des Boſton Symphonie Orcheſters erſchien, war eine überaus herzliche Man freute ſich den genialen Kapellmeiſter wieder hier zu haben, man freute ſich, ihn wieder in ſeiner feinſinnigen Art die Werke der großen Meiſter interpretiren zu hören, und man fühlte ſich zu gleicher Zeit geſchmeichelt, daß Dr Muck den Weg nach Amerika zurückgefunden hat, daß er allen Lockungen widerſtanden, und daß er nach Beendigung ſeines Berliner Contractes ohne Zögern den amerikaniſchen Contract unterzeichnete.

Dr. Muck wird bei dieſer lebhaften, demonſtrativen Begrüßung auf's Neue empfunden haben, daß er nicht übel gewählt hat. Man wird ihn hier ohne Zweifel ebenſo ſehr ſchätzen, wie in Europa, und abgeſehen davon, daß man ihn hier auch weit höher honorirt, wird es den Künſtler Muck auch gereizt haben auf's Neue nach Amerika zu kommen, das die Kunſt ſo ernſt zu nehmen beginnt, und jedes große Streben mit freudigſter Hingabe unterſtützt.

Natürlich wird der ſtarke Beifall, der nach jeder Nummer des vornehmen Programms durch das dichtbeſetzte Haus brauſte, auch dem trefflichen Orcheſter gegolten haben, das den Intentionen des Meiſters willig folgte. Beethoven's „Eroica", Berlioz's Ouvertüre „Le Carnival Romain", Liszt's ſymphoniſches Gedicht „Mazeppa" und Wagner's Vorſpiel zu den „Meiſterſingern" bildeten das Programm, und jede einzelne Nummer fand eine vorzügliche Wiedergabe, die Entzücken hervorrief und zum Denken anregte. Herr Dr. Muck, wiederholt hervorgerufen, ließ, was nur recht und billig erſchien, das geſammte Orcheſter ſich erheben, um von dem Danke des Publikums den ihm gebührenden Antheil in Empfang zu nehmen.

* * *

From CITIZENS
Address Brooklyn, N. Y. NOV 9 1912
Date

Est 1884

DR. MUCK WINS HIS OLD PLACE

Welcomed Back to B'klyn as Conductor.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA OPENS ACADEMY CONCERT SEASON

Capacity Audience Shows Marked Pleasure Over Return of Famous Leader and Enjoys an Interesting Programme.

With Dr. Karl Muck again at the conductor's desk—a gladsome sight to the great audience—the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first of its season series of concerts last night at the Academy of Music. Dr. Muck established himself firmly in the affections of Brooklyn music lovers when he wielded the baton for this splendid orchestra some years ago, and now that he has returned from his service abroad, the Boston organization bids fair to enjoy greater favor than ever in this community—one that has always rendered it due need of appreciation and loyalty.

Last night's audience—a capacity one by the way—showed throughout that it was mightily pleased to welcome the orchestra again and still more pleased to see Dr. Muck once more in the place that seems peculiarly his. Of course, they didn't blister their hands showing their joy, but Brooklyn audiences seldom do that anyway. Yet it was evident from the moment Dr. Muck appeared that everybody was satisfied and thoroughly pleased, notwithstanding the lack of riotous expression.

Possibly the programme had something to do with the audience's attitude. It began with Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, in F major, included Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and Berlioy's overture, "Le Carnival Romain," and concluded with the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger." An interesting programme, but hardly one to go into raptures over.

The tone of the orchestra, that solid, pure tone which has so often been praised—is, as in the past, one of the chief charms. All evening it was a delight. Dr. Muck has his musicians in full sympathy with him and his aims—that was evident at once—and his readings are authoritative, scholarly and, also instinct of life.

The symphony was exquisitely played, the gracious bits in the allegretto scherzando and menuetto movements being played with marked charm. As always—so distinctive and original is it—the scherzando stirred one to wonder, to admiration of the idea and its execution. And the beauty of the movement lost nothing at Dr. Muck's hands.

Some very lovely playing was also heard in the Berlioz overture, the wood winds being in excellent form. The finale was splendid.

A more stirring rendition of the "Mazeppa" has seldom been heard in Brooklyn. At times it gripped and shook the audience. And the "Die Meistersinger" prelude was so satisfactorily done —so much of its beauty, so much of its melodic charm brought out, the power, the warm-blooded, pulsing life that infuses all of Wagner's work, the urge and surge that rear his climaxes on such firm foundations, all developed, yet never at the expense of the lyric moments.

Yes, a programme might have been selected better calculated to result in an ovation for conductor and orchestra, but, all in all, what was offered proved mighty satisfactory. And the audience, which greeted Dr. Muck all standing as he appeared behind the flower-covered footlights, went away very sure that it was glad to have its old favorite conductor back again.

The next concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 6.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

From TIMES
Address: New York
Date NOV 10 1912

Est 1884

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AGAIN.

Dr. Muck Repeats H. Bischoff's Long Symphony at His Second Concert.

Dr. Muck was fond of giving his New York listeners severe tests of their patience when he was previously conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. One of those tests was a symphony by Hermann Bischoff. Dr. Muck played it in New York on January 9, 1908; it took seventy minutes for performance. He made it yesterday the principal number of his first afternoon concert. The rest of the programme was Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" and the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe."

The symphony was not worth exhuming after its four years' rest. It is as long as ever it was, and its length is not commensurate with the value of the ideas that are contained in it. Mr. Bischoff declared that his symphony had nothing to do with programme music, but in order not to be out of fashion, he then insisted that it presents programme music throughout, and proceeded to outline its programme—a suggestion of a dissipated young man who sees the ghosts of his misspent early years—dissolute nights, orgiastic masked balls, passionate love murmurings in gardens flooded with moonlight and vocal with the song of birds. Mr. Bischoff is a pupil of Strauss, and the fact appears in certain passages of his music; does it also appear in this proclamation?

He begins as if he were going to differentiate himself from many composers of the present day and starts to writing tunes. There is a strong rhythmic feeling in the first theme, though it is rather commonplace, which is also to be said of subsequent themes in this movement. But he loses himself speedily, now and in the subsequent movements, in a maze of elaboration that is by turns dry, bombastic and turgid. The slow movement, built on themes not without breadth and even nobility; the presto, with its slow trio—though the principal theme has a movement that strongly suggests the galumphing of the conqueror of the Snark—the final allegro, all offer undoubtedly something for the listener; there are pages of music deeply felt, there are passages of beauty. But Mr. Bischoff knows nothing of moderation, and his material is wrought over with fatuous prolixity. He is his own worst enemy in striving for depth and distinction by means of an elaboration that has brought to his work only dullness and weariness of the spirit.

In his orchestration he is equally immoderate; the first movement, especially, is noisy to a degree that verges on vulgarity and blatancy. His effects are often hard and metallic and monotonous. For one thing, he needs to follow the advice of Sir Charles Stanford, who urges young composers to give their music a "chance to breathe" through rests. The slow movement needs such a chance especially—for pages and pages everybody in the orchestra is playing industriously all the time. There is better scoring in some of the later movements.

Mr. Bischoff four years ago was thought of as one of Germany's promising young men; but he apparently has not been heard of again since he launched this symphony. Dr. Muck evidently believes in him. He conducted the symphony with zeal and enthusiasm, and it was played with splendid spirit and power. All that the Boston Orchestra could do for it was done; and no more could be done.

From STAATS-ZEITUNG

Address: New York.

Date

Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Herr Dr. Muck hat uns in der erſten Matinee der Boſtoner eine Symphonie von Hermann Biſchoff, die ſich in ſeiner Vorführung vor 5 Jahren nicht allgemeinen Beifalls zu erfreuen hatte, wieder vorgeführt. Der Erfolg hat dem Dirigenten Recht gegeben, denn dieſe E-Dur-Symphonie, in der ſo viel und ſo gute Muſik ſteckt, hat diesmal weit beſſer gefallen. Man hat unterdeſſen eben ſo viel Mittelmäßiges und Schlechtes an moderner Produktion über ſich ergehen laſſen müſſen, daß das Werthvolle, das Biſchoff uns zu ſagen hat, beſſer goutirt wurde.

Biſchoff iſt ein ſehr bemerkenswerthes Talent, ja, das genannte Werk rückt ihn in die vorderſte Reihe der zeitgenöſſiſchen Symphoniker. Vor allem iſt er originell in Inhalt und Form. Sein Werk weicht von der klaſſiſchen Symphonie-Form ſtark ab, aber wer wollte da pedantiſch vorgehen und ihm das übelnehmen! Dafür iſt die Erfindung, ſonſt die ſchwache Seite der Modernen, zu bedeutend und zu vielfarbig. Biſchoff treibt eine wahre Verſchwendung mit Gedanken, die er überdies durch ganz hervorragende koloriſtiſche Künſte wunderſchön variirt und verbrämt. Die Gliederung zeigt eine höchſt geſchmackvolle Hand, der Aufbau iſt impoſant.

Bewundernswerth iſt ſein Talent der Tonſchilderung, die das glitzernde Orcheſtergewand verleiht. Woran es fehlt, iſt Knappheit des Ausdrucks und Beſchränkung in der Entwicklung. Biſchoff giebt ſich allzu redſelig, er kennt kein Maß und wirkt daher ſtellenweiſe ermüdend. Von den vier Sätzen der Symphonie gebe ich dem wirklich originellen dritten, einem direkt dämoniſch gefärbten Scherzo, den Vorzug. Ein grauſiger Humor, eine Fülle ſataniſch gefärbter Nuancen und Phraſen, als ob ſämmtliche Dante'ſchen Höllenkreiſe ihren Inhalt ausgeſpien hätten. Da wirkt die reiche Chromatik wirklich höchſt intereſſant und charakteriſtiſch. Der Dirigent ſchwelgte in der Ausführung des überaus anſpruchsvollen Werkes ſichtlich erfreut in der Tonpracht ſeines Orcheſters, das nicht häufig ſolchen Wohllaut und individuelle Vielfarbigkeit entfaltet hat. Der Beifall war ſehr warm und überzeugt.

Auch die intimen Seelenbekenntniſſe des Wagner'ſchen „Siegfried"-Idylls und die wundervoll weichen Konturen des Weberſchen Melos in der „Euyanthe"-Ouvertüre zeigten die Boſtoner Meiſter auf voller [illegible]

H.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address New York

NOV 10 1912

York, 1884

BISCHOFF SYMPHONY IS STURDY AT LEAST

Work by New Writer Is Presented by Boston Orchestra at Its Second Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert yesterday afternoon. The first part of the programme was devoted to a symphony by a new writer of the name of Bischoff. It would be unjust to say that the work did not deserve a place on the programme, but at the same time one regrets that nearly an hour and a half should have been consecrated to a writer about whom nobody cares very much, and who is not destined to establish himself.

Like nearly all modern composers, Mr. Bischoff is very, very long-winded. His symphony reminds one forcibly of the output of other composers, at times ludicrously so. At the same time he writes sturdily and with a firm and outspoken style.

Now the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes but ten visits a year to New York. During those ten visits—and this is a hint to Dr. Muck—the public would like to hear it play much of the music which is attempted, but not done full justice to, by some of our local—often intensely local—orchestras. The spirit which dictates the production of new works is an admirable one, and no one wishes to discourage it. But it is so rare that one hears a new piece of any emotional or inspirational value, that audiences would not really suffer much if modern Germany and modern France and modern Russia, and modern Finland, gave way to those things which, though ten times repeated, still will please.

From STANDARD UNION

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date NOV 1912

Established:

BOSTON SYMPHONY WARMLY GREETED

Packed House Attends Opening Concert By Hub's Splendid Orchestra.

AN INSPIRING PROGRAMME.

Dr. Muck Wields Baton—Liszt's "Mazeppa" Well Played.

Competent musicians who have had the opportunity to make comparisons have reached the practically unanimous conclusion that there is no finer orchestra in the world than the body of men which makes up the Boston Symphony. Despite the general and increasing excellence of the many symphonic orchestras in this country the players from the "Hub" still lead the way toward the nearest realization of the ideal in music.

Numerous changes have been made this year in the make-up of Major Higginson's orchestra, but the ensemble was never better than it was last night, when the organization made its first appearance this season in Brooklyn at the Academy. Every man in the orchestra is an artist and as fine an artist as money and careful selection can secure.

The guiding spirit of these players is Dr. Karl Muck. His return to America had been eagerly looked forward to by the musical public, which remembered the impressive beauty and keen intelligence of his readings when he was here before. When he appeared last night the audience rose in a body to greet him. He stood bowing as the applause grew in tribute to his magnetic personality.

The applause for the remainder of the evening was not very enthusiastic, however. The very best music, as in other things, does not rouse people to wild demonstrations. Nevertheless, there is every reason to believe the audience appreciated the musical merit of the performance. Most of those present had heard the orchestra regularly for years and had subscribed this season for the entire series of five concerts. The house was sold out and there was a noticeable number of standees. It is said all of the seats have been taken for the remainder of the series.

There was no soloist last night and the audience was able to give itself up to the enjoyment of a purely orchestral programme. The selections were the same as those presented on Thursday night in Manhattan. The opening number was Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, the "Hero Symphony." There was an intermission, and then the overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," by Berlioz; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and the prelude to Wagner's "Meistersinger" [illegible]

It was a joyous programme and there was not a phrase that lost any of its telling effect through Dr. Muck's interpretation. His reading of the symphony was worthy of Beethoven. "The military triology," as the number has been called by those who like to read a story into the work—and there are precious few who don't—was given supremely well. The sudden changes in harmony in the last movement which startled its hearers in 1813 came naturally to the ears of a generation which has had its ears accustomed to the daring harmonic changes of Strauss. Dr. Muck was recalled three times after the conclusion of the number.

The powerful orchestration of Berlioz is in few places better exemplified than in "Le Carnaval Romain." He has caught the medieval spirit, the brilliancy, the passion, the underlying but seldom apparent tragedy of the times of Benvenuto Cellini. The fascinating saltarello, the mad fifteenth century dance which runs throughout the number, is used with the highest musicianly skill.

"Roaring, weeping, raging, writhing" following the opening strains of Liszt's "Mazeppa"—that wonderful orchestral picture of Hugo's poem. The whirring ride of the Cossack chief, which every school boy has learned in Byron's poem, is never so thrilling as it is in the Liszt composition with its savage color and tremendous pace ending in the final wild orchestral shriek and its triumphant finale.

That masterpiece of counterpart—Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude was the last number. It is one that a symphonic audience never tires of hearing. Almost everybody was familiar with it, and the players seemed to enjoy it as much as the audience. Dr. Muck's reading was delightful.

From TRIBUNE

Address: New York.

Date

A MODERN SYMPHO

Good Music by a Straus Im tator.

Dr. Muck devoted something more than an hour at the second concert of the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon to making propaganda for a composition which he admires, and which is worthy of admiration, in a measure, at least. It is a symphony in E major by a German named Hermann Bischoff. At one of the last concerts which Dr. Muck gave here before his return to Berlin (it was on January 9, 1908), he brought the same work forward. It was not the reception which his audience accorded it then which persuaded him to repeat it at almost the earliest opportunity which offered, but zeal in behalf of the composer. Such zeal is more easily respected in the abstract than admired in the concrete. Herr Bischoff's music is deserving of very respectful attention, for it has some large and imposing attributes; but it would have been more to the liking of yesterday's listeners had Dr. Muck postponed his propagandism until a later occasion and permitted his first afternoon audience the privilege of simpler, sincerer and more direct enjoyment. He was, unfortunately, made to feel after the first movement that the music had not compelled the close attention or won the interest to which it is entitled. Had he waited two months and given the symphony on a Thursday evening there would be a different result to chronicle.

The indefatigable Mr. Hale has been obliged to confess that after more than four years of effort to learn it he is still quite in the dark about the personal history of Herr Bischoff—which invites the remark that, much as he may resemble his hero and model, Richard Strauss, as a composer, Herr Bischoff differs from him greatly as a man, in one respect at least. He keeps his personality hidden, while Strauss employs indefatigably every means yet invented for keeping himself in the public eye. His symphony is much like some of Strauss's music in its impetuous and sure-footed sweep, in its reliance upon sonority to make good deficiencies of fundamental beauty of thought, in its preponderance of tutti, and in its alternation of wearisome handicraftsmanship with flashes of wonderful originality and beauty. The last thing likely to occur to an ingenuous listener is that it is programme music in any sense except that which may be made to apply to every composition having a series of movements presenting the contrasts of energetic action, contemplation, the pursuit of pleasure and achievement. When the composer asks us to hear or see in it visions of the life of a debauchee—dissolute nights, orgiastic masked balls, moonlight gardens, whispers and murmurs and sighs made to bless, high ideals of womanhood, lofty strivings made vain by an ill-spent youth—he compels us to doubt his ingenuousness and robs his music of some of the merit which it possesses as self-sufficient art. We should hesitate to describe the symphony as a lofty poetical flight, but neither can we set it down as merely a product of skill in workmanship and the fruit of pregnant inventiveness. It shows fancy, if not deep imagination; and, despite the commonplaceness of its themes and the diffuseness of their treatment, the first movement frequently strikes fire. After the sixty-five minutes of brain-cudgelling came the romantic charm—brought out only as the men from Boston can bring it out—of Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and the overture to "Euryanthe."

H. E. K.

Newspaper Cutting

From EVENING TELEGRAM

Address: New York.

Date NOV 10 1

IT seemed a great pity that Dr. K Muck devoted more than an hour of h valuable time and energy and that of the noble Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon to the performance of a new symphony by a contemporary German composer, Hermann Bischoff.

The composer evidently has nothing to say that need take up so much time. His work is decidedly discursive and long drawn out. In manner it shows the influence of Richard Strauss and at times employs the same harsh tonalities. The first movement seems more operatic than symphonic in treatment.

Of the four movements the third, which is marked "Presto: Ruhig," and is really the scherzo, is the most interesting. Here the composer is most coherent and least tedious.

It must be said that Dr. Muck's reading of the work was admirable in every respect. Evidently the composer's meaning was interpreted with musicianship worthy of a better work.

Then followed Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," which was like golden sunlight after the more ponderous offering. The programme concluded with Weber's overture to "Euryanthe." The essential quality of elegance that pervades this composer's work was most adequately expressed by the great orchestra and its masterly leader.

As at the opening concert on Thursday night, there was evident rejoicing over the return of Doctor Muck.

AMERICAN

New York

BOSTONIANS PLAY BISCHOF SYMPHONY

First Afternoon Concert at Carnegie Hall Is Given by Dr. Muck's Orchestra.

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

At the first afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place at Carnegie Hall, yesterday, before a crowded house, the place of honor on the programme compiled by Dr. Muck, was reserved for Hermann Bischoff.

This Hermann Bischoff is not widely known here. Of Prussian birth, he has, however, made a reputation for himself abroad. Dr. Much thinks very highly of him—so highly that he is said to have said he ranked his symphony in E above the best work yet produced by the more youthful Germans.

This symphony was played some years ago in Boston, and later in Chicago, under Dr. Muck's direction. And yesterday for the first time New Yorkers heard it.

The impression that it made was only partly favorable. The work is that of an ambitious man, self-conscious and of the Byronic temperament; introspective, melodramatic and much too verbose. It took a little more than a full hour for Hermann Bischoff to reveal his meaning in this work; and all he had to tell was not worth hearing.

With refreshing honesty, Mr. Bischoff has explained that his symphony is largely "programme music." He does not hide from us his sincere belief that music has always been as is today of that order. And he may be right. The puzzle which each hearer has to solve—only for himself—when he hears a symphony is, in this instance, largely simplified by the admission of the composer that, in the first of his four movements, he laid bare (or tried to bare) the soul of a young, worn-out debauchee, who learns too late the charm of purity.

Though German, Mr. Bischoff has a great deal of the French and Italian feeling in his work. He has studied Richard Wagner, Strauss and others in his native land. But he reminds one very often more of Berlioz and Saint-Saeins than of Strauss, and it is only in his last movement that he recalls Wagner.

The opening movement ("very fast and fiery") is full of restlessness and varied color. The debauchee is haunted by the fairies of his misspent youth and pacified at times by the suggestion of a pure and noble woman. A "quiet and sustained" second movement leads to an insufferably long (though skilful) presto, in which the chief figure in the programme story seems to mock himself; they hint at religious hope and resignation. In the last episode, he lapses again into irony and ends in pathos.

Mr. Bischoff is a master of instrumentation. He has invented many pleasing and effective themes. But he is too loquacious.

After the fatigue of listening to the symphony it was a joy to hear the tender reading of the "Siegfried Idyl" by the orchestra. I cannot remember having ever had the pleasure of listening to a more [illegible] rendering of the [illegible]

The symphony was not worth exhuming after its four years' rest. It is as long as ever it was, and its length is not commensurate with the value of the ideas that are contained in it. Mr. Bischoff declared that his symphony had nothing to do with programme music, but in order not to be out of fashion, he then insisted that it presents programme music throughout, and proceeded to outline its programme —a suggestion of a dissipated young man who sees the ghosts of his misspent early years—dissolute nights, orgiastic masked balls, passionate love murmurings in gardens flooded with moonlight and vocal with the song of birds. Mr. Bischoff is a pupil of Strauss, and the fact appears in certain passages of his music; does it also appear in this proclamation?

He begins as if he were going to differentiate himself from many composers of the present day and starts to writing tunes. There is a strong rhythmic feeling in the first theme, though it is rather commonplace, which is also to be said of subsequent themes in this movement. But he loses himself speedily, now and in the subsequent movements, in a maze of elaboration that is by turns dry, bombastic and turgid. The slow movement, built on themes not without breadth and even nobility; the presto, with its slow trio—though the principal theme has a movement that strongly suggests the galumphing of the conqueror of the Snark —the final allegro; all offer undoubtedly something for the listener; there are pages of music deeply felt, there are passages of beauty. But Mr. Bischoff knows nothing of moderation, and his material is wrought over with fatuous prolixity. He is his own worst enemy in striving for depth and distinction by means of an elaboration that has brought to his work only dullness and weariness of the spirit.

In his orchestration he is equally immoderate; the first movement, especially, is noisy to a degree that verges on vulgarity and blatancy. His effects are often hard and metallic and monotonous. For one thing, he needs to follow the advice of Sir Charles Stanford, who urges young composers to give their music a "chance to 'breathe'" through rests. The slow movement needs such a chance especially —for pages and pages everybody in the orchestra is playing industriously all the time. There is better scoring in some of the later movements.

Mr. Bischoff four years ago was thought of as one of Germany's promising young men; but he apparently has not been heard of again since he launched this symphony. Dr. Muck evidently believes in him. He conducted the symphony with zeal and enthusiasm, and it was played with splendid spirit and power. All that the Boston Orchestra could do for it was done; and no more could be done.

From STAATS-ZEITUNG

Address: New York.

Date

Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Herr Dr. Muck hat uns in der erſten Matinee der Boſtoner eine Symphonie von Hermann Biſchoff, die ſich in ſeiner Vorführung vor 5 Jahren nicht allgemeinen Beifalls zu erfreuen hatte, wieder vorgeführt. Der Erfolg hat dem Dirigenten Recht gegeben, denn dieſe E-Dur-Symphonie, in der ſo viel und ſo gute Muſik ſteckt, hat diesmal weit beſſer gefallen. Man hat unterdeſſen eben ſo viel Mittelmäßiges und Schlechtes an moderner Produktion über ſich ergehen laſſen müſſen, daß das Werthvolle, das Biſchoff uns zu ſagen hat, beſſer goutirt wurde.

Biſchoff iſt ein ſehr bemerkenswerthes Talent, ja, das genannte Werk rückt ihn in die vorderſte Reihe der zeitgenöſſiſchen Symphoniker. Vor allem iſt er originell in Inhalt und Form. Sein Werk weicht von der klaſſiſchen Symphonie-Form ſtark ab, aber wer wollte da pedantiſch vorgehen und ihm das übelnehmen! Dafür iſt die Erfindung, ſonſt die ſchwache Seite der Modernen, zu bedeutend und zu vielfarbig. Biſchoff treibt eine wahre Verſchwendung mit Gedanken, die er überdies durch ganz hervorragende koloriſtiſche Künſte wunderſchön variir und verbrämt. Die Gliederung zeigt ein höchſt geſchmackvolle Hand, der Aufbau iſ impoſant.

Bewundernswerth iſt ſein Talent de Tonſchilderung, die das glitzernde Orcheſtergewand verleiht. Woran es fehlt, iſ Knappheit des Ausdrucks und Beſchränkung in der Entwicklung. Biſchoff gieb ſich allzu redſelig, er kennt kein Maß un wirkt daher ſtellenweiſe ermüdend. Vo den vier Sätzen der Symphonie gebe i dem wirklich originellen dritten, einem di rekt dämoniſch gefärbten Scherzo, de Vorzug. Ein grauſiger Humor, eine Füll ſataniſch gefärbter Nuancen und Phraſe als ob ſämmtliche Dante'ſchen Höllenkreiſ ihren Inhalt ausgeſpien hätten. Da wir die reiche Chromatik wirklich höchſt intereſſant und charakteriſtiſch. Der Dirigen ſchwelgte in der Ausführung des überau anſpruchsvollen Werkes ſichtlich erfreut i der Tonpracht ſeines Orcheſters, das nic häufig ſolchen Wohllaut und individuell Vielfarbigkeit entfaltet hat. Der Beifa war ſehr warm und überzeugt.

Auch die intimen Seelenbekenntniſſe de Wagner'ſchen „Siegfried"-Idylls und di wundervoll weichen Konturen des Weber ſchen Melos in der „Euryanthe"-Ouvertür zeigten die Boſtoner Meiſter auf volle [illegible]

H.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address New York

NOV 10 1912

York, 1884

BISCHOFF SYMPHONY IS STURDY AT LEAST

Work by New Writer Is Presented by Boston Orchestra at Its Second Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert yesterday afternoon. The first part of the programme was devoted to a symphony by a new writer of the name of Bischoff. It would be unjust to say that the work did not deserve a place on the programme, but at the same time one regrets that nearly an hour and a half should have been consecrated to a writer about whom nobody cares very much, and who is not destined to establish himself.

Like nearly all modern composers, Mr. Bischoff is very, very long-winded. His symphony reminds one forcibly of the output of other composers, at times ludicrously so. At the same time he writes sturdily and with a firm and outspoken style.

Now the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes but ten visits a year to New York. During those ten visits—and this is a hint to Dr. Muck—the public would like to hear it play much of the music which is attempted, but not done full justice to, by some of our local—often intensely local—orchestras. The spirit which dictates the production of new works is an admirable one, and no one wishes to discourage it. But it is so rare that one hears a new piece of any emotional or inspirational value, that audiences would not really suffer much if modern Germany and modern France and modern Russia, and modern Finland, gave way to those things which, though ten times repeated, still will please.

From STANDARD UNION

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

1912

Date

Established:

BOSTON SYMPHONY WARMLY GREETED

Packed House Attends Opening Concert By Hub's Splendid Orchestra.

AN INSPIRING PROGRAMME.

Dr. Muck Wields Baton—Liszt's "Mazeppa" Well Played.

Competent musicians who have had the opportunity to make comparisons have reached the practically unanimous conclusion that there is no finer orchestra in the world than the body of men which makes up the Boston Symphony. Despite the general and increasing excellence of the many symphonic orchestras in this country the players from the "Hub" still lead the way toward the nearest realization of the ideal in music.

Numerous changes have been made this year in the make-up of Major Higginson's orchestra, but the ensemble was never better than it was last night, when the organization made its first appearance this season in Brooklyn at the Academy. Every man in the orchestra is an artist and as fine an artist as money and careful selection can secure.

The guiding spirit of these players is Dr. Karl Muck. His return to America had been eagerly looked forward to by the musical public, which remembered the impressive beauty and keen intelligence of his readings when he was here before. When he appeared last night the audience rose in a body to greet him. He stood bowing as the applause grew in tribute to his magnetic personality.

The applause for the remainder of the evening was not very enthusiastic, however. The very best music, as in other things, does not rouse people to wild demonstrations. Nevertheless, there is every reason to believe the audience appreciated the musical merit of the performance. Most of those present had heard the orchestra regularly for years and had subscribed this season for the entire series of five concerts. The house was sold out and there was a noticeable number of standees. It is said all of the seats have been taken for the remainder of the series.

There was no soloist last night and the audience was able to give itself up to the enjoyment of a purely orchestral programme. The selections were the same as those presented on Thursday night in Manhattan. The opening number was Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, the "Hero Symphony." There was an intermission, and then the overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," by Berlioz; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and the prelude to Wagner's "Meistersinger" [illegible]

It was a joyous programme an there was not a phrase that lost an of its telling effect through D Muck's interpretation. His readin of the symphony was worthy of Beethoven. "The military triology," a the number has been called by thos who like to read a story into th work—and there are precious few wh don't—was given supremely well. Th sudden changes in harmony in th last movement which startled it hearers in 1813 came naturally to th ears of a generation which has ha its ears accustomed to the darin harmonic changes of Strauss. Dr Muck was recalled three times afte the conclusion of the number.

The powerful orchestration of Berlioz is in few places better exemplified than in "Le Carnaval Romain." He has caught the medieval spirit, the brilliancy, the passion, the underlying but seldom apparent tragedy of the times of Benvenuto Cellini. The fascinating saltarello, the mad fifteenth century dance which runs throughout the number, is used with the highest musicianly skill.

"Roaring, weeping, raging, writhing" following the opening strains of Liszt's "Mazeppa"—that wonderful orchestral picture of Hugo's poem. The whirring ride of the Cossack chief, which every school boy has learned in Byron's poem, is never so thrilling as it is in the Liszt composition with its savage color and tremendous pace ending in the final wild orchestral shriek and its triumphant finale.

That masterpiece of counterpart—Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude was the last number. It is one that a symphonic audience never tires of hearing. Almost everybody was familiar with it, and the players seemed to enjoy it as much as the audience. Dr. Muck's reading was delightful.

From TRIBUNE

Address: New York.

Date

A MODERN SYM

Good Music by a Stra tator.

Dr. Muck devoted something more than an hour at the second concert of the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon to making propaganda for a composition which he admires, and which is worthy of admiration, in a measure, at least. It is a symphony in E major by a German named Hermann Bischoff. At one of the last concerts which Dr. Muck gave here before his return to Berlin (it was on January 9, 1908), he brought the same work forward. It was not the reception which his audience accorded it then which persuaded him to repeat it at almost the earliest opportunity which offered, but zeal in behalf of the composer. Such zeal is more easily respected in the abstract than admired in the concrete. Herr Bischoff's music is deserving of very respectful attention, for it has some large and imposing attributes; but it would have been more to the liking of yesterday's listeners had Dr. Muck postponed his propagandism until a later occasion and permitted his first afternoon audience the privilege of simpler, sincerer and more direct enjoyment. He was, unfortunately, made to feel after the first movement that the music had not compelled the close attention or won the interest to which it is entitled. Had he waited two months and given the symphony on a Thursday evening there would be a different result to chronicle.

The indefatigable Mr. Hale has been obliged to confess that after more than four years of effort to learn it he is still quite in the dark about the personal history of Herr Bischoff—which invites the remark that, much as he may resemble his hero and model, Richard Strauss, as a composer, Herr Bischoff differs from him greatly as a man, in one respect at least. He keeps his personality hidden, while Strauss employs indefatigably every means yet invented for keeping himself in the public eye. His symphony is much like some of Strauss's music in its impetuous and sure-footed sweep, in its reliance upon sonority to make good deficiencies of fundamental beauty of thought, in its preponderance of tutti, and in its alternation of wearisome handicraftsmanship with flashes of wonderful originality and beauty. The last thing likely to occur to an ingenuous listener is that it is programme music in any sense except that which may be made to apply to every composition having a series of movements presenting the contrasts of energetic action, contemplation, the pursuit of pleasure and achievement. When the composer asks us to hear or see in it visions of the life of a debauchee—dissolute nights, orgiastic masked balls, moonlight gardens, whispers and murmurs and sighs made to bless, high ideals of womanhood, lofty strivings made vain by an ill-spent youth—he compels us to doubt his ingenuousness and robs his music of some of the merit which it possesses as self-sufficient art. We should hesitate to describe the symphony as a lofty poetical flight, but neither can we set it down as merely a product of skill in workmanship and the fruit of pregnant inventiveness. It shows fancy, if not deep imagination; and, despite the commonplaceness of its themes and the diffuseness of their treatment, the first movement frequently strikes fire. After the sixty-five minutes of brain-cudgelling came the romantic charm—brought out only as the men from Boston can bring it out—of Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and the overture to "Euryanthe."

H. E. K.

Newspaper Cutting

From EVENING TELEGRAM

Address: New York.

Date NOV 10 1912

IT seemed a great pity that Dr. Kar Muck devoted more than an hour of his valuable time and energy and that of the noble Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon to the performance of a new symphony by a contemporary German composer, Hermann Bischoff.

The composer evidently has nothing to say that need take up so much time. His work is decidedly discursive and long drawn out. In manner it shows the influence of Richard Strauss and at times employs the same harsh tonalities. The first movement seems more operatic than symphonic in treatment.

Of the four movements the third, which is marked "Presto: Ruhig," and is really the scherzo, is the most interesting. Here the composer is most coherent and least tedious.

It must be said that Dr. Muck's reading of the work was admirable in every respect. Evidently the composer's meaning was interpreted with musicianship worthy of a better work.

Then followed Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," which was like golden sunlight after the more ponderous offering. The programme concluded with Weber's overture to "Euryanthe." The essential quality of elegance that pervades this composer's work was most adequately expressed by the great orchestra and its masterly leader.

As at the opening concert on Thursday night, there was evident rejoicing over the return of Doctor Muck.

From AMERICAN

Address: New York

Date

Established:

BOSTONIANS PLAY BISCHOF SYMPHONY

First Afternoon Concert at Carnegie Hall Is Given by Dr. Muck's Orchestra.

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

At the first afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place at Carnegie Hall, yesterday, before a crowded house, the place of honor on the programme compiled by Dr. Muck, was reserved for Hermann Bischoff.

This Hermann Bischoff is not widely known here. Of Prussian birth, he has, however, made a reputation for himself abroad. Dr. Much thinks very highly of him—so highly that he is said to have said he ranked his symphony in E above the best work yet produced by the more youthful Germans.

This symphony was played some years ago in Boston, and later in Chicago, under Dr. Muck's direction. And yesterday for the first time New Yorkers heard it.

The impression that it made was only partly favorable. The work is that of an ambitious man, self-conscious and of the Byronic temperament; introspective, melodramatic and much too verbose. It took a little more than a full hour for Hermann Bischoff to reveal his meaning in this work; and all he had to tell was not worth hearing.

With refreshing honesty, Mr. Bischoff has explained that his symphony is largely "programme music." He does not hide from us his sincere belief that music has always been as is today of that order. And he may be right. The puzzle which each hearer has to solve—only for himself—when he hears a symphony is, in this instance, largely simplified by the admission of the composer that, in the first of his four movements, he laid bare (or tried to bare) the soul of a young, worn-out debauchee, who learns too late the charm of purity.

Though German, Mr. Bischoff has a great deal of the French and Italian feeling in his work. He has studied Richard Wagner, Strauss and others in his native land. But he reminds one very often more of Berlioz and Saint-Saeins than of Strauss, and it is only in his last movement that he recalls Wagner.

The opening movement ("very fast and fiery") is full of restlessness and varied color. The debauchee is haunted by the fairies of his misspent youth, and pacified at times by the suggestion of a pure and noble woman. A "quiet and sustained" second movement leads to an insufferably long (though skilful) presto, in which the chief figure in the programme story seems to mock himself; they hint at religious hope and resignation. In the last episode, he lapses again into irony and ends in pathos.

Mr. Bischoff is a master of instrumentation. He has invented many pleasing and effective themes. But he is too loquacious.

After the fatigue of listening to the symphony it was a joy to hear the tender reading of the "Siegfried Idyl" by the orchestra. I cannot remember having ever had the pleasure of listening [illegible]

From PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Address V 1 0 1912

Date

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Attractive Programme for Second Local Event Nov. 19.

The second Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in Infantry Hall a week from next Tuesday evening, Nov. 19, will have as its principal attraction the greatest violinist of the younger school, Fritz Kreisler. This distinguished artist is now on his way to America under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and makes no appearance in the East except with that organization. The concert in Providence will be his first appearance in America for four years.

Dr. Muck has elected that he shall play here the greatest of all concertos—that of Beethoven in D-major. For over 100 years the interpretation of this work has been the final standard by which great violinists are judged. In beauty of melody, in nobility of conception, this work of Beethoven's has no rival among compositions of its kind and Kreisler is regarded as its greatest interpreter since Joachim was in his prime, 40 years ago.

The symphony will be the first of the Finnish composer, Sibelius, a magnificent work which has been heard here once before under Dr. Muck during his former engagement. The other number on the programme will be the third "Leonora" overture of Beethoven.

1884

From

Address

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The second Boston Symphony concert which will be given in Infantry hall a week from next Tuesday evening, Nov. 19, will have as its principal attraction the greatest violinist of the younger school, Fritz Kreisler. This distinguished artist is now on his way to America under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony orchestra and makes no appearance in the East, except with that organization.

The concert in Providence will be his first appearance in America for four years. Dr. Muck has elected that he shall play here the greatest of all concertos—that of Beethoven in D-major. For over 100 years the interpretation of this work has been the final standard by which great violinists are judged. In beauty of melody, in nobility of conception, this work of Beethoven's has no rival among compositions of its kind and Kreisler is regarded as its greatest interpreter since Joachim was in his prime 40 years ago.

The symphony will be the first of the Finnish composer, Sibelius, a magnificent work which has been heard here once before, under Dr. Muck, during his former engagement. The other number on the program will be the third "Leonora" overture of Beethoven.

From

Address

Date

Die Boſtoner gaben unter Leitung Dr. Karl Muck's ihre erſte Matinee. Hermann Biſchoff's E-dur Symphonie, die vor fünf Jahren hier keinen großen Erfolg hatte, wurde von Dr. Muck noch einmal wieder zu Gehör gebracht, und dabei zeigte ſich, daß die froſtige Aufnahme, die dem Werke ſeiner Zeit bereitet worden, nicht zu Recht beſtehend war, denn die Zwiſchenzeit hat gelehrt, daß andere Symphoniker inzwiſchen nicht viel Bedeutenderes geleiſtet haben.

1884

From EVG. MAIL

Address: New York.

Date NOV 11 1912

The Boston Symphony concert Saturday afternoon had as its principal offering a symphony by Bischoff, one of the younger German composers. Although essentially modern, and with evident influence of Wagner, as well as an open admiration for Strauss—this work being dedicated to Richard Strauss "with grateful veneration"—there are none of the ear-splitting cacophanies that we have come to expect from men who write "modern" music.

True, it takes the composer one hour and twenty minutes to express his ideas, but throughout he does not lose his coherence and interest for the hearer. The music is rather operatic, and without being descriptive it is essentially of the sort built around a poetic idea. The first movement intended to express the emotions of a young man who living a wild and debauched life becomes acquainted with pure happiness when he is no longer worthy of it is in itself rather complete as a tone poem, and seems almost too dramatic for the first movement of a smyphony.

Other numbers were the "Siegfried Idyl" and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture.

1884

From POST

Address: New York

Date NOV 1

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Saturday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought forward Hermann Bischoff's Symphony in E-major. It cannot be said that the symphony gains on a second hearing. To be sure the composer does not always "disdain melody," but his melodies, particularly in the first movement, are trivial tunes, fit for a tavern scene in an opera, perhaps, but not worthy of a serious work like a symphony. This is not to say, of course, that an opera may not be a serious work; some operas are and some are not. But if these tunes had been introduced in an opera, an appropriate place might have been found for them, but not in a symphony. On the whole, noisiness and emptiness are the principal characteristics of this work.

The other numbers were Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," and Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe." The "Idyl" sounded like a blessed benediction from on high, after the storm and stress of the symphony. The Overture was brilliantly played, as was to be expected, but it did not produce its full effect in the slower portions. The "tomb-music" was not sepulchral enough. It was merely "soft music." On the other hand, the "Idyl" was exquisitely played.

Dr. Muck was vigorously applauded when he first appeared at the conductor's desk. The applause after the different movements of the symphony was perfunctory enough, but after the "Siegfried Idyl," Dr. Muck had to bow again and again, till finally the whole orchestra had to rise in acknowledgment.

From

Address: New York City

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA COVERS ITSELF WITH GLORY IN PERFORMANCE OF HERMAN BISCHOFF'S SYMPHONY IN E-MAJOR, OPUS 16.

The first afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The program consisted of Herman Bischoff's symphony in E-major, opus 16, Wagner's "Siegfried Odyl" and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. Bischoff is a living composer whose work is now extant in the metropolis of Munich.

Although Bischoff was ushered into this world in 1868, his sixteenth work, this imposing symphony, was not disclosed to the world till 1906, when it was performed at a concert of the Allgemeiner Musikverein in Essen. When and where Dr. Carl Muck first met this seductive score and lost his scholarly heart to it is not a matter of cord, but he played it in Carnegie all on January 9, 1908.

The performance yesterday served [illegible] disclose more clear [illegible] he method of Bischoff and the presence of the master influence of Richard Strauss. The first movement of this prodigious symphony, which takes an hour and a quarter to perform, is decidedly the best.

This movement has a strong, crisply defined and really musical first theme, and of this the composer makes excellent technical use in his development. His contrasting theme is characteristic of the morbidity which has fallen on contemporaneous musical expression.

The symphony is a largely built work, brilliantly and strongly scored, based on sharply conceived thematic germs and worked out at great length. If the composer had condensed his work to two-thirds its present size, it would have gained greatly in power.

The Boston Orchestra covered itself with glory in the performance of this composition. The ordinary careless concert-goer fails to perceive the size of the gulf which separates such art as this from the entirely respectable and praiseworthy performances to which he is accustomed to listen.

The playing of this appallingly difficult symphony yesterday was a triumph of orchestral perfection, and Dr. Muck may rest satisfied that he did all for the composition that can be done for it.

From PRESS

Address New York

Date NOV 1 0 1912

BOSTON ORCHESTRA SCORES A TRIUMPH

Dr. Muck's Organization Gives Fine Performance of Bischoff's Symphony.

Under Dr. Karl Muck's domination the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave an extraordinary demonstration of its powers yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. In a popular sense nothing sensational was offered. No prima donna persuasions had been injected into the programme; even the music presented lacked the allurements usually dispensed to matinee gatherings. And yet the playing of the Hub's incomparable band made an impression almost sensational on those who understood its full significance. Never, perhaps, and certainly not since Dr. Muck had to interrupt his activities in America at the German Emperor's behest, has that collection of virtuosi achieved as brilliant results in the face of almost insurmountable difficulties as it did yesterday in Bischoff's titanic symphony in E major, which opened the afternoon and occupied most of the allotted time.

There may be differences of opinion regarding the wisdom of producing so interminable a work before a matinee audience. It may be questioned, too, whether the value of Bischoff's symphony is sufficient to compensate for the infinite pains it requires in practice and preparation. Connoisseurs must realize, however, that a better vehicle for putting the virtuosity of an orchestra to a test would be hard to find.

Dr. Muck knew what he was doing when he decided to bring forward early in the season a compositiin which had failed to win general approval when he first introduced it to Americans almost five years ago. He knew that the rehearsing would be a fine lesson for his orchestra. He knew that the amazing complications and difficulties of a score bristling with unexpected twists and turns, a score that uses even the third clarinet as a solo instrument, would probe into the very vitals of the great instrument he had at his command. The gentle listeners who found an hour and a quarter of such music something of an ordeal should bear those facts in mind.

If there was the slightest technical defect in the performance of Bischoff's symphony, the slightest wavering among the breath-catching rhythmical shifts, the slightest obscurity in the tonal exposition, the slightest flaw in the song of the strings, the slightest defect in the utterance of the wood-wind, the slightest brutality in the attack of the brass, even in the midst of heaven-storming stress, the writer of this failed to detect it. Grinding dissonances, however poignant in their effect, were beautiful for the sheer euphony of the instrumental proclamation. Pompous dynamic outbursts, swelling into ear-filling climaxes of sound, never became boisterous. And the whole stupendous structure was shot through with a wealth of fine-spun nuance, woven by Dr. Muck's poetizing baton.

That Bischoff's score savors of Richard Strauss in thematic curve and workmanship there can be no question. That it lacks the bold individuality of the more famous master is hard to dispute. Yet the underlying spirit of the music is distinctly different. And that, after all, is important. Resemblances have always existed, even among the great masters. True originality goes deeper than superficial style.

Quite apart from its intrinsic merit, however, the Bischoff symphony is a superb orchestral piece and it served yesterday not only to reveal the prowess of the Boston Orchestra in an amazing manner, but to throw Dr. Muck's accomplishments into a brilliant light.

No less convincing an example, though entirely different, of what the Boston Orchestra can achieve under the German conductor, was offered in Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl." There is no other musician now living who approaches that beautiful work with greater tenderness, with a more exquisite sense of delicacy, with finer poetic perceptions than Dr. Muck. There is none who grasps the true spirit of the music as he does; none who draws so much fragrance from the score; none who seems so thoroughly imbued with the tempi conceived by the composer himself. And the men from Boston answered Dr. Muck's demands in every detail of phrasing, even to the most ethereal pianissimos.

An afternoon of rare delights ended with a refined and poetic reading of Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. Such wonderful achievements as those of yesterday even the Boston Symphony Orchestra could hardly have put to its credit in the tone-muffling weather it had to face on last Thursday night.

M. S.

From …ING GLOBE

Address …k

Date …11 1912

…From …Heard in …ome Music

…Symphony a Bore in …e of Excellent Perform…ce—Rudolph Ganz Plays Korngold Sonata — Persinger and Dimitrieff.

TO-DAY.

Cooper Union—8.15 P. M., concert of the Adèle Margulies Trio.

Metropolitan Opera House—8 P. M., "Manon Lescaut."

Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra wasted a good deal of time for a large number of people Saturday afternoon by exhibiting again in Carnegie Hall Herman Bischoff's E major symphony of a misspent youth. Dr. Muck and his men did a reasonable duty by that symphony in the same hall nearly five years ago. One had supposed it had thereupon been decently and definitively buried, but there it was again on Saturday in all its appalling length. Evidently Dr. Muck has faith in the work, and detects in it beautiful or impressive qualities to which the world in general is deaf, but the trouble is the world in general seems determined to stay deaf to them, so all the eloquence of the Boston orchestra and the special pleader at its head was thrown away.

No doubt there are beauties in Bischoff's score, for there is a good deal in it that in happier days and places was Mendelssohn, Wagner, Richard Strauss, and others. The mistake Bischoff made was not in helping himself to what he happened to want, but in making such poor use of it afterward. When Wagner took his stuff where he found it he had a way of doing something with it that would strike the cry of "Stop, thief!" dumb on the most meticulous lips. Bischoff is least endurable when he is most Bischoff. And this orchestration is so persistently thick and noisy! It is almost needless to say that the performance was one of very high merit, though in vain.

Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture completed the programme, providing such belated recompense as they could for the ordeal of the symphony. The "Siegfried Idyl" was played with quite surpassing loveliness, and of course the "Euryanthe" overture came off in brilliant fashion. The audience was particularly warm in its applause after the former.

From PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Address NOV 10 1912
Date

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Attractive Programme for Second Local Event Nov. 19.

The second Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in Infantry Hall a week from next Tuesday evening, Nov. 19, will have as its principal attraction the greatest violinist of the younger school, Fritz Kreisler. This distinguished artist is now on his way to America under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and makes no appearance in the East except with that organization. The concert in Providence will be his first appearance in America for four years.

Dr. Muck has elected that he shall play here the greatest of all concertos—that of Beethoven in D-major. For over 100 years the interpretation of this work has been the final standard by which great violinists are judged. In beauty of melody, in nobility of conception, this work of Beethoven's has no rival among compositions of its kind and Kreisler is regarded as its greatest interpreter since Joachim was in his prime, 40 years ago.

The symphony will be the first of the Finnish composer, Sibelius, a magnificent work which has been heard here once before under Dr. Muck during his former engagement. The other number on the programme will be the third "Leonora" overture of Beethoven.

1884

From PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Address
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The second Boston Symphony concert which will be given in Infantry hall a week from next Tuesday evening, Nov. 19, will have as its principal attraction the greatest violinist of the younger school, Fritz Kreisler. This distinguished artist is now on his way to America under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony orchestra and makes no appearance in the East, except with that organization.

The concert in Providence will be his first appearance in America for four years. Dr. Muck has elected that he shall play here the greatest of all concertos—that of Beethoven in D-major. For over 100 years the interpretation of this work has been the final standard by which great violinists are judged. In beauty of melody, in nobility of conception, this work of Beethoven's has no rival among compositions of its kind and Kreisler is regarded as its greatest interpreter since Joachim was in his prime 40 years ago.

The symphony will be the first of the Finnish composer, Sibelius, a magnificent work which has been heard here once before, under Dr. Muck, during his former engagement. The other number on the program will be the third "Leonora" overture of Beethoven.

From
Address
Date

Die Boſtoner gaben unter Leitung Dr. Karl Muck's ihre erſte Matinee. Hermann Biſchoff's E-dur Symphonie, die vor fünf Jahren hier keinen großen Erfolg hatte, wurde von Dr. Muck noch einmal wieder zu Gehör gebracht, und dabei zeigte ſich, daß die froſtige Aufnahme, die dem Werke ſeiner Zeit bereitet worden, nicht zu Recht beſtehend war, denn die Zwiſchenzeit hat gelehrt, daß andere Symphoniker inzwiſchen nicht viel Bedeutenderes geleiſtet haben.

, 1884

From EVG. MAIL
Address: New York.
Date NOV 11 1912

The Boston Symphony concert Saturday afternoon had as its principal offering a symphony by Bischoff, one of the younger German composers. Although essentially modern, and with evident influence of Wagner, as well as an open admiration for Strauss—this work being dedicated to Richard Strauss "with grateful veneration"—there are none of the ear-splitting cacophanies that we have come to expect from men who write "modern" music.

True, it takes the composer one hour and twenty minutes to express his ideas, but throughout he does not lose his coherence and interest for the hearer. The music is rather operatic, and without being descriptive it is essentially of the sort built around a poetic idea. The first movement intended to express the emotions of a young man who living a wild and debauched life becomes acquainted with pure happiness when he is no longer worthy of it is in itself rather complete as a tone poem, and seems almost too dramatic for the first movement of a smyphony.

Other numbers were the "Siegfried Idyl" and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture.

, 1884

From POST
Address: New York
Date NOV 11 1912

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Saturday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought forward Hermann Bischoff's Symphony in E-major. It cannot be said that the symphony gains on a second hearing. To be sure the composer does not always "disdain melody," but his melodies, particularly in the first movement, are trivial tunes, fit for a tavern scene in an opera, perhaps, but not worthy of a serious work like a symphony. This is not to say, of course, that an opera may not be a serious work; some operas are and some are not. But if these tunes had been introduced in an opera, an appropriate place might have been found for them, but not in a symphony. On the whole, noisiness and emptiness are the principal characteristics of this work.

The other numbers were Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," and Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe." The "Idyl" sounded like a blessed benediction from on high, after the storm and stress of the symphony. The Overture was brilliantly played, as was to be expected, but it did not produce its full effect in the slower portions. The "tomb-music" was not sepulchral enough. It was merely "soft music." On the other hand, the "Idyl" was exquisitely played.

Dr. Muck was vigorously applauded when he first appeared at the conductor's desk. The applause after the different movements of the symphony was perfunctory enough, but after the "Siegfried Idyl," Dr. Muck had to bow again and again, till finally the whole orchestra had to rise in acknowledgment.

From
Address: New York City
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA COVERS ITSELF WITH GLORY IN PERFORMANCE OF HERMAN BISCHOFF'S SYMPHONY IN E-MAJOR, OPUS 16.

The first afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The program consisted of Herman Bischoff's symphony in E-major, opus 16, Wagner's "Siegfried Odyl" and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. Bischoff is a living composer whose work is now extant in the metropolis of Munich.

Although Bischoff was ushered into this world in 1868, his sixteenth work, this imposing symphony, was not disclosed to the world till 1906, when it was performed at a concert of the Allgemeiner Musikverein in Essen. When and where Dr. Carl Muck first met this seductive score and lost his scholarly heart to it is not a matter of ecord, but he played it in Carnegie all on January 9, 1908.

The performance yesterday served disclose more clear [illegible] he method of Bischoff and the presence of the master influence of Richard Strauss. The first movement of this prodigious symphony, which takes an hour and a quarter to perform, is decidedly the best.

This movement has a strong, crisply defined and really musical first theme, and of this the composer makes excellent technical use in his development. His contrasting theme is characteristic of the morbidity which has fallen on contemporaneous musical expression.

The symphony is a largely built work, brilliantly and strongly scored, based on sharply conceived thematic germs and worked out at great length. If the composer had condensed his work to two-thirds its present size, it would have gained greatly in power.

The Boston Orchestra covered itself with glory in the performance of this composition. The ordinary careless concert-goer fails to perceive the size of the gulf which separates such art as this from the entirely respectable and praiseworthy performances to which he is accustomed to listen.

The playing of this appallingly difficult symphony yesterday was a triumph of orchestral perfection, and Dr. Muck may rest satisfied that he did all for the composition that can be done for it.

From PRESS
Address New York
Date NOV 10 19

Establishe

BOSTON ORCHESTRA SCORES A TRIUM

Dr. Muck's Organizat Gives Fine Performance of Bischoff's Symphony.

Under Dr. Karl Muck's domination the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave an extraordinary demonstration of its powers yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. In a popular sense nothing sensational was offered. No prima donna persuasions had been injected into the programme; even the music presented lacked the allurements usually dispensed to matinee gatherings. And yet the playing of the Hub's incomparable band made an impression almost sensational on those who understood its full significance. Never, perhaps, and certainly not since Dr. Muck had to interrupt his activities in America at the German Emperor's behest, has that collection of virtuosi achieved as brilliant results in the face of almost insurmountable difficulties as it did yesterday in Bischoff's titanic symphony in E major, which opened the afternoon and occupied most of the allotted time.

There may be differences of opinion regarding the wisdom of producing so interminable a work before a matinee audience. It may be questioned, too, whether the value of Bischoff's symphony is sufficient to compensate for the infinite pains it requires in practice and preparation. Connoisseurs must realize, however, that a better vehicle for putting the virtuosity of an orchestra to a test would be hard to find.

Dr. Muck knew what he was doing when he decided to bring forward early in the season a compositiin which had failed to win general approval when he first introduced it to Americans almost five years ago. He knew that the rehearsing would be a fine lesson for his orchestra. He knew that the amazing complications and difficulties of a score bristling with unexpected twists and turns, a score that uses even the third clarinet as a solo instrument, would probe into the very vitals of the great instrument he had at his command. The gentle listeners who found an hour and a quarter of such music something of an ordeal should bear those facts in mind.

If there was the slightest technical defect in the performance of Bischoff's symphony, the slightest wavering among the breath-catching rhythmical shifts, the slightest obscurity in the tonal exposition, the slightest flaw in the song of the strings, the slightest defect in the utterance of the wood-wind, the slightest brutality in the attack of the brass, even in the midst of heaven-storming stress, the writer of this failed to detect it. Grinding disonances, however poignant in their effect, were beautiful for the sheer euphony of the instrumental proclamation. Pompous dynamic outbursts, swelling into ear-filling climaxes of sound, never became boisterous. And the whole stupendous structure was shot through with a wealth of fine-spun nuance, woven by Dr. Muck's poetizing baton.

That Bischoff's score savors of Richard Strauss in thematic curve and workmanship there can be no question. That it lacks the bold individuality of the more famous master is hard to dispute. Yet the underlying spirit of the music is distinctly different. And that, after all, is important. Resemblances have always existed, even among the great masters. True originality goes deeper than superficial style.

Quite apart from its intrinsic merit, however, the Bischoff symphony is a superb orchestral piece and it served yesterday not only to reveal the prowess of the Boston Orchestra in an amazing manner, but to throw Dr. Muck's accomplishments into a brilliant light.

No less convincing an example, though entirely different, of what the Boston Orchestra can achieve under the German conductor, was offered in Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl." There is no other musician now living who approaches that beautiful work with greater tenderness, with a more exquisite sense of delicacy, with finer poetic perceptions than Dr. Muck. There is none who grasps the true spirit of the music as he does; none who draws so much fragrance from the score; none who seems so thoroughly imbued with the tempi conceived by the composer himself. And the men from Boston answered Dr. Muck's demands in every detail of phrasing, even to the most ethereal pianissimos.

An afternoon of rare delights ended with a refined and poetic reading of Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. Such wonderful achievements as those of yesterday even the Boston Symphony Orchestra could hardly have put to its credit in the tone-muffling weather it had to face on last Thursday night.

M. S.

From EVENING GLOBE
Address New York
Date NOV 11 1912

Orchestra From Boston Heard in Tiresome Music

Bischoff's Symphony a Bore in Spite of Excellent Performance—Rudolph Ganz Plays Korngold Sonata — Persinger and Dimitrieff.

TO-DAY.

Cooper Union—8.15 P. M., concert of the Adèle Margulies Trio.

Metropolitan Opera House—8 P. M., "Manon Lescaut."

Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra wasted a good deal of time for a large number of people Saturday afternoon by exhibiting again in Carnegie Hall Herman Bischoff's E major symphony of a misspent youth. Dr. Muck and his men did a reasonable duty by that symphony in the same hall nearly five years ago. One had supposed it had thereupon been decently and definitively buried, but there it was again on Saturday in all its appalling length. Evidently Dr. Muck has faith in the work, and detects in it beautiful or impressive qualities to which the world in general is deaf, but the trouble is the world in general seems determined to stay deaf to them, so all the eloquence of the Boston orchestra and the special pleader at its head was thrown away.

No doubt there are beauties in Bischoff's score, for there is a good deal in it that in happier days and places was Mendelssohn, Wagner, Richard Strauss, and others. The mistake Bischoff made was not in helping himself to what he happened to want, but in making such poor use of it afterward. When Wagner took his stuff where he found it he had a way of doing something with it that would strike the cry of "Stop, thief!" dumb on the most meticulous lips. Bischoff is least endurable when he is most Bischoff. And this orchestration is so persistently thick and noisy! It is almost needless to say that the performance was one of very high merit, though in vain.

Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture completed the programme, providing such belated recompense as they could for the ordeal of the symphony. The "Siegfried Idyl" was played with quite surpassing loveliness, and of course the "Euryanthe" overture came off in brilliant fashion. The audience was particularly warm in its applause after the former.

OTHER CONCERTS

From SUN
Address: New York NOV
Date

k, 1884

MUSIC BY BISCHOFF TOO LONG DRAWN OUT

Symphony That Deals With a Dissipated and Disappointed Youth.

WORK SUPERBLY PLAYED

Dr. Muck Conducts Boston Symphony Orchestra in Concert of Notable Features.

The first afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The programme consisted of Hermann Bischoff' symphony in E major, opus 16, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. Bischoff is a living composer, now extant in the metropolis of Munich, the seat of Bavarian art and beer, both most admirable in their kind.

Although Mr. Bischoff was ushered into this world in 1868 his sixteenth work, this imposing symphony, was not disclosed to the world till 1906, when it was performed at a concert of the Allgemeiner Musikverein in Essen, where the Krupp guns come from. When and where Dr. Karl Muck first met this seductive score and lost his scholarly heart to it is not a matter of record, but he played it at us in Carnegie Hall on January 9, 1908.

The composer has provided us with a note of introduction to his composition. It runs thus:

"For some years many composers have attached importance to explicit explanations in programme books. My piece has nothing to do with 'programme music.' I believe, however, that there is no music, as there has been no music, which is not programme music in one way or another, inasmuch as there is no musical expression which does not find an analogy either in the world of facts and events or in that of poetic sentiments and sensations. Not to be out of fashion I therefore insist that my symphony presents throughout programme music. It naturally lays claim to be shaped solely in accordance with musical principles.

"In my mind is the story of a young man who, living a wild and debauched life, becomes acquainted with pure happiness when he is no longer worthy of it and therefore cannot possess it.

"He seeks in vain to find peace in resignation (second movement). The ghosts of his misspent youth appear again, as Furies following him, pursuing him (third movement). Again appears that noble and beautiful womanly apparition (intermediate passage) and the voices of darkness, hushed, are quiet. Love of the pure woman delivers us from the filth of life. As one sees, this is an old problem that has often been treated, that has often been solved in many ways. Now if any one hearing the first movement (this is the only one that has a special programme) should see a vision of dissolute night, of orgiastic masked balls; if he believes that he hears passionate love murmuring in gardens flooded with moonlight and vocal with the songs of birds he will then be conscious of what was in the mind of the composer.

"And also if the hearer has only the idea of my work, as the cloudy and foaming must clears into still and noble wine, I may then believe that I have succeeded in working the poetical idea into that which is clearly defined and plastic."

When the present writer listened to this composition in 1908 he was impressed more by its tremendous struggle for delineation than by its musical structure. Yesterday, however, the performance served to disclose more clearly the method of Bischoff and the presence of the master influence of Richard Strauss. The first movement of this prodigious symphony, which takes an hour and a quarter to perform, is decidedly the best.

This movement has a strong, crisply defined and really musical first theme and of this the composer makes excellent technical use in his development. His contrasting theme is characteristic of the morbidity which has fallen on contemporaneous musical expression. It is not easy to resist at this point the temptation to launch into a discussion of the relation of the present fashions in orchestral composition to the life and thought of our time, but we may go so far for the moment as to say that we do not believe that this particular type of musical conception is as close to a realization of the real character of present thought as that of Strauss's "Don Juan" or of some of Debussy's works.

One may if he choose read all sorts of things into this first movement, but let us follow the composer. The young man, leading his life of debauchery, does not revel in the follies of Montmartre, nor the elegant wickedness of Venedig in Wien, nor the sedate dissipations of the Moulin Rouge or the Cafe Riche in Berlin. Nor does he stagger amid exotic sins in Benares or Tiflis. He may be imagined as gambling for death in Stevenson's suicide club or mixing devilments with smoky philosophy in Auerbach's cellar. He sounds like either and makes us feel like both. He has a hard time of it and a long one, for that first movement seems almost as long as the first act of "Gotterdammerung."

The search after peace in the second movement makes one feel that unhappy youth was looking for it somewhere in the Inferno of Dante. Such a truly lugubrious melancholy, trying slow movement has not been heard in many moons. But it is really not worth while to pursue all the ideas to their lairs. The symphony is a largely built work, brilliantly and strongly scored based on sharply conceived thematic germs and worked out at great length. If the composer had condensed his work to two-thirds its present size it would have gained greatly in power.

[illegible] covered itself with glory in the performance of this composition. It is almost impossible to make just comment on the playing of this organization. The ordinary careless concertgoer fails to perceive the size of the gulf which separates such art as this from the entirely respectable and praiseworthy performances to which he is accustomed to listen.

Such a delivery as that of the Bischoff symphony yesterday bears about the same relation to the daily routine orchestral exhibition as Lilli Lehmann's Brunnhilde might have borne to a conventional interpretation of Marguerite.

When these things are said commentators are charged with exalting the Boston Orchestra at the expense of local organizations. It is a pity that those who make these plaints do not realize that the exaltation took place before the announcement of it. Meanwhile there need be no hesitation in asserting that the playing of this appallingly difficult symphony yesterday was a triumph of orchestral perfection and Dr. Muck may rest satisfied that he did all for the composition that can be done for it.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 9 1912

E 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Warm Welcome at Academy to Dr. Karl Muck and Players.

Dr. Karl Muck and the new and the older members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have reason to be pleased at their reception by a big Brooklyn audience in the opera house of the Academy of Music, last evening, when the first in a series of five Philharmonic concerts, under Institute auspices, was given. The welcome to the conductor was neither boisterous nor very long continued, when the curtains were parted, disclosing the instrumentalists; neither was it overdone when the famous conductor appeared after a long absence. The audience rose as a body and applauded vigorously, while Dr. Muck bowed his appreciation. It was a characteristic Brooklyn welcome, neither ecstatic nor sensational, but warm hearted and in a mood of something like veneration for the splendid body of music interpreters, and for their leader. And the audience quickly settled into a receptive attitude.

Interest was chiefly in the direction of a possible change in the style of Dr. Muck's leadership since he was last in control of the baton in Brooklyn. He had been considered rather cold, perhaps owing to his imperturbable attitude, so far as an observer in the audience could see, and this semi-conviction, in memory, was confirmed by the more demonstrative action of Mr. Fiedler, who followed him in recent seasons. But it was seen at once, when he started the orchestra in Beethoven's "Symphony No. 8, in F major," that there is no lack of spirit in Dr. Muck's conducting. No end of talk has been indulged in as to the tempi in the movements of this so-called "little symphony"; Dr. Muck took it very briskly.

Once for all it should be said that Dr. Muck excels in two ways. He makes himself, by a divine gift of intuition, a transparent medium for the transmission of the composer's inmost meaning to an audience, and, beside, he has the trained musician's art of eliciting from his men every minutest shade in nuance and in shading, at the same time preserving due accent, maintaining the exuberance and even, at times, a sheer boisterousness in the composer. Neither is elasticity wanting, nor preservation of the main, emotional curve of the composition.

This Beethoven symphony seemed to almost play itself, like a very improvisation; there was nothing pompous about it. Elasticity was declared at the very beginning, when the phrases in alternate utterance were retarded, followed by the gay turmoil of vigor by all of the choirs, made emphatic by octaves, over which floated the fleecy, first violin notes. There was romance in the way the wood winds brought in their solemn voices, the flute adding doubled romance, only to be interrupted by the dashing in of the trumpets and other brasses and the sportive endeavors of the double basses. And the kettle drums joined in the general merriment. Surely Beethoven was in a merry mood when he wrote the little symphony.

Exquisitely played was the famed scherzando movement, the theme dancing from one mood to another in pure joy. In the swaying, gliding movement colors in the different choirs were delicately pictured and the perfect balance of the score, as written, was made finely effective by the perfect balance of the orchestra. Playfully was uttered the "Ta, ta, ta, lieber Maelzel"; the wood winds ticked, in accordance with the legend associated with the theme, the strings sang over the wood winds and the basses clucked into the game cheerfully. Like the faint fluttering of angels' wings began the menuetto movement, which was also taken quickly, and properly, but not customarily. Yet stately it was, withal. Beautifully did Dr. Muck lead the movement, preserving the individuality of each choir at all times. A joy, too, was the vivacious last movement, the accent sharply given and ponderously tramped in the tambours, set an octave apart. There were Oriental moments and, sometimes, Turkish atmosphere seemed not far away, in the march of an army.

Berlioz's "Le Carnaval Romaine," op. 9, maintained the note of joy, showing Dr. Muck's tact as a programme maker. Romance was voiced in the solo from the wood-wind, and more followed in the pretty instrumental duet, both themes accompanied mainly by the strings, as in the Berlioz opera, "Benvenuto Cellini," A merry saltarello then burst in, each choir chattering and replying to its brethren. With supreme delicacy did Dr. Muck bring back the players to the romantic theme and again let the merry dance go on, the whole ending in a furious clash of cymbals and braying of brasses.

The List "Symphonic Poem," No. 6, "Mazeppa" went like a hurricane of sound. There were wails and shrieks from the picolo, in telling the story, and sympathy came in from the full orchestra, even in the brasses and the lumbering double-brass viols, while the upper strings, in descriptive, running passages, mounted to the heights and descended into the deeps; it was truly a chase. And feelingly was brought into the movement the wailing song given at the beginning. Dramatically given was the pathetic wail for the dead, while the song of the victor made a triumphant close.'

Last came the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," which is almost a concert in itself. No need to comment on it. The wonder grew that Dr. Muck kept each choir so distinct in its work in this masterpiece and yet gave to the whole a clear outline. The difficulty in doing that is only apparent when one considers the contrapuntal workmanship employed by Wagner. Out of the whole, Beckmesser's medieval piping style and the love song of Walther and Eva issued with clarity, and the mastersinger theme at the close was a song of apotheosis. Long applause followed each number.

NOVEMBER 14, BOSTON POST,

PROCTOR SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY

GEORGE PROCTOR,
Soloist at the Symphony concert.

The soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening will be George Proctor, the justly esteemed pianist of this city. Mr. Proctor has had the initiative to choose for his performance a rarely heard but effective work—the second concert of Tschaikowsky, in G major, a piece full of Slavic melody and fire, with a most effective orchestral part.

The orchestral pieces for the programme are not less effective: Sibelius' First Symphony, introduced here with exceptional success by Dr. Muck in the season of 1907-08, a work of exceptional strength and individuality; Charbrier's scintillating Rhapsody on Spanish waltz tunes, "Espana," one of the orchestral masterpieces of the last 50 years, and Glazounoff's sonorous "Overture Sollennelle."

[redacted]

HERALD,

WILL PLAY CONCERTO RARELY HEARD HERE

George Proctor, Pianist, to Perform with Symphony Orchestra.

GEORGE PROCTOR,
Pianist, Who Will Be Soloist at Symphony Concerts This Week; Will Play Tschaikowsky's Seldom Heard Second Concerto in G Major.

The Symphony program of tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening will have a special interest for students of the piano because George Proctor, the pianist, has chosen the second concerto of Tschaikowsky. This concerto has been played only once in this city at a Symphony concert, that 14 years ago by Alexander Siloti. The orchestral pieces will be the first symphony of Sibelius, the overture Solennelle of Glazounoff and the "Espana" rhapsody of Chabrier, which is one of the most popular pieces in the repertory of the orchestra.

TRANSCRIPT,
NOVEMBER 14,

Sibelius's Symphony Again

At the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and Saturday, Dr. Muck will revive Sibelius's symphony in E minor, unplayed here since he produced it in the season of 1906-07. It was unusual and impressive music then; it is no less so now; and its musical interest and its imaginative quality will be better understood and felt in these days when we have heard so many of Sibelius's lesser pieces. Yet it is still worth while by way of preparation, to reprint the paragraphs about the symphony in Mrs. Newmarch's monograph about Sibelius:

> If Sibelius's symphonies prove anything, it is that the vision of Ezekiel in the valley can be perpetually reenacted in the world; that the forms which appear to each succeeding generation as the dry bones of academical tradition can be rearticulated and live again, in beauty and flexibility, if only the breath of genius passes through them. The symphonies of Sibelius are at least as conventional as those of Tchaikowsky and Dvoràk. They bear no indication of any literary basis; they are not fettered to the expression of any particular sentiment, heroic, pathetic, pastoral or even domestic; but they appeal to us and thrill us by the sheer originality, beauty and vigor of the musical idea.
>
> The first symphony in E minor was composed in 1899. The plan of the work is spacious, Sibelius has something to say and takes his time—a liberal forty minutes—in saying it; its structure is solid, but not heavy, while it contains—especially in the finale—an extraordinary wealth of thematic material. From the melancholy, half-pastoral theme given out by the clarinet in the opening bars, to the brief impressive coda with which the work closes, we are conscious of a sweeping tide of virile power; a sustained flight of inspiration that neither flags, nor takes refuge in padding, nor drops into emotional incoherence. My first impression of the work was the essentially "plein air" quality of the music. Sibelius's oneness with nature, and that kind of poetical pantheism which is the inheritance of his race, are evident in every page of this symphony. His orchestral combinations, more especially his use of the woodwind, seem at times direct echoes from the natural world, to the beauty and mystery of which he is peculiarly sensitive. Frequently this music evoked to my vision the color, atmosphere and melancholy grandeur of some masterpiece of Ruysdael. But I must not leave the impression that the symphony is mere landscape painting, such as we find occasionally in the tone-pictures of Smetana or Rimsky-Korsakoff. The vigorous Allegro energico of the first movement would alone contradict this idea; we feel sure that side by side with these reflections from the natural world the entire symphony has some very human and dramatic tale to tell —one of those unrevealed programmes of which we are ever seeking the impalpable solution.

NOVEMBER 16,
HERALD,

SIBELIUS HEARD TO ADVANTAGE

Symphony Orchestra Reveals New Beauties in Music of the North.

By FRANK BERTWALL

Pleasant memories will remain for many a day of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's interpretation of the first symphony of Sibelius yesterday afternoon. It's a particularly interesting symphony and was exceptionally well played. It was a musical treat from the opening measure to the last movement of the baton. Novel in many ways, always interesting and at times inspiring, it aroused the most marked enthusiasm of the present Symphony season. The composer's clever use of the various groups of instruments kept the listener ever alert. Well merited indeed were the outbursts of enthusiasm at the close of each movement and the ovation accorded Dr. Muck at its close. It afforded another proof that the conductor has no peer in selecting programs.

George Proctor, ever a favorite in his home city, added to his laurels in the Tschaikowsky second concerto, though truth to tell, his admirers have heard him to better advantage.

The Glazounoff overture seemed just a bit tame after the grand symphony, but allowance should be made for the fact that the composition hardly does Glazounoff justice.

But what the overture lacked was more than made up in the closing number—Chabrier's "Espana." It was given with spendid dash and appreciation of its many opportunities, and sent the audience away with most pleasant memories of one of the most enjoyable of many satisfactory Symphony concerts.

The appearance of that peerless violinist, Fritz Kreisler, promises to be the feature of the concerts for the coming week.

NOVEMBER 16,
HERALD,

INTENSE RIVALRY IN SUNDAY CONCERTS

Boston Opera House and Symphony Hall Book Stars Same Date.

There is a clash between the Boston Opera House and Symphony Hall. The casus belli is the fact that both managements decided to give Sunday afternoon concerts at which will appear the most brilliant stars of the operatic firmament. The clashing of the managements will result in a decided rivalry in the popularity of the two houses.

On Dec. 1 Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, will give a concert at Symphony Hall. On the same day Vanni Marcoux, the distinguished basso, will sing at the Boston Opera House, accompanied by orchestra and chorus.

On Dec. 8 Mme. Sembrich will be at Symphony Hall, and Mary Garden at the Opera House.

Bostonians will have a chance to vacillate between Mme. Sembrich and Mary Garden. However, as L. A. Mudgett, the manager of Symphony Hall, said, "There is room for us both and enough music lovers in Boston to support both houses. Of course we regret that this situation has occurred, but I do not think our business will suffer."

TRANSCRIPT,
NOVEMBER 16,

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Mr. KREISLER, the eminent violinist, whom a numerous public here has long and warmly admired, will reappear at the Symphony Concerts next week, playing Beethoven's Concerto, between Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony and Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture. On Sunday evening, the orchestra will undertake the first of its two annual concerts for the increase of its Pension Fund. The programme will consist wholly of Wagner's music — overtures, prelude and orchestral excerpts from "Tannhäuser" and "Götterdämmerung." Or Wednesday evening, in Jordan Hall, Mr. Copeland, the pianist, will play Frenc and Spanish music, in which he i unique and on Thursday afternoon, Mr Proctor, will appear in the same room i an exacting programme of pianofort music. For the rest a swarm of mino recitals befall through the week as listed below:

The Symphony Concerts

Dr. Muck has withdrawn Reger's ne "Concerto in the Olden Style" from h programme for the Symphony Concert next week, because the music often treat the first violin and sometimes two first vi lins, as solo instruments. Naturally, M Witek and Mr. Noack were loth to p themselves so against Mr. Kreisler who to play Beethoven's concerto, and the tw pieces might satiate the ears of the a diences with music for the violin. Accordingly, the production of Reger's piece i deferred, and the concerts of next Frida afternoon and Saturday evening will begi with Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, pro ceed with Beethoven's concerto for violin and end with his third "Leonore" over ture—"the" overture of the four. In Beethoven's concerto Mr. Kreisler, returning this year almost exclusively to the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, will doubtless prove once more the fine and multi-colored beauty of his tone, the flowing songfulness and the rare plasticity of his playing of melodies, his elegance in ornament, his art in transition, his musical imagination and sensitive style. It will be good to hear him again.

A Wagner Concert

Once more, on Sunday evening, will the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra profit by the eagerness of this town to hear the music of Wagner even in the concert-room and its knowledge of the impressive and revealing eloquence with which Dr. Muck conducts it with mingled tonal beauty and dramatic fire. As usual, however, the conductor will take nothing from the operas and the music-dramas that requires the dramatic action and picturing of the stage. So, he has limited his programme to the overtures to "Rienzi" and "The Flying Dutchman"; the preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristan," "Die Meistersinger" and "Parsifal"; the music for the dead Siegfried in "Götterdämmerung" and the Venusberg music from "Tannhäuser." In that exciting piece he has not hitherto conducted here.

NOVEMBER 16,
TRANSCRIPT,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A CONTRADICTORY AFTERNOON OF MUSIC

Performance That Excelled Anticipation, but Two Pieces That Disappointed It—The Barrenness of Glazounoff's Overture and the Ill Mating of Tschaikowsky's Concerto with Mr. Proctor—Chabrier's "Espana" and the Music of Spain—The Contrasting Symphony of Sibelius—Its Individuality and Its Force

IN two respects the Symphony Concert of yesterday belied expectations. Once a month the orchestra makes a journey to New York and other cities to the southward, sometimes with incidental concerts along the way. In recent years its more acute public at home has gradually come to mistrust the first concert after a return from these wanderings, because often in it the orchestra has seemed listless, rough and ragged—not so much in the literal sense of these words as according to its usual standards. Yesterday it played without a hint of such fatigue or indifference, at every turn answering to Dr. Muck who also was at the top of his form. Orchestra and conductor, for example, gained the glowing brilliance of tone that Chabrier's gorgeous rhapsody, "España," exacts, yet they did not make the tonal coloring coarse and garish; they held the vivid rhythms lightly and elastically; they were mindful of the many moods of the kaleidescopic music. Contrastingly, yet similarly, they attained the rugged and rigorous tone that Sibelius's symphony in E minor demands; wrought with due wildness its clashes and clangors, and sustained as often (as the composer's mannerism is) his piercing and mournful melody above a stern and shadowed underbody of tone that will scarcely release its voice. Nor did they fall short in his rude and biting rhythms. They were as happy in the ornate pomps of tone in Glazounoff's "Ceremonial Overture" and in its suave contrasting passages. Here was orchestral stateliness. And in Tschaikowsky's concerto, they were equally supple to the considerate reticence that the pianist required and to the freer sweeps and intensities of tone, in the composer's quasi-barbaric vein, that were possible when the solo instrument was silent. Throughout the concert, the differentiating and the characterizing quality of both conductor and orchestra shone.

In the other respect the concert was measurably disappointing. Whenever a piece by Glazounoff is played in a symphony concert in the Western world, unless it is "Stenka Razine" or other of his earlier music, it is the reviewers custom to lament the decline of the composer in freshness and originality of fertilizing idea, in inventive design, in individuality of instrumental treatment. He writes now, they say, conventional pieces in routine fashion and only a little glamors them by the aptness or the amplitude of the instrumental coloring. They could say these things truly of the "Ceremonial Overture" of yesterday's concert. No doubt it has been and will be serviceable music for stately pomps in its native Russia. In a concert-room in America it serves only two purposes—to please for the moment by its pomp of tone and to underscore the anticipations unfulfilled in Glazounoff himself.

Tschaikowsky's concerto in G for piano suffered another sort of handicap. The virtuosi neglect it, flinging themselves in rage of rivalry upon its over-played predecessor. It has become the tacit custom to believe that this second concerto is inferior work in melodic inventiveness, glow of feeling, propulsive and engrossing energy—in all the attributes of a concerto except exacting virtuosity. Perhaps; but we shall never know for certain until some reincarnated Rubinstein, for example, plays it. Such a Slav, master and rhapsodist with the technique of the piano, whirling through the far-flung rhythmic excitements of the finale, intensifying the melodies of the slow movement until they lose their sentimental voice in the accents of melancholy brooding, and sweeping grandiloquently through the first allegro as through passionate improvisation—such a Slav so doing might make this second concerto seem in hearing to match the first. Obviously in beauty and the poignancy of melodies and in tireless energy of self-creation, it will not bear comparative scrutiny.

Mr. Proctor, who played the concerto yesterday, is no such Slav, and wisely he cut away considerable parts of the music that are waste places in themselves unless transforming voice, imagination and emotion make them fertile. Even so, the concerto over-taxed his technical powers and lay almost always beyond the range of his mind and temperament. Bravura that should have sounded like magnificent rhapsody came tamely off his fingers. When he should have seemed to thrill himself and his hearers under the goading of the music, he played carefully, thoughtfully. He could not whip the orchestra before him, as Tschaikowsky likes to make his piano do, and then gather the instrument into the climax of a long and mounting progression. There was little of the Slav intensity of brooding and the Slav poignancy of released expression in Mr. Proctor's singing of the songful melodies. He made them sound from drawing-rooms, not from steppes. He missed the magnificence, the insistent rhetorical expression that must clothe and vitalize this concerto. The audience heard him patiently and applauded him courteously. Between Miss Goodson with the first concerto last winter and Mr. Proctor with the second yesterday, it has learned that this music of Tschaikowsky is not for all temperaments. May the pianists soon make the discovery too.

So, outside orchestra and conductor, the vivid interest of the concert reduced itself to Sibelius's unfamiliar symphony in E minor, which began it, and to Chabrier's familiar rhapsody, "España," which ended it. An hour apart as they were, they made sharp contrast. Chabrier's music is Latin in its brevity—as of the hot feeling of invention, imagination and execution in an impulsive hour—Latin in its passion for glow of instrumental color and bite of incisive rhythm, in its concentrated exuberance half controlled by true Gallic sense of proportion and contrast, in its instinct for clear and sharp impression upon those that hear. The Spain of music is a queer land. Usually remote and even northern composers, like Hugo Wolf or Rimsky-Korsakoff, have dreamed of it and wrought their vision more or less conventionalized into heir tones. Very lately, realists in music, ike Laparra, have written operas about it—tern, sombre, grewsome, full of passio hat smoked ominously out of brooding to ame in savage action and savager tones. Bizet has wrought into Carmen the Spain f romantic imagination. Debussy and Chabrier have been the musical impressionists for this alluring and puzzling Spain. Debussy's "impressions" in "Iberia" have been at once the more subtle and the more superficial—by a queer paradox—and they are much colored by his introspective personality and his peculiar idiom. What Chabrier's lose in subtlety they gain in divining intensity. How he has wrought this music of "España" out of the dance tunes that he hear as he wandered up and down Spain. How he has wrapped it in the glow of his his instrumental colors and whipped—or sometimes bridled it—with its own rhythms. The listener hears; his imagination takes fire. "This," he says, "is the spirit of the Spain that has fascinated so many different imaginations, at last made tones." The reality may go hang. That is not the business of music.

Sibelius's symphony, though the audience received it rather coolly, impressed once more by its manner and its matter, by the individuality and the force that in almost all its attributes distinguish it. Sibelius is quite content with the ordinary symphonic orchestra. It can provide him with all the instrumental interplay and color that his musical design and his emotional stirrings require. He pines neither for six horns nor for two harps, nor yet for the mutterings of bass clarinets or the clackings of xylophones. Similarly, he finds the orthodox symphonic form sufficient to contain his musical thoughts in germ and in development and all the passion of imagination and expression that lies behind them. Yet by main force of creative spirit eager for its peculiar expression, rather than by an adeptness of handling, does he make this symphonic form do his will. In his own individual fashion, too, he works within it. Hear his liking for an isolated and poignant instrument, like the clarinet that begins the symphony. Note his fondness for the piercing entrance of his strings, for the flicks of the harp upon his melodies, for the horns in song. He likes the sudden and bursting climax, with its clash and clangor, rather than the long-sustained, augmented, finally suffusing progression and expansion. He breaks off his movements abruptly rather than ends them, as though they fell suddenly into choking abysses of shadow. Above all, heed the great open spaces of his harmony or, when contrast bids, its clenched compactness; feel the bitter-sweetness, the penetrating, sometimes almost the acrid, voice of his melodies that mourn; note, too, how they seem to cut their way through the firm, dark underbody as some glorified drill might pierce tempered steel.

Of like individuality and impinging force are Sibelius's imagination and emotion. When his symphony clashes and clangs, he might have called it a Vikings' Symphony. Sometimes in the rushes of the first movement, fancy sees them swarming down to the sea over crag and cliff. Sometimes in the great and spacious din of the finale, it hears them smiting with the swords of savage victory and hears them singing its mighty song. (For Sibelius, like most of the moderns, loves on occasion the broad expanse of sustained melody.) Yet a poet—of those days and of this gray north with its empty landscapes, its cold,sunless light, its pervading and compressing isolation—watches these vikings. And watching, he turns his thoughts within and sings sadly, mournfully, his songs of passionate brooding, of longing resignation. And there is no comfort for his spirit—only the momentary release of action, of strife, of victory. Heroically he mourns, heroically he fights. The voice of rude sagas is his voice of battle and triumph. The bleak desolation all about him is in the spirit of his mournful song. When he capers, as he must in the scherzo, he stamps with his heels and bristles with his head. And all things break off . . . . as though the piercing wind and the quick-falling dark had choked them.

H. T. P.

BOSTON AMERICAN—

NOVEMBER 17,

REGER'S CONCERTO IN ANCIENT STYLE

Dr, Muck to Present First of His Promised Symphony Novelties This Week.

The Symphony concerts of this week bring the first novelty of the year, which Dr. Muck promised on his arrival in America. This is Reger's Concerto in Ancient Style for Full Orchestra. In this Reger has sought to embody modern musical thought in the form used by Bach. The work is in three movements and has passages for solo violin.

The Concerto in Ancient Style is his opus 123. It had its first performance in Frankfort-on-Main last month, at one of the Museum's concerts, with Mengelberg conducting. Judging from accounts which have been received concerning it, it contains little to excite the heated discussions which have attended the first performances of his earlier works. The middle movement, a largo, in particular, has been praised as being of very uncommon melodic beauty. The part of the solo violin will, of course, be played by Mr. Witek, the concert master of the orchestra.

Equally important with the performance of the Reger Concerto will be the only appearances here this season of Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, who is to play the Beethoven Concerto. As is generally known, Mr. Kreisler comes to America under an exclusive and limited contract with the Symphony Orchestra. He will be in this country only a few weeks, and is to play at several concerts with the orchestra and in addition will play once or twice in the middle West. It had been intended at first that he should give a recital here, but he has sent word to Mr. Ellis that he prefers to limit his work this year entirely to orchestral performances.

The program as made by Dr. Muck begins with the Reger Concerto, which will be the first part. The second part will consist of the Beethoven Concerto for violin, played by Mr. Kneisel, and Beethoven's "Leonora" overture, No. 3.

NOVEMBER 17,

HERALD,

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The first pension fund concert of the Symphony Orchestra will take place in Symphony Hall tonight at 8 o'clock. The program will be devoted entirely to Wagner's music. Dr. Muck and the orchestra have been at work on the program for the past three weeks, and the same care has been given to its preparation as is given to the preparation of one of the regular Symphony concerts. The entire force of the orchestra will be used as the funeral music from "Goetterdaemmerung" calls for every instrument of a modern band. The program gives in a sense a swift review of the musical development of Wagner, for it begins with "Renzi," the first of his operas, and ends with "Parsifal," the last. The overtures are those to "Rienzi" and the "Flying Dutchman," and the preludes are those to "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," "Die Meistersingers" and "Parsifal." The first part of the program comprises the "Reinzi" and "Flying Dutchman" overtures, introduction and bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser." The second part of the program, running from "Lohengrin" to "Parsifal" will be arranged chronologically.

NOVEMBER 16,

MONITOR,

MUSIC NOTES

GEORGE PROCTOR AT SYMPHONY

With George Proctor as soloist, the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor, rehearsed its fifth program in Symphony hall Friday afternoon, presenting the following works: Sibelius, Symphony No. 1, in E minor, op. 39; Glazounoff, ouverture solennelle, op. 73; Tschaikowsky, concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, G major, op. 44; Chabrier, rhapsody for orchestra, "Espana."

Rarely does it happen that an audience bursts out into loud laughter at the end of the performance of an orchestral scherzo. Many a composer has written the humorous portion of his symphony with the intent of causing a laugh at the close, but seldom has the joke made as palpable a hit as if it were turned out on the lathe of speech. The listener usually has a pleasant little thrill over it and turns to his neighbor and smiles, thankful that music can occasionally touch, even lightly, some other chord but the tragic or the sentimental. But with the closing cadence of the third division of the Sibelius symphony, the matinee audience, one of the hardest, probably in the United States for anybody to take by surprise, could not resist the fun of the music maker of Finland. It was not any kettledrum tomfoolery that raised the laugh, either. It was handfuls and heaps of jocose instrumentation original and witty. It was the talk of a man who knows modern society as Moliere knew seventeenth century Europe.

No better test of the vitality of symphonic writing can be made than the test of its quality of humor. The only composers that hold their own on orchestral programs are those who have a comedy streak in them. Richard Straus, the greatest of satirists since Beethoven and the greatest of all musical caricaturists, is perpetually interesting for the human comedy that lightens up his work. The composers who are most impressively serious are those who have the potential power of humor. Witness Tschaikowsky and Wagner.

To Karl Muck, of course, belongs the credit of a most sympathetic interpretation of the scherzo of the Sibelius First symphony. With anybody else conducting the point of the Finnish joke might have been blunted. The entire symphony was prepared with the greatest care and read consequently with extraordinary freedom. The first and third movements are such interesting pieces of orchestration and expression as to make a repetition of the whole work on some future program of the year worth while. The piece should be one of the numbers to bring the orchestra applause on the second tour of the cities to the south of Boston.

Mr. Proctor was given a difficult task to make a successful number of the Tschaikowsky second piano concerto. Dr. Muck could hardly have complimented a local pianist more highly than by assuring him that his abilities were sufficient to present this work appealingly. No other composer of the first rank could be so tame as Tschaikowsky. The Russian master could pursue an uninteresting trail as simple-heartedly as he could pursue a peak-capturing track unerringly. Of course these are not waste notes in this work. They come to good eventually. They were what the mountaineers call good practise ground. The concerto gets somewhere in the last division, and here Mr. Proctor made the most of a rare moment or two. He is an artist worthy of a better opportunity than he had on Friday. His performance was admirably styled. It is to his great praise that he did not over-interpret the work and try to give the piano part greater importance than it deserves. The good outcome of the occasion is that the symphony listeners know now whether the G major concerto deserves the neglect it has received or not.

The Glazounoff piece was admirably handled by Dr. Muck. The sparkling "Espana" music was in excellent program contrast to the ponderous writing of the sub-Arctic schools of composition represented in the principal numbers, but the orchestra has not yet acquired the lightness it had when it played the rhapsody under Dr. Muck five years ago.

NOVEMBER 16,

MONITOR,

Violinist Who Appears as Symphony Soloist and Gives Sunday Concert

FRITZ KREISLER

The members of the Boston Symphony orchestra who manage the affairs of the pension fund are presenting the orchestra before the public on Sunday evening in a Wagnerian program which will have no other soloist but the new conductor, Karl Muck. Artistic, not financial, economy prompts the men to this plan. An organization that has had the gratuitous assistance in past seasons of artists like Paderewsky, Melba, Schumann-Heink, Elman, Hofmann and Constantino, does not have to search far for a distinguished solo performer to help it call out the public. The program, as already announced, covers practically the entire range of Wagner's activities, comprising the overtures to "Rienzi" and the "Flying Dutchman," the introduction and bacchanale from "Tannhauser," the preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde" "Die Meistersinger" and "Parsifal" and the funeral music from "Gotterdammerung."

The gradual strengthening of the standards of virtuosity in Symphony players has made the retirement fund necessary. Long ago Mr. Gericke found that the best men of Europe were to be engaged for service in the Boston orchestra only on the condition that their positions have some character of permanence. An indefinite term of employment could not be promised to new members. It was seen that if a stipend from a permanent fund could be assured to players at the close of a fair term of employment, contracts could be closed with satisfaction all around. Mr. Gericke and the men of the orchestra instituted the fund themselves and it has gradually grown until now through monthly assessments, a few gifts and the income from special concerts it is sufficient to pension about 20 retired members.

Many of the established orchestras of Europe that are not state-supported are known to have pension funds much larger than the Boston Symphony fund. Loyalty and sympathy with the work are said to characterize the men in those orchestras that have a regular system of retirement. In regard to the standards of the Boston orchestra, the evidence of a member who has joined the institution this year has significant bearing. Mr. Urack, the 'cellist, taking the place of Mr. Schroeder, has won distinction as a conductor of opera and of Symphony concerts in Rhine cities and in Belgrade, Sofia and Bucharest and is said to be competent to direct a concert of the Boston orchestra. He recently remarked on the extraordinary demands made in the Symphony rehearsals. "I never imagined," said Mr. Urack, "that such work was done here. The rehearsals are as thorough as if we were preparing for a chamber music concert. I have never known an orchestra in which the requirements on individual men were so exacting."

Mr. Urack is not only one of the promising new conductors of the day, a man who has proved his abilities in directing the music of the Strauss operas, "Rose Cavalier" and "Salome," but he is a solo 'cellist of distinction. He has been scheduled to perform the Dvorak 'cello concerto at Hartford, Conn., the coming week. Another artist whose recognition in Europe testifies to Boston Symphony standards is the new leader of the second violins, Mr. Habenicht. He has played at the first desk of the first violins at Bayreuth and has been concertmaster of the Symphony orchestra at Kiel.

Many men who were able to perform Beethoven, the program which the orchestra presented 20 years ago, would fall below the requirements of the Strauss programs presented today. Recruits are taken on in increasing numbers each year. And invariably they are of a higher efficiency than the men they displace. There were 17 men put on the retired list last spring, some of them becoming pensioners. It is said that next spring there will be another large retirement list, not in the interest of merely maintaining the standard of virtuoso efficiency but of raising it still higher.

* * *

Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, appears as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the sixth pair of concerts, Nov. 22 and 23. Following the policy to have in each season the exclusive services of at least one artist of the first distinction, Mr. Ellis, the Symphony manager, made with Mr. Kreisler a contract whereby the violinist comes to America for a few weeks to appear in a series of concerts with the orchestra in the East and to make three or four appearances in the middle West. Mr. Kreisler will play the Beethoven Concerto for violin and orchestra. The orchestral numbers of the program are the C major symphony of Mozart and the "Leonora" overture, No. 3, of Beethoven.

* * *

NOVEMBER 17,

POST,

RIVAL CONCERT PLANS READY

Symphony and Opera Orchestras to Play Sundays

BY OLIN DOWNES

There is much public interest in the splendid series of concerts to be given this winter, both at Symphony Hall and at the Boston Opera House, on Sunday afternoons, and there is considerable speculation as to the results of the rivalry, intentional or otherwise, between these two institutions.

On Sunday, Dec. 1, Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, will perform at Symphony Hall, and a programme presenting many important and unfamiliar compositions by Russian composers will be given at the Boston Opera House by the Boston Opera Orchestra, and with Vanni Marcoux, the admirable baritone, foremost among the soloists. On Dec. 8 Mme. Sembrich will sing at Symphony Hall, while Mary Garden and George Copeland will be the soloists at the Opera House. The following week will present an extraordinary contest, Mischa Elman at Symphony Hall, and Ysaye at the Boston Opera House.

For the following two Sundays Symphony Hall has not yet made public its programme, but at the Opera House the offerings will be, on successive Sundays, Tetrazzini, John McCormack, Maria Gay and others in a special performance of Verdi's Requiem.

This rivalry has not, both parties claim, been the result of any idea of competition. Dates have fallen out so. It has long been the idea at Symphony Hall to institute Sunday concerts, and it has been proven conclusively that for these concerts at popular prices there are large audiences available. Meanwhile, both institutions will do their utmost to attract those audiences. The results will be very interesting to watch and of great benefit to music lovers in this city.

Asked to make clear his attitude on this question, Mr. Russell said: "We did not seek competition, but we had scheduled our Sunday concerts for the afternoon before we knew that Symphony Hall was doing likewise. We sent to them asking that they compromise with us, but they did not wish to do so, and we have naturally arranged the strongest bills we could under the circumstances."

At Symphony Hall, Louis Mudgett said: "We are sorry that this situation has come up, but do not think that our business will be affected by it to any great extent. There is room for both of us. I have actually arranged today with a well-known artist for a concert not yet announced, to take place on a Sunday afternoon, so you see we are not worrying."

SUNDAY GLOBE—

—NOVEMBER 17,

Fritz Kreisler Soloist at This Week's Symphonies

Dr Muck has again found it necessary to postpone the first performance in Boston of Reger's "Concerto in Ancient Style" which was announced for this week's Symphony concert. As there is considerable solo violin work in the concerto and as Mr Kreisler is to be the soloist, he thought it better to postpone the Reger piece to another time. Therefore, instead of the "Concerto in Ancient Style" he will play as the first number on the program Mozart's Symphony in C major. "Jupiter."

This will make the program entirely classical, the first one of its kind of the season. As it now stands the first part will consist of Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, the second part Beethoven's concerto and his "Leonora" No. 3 overture, with Mr Fritz Kreisler as soloist in the Beethoven concerto.

Symphony Pension Fund Concert This Evening

At the Pension Fund concert of the Symphony Orchestra this evening at Symphony Hall, the program will be devoted to Wagner's music, comprising two overtures, four preludes, the Introduction and Bacchanale from the first act of "Tannhauser" and the "Funeral Music" from "Gotterdammerung."

Dr Muck and the orchestra have been at work on the program for the past three weeks, and the same care has been given to its preparation as is given to the preparation of one of the regular Symphony concerts. Naturally the entire force of the orchestra will be used, as the "Funeral Music" from "Gotterdammerung" calls for every instrument of a modern band.

The program gives in a sense a review of the musical development of Wagner. The overtures are those to "Rienzi" and the "Flying Dutchman," and the preludes are those to "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," "Die Meistersinger" and "Parsifal."

The first part of the program comprises the "Rienzi" and "Flying Dutchman" overtures and the "Tannhauser" music, exhibiting the early styles of Wagner. The second part of the program, running from "Lohengrin" to "Parsifal," will be arranged chronologically.

ADVERTISER.

NOVEMBER 18.

DR. MUCK CONDUCTS PENSION FUND CONCERT

PROGRAMME WAS ONE OF RARE BEAUTY

Included Many of Wagner's Most Favored Compositions — Audience Taxes Capacity of Symphony Hall.

Last evening in Symphony hall, the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, gave the first concert this season in aid of the pension fund.

The programme was:—

Overture, "Rienzi."
Overture, "The Flying Dutchman."
Introduction and First Scene (Bacchanale), Act I., "Tannhauser" (Paris version).

Prelude to "Lohengrin."
Preleude to "Tristan and Isolde."
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg."
Funeral Music, "Dusk of the Gods."
Prelude, "Parsifal."

The opportunity for materially showing appreciation for the pleasure derived from the concerts of the orchestra always finds a ready and hearty response from music-lovers. Last night being no exception, Symphony hall was filled. The concert was a memorable one and like unto

"The quality of mercy * * * it is twice bless'd.
It blesseth him that gives and him that takes."

The programme was one of rare beauty and unusual interest, while familiarity with the music heightened the enjoyment of it. It is only occasionally that we are privileged to enjoy such a wealth of glowing tone as last night's concert gave us.

The three potent factors which made the concert memorable were: The orchestra, Dr. Muck, Wagner's compositions. Verily this was a combination with which to conjure. Each depended upon and was complemented by the other to consummate the splendid artistic success. The result may be summed up in one word—perfection. The concert was a triumph for the men of the orchestra and its great conductor, Dr. Muck. And, withal, we enjoyed Wagner unquestionably at his best. It is not extravagant to say that it was ideally Wagnerian.

Dr. Muck conducted con amore. He was in his element, and revelled in it. Those who have heard him in this field before knew what to expect and to those who heard him conduct operatic excerpts for the first time, his work was a revelation. His name is synonymous with all that is great in the art. A master hand—a consummate artist to whom conducting is primarily a matter of instinct, he is without a peer in the realm of Wagnerian conductors. Is it not cause for regret that with this eminent interpreter of the genius of Bayreuth in our midst, we are deprived of seeing him in the opera house? Does it not seem profligate of rare talent? Hearing the overture to Tristan as played last night gave a suggestion of what could be expected from the opera as a whole.

Of the compositions played last night the "Introduction and Bacchanale," "Tannhauser," aroused greatest enthusiasm and displayed startling virtuosity in the orchestra. The Bacchanale was all that the name implies. It was played with splendid riotous abandon. Noble sonority of tone, strongly marked rhythms, strict without being angular, rapid passages clearly played without precipitation, characterized the piece. It is doubtful if this Introduction has ever been played in this city with equal effect. Intensely thrilling, it was a remarkable interpretation.

In the "Lohengrin" Prelude the opening measures were exceptionally delicate. The balance of tone was even. Excellent legato and fine gradation of colors, clean-cut attacks, a deliberate and well calculated tempo, and flawless ensemble marked the playing of this excerpt.

There is no doubt that a repetition of this same programme would be welcomed again this season. It would be difficult to find one more attractive and interesting.

F. M. W.

BOSTON POST,

NOVEMBER 18,

FIRST PENSION FUND CONCERT

Paris Version of Tannhauser Enjoyed

Symphony Hall was packed to the doors last night for the first Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, Dr. Muck conducting. Many stood. Dr. Muck gave vigorous and masterly performances of overtures and preludes of Wagner, from the overture to Rienzi to the prelude to Parsifal. There was also the funeral march from "Die Gotterdamerung." The Paris version of the opening scene of Tannhauser followed the overture to that work. This version consists in the extended ballet which Wagner composed for the performance of Tannhauser at the Paris Opera, in 1861. According to the traditions of that theatre, there was to be a ballet on a larger plan than the scene which Wagner had originally composed. The orchestral score of the opening scene has not been played at a Symphony concert since Mr. Nikisch directed the music, more than 20 years ago. It is great music, even if somewhat anachronistic. Tannhauser was first performed in 1845. In 1861 Wagner was at work upon "Tristan" and "Die Meistersinger."

The music gains by this, even if the style of the ballet itself be a little richer than the preceding and succeeding pages. The music last night included also a portion of the scene between Venus and Tannhauser in the Venusberg, the instruments taking the voice parts.

One of the finest performances of the evening was that of the "Tristan" prelude, and the funeral music from "Die Gotterdammerung" was given a strong and heroic reading. Dr. Muck takes the "Meistersinger" prelude faster than any other of the great conductors before the public, but the music is not injured by this treatment. It gains, rather, a youthful glow and an ardent, rapturous character that was surely the thing Wagner had in mind. The audience was exceedingly enthusiastic, and after the performance of the Tannhauser music Dr. Muck was presented with a large wreath with ribbons. He, in turn, made the orchestra rise to its feet in response to the applause.

NOVEMBER 18,

JOURNAL

AID SYMPHONY PENSION FUND

Big Audience Waxes Enthusiastic Over Notable Concert Program.

Ysaye, who was quoted in New York the other day as saying that "Bostonians love to keep their emotions on ice," should have seen the most critical audience of the season, and also one of the largest, let loose enthusiasm at Symphony Hall last night, after an electrifying performance of the bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser," which marked the close of the first part of the Symphony Orchestra's annual fall pension fund concert.

The enthusiasm did not stop with the ovation given Dr. Muck, after a huge beribboned wreath had been hadded up to him. It continued at high pitch for several minutes, until the foremost Wagnerian conductor on this side of the ocean had returned to the platform and signaled to the players to stand up and take some of the honors themselves.

There are performances that put emotions on ice; but this was not one of them.

The crowd was one of the biggest on record at a pension fund concert. The opportunity to hear an all-Wagner program played by the best orchestra in the land, and conducted by one of the men who have shed luster upon the great Wagnerian festivals at Bayreuth, was not to be missed by these nearly 3000 music lovers. The program spanned the full length of Wagner's operatic history, from the "Rienzi" overture, first heard in 1842, to the prelude to "Parsifal," first played at Bayreuth in 1872, the year before the death of the genius to whom the world paid tardy but unprecedented tribute. Last summer Dr. Muck conducted six performances of "Parsifal" at Bayreuth, and he proudly declares that every time he reads this wonderful music he discovers new beauties in it.

The introduction and bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser," commonly known as the Paris version, and not heard here [illegible] more than a decade, was perhaps the most interesting and impressive feature. The bacchanale was played with breathtaking bravura. But it was really hard to choose. The "Flying Dutchman" overture, the "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde" and "Mastersingers" preludes and the funeral music from "The Dusk of the Gods" were all performed as only

---

GLOBE

NOVEMBER 18.

DR MUCK AND WAGNER AT THE PENSION FUND

Popular Program Attracts Large Audience.

Superb Qualities of the Orchestra Were Never More Apparent.

Dr Muck conducted the season's first concert for the pension fund of the orchestra last night. His program comprised a Wagner festival, and when supplemented by the programs of recent weekday concerts it completed an anthology of the music dramas.

Week before last we had the finale of "The Valkyrie," the week before the Siegfried Idyl. Excepting "The Rhinegold," of which the finale is only an occasional orchestral number in the concert hall, an excerpt from each of the composer's mature works from "Rienzi" to "Parsifal," now has been heard played by Dr Muck, and this notwithstanding his artistic scruples against playing the music of the theatre in a symphonic concert, and he is a man as much at home in the repertory and administration of the one as the other.

Dr Muck consented to the following program for the aid of its drawing power for the pension fund, and there will be rejoicing for many days in the memory of the familiar music glorified, even as the excerpts from "Siegfried" and "The Valkyrie" already have been. The numbers were arranged and played chronologically: Overtures to "Rienzi" and to "The Flying Dutchman"; introduction and bacchanale from "Tannhauser;" the preludes to "Lohengrin," to "Tristran and Isolde" and to "The Mastersingers"; funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods"; prelude, "Parsifal."

This morning it may be that this or that passage lingers to enrich the mind. The progress of the numbers disclosed not only the composer's advance in spirituality, but the capacity of the conductor to interpret it. Such presentations of the "Tristan" and the "Lohengrin" preludes are not common, and those so fortunate as to hear these two may treasure them as the memory of a sacrament.

It is doubtful if Dr Muck has vouchsafed to this public such a communication of lofty musical beauty and of poignant emotional intensity as in the preparatory measures to Wagner's supreme tragedy of human passion. Like a great piece of noble architecture it rose before the eyes, towering in the simplicity, the majesty of its outlines. Yet how instinct with the pulsing life of the heart that finds no speech in material things.

Whereas the "Tristan" was filled with the ebb and flow of human rapture and woe, the "Lohengrin" was as a holy ceremonial, as heavenly pageantry filled with spiritual attributes. The ethereal beauty of the opening measures, typical of the descent of the Grail and of its ascension, was beyond the suggestion of the things of this world. The holy vessel was uncovered by reverent hands.

Dr Muck has not at any concert so revealed his type of mind and feeling to be that of the idealist. In the "Tannhauser" there was to be felt the contrast between the spiritual and the sensual upon which the dramatic structure rests. The sacrificial faith of Elisabeth was heard in its unfaltering serenity in the suppressed and sustained line of the pilgrims chant, and in the bacchanale there was the vision, the idealization of sensuous, voluptuous enticing woman. This music is sometimes heard in the opera as that of a drunken orgy. There was idealization even in the tawdry and blatant "Rienzi." Some may quarrel with Dr Muck over his deliberate tempo of Rienzi's prayer, but he at least imparted a new dignity to the circus music that follows.

The epic breadth and grandeur of the funeral music should not be forgotten. It was a memorable part of the evening. Placing the "Parsifal" prelude last kept chronological unity, if at the expense of a brilliant conclusion. There was every mark of appreciation for the eminent conductor, and this no less distinguished orchestra, one which Boston is in danger of taking too much for granted. Never have its superb tonal qualities and artistry been more apparent. A large laurel wreath was carried up to Dr Muck after the "Tannhauser," and conductor and players were heartily applauded.

NOVEMBER 18.

HERALD.

FIRST PENSION FUND CONCERT

Great Audience Applauds Symphony Orchestra in Wagner Program.

Symphony Hall was filled last night to its utmost capacity at the first concert of the season in aid of the Symphony Orchestra's pension fund. With Dr. Muck conducting, a program entirely of Wagner's music was given as follows:

Overture, "Rienzi."
Overture, "The Flying Dutchman."
Introduction and first scene (Bacchanale), act 1, "Tannhauser."
(Paris version.)
Prelude, "Lohengrin."
Prelude, "Tristan and Isolde."
Prelude, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."
Funeral music, "Dusk of the Gods."
Prelude, "Parsifal."

Beginning with examples of the composer's earliest works and ending with "Parsifal," this list furnished as wide a range as was possible in one evening of the varying types of his compositions. The orchestra seemed inspired by the great throng assembled there to aid its fund and made up not only of regular Symphony patrons, but also of a large sprinkling of the general public to do its utmost in interpreting Wagner's different styles of work.

The musicians are always sensitively responsive to the inspiring leadership of Dr. Muck, but last evening they seemed to be especially on their mettle and the result was a concert long to be remembered by those who heard it. Hearty applause followed each number and at the close of the first section of the program a huge laurel wreath was brought forward and given to Dr. Muck. He graciously waved toward the orchestra the plaudits that accompanied this testimonial and the men stood up to acknowledge the warm response that came from the audience.

From EVG. SUN
Address: New York
Date NOV 15 1912

The only opportunities New York will have to hear Fritz Kreisler, the Austrian violinist, this year, will be at the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Dec. 5 and 7.

Kreisler has just arrived, to stay till New Year's, under exclusive contract with the Boston players in the East.

W. B. CHASE.

E 34

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 14 1912

Fritz Kreisler Coming.

The only opportunity Baltimore will have to hear Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, this year, will be at the second Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert, which will be given in the Lyric Theater, Wednesday evening, December 4. Mr. Kreisler has just arrived in this country and will be here until the end of December. He comes under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will appear with no other organization of the kind in the East.

Estab 884

[85]

ADVERTISER.

NOVEMBER 18,

DR. MUCK CONDUCTS PENSION FUND CONCERT

PROGRAMME WAS ONE OF RARE BEAUTY

Included Many of Wagner's Most Favored Compositions — Audience Taxes Capacity of Symphony Hall.

Last evening in Symphony hall, the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, gave the first concert this season in aid of the pension fund.

The programme was:—

Overture, "Rienzi."
Overture, "The Flying Dutchman."
Introduction and First Scene (Bacchanale), Act I., "Tannhauser" (Paris version).

Prelude to "Lohengrin."
Preleude to "Tristan and Isolde."
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg."
Funeral Music, "Dusk of the Gods."
Prelude, "Parsifal."

The opportunity for materially showing appreciation for the pleasure derived from the concerts of the orchestra always finds a ready and hearty response from music-lovers. Last night being no exception, Symphony hall was filled. The concert was a memorable one and like unto

"The quality of mercy * * * it is twice bless'd.
It blesseth him that gives and him that takes."

The programme was one of rare beauty and unusual interest, while familiarity with the music heightened the enjoyment of it. It is only occasionally that we are privileged to enjoy such a wealth of glowing tone as last night's concert gave us.

The three potent factors which made the concert memorable were: The orchestra, Dr. Muck, Wagner's compositions. Verily this was a combination with which to conjure. Each depended upon and was complemented by the other to consummate the splendid artistic success. The result may be summed up in one word—perfection. The concert was a triumph for the men of the orchestra and its great conductor, Dr. Muck. And, withal, we enjoyed Wagner unquestionably at his best. It is not extravagant to say that it was ideally Wagnerian.

Dr. Muck conducted con amore. He was in his element, and revelled in it. Those who have heard him in this field before knew what to expect and to those who heard him conduct operatic excerpts for the first time, his work was a revelation. His name is synonymous with all that is great in the art. A master hand—a consummate artist to whom conducting is primarily a matter of instinct, he is without a peer in the realm of Wagnerian conductors. Is it not cause for regret that with this eminent interpreter of the genius of Bayreuth in our midst, we are deprived of seeing him in the opera house? Does it not seem profligate of rare talent? Hearing the overture to Tristan as played last night gave a suggestion of what could be expected from the opera as a whole.

Of the compositions played last night the "Introduction and Bacchanale," "Tannhauser," aroused greatest enthusiasm and displayed startling virtuosity in the orchestra. The Bacchanale was all that the name implies. It was played with splendid riotous abandon. Noble sonority of tone, strongly marked rhythms, strict without being angular, rapid passages clearly played without precipitation, characterized the piece. It is doubtful if this Introduction has ever been played in this city with equal effect. Intensely thrilling, it was a remarkable interpretation.

In the "Lohengrin" Prelude the opening measures were exceptionally delicate. The balance of tone was even. Excellent legato and fine gradation of colors, clean-cut attacks, a deliberate and well calculated tempo, and flawless ensemble marked the playing of this excerpt.

There is no doubt that a repetition of this same programme would be welcomed again this season. It would be difficult to find one more attractive and interesting.

F. M. W.

BOSTON POST,

NOVEMBER 18,

FIRST PENSION FUND CONCERT

Paris Version of Tannhauser Enjoyed

Symphony Hall was packed to the doors last night for the first Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, Dr. Muck conducting. Many stood. Dr. Muck gave vigorous and masterly performances of overtures and preludes of Wagner, from the overture to Rienzi to the prelude to Parsifal. There was also the funeral march from "Die Gotterdamerung." The Paris version of the opening scene of Tannhauser followed the overture to that work. This version consists in the extended ballet which Wagner composed for the performance of Tannhauser at the Paris Opera, in 1861. According to the traditions of that theatre, there was to be a ballet on a larger plan than the scene which Wagner had originally composed. The orchestral score of the opening scene has not been played at a Symphony concert since Mr. Nikisch directed the music, more than 20 years ago. It is great music, even if somewhat anachronistic. Tannhauser was first performed in 1845. In 1861 Wagner was at work upon "Tristan" and "Die Meistersinger."

The music gains by this, even if the style of the ballet itself be a little richer than the preceding and succeeding pages. The music last night included also a portion of the scene between Venus and Tannhauser in the Venusberg, the instruments taking the voice parts.

One of the finest performances of the evening was that of the "Tristan" prelude, and the funeral music from "Die Gotterdammerung" was given a strong and heroic reading. Dr. Muck takes the "Meistersinger" prelude faster than any other of the great conductors before the public, but the music is not injured by this treatment. It gains, rather, a youthful glow and an ardent, rapturous character that was surely the thing Wagner had in mind. The audience was exceedingly enthusiastic, and after the performance of the Tannhauser music Dr. Muck was presented with a large wreath with ribbons. He, in turn, made the orchestra rise to its feet in response to the applause.

NOVEMBER 18,

JOURNAL

AID SYMPHONY PENSION FUND

Big Audience Waxes Enthusiastic Over Notable Concert Program.

Ysaye, who was quoted in New York the other day as saying that "Bostonians love to keep their emotions on ice," should have seen the most critical audience of the season, and also one of the largest, let loose enthusiasm at Symphony Hall last night, after an electrifying performance of the bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser," which marked the close of the first part of the Symphony Orchestra's annual fall pension fund concert.

The enthusiasm did not stop with the ovation given Dr. Muck, after a huge beribboned wreath had been hadded up to him. It continued at high pitch for several minutes, until the foremost Wagnerian conductor on this side of the ocean had returned to the platform and signaled to the players to stand up and take some of the honors themselves.

There are performances that put emotions on ice; but this was not one of them.

The crowd was one of the biggest on record at a pension fund concert. The opportunity to hear an all-Wagner program played by the best orchestra in the land, and conducted by one of the men who have shed luster upon the great Wagnerian festivals at Bayreuth, was not to be missed by these nearly 3000 music lovers. The program spanned the full length of Wagner's operatic history, from the "Rienzi" overture, first heard in 1842, to the prelude to "Parsifal," first played at Bayreuth in 1872, the year before the death of the genius to whom the world paid tardy but unprecedented tribute. Last summer Dr. Muck conducted six performances of "Parsifal" at Bayreuth, and he proudly declares that every time he reads this wonderful music he discovers new beauties in it.

The introduction and bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser," commonly known as the Paris version, and not heard here in more than a decade, was perhaps the most interesting and impressive feature. The bacchanale was played with breath-taking bravura. But it was really hard to choose. The "Flying Dutchman" overture, the "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde" and "Mastersingers" preludes and the funeral music from "The Dusk of the Gods" were all performed as only

---

GLOBE

NOVEMBER 18.

DR MUCK AND WAGNER AT THE PENSION FUND

Popular Program Attracts Large Audience.

Superb Qualities of the Orchestra Were Never More Apparent.

Dr Muck conducted the season's first concert for the pension fund of the orchestra last night. His program comprised a Wagner festival, and when supplemented by the programs of recent weekday concerts it completed an anthology of the music dramas.

Week before last we had the finale of "The Valkyrie," the week before the Siegfried Idyl. Excepting "The Rhinegold," of which the finale is only an occasional orchestral number in the concert hall, an excerpt from each of the composer's mature works from "Rienzi" to "Parsifal," now has been heard played by Dr Muck, and this notwithstanding his artistic scruples against playing the music of the theatre in a symphonic concert, and he is a man as much at home in the repertory and administration of the one as the other.

Dr Muck consented to the following program for the aid of its drawing power for the pension fund, and there will be rejoicing for many days in the memory of the familiar music glorified, even as the excerpts from "Siegfried" and "The Valkyrie" already have been. The numbers were arranged and played chronologically: Overtures to "Rienzi" and to "The Flying Dutchman"; introduction and bacchanale from "Tannhauser;" the preludes to "Lohengrin," to "Tristran and Isolde" and to "The Mastersingers"; funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods"; prelude, "Parsifal."

This morning it may be that this or that passage lingers to enrich the mind. The progress of the numbers disclosed not only the composer's advance in spirituality, but the capacity of the conductor to interpret it. Such presentations of the "Tristan" and the "Lohengrin" preludes are not common, and those so fortunate as to hear these two may treasure them as the memory of a sacrament.

It is doubtful if Dr Muck has vouchsafed to this public such a communication of lofty musical beauty and of poignant emotional intensity as in the preparatory measures to Wagner's supreme tragedy of human passion. Like a great piece of noble architecture it rose before the eyes, towering in the simplicity, the majesty of its outlines. Yet how instinct with the pulsing life of the heart that finds no speech in material things.

Whereas the "Tristan" was filled with the ebb and flow of human rapture and woe, the "Lohengrin" was as a holy ceremonial, as heavenly pageantry filled with spiritual attributes. The ethereal beauty of the opening measures, typical of the descent of the Grail and of its ascension, was beyond the suggestion of the things of this world. The holy vessel was uncovered by reverent hands.

Dr Muck has not at any concert so revealed his type of mind and feeling to be that of the idealist. In the "Tannhauser" there was to be felt the contrast between the spiritual and the sensual upon which the dramatic structure rests. The sacrificial faith of Elisabeth was heard in its unfaltering serenity in the suppressed and sustained line of the pilgrims chant, and in the bacchanale there was the vision, the idealization of sensuous, voluptuous enticing woman. This music is sometimes heard in the opera as that of a drunken orgy. There was idealization even in the tawdry and blatant "Rienzi." Some may quarrel with Dr Muck over his deliberate tempo of Rienzi's prayer, but he at least imparted a new dignity to the circus music that follows.

The epic breadth and grandeur of the funeral music should not be forgotten. It was a memorable part of the evening. Placing the "Parsifal" prelude last kept chronological unity, if at the expense of a brilliant conclusion. There was every mark of appreciation for the eminent conductor, and this no less distinguished orchestra, one which Boston is in danger of taking too much for granted. Never have its superb tonal qualities and artistry been more apparent. A large laurel wreath was carried up to Dr Muck after the "Tannhauser," and conductor and players were heartily applauded.

NOVEMBER 18.

HERALD,

FIRST PENSION FUND CONCERT

Great Audience Applauds Symphony Orchestra in Wagner Program.

Symphony Hall was filled last night to its utmost capacity at the first concert of the season in aid of the Symphony Orchestra's pension fund. With Dr. Muck conducting, a program entirely of Wagner's music was given as follows:

Overture, "Rienzi."
Overture, "The Flying Dutchman."
Introduction and first scene (Bacchanale), act 1, "Tannhauser."
(Paris version.)
Prelude, "Lohengrin."
Prelude, "Tristan and Isolde."
Prelude, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."
Funeral music, "Dusk of the Gods."
Prelude, "Parsifal."

Beginning with examples of the composer's earliest works and ending with "Parsifal," this list furnished as wide a range as was possible in one evening of the varying types of his compositions. The orchestra seemed inspired by the great throng assembled there to aid its fund and made up not only of regular Symphony patrons, but also of a large sprinkling of the general public to do its utmost in interpreting Wagner's different styles of work.

The musicians are always sensitively responsive to the inspiring leadership of Dr. Muck, but last evening they seemed to be especially on their mettle and the result was a concert long to be remembered by those who heard it. Hearty applause followed each number and at the close of the first section of the program a huge laurel wreath was brought forward and given to Dr. Muck. He graciously waved toward the orchestra the plaudits that accompanied this testimonial and the men stood up to acknowledge the warm response that came from the audience.

From EVG. SUN
Address: New York
Date

The only opportunities New York will have to hear Fritz Kreisler, the Austrian violinist, this year, will be at the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Dec. 5 and 7.

Kreisler has just arrived, to stay till New Year's, under exclusive contract with the Boston players in the East.

W. B. CHASE.

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

Fritz Kreisler Coming.

The only opportunity Baltimore will have to hear Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, this year, will be at the second Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert, which will be given in the Lyric Theater, Wednesday evening, December 4. Mr. Kreisler has just arrived in this country and will be here until the end of December. He comes under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will appear with no other organization of the kind in the East.

From PRESS
Address: New York
Date 8 1912

The grim spectre of war casts its ghastly shadow even into the world artistic. Almost to the moment of his sailing, Fritz Kreisler, who has just arrived in America under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was left in doubt as to whether he could actually fulfill his six weeks' engagement in this country. The famous violinist, it seems, is not only expert with his bow. He is, indeed, an officer in the First Reserve of the Austrian army, and that was why he received a notice to hold himself in readiness to join at short notice the Uhlan regiment of which he is a member. Luckily, however, he was able to procure a temporary release with the understanding that should the mobilization of the entire Austrian army take place he would sail for home post-haste.

What a sensation it would create if Kreisler, in the midst of his artistic activities with the Boston Orchestra, should be served with a call to arms! How distressing, though, to his many admirers here and abroad, if his virtuoso hand, insured, no doubt, for some fabulous sum, would have to grip the murderous hilt of a sabre instead of balancing on resonant strings the magic rod of his art!

MAX SMITH.

From POST
Address: New York
Date 1912

MUSIC IN BOSTON.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Programmes. With Historical and Descriptive Notes by Philip Hale. Boston: C. A. Ellis.

The bound volume containing the home programmes for 1911-1912 of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a book of 1,594 pages. More than half of these pages are filled with advertisements. Now that this orchestra has become so popular and prosperous, it is to be hoped that these advertisements may soon be printed and paged separately from the reading matter, so that they need not be bound up with it. The programmes themselves thoroughly deserve being bound and preserved. They contain a good deal of valuable reading matter in addition to Mr. Hale's erudite yet entertaining and sane notes on the pieces played at the season's twenty-four concerts. Each of the programmes has a footnote imparting the information that there will be an intermission of ten minutes after the symphony. In order that the Boston music-lover's mind may not be arrested in its quest of culture even during that brief interval of time, Mr. Hale always provides a literary entr'acte, consisting either of an article on some general musical topic from his own workshop, or else, and more frequently, a paper reprinted from some English or American periodical. This Programme Book thus comes once a year as a life-preserver for a good deal that is valuable in contemporary journalistic literature.

Mr. Hale himself descants on Beethoven the Pianist, The Beginning of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Bruckner, Color, Tonal and Colored Audition, Works of Liszt Played by the Boston Orchestra, Salome and Her Dance, The Triangle, Wagner's Account of Himself. Mr. Hale's predecessor, W. F. Apthorp, provides interesting reminiscences of earlier years of the Boston Orchestra. Barry writes about Liszt and the Symphonic Poem; Newman on Bantock, Wallace, and Elgar's Second Symphony; Runciman on England's Lack of Great Musicians and on Brünnhilde's Self-Immolation, on which subject Bernard Shaw is also quoted. Of special interest are the reprints from the London Times of papers on Cathedral Festivals, A Chopin Relic, Humor and Quotation, Mannerisms, Musical Patriotism, Post-Wagnerian Opera, Science and Singing. A good index makes it easy to find what one happens to be interested in, and this index also embraces those incidental references and footnotes which are a specialty of Mr. Hale's and many of which contain information hard to find elsewhere.

French music is a particular object of Mr. Hale's admiration; he keeps his eyes open for everything relating to it, and no one who gets this annual record is likely to miss anything of importance. While Saint-Saëns towers high above all French composers of the day, the most prominent of them, and the most widely discussed, is Debussy. Under the head of "Cor and Debussy" Mr. Hale gives a bird's-eye view of contemporary French and German opinion on this exotic composer. An article from the pen of Raphael Cor entitled "M. Claude Debussy et le Snobisme Contemporain" aroused a good deal of discussion. The Revue du Temps Présent, in which this article appeared, thereupon sent a circular to a number of prominent European musicians, asking them to answer certain questions relating to that composer. Thirty of the answers were printed in a small volume which M. Debussy must have read with mingled feelings of pride and indignation. What he read, among many other things, was that he is a musician without parallel; that he is original, but only negatively so: "take away from music rhythm, melody, and emotion, and you have defined Debussy's musical works." The monotony of his music "stupifies the hearer." It leads to reveries; it is a mosaic of chords; the passionate admiration of it is in Paris "a disease of the season, or a crisis." There are many vain imitations of it—childish apings. He was just the man to work in sympathy with Maeterlinck, the "Shakespeare for snobs." Among the thirty whose answers are printed in the volume referred to are Siegfried Wagner, who says regarding "Pelléas et Mélisande": "I heard only one act, and no one should judge after one act." Another composer, Reynaldo Hahn, wrote that, while he held Debussy in high honor, he was not a Debussyite, and regarded Debussyites as unfortunate persons. Paul Flat agreed with M. Cor that there is "an enormous part of snobbism and bluff" in the reputation of Debussy. The most amusing thing in the volume is a remark contributed by Romain Rolland, whose novel in nine volumes, "Jean Christophe," has found so many readers and admirers. In answer to the question whether Debussy is likely to found a school, he writes: "Every great artist has a school. Every school is injurious. Would it not, then, be better if there were no great artists?"

A Calendar of Concerts.

November.

17—Volpe Symphony Orchestra, afternoon, Republic Theatre.
17—Volpe Symphony Orchestra, evening, Aeolian Hall.
17—New York Symphony Orchestra, afternoon, Aeolian Hall.
17—Philharmonic Orchestra, afternoon, Carnegie Hall.
19—Ysaye, violin recital, afternoon, Carnegie Hall.
20—John Thompson, piano recital, afternoon, Aeolian Hall.
20—Alwin and Hedwig Schroeder, 'cello and piano recital, evening, Aeolian Hall.
21—Aline Stillman, piano recital, afternoon, Carnegie Lyceum.
21—Gracia Ricardo, song recital, afternoon, Aeolian Hall.
21—Philharmonic Society, evening, Carnegie Hall.
21—Russian Symphony Orchestra, evening, Aeolian Hall.
22—New York Symphony Orchestra, afternoon, Aeolian Hall.
22—Philharmonic Society, afternoon, Carnegie Hall.
22—Antoinette Szumowska, piano recital, afternoon, Berkeley Theatre.
23—Young People's Concert, afternoon, Carnegie Hall.
24—New York Symphony Orchestra, afternoon, Aeolian Hall.
—Titta Ruffo, concert, evening, Carnegie Hall.
lden Miller, piano and song recital, afternoon, Rumford Hall.
Symphony Orchestra, evening, Carnegie Hall.
d Mary Garden, afternoon, Carnegie Hall.
renrath, song recital, Aeolian Hall.
sky, piano recital, Carnegie Hall.
rchestra, evening,
ska, piano recital, Berkeley Theatre.
tra, afternoon, all.
n recital, afternoon, Hall.

From TIMES
Address: New York
Date 7 1 9

Established: 1

Correspondents of THE TIMES have expressed disapproval of the excess of Wagnerian selections that has appeared in the two programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra already performed in New York. They also betray a fear lest there should be a continuance of this "Wagnerian policy" in the concerts to come. So far as Dr. Muck and the Boston Orchestra are concerned, we fancy there will be little cause for apprehension. Dr. Muck has, and has expressed, strong objection to giving "excerpts" from Wagner on the concert platform. In the two years in which he was formerly conductor of the orchestra he gave in his forty-eight Boston concerts only five Wagnerian excerpts. Of these two were preludes to dramatic works; those to "Rienzi" and "Die Meistersinger." The others were the "Siegfried Idyll," "Eine Faust Ouverture" and the "Kaisermarsch," none of which belong to, or are taken from an opera or music drama, but were composed and intended as orchestral pieces for separate performance in concert programmes.

It will be remembered that the two Wagnerian numbers in his first two New York programmes this season were the "Siegfried Idyll" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." Now, the "Siegfried Idyll" is indeed made up in large part of themes from the music drama of "Siegfried;" but their development is new, and it is a piece by itself, which Wagner composed for the birthday of his wife, Cosima, and first performed as a morning serenade on the steps of his villa at Triebschen, Wagner himself conducting—all of which was duly set forth in Mr. Hale's admirable programme notes. The composition has been universally taken into the concert repertory by orchestral conductors the world over, and necessarily belong there and nowhere else. As for the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," it is scarcely less available for use as a number and shares this not only with other Wagner overtures and preludes—those "The Flying Dutchman," "Lohengrin," "Tristan e," and "Parsifal"—but also most of the other great operatic overtures—Gluck's, Mozart's, Beethoven's, Weber's, Schubert's, Schumann's and those of later composers, whether the operas to which they belong are often given or not. It is fairly certain that not only orchestral conductors, but their listeners as well, would feel that they had lost a great deal if these overtures were withdrawn from the concert lists.

⁂

On general principles, however, the objections to Wagnerian excerpts as such are well founded, so far as they relate to fragments taken from the dramatic portions of the works, wrested from their context and deprived of the stage setting of action, scenery and declamation that the composer intended to be an inherent part of them. Wagner himself did indeed make or authorize certain excerpts of this sort, in direct contravention of his own principles. The excuse made for them was the need in the early days of his struggle to get his music before the public in some way or other. There is now no such need in the chief operatic cities; and there is none in New York, where the music dramas are so frequently and so well performed. The climax of absurdity is reached when a dramatic soprano giving a song recital thinks it advisable to appear on the platform gowned, gloved and hatted, and discharge the "Ho-jo-to-ho" of Brunnhilde from the beginning of the second act of "Die Walkure"—sometimes even to the pattering accompaniment of a pianoforte.

Of course, THE TIMES's correspondents

From TIMES
Address: New York
Date ......NOV 1 1912

The first symphony concert for young people for the current season will be given on next Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The programme is entitled "Beethoven, Master of the Symphony," and consists entirely of the works of this composer. Walter Damrosch will give an introductory talk on the orchestra of Beethoven's day, and will then lead the forces of the New York Symphony Orchestra in the eighth symphony. Miss Irma Seydel, the soloist, is one of the youngest violinists on the concert stage, but notwithstanding her youth she has appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Gurzenich Orchestra of Cologne, and at the Worcester Music Festival in October of this year. The programme follows: Symphony No. 8 in F major; Romanze in G, Romanze in F, for violin, with orchestral accompaniment; "A Turkish March," from the "Ruins of Athens."

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York.
Date ......NOV 17 1912

The only opportunities New York will have this year to hear Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, will be at the second Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, to be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 5, and Saturday afternoon, December 7. Mr. Kreisler has just arrived in this country, and will be here until the end of December. He will give no recitals. In this city he will play the Beethoven concerto at one concert and the Brahms at the other.

1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From SUN
Address: New York
Date 1912

The only opportunities New York will have to hear Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, this year will be at the second Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, which will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 5, and Saturday afternoon, December 7. Mr. Kreisler has just arrived in this country and will be here until the end of December. He comes under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will appear with no other organization of the kind in the East. He will give no recitals. In this city he will play the Beethoven concerto at one concert and the Brahms at the other.

1884

From SUN
Address: New York
Date ......

The first Symphony concert for young people for the current season will be given next Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The programme is entitled "Beethoven, Master of the Symphony," and consists entirely of works by this great composer. Walter Damrosch will give an introductory talk on the orchestra of Beethoven's time and will then lead the forces of the New York Symphony Orchestra through the graceful melodies and whimsical rhythms of the Eighth Symphony, "my little symphony," as Beethoven himself affectionately called it. Miss Irma Seydel, the soloist, is one of the youngest violinists on the concert stage, but notwithstanding her youth she has appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and three times with the famous Gürzenich Orchestra of Cologne. She was also one of the soloists at the Worcester music festival in October of this year. The programme follows: Symphony No. 8 in F major, Romanze in G, Romanze in F, violin with orchestral accompaniment, and a Turkish march from "The Ruins of Athens."

1884

From PRESS
Address: New York
Date ......

BEETHOVEN.

Dr. Karl Muck is gifted in many ways, among others with a sense of the fitness of things, of dramatic arrangement, of a beginning a middle and an end. Witness the programme of the concert in which he returns as to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The programme of the evening, the programme of the season, began with Beethoven, and the biggest Beethoven, "Eroica." When the place was echoing and re-echoing with the magnificent music it seemed, indeed, as if the season as well as the concert, was beginning. It is this sense of unity, the consideration of all the parts that go to make up the whole, the whole of anything, that denotes the artist. It certainly denotes Dr. Muck.

♣ ♣ ♣

From POST
Address: New York
Date 6 1912

The only opportunities New York will have to hear Fritz Kreisler, the incomparable violinist, this year will be at the second Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts which will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 5, and Saturday afternoon, December 7. Mr. Kreisler has just arrived in this country, and will be here until the end of December. He comes under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will appear with no other organization of the kind in the East. He will give no recitals. In this city he will play the Beethoven Concerto at one concert, and the Brahms at the other. Up to the time of his sailing there was considerable doubt whether he would be able to fulfil his engagements. Mr. Kreisler is an officer in the First Reserve of the Austrian army, and had received notice to hold himself in readiness to join his regiment, which is one of the Uhlan regiments of the service. Arrangements were made, however, by which he was released for the time being, but with the understanding that, should the mobilization of the entire Austrian army take place, he should be ready to sail on short notice.

[86]

From PRESS
Address: New York
Date NOV 18 1912

The grim spectre of war casts its ghastly shadow even into the world artistic. Almost to the moment of his sailing, Fritz Kreisler, who has just arrived in America under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was left in doubt as to whether he could actually fulfill his six weeks' engagement in this country. The famous violinist, it seems, is not only expert with his bow. He is, indeed, an officer in the First Reserve of the Austrian army, and that was why he received a notice to hold himself in readiness to join at short notice the Uhlan regiment of which he is a member. Luckily, however, he was able to procure a temporary release with the understanding that should the mobilization of the entire Austrian army take place he would sail for home post-haste.

What a sensation it would create if Kreisler, in the midst of his artistic activities with the Boston Orchestra, should be served with a call to arms! How distressing, though, to his many admirers here and abroad, if his virtuoso hand, insured, no doubt, for some fabulous sum, would have to grip the murderous hilt of a sabre instead of balancing on resonant strings the magic rod of his art!

MAX SMITH.

From POST
Address: New York
Date 1912

MUSIC IN BOSTON.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Programmes. With Historical and Descriptive Notes by Philip Hale. Boston: C. A. Ellis.

The bound volume containing the home programmes for 1911-1912 of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a book of 1,594 pages. More than half of these pages are filled with advertisements. Now that this orchestra has become so popular and prosperous, it is to be hoped that these advertisements may soon be printed and paged separately from the reading matter, so that they need not be bound up with it. The programmes themselves thoroughly deserve being bound and preserved. They contain a good deal of valuable reading matter in addition to Mr. Hale's erudite yet entertaining and sane notes on the pieces played at the season's twenty-four concerts. Each of the programmes has a footnote imparting the information that there will be an intermission of ten minutes after the symphony. In order that the Boston music-lover's mind may not be arrested in its quest of culture even during that brief interval of time, Mr. Hale always provides a literary entr'acte, consisting either of an article on some general musical topic from his own workshop, or else, and more frequently, a paper reprinted from some English or American periodical. This Programme Book thus comes once a year as a life-preserver for a good deal that is valuable in contemporary journalistic literature.

Mr. Hale himself descants on Beethoven the Pianist, The Beginning of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Bruckner, Color, Tonal and Colored Audition, Works of Liszt Played by the Boston Orchestra, Salome and Her Dance, The Triangle, Wagner's Account of Himself. Mr. Hale's predecessor, W. F. Apthorp, provides interesting reminiscences of earlier years of the Boston Orchestra. Barry writes about Liszt and the Symphonic Poem; Newman on Bantock, Wallace, and Elgar's Second Symphony; Runciman on England's Lack of Great Musicians and on Brünnhilde's Self-Immolation, on which subject Bernard Shaw is also quoted. Of special interest are the reprints from the London Times of papers on Cathedral Festivals, A Chopin Relic, Humor and Quotation, Mannerisms, Musical Patriotism, Post-Wagnerian Opera, Science and Singing. A good index makes it easy to find what one happens to be interested in, and this index also embraces those incidental references and footnotes which are a specialty of Mr. Hale's and many of which contain information hard to find elsewhere.

French music is a particular object of Mr. Hale's admiration; he keeps his eyes open for everything relating to it, and no one who gets this annual record is likely to miss anything of importance. While Saint-Saëns towers high above all French composers of the day, the most prominent of them, and the most widely discussed, is Debussy. Under the head of "Cor and Debussy" Mr. Hale gives a bird's-eye view of contemporary French and German opinion on this exotic composer. An article from the pen of Raphael Cor entitled "M. Claude Debussy et le Snobisme Contemporain" aroused a good deal of discussion. The Revue du Temps Présent, in which this article appeared, thereupon sent a circular to a number of prominent European musicians, asking them to answer certain questions relating to that composer. Thirty of the answers were printed in a small volume which M. Debussy must have read with mingled feelings of pride and indignation. What he read, among many other things, was that he is a musician without parallel; that he is original, but only negatively so: "take away from music rhythm, melody, and emotion, and you have defined Debussy's musical works." The monotony of his music "stupifies the hearer." It leads to reveries; it is a mosaic of chords; the passionate admiration of it is in Paris "a disease of the season, or a crisis." There are many vain imitations of it—childish apings. He was just the man to work in sympathy with Maeterlinck, the "Shakespeare for snobs." Among the thirty whose answers are printed in the volume referred to are Siegfried Wagner, who says regarding "Pelléas et Mélisande": "I heard only one act, and no one should judge after one act." Another composer, Reynaldo Hahn, wrote that, while he held Debussy in high honor, he was not a Debussyite, and regarded Debussyites as unfortunate persons. Paul Fl[illegible] agreed with M. Cor that there is "an enormous part of snobbism and bluff" in the reputation of Debussy. The most amusing thing in the volume is a remark contributed by Romain Rolland, whose novel in nine volumes, "Jean Christophe," has found so many readers and admirers. In answer to the question whether Debussy is likely to found a school, he writes: "Every great artist has a school. Every school is injurious. Would it not, then, be better if there were no great artists?"

A Calendar of Concerts.

November.

17—Volpe Symphony Orchestra, afternoon, Republic Theatre.
17—Volpe Symphony Orchestra, evening, Aeolian Hall.
17—New York Symphony Orchestra, afternoon, Aeolian Hall.
17—Philharmonic Orchestra, afternoon, Carnegie Hall.
19—Ysaye, violin recital, afternoon, Carnegie Hall.
20—John Thompson, piano recital, afternoon, Aeolian Hall.
20—Alwin and Hedwig Schroeder, 'cello and piano recital, evening, Aeolian Hall.
21—Aline Stillman, piano recital, afternoon, Carnegie Lyceum.
21—Gracia Ricardo, song recital, afternoon, Aeolian Hall.
21—Philharmonic Society, evening, Carnegie Hall.
21—Russian Symphony Orchestra, evening, Aeolian Hall.
22—New York Symphony Orchestra, afternoon, Aeolian Hall.
22—Philharmonic Society, afternoon, Carnegie Hall.
22—Antoinette Szumowska, piano recital, afternoon, Berkeley Theatre.
23—Young People's Concert, afternoon, Carnegie Hall.
24—New York Symphony Orchestra, afternoon, Aeolian Hall.
25—Titta Ruffo, concert, evening, Carnegie Hall.
26—Selden Miller, piano and song recital, afternoon, Rumford Hall.
26—Volpe Symphony Orchestra, evening. Carnegie Hall.
26—Ysaye and Mary Garden, afternoon, Carnegie Hall.
26—Reinald Werrenrath, song recital, evening, Aeolian Hall.
27—Leopold Godowsky, piano recital, afternoon, Carnegie Hall.
28—Philharmonic Orchestra, evening, Carnegie Hall.
29—Antoinette Szumowska, piano recital, afternoon, Berkeley Theatre.
29—Philharmonic Orchestra, afternoon, Carnegie Hall.
30—Mischa Elman, violin recital, afternoon, Carnegie Hall.

From TIMES
Address: New York
Date

Established: 1

Correspondents of THE TIMES have expressed disapproval of the excess of Wagnerian selections that has appeared in the two programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra already performed in New York. They also betray a fear lest there should be a continuance of this "Wagnerian policy" in the concerts to come. So far as Dr. Muck and the Boston Orchestra are concerned, we fancy there will be little cause for apprehension. Dr. Muck has, and has expressed, strong objection to giving "excerpts" from Wagner on the concert platform. In the two years in which he was formerly conductor of the orchestra he gave in his forty-eight Boston concerts only five Wagnerian excerpts. Of these two were preludes to dramatic works; those to "Rienzi" and "Die Meistersinger." The others were the "Siegfried Idyll," "Eine Faust Ouverture" and the "Kaisermarsch," none of which belong to, or are taken from an opera or music drama, but were composed and intended as orchestral pieces for separate performance in concert programmes.

It will be remembered that the two Wagnerian numbers in his first two New York programmes this season were the "Siegfried Idyll" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." Now, the "Siegfried Idyll" is indeed made up in large part of themes from the music drama of "Siegfried;" but their development is new, and it is a piece by itself, which Wagner composed for the birthday of his wife, Cosima, and first performed as a morning serenade on the steps of his villa at Triebschen, Wagner himself conducting—all of which was duly set forth in Mr. Hale's admirable programme notes. The composition has been universally taken into the concert repertory by orchestral conductors the world over, and necessarily belong there and nowhere else. As for the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," it is scarcely less available for use as a concert number and shares this availibility not only with other Wagnerian overtures and preludes—those to "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhauser," "Lohengrin," "Tristan und Isolde," and "Parsifal"—but also with most of the other great operatic overtures—Gluck's, Mozart's, Beethoven's, Weber's, Schubert's, Schumann's and those of later composers, whether the operas to which they belong are often given or not. It is fairly certain that not only orchestral conductors, but their listeners as well, would feel that they had lost a great deal if these overtures were withdrawn from the concert lists.

⁂

On general principles, however, the objections to Wagnerian excerpts as such are well founded, so far as they relate to fragments taken from the dramatic portions of the works, wrested from their context and deprived of the stage setting of action, scenery and declamation that the composer intended to be an inherent part of them. Wagner himself did indeed make or authorize certain excerpts of this sort, in direct contravention of his own principles. The excuse made for them was the need in the early days of his struggle to get his music before the public in some way or other. There is now no such need in the chief operatic cities; and there is none in New York, where the music dramas are so frequently and so well performed. The climax of absurdity is reached when a dramatic soprano giving a song recital thinks it advisable to appear on the platform gowned, gloved and hatted, and discharge the "Ho-jo-to-ho" of Brunnhilde from the beginning of the second act of "Die Walkure"—sometimes even to the pattering accompaniment of a pianoforte.

Of course, THE TIMES's correspondents

From TIMES
Address: New York
Date

The first symphony concert for young people for the current season will be given on next Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The programme is entitled "Beethoven, Master of the Symphony," and consists entirely of the works of this composer. Walter Damrosch will give an introductory talk on the orchestra of Beethoven's day, and will then lead the forces of the New York Symphony Orchestra in the eighth symphony. Miss Irma Seydel, the soloist, is one of the youngest violinists on the concert stage, but notwithstanding her youth she has appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Gurzenich Orchestra of Cologne, and at the Worcester Music Festival in October of this year. The programme follows: Symphony No. 8 in F major; Romanze in G, Romanze in F, for violin, with orchestral accompaniment; "A Turkish March," from the "Ruins of Athens."

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York.
Date NOV 17 1912

The only opportunities New York will have this year to hear Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, will be at the second Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, to be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 5, and Saturday afternoon, December 7. Mr. Kreisler has just arrived in this country and will be here until the end of December. He will give no recitals. In this city he will play the Beethoven concerto at one concert and the Brahms at the other.

1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From SUN
Address: New York
Date

The only opportunities New York will have to hear Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, this year will be at the second Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, which will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 5, and Saturday afternoon, December 7. Mr. Kreisler has just arrived in this country and will be here until the end of December. He comes under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will appear with no other organization of the kind in the East. He will give no recitals. In this city he will play the Beethoven concerto at one concert and the Brahms at the other.

1884

From SUN
Address: New York
Date

The first Symphony concert for young people for the current season will be given next Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The programme is entitled "Beethoven, Master of the Symphony," and consists entirely of works by this great composer. Walter Damrosch will give an introductory talk on the orchestra of Beethoven's time and will then lead the forces of the New York Symphony Orchestra through the graceful melodies and whimsical rhythms of the Eighth Symphony, "my little symphony," as Beethoven himself affectionately called it. Miss Irma Seydel, the soloist, is one of the youngest violinists on the concert stage, but notwithstanding her youth she has appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and three times with the famous Gürzenich Orchestra of Cologne. She was also one of the soloists at the Worcester music festival in October of this year. The programme follows: Symphony No. 8 in F major, Romanze in G, Romanze in F, violin with orchestral accompaniment, and a Turkish march from "The Ruins of Athens."

1884

From PRESS
Address: New York
Date

BEETHOVEN.

Dr. Karl Muck is gifted in many ways, among others with a sense of the fitness of things, of dramatic arrangement, of a beginning a middle and an end. Witness the programme of the concert in which he returns as to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The programme of the evening, the programme of the season, began with Beethoven, and the biggest Beethoven. "Eroica." When the place was echoing and reechoing with the magnificent music it seemed, indeed, as if the season as well as the concert, was beginning. It is this sense of unity, the consideration of all the parts that go to make up the whole, the whole of anything, that denotes the artist. It certainly denotes Dr. Muck.

♣ ♣ ♣

From POST
Address: New York
Date 1912

The only opportunities New York will have to hear Fritz Kreisler, the incomparable violinist, this year will be at the second Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts which will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 5, and Saturday afternoon, December 7. Mr. Kreisler has just arrived in this country, and will be here until the end of December. He comes under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will appear with no other organization of the kind in the East. He will give no recitals. In this city he will play the Beethoven Concerto at one concert, and the Brahms at the other. Up to the time of his sailing there was considerable doubt whether he would be able to fulfil his engagements. Mr. Kreisler is an officer in the First Reserve of the Austrian army, and had received notice to hold himself in readiness to join his regiment, which is one of the Uhlan regiments of the service. Arrangements were made, however, by which he was released for the time being, but with the understanding that, should the mobilization of the entire Austrian army take place, he should be ready to sail on short notice.

From TIMES
Address: New York
Date NOV 17 1912

The only opportunity Brooklyn will have to hear Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, this year will be at the second Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 6, at 8:15. Mr. Kreisler has arrived in this country and will be here until the end of December. He comes under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will appear with no other organization of the kind in the East. He will give no recitals.

E 1884

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.
Date NOV 17 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The only opportunity New York will have to hear Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, this year will be at the second Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, which will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 5, and Saturday afternoon, December 7. Mr. Kreisler has just arrived in this country, and will be here until the end of December. He comes under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will appear with no other organization of the kind in the East. He will give no recitals. In this city he will play the Beethoven Concerto at one concert and the Brahms at the other.

Estab

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 17 1912

The only opportunity Brooklyn will have to hear Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, this year will be at the second Boston Symphony Orchestra concert which will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 6, at 8:15. Mr. Kreisler has arrived in this country and will be here until the end of December. He comes under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will appear with no other organization of the kind in the East. He will give no recitals.

Es 1884

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 16 1912

Boston Symphony.

The only opportunity Baltimore will have to hear Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, this year will be at the second Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, which will be given in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, December 4. Mr. Kreisler has just arrived in this country and will be here until the end of December. He comes under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will appear with no other organization of the kind in the East. He will give no recitals.

Estal 884

From CITIZENS
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 16 1912

The only opportunity Brooklyn will have to hear Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, this year will be at the second Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 6. Mr. Kreisler has arrived in this country and will be here until the end of December.

He comes under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will appear with no other organization of the kind in the East. He will give no recitals.

Est 1884

From PRESS
Address: New York
Date NOV 17 1912

Kreisler Plays Only in Boston.

The only opportunities New Yorkers will have to hear Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, this year, will be at the second pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts on Thursday evening, December 5, and Saturday afternoon, December 7, in Carnegie Hall. Kreisler has just arrived in this country and will be here until the end of December. He comes under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will appear with no other organization of the [illegible] in the East, [illegible] will he give any [illegible]. In [illegible] he will play the [illegible]certo at one concert [illegible] Concerto at the other.

ork,

BOSTON HERALD,

NOVEMBER 21,

KREISLER SUNDAY CONCERT

The concert which Fritz Kreisler will give in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 1, will be made particularly attractive, inasmuch as he will be assisted by a considerable orchestra of Symphony players under the leadership of Otto Urack, the new assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Urack was engaged last summer to be the successor to Mr. Schoeder at the first desk of the 'cellists and to be assistant conductor of the orchestra. Last winter he was conductor of the Municipal Opera at Barmen, where he did all of the Wagnerian music dramas and all of the Richard Strauss operas, including 15 performances of "Der Rosencavalier." He has conducted opera in Bucharest, Sofia and Belgrade and concerts in the Lower Rhine cities. The program will include a Concerto by Vivaldi with accompaniment of orchestra and organ, Mendelssohn's Concerto and two groups of violin pieces with piano accompaniment. The orchestra under Mr. Urack will open the concert with the overture to

---

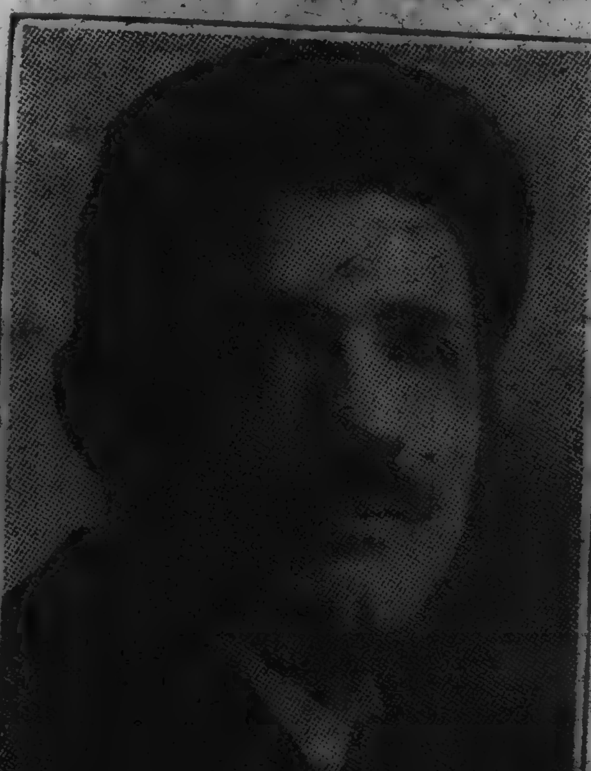
From LIFE
Address BROOKLYN, N. Y.
Date NOV 16 1912

The Boston Symphony Again.

The reappearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck at the Brooklyn Academy of Music last week Friday evening was hailed by a large and typical audience of Brooklyn music lovers with a considerable manifestation of enthusiasm. Dr. Muck's appearance brought the audience to its feet and while the political record for prolonged cheering was not broken, the Brooklyn Philharmonic record might have been. With the exception of the Beethoven symphony the program was the same as the orchestra had given in Manhattan on the preceding evening, but the substitution of the comparatively trivial eighth for the inspiring "Eroica" resulted in depriving the program of substance for which even Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger," with which it closed, did not supply the need. Between the two the orchestra played Berlioz's overture to "The Roman Carnival" and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," with brilliancy and eloquence. For smoothness and perfection of expression the performance was beyond criticism and barring occasional moments in the symphony and Liszt's number when the mind was inclined to wander, it was a charming if not soul-stirring program; one that was characterized as "light" by old Philharmonic subscribers. In the two lower boxes on the left of the stage were Mrs. Camden C. Dike, Mrs. James L. Morgan, Mr. and Mrs. R. Huntington Woodman, Miss Florence I. Chauncey, Mrs. Frederick W. Moss, Miss Theodora Bulkley, Mrs. Frank M. Lupton, Miss Kate V. Barnum, Mrs. S. B. Chittenden and Judge Norman S. Dike and among the familiar figures noticed in the crowded auditorium were Mr. and Mrs. Alfred T. White, Mr. and Mrs. Martin Joost, Mr. Charles J. Peabody, Miss Benson, the Rev. and Mrs. Henry T. Scudder, Mr. David T. Lanman, Miss Brinsmade, Miss Harriet Low, Mr. Benjamin R. C. Low, Miss Grace Merritt, Mr. Grant Notman, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Hammitt, Mr. and Mrs. Horace J. Morse, Mr. George A. Price, Mr. Frank Julian Price, Mrs. Katharine Perry, Miss Perry, Mr. and Mrs. George F. Elliott, Mrs. Nathaniel Matson, Miss Esther Matson, Mr. John F. Praeger, Mr. Hamilton Ormsbee, the Rev. and Mrs. Herman Carl Weber, Miss Haxtun, the Misses Ingalls, Mr. and Mrs. Alexander M. Forman, Mr. Henry M. Congdon, Mr. Ernest A. Congdon, Mr. John J. Petit, Mr. and Mrs. John Anderson, Mrs. Otto Heinigke, Miss Frances M. Finlay, Mr. James Jenkins, Jr., Mrs. Calvin E. Hull, Mrs. Walter Hanford and Mr. and Mrs. Adolph T. Goepel. The next concert is scheduled for Friday evening, December sixth, and Fritz Kreisler is to be the soloist.

BOSTON POST, NOVEMBER 21,

URACK CONDUCTS KREISLER CONCERT



FRITZ KREISLER,
The violin soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is to give a concert Sunday night.

The concert which Fritz Kreisler is to give in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 1, will be made particularly attractive inasmuch as he will be assisted by a considerable orchestra of Boston Symphony players under the leadership of Otto Urack, the new assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Urack was engaged last summer to be the successor to Alwin Schroeder at the first desk of the 'cellists and to be assistant con- [illegible]

Mr. Urack has had much experience in this line of work. Last winter he was conductor of the Municipal Opera at Bremen, where he did all of the Wagnerian music dramas and all of the Richard Strauss operas, including 15 performances of "Der Rosencavalier." Previous to that he had conducted opera in Bucharest, Sofia and Belgrade and had conducted concerts in the Lower Rhine cities.

The programme in general will comprise a concerto by Vivaldi with accompaniment of orchestra and organ, the Mendelssohn Concerto and two groups of solo pieces which Mr. Kreisler will play with piano accompaniment. The orchestra, under Mr. Urack, will open the concert with the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" and will end it with the "Oberon" overture of Weber.

NOVEMBER 20,

MONITOR,

OTTO URAK WITH KREISLER

Otto Urak, 'cellist at the first desk of the Symphony orchestra in the place of Alwyn Schroeder, regarded in Germany as one of the promising new conductors, will appear with Fritz Kreisler at the Sunday afternoon concert in Symphony hall, Dec. 1, conducting an orchestra of Boston Symphony men. On the program is a concerto by Vivaldi for solo violin, orchestra and organ, the Mendelssohn concerto and short selections for violin with piano accompaniment. J. P. Marshall will be the organist. The concert is under the direction of C. A. Ellis.

NOVEMBER 20,

TRANSCRIPT,

NEWS OF MUSIC

Mr. Kreisler's Orchestral Concert Here—Ysaye Reappears After Seven Years—Propagating American Music—Mr. Dolmetsch and Loie Fuller—Items and Opinions

AT Symphony Hall, on the afternoon of Sunday, Dec. 1, Mr. Kreisler, the violinist, will appear in an orchestral concert and not in the recital originally proposed for him. Forty or fifty players in the Symphony Orchestra will make the band and Mr. Urack will lead them for the first time. He is one of the newcomers to the orchestra and he was engaged both as one of the first 'cellists and as an assistant conductor, since he had proved his ability in such work in Germany and in the Balkan cities. With him and with the orchestra, Mr. Kreisler will play two concertos—one by Vivaldi, a composer of the eighteenth century, the music of which the violinist so cherishes; the other the familiar and popular piece by Mendelssohn. Vivaldi's concerto, long unknown in concert-rooms generally, enlists an organ too. Mr. Kreisler will play, besides, sundry short solo pieces to a piano accompaniment. Thus has the recital expanded to a concert that will reveal many sides of the returned violinist. His faithful and admiring public here will hardly be lacking.

NOVEMBER 21,

JOURNAL—

SYMPHONY HAS NEW ASSISTANT CONDUCTOR IN OTTO URACK

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has a new assistant conductor in the person of Otto Urack, who has taken Alwin Schroeder's place among the 'cellists of the orchestra. Mr. Urack will make his debut as conductor here on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 1, when he will lead the Symphony players who will assist the soloist of the occasion, Fritz Kreisler, the violinist.

Mr. Urack has had much experience in this line of work. Last winter he was conductor of the Municipal Opera at Barmen, where he did all of the Wagnerian music dramas and all of the Richard Strauss operas, including fifteen performances of "Der Rosencavalier." Previous to that he had conducted opera in Bucharest, Sofia and Belgrade, and had conducted concerts in the lower Rhine cities.

The program in general at this Sunday concert here will comprise a concerto by Vivaldi, with accompaniment of orchestra and organ; the Mendelssohn concerto and two groups of solo pieces which Mr. Kreisler will play with piano accompaniment. The orchestra under Mr. Urack will open the concert with the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," and will end it with the "Oberon" overture of Weber.

TRANSCRIPT,

NOVEMBER 19,

NEWS OF MUSIC

Wagner's Music in Concert

HERE, for a bit of aftermath to the concert of Wagner's music by the Symphony Orchestra last Sunday evening are wise words, printed in the New York Times of Sunday, about fragments of the composer's operas in the concert-room. When Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra last visited New York, he happened to include the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" and the "Siegfried Idyl" in his programmes. Thereupon sundry correspondents complained to the Times of an "excess" of Wagner's music in the relatively few concerts that the Boston Orchestra undertakes in New York—the more regrettable since the New Yorkers may hear Wagner at will at the Metropolitan. To these correspondents the Times rejoins: "Dr. Muck has, and has expressed, strong objection to giving excerpts from Wagner on the concert platform. In the two years in which he was formerly conductor of the orchestra he gave in his forty-eight Boston concerts only five Wagnerian excerpts. Of these two were preludes to dramatic works; those to 'Rienzi' and 'Die Meistersinger.' The others were the 'Siegfried Idyl,' 'Eine Faust Ouverture' and the 'Kaisermarsch,' none of which belong to, or are taken from, an opera or music drama, but were composed and intended as orchestral pieces for separate performance in concert programmes. . . .

"On general principles, however, the objections to Wagnerian excerpts as such are well founded, so far as they relate to fragments taken from the dramatic portions of his operas, wrested from their context and deprived of the stage setting of action, scenery and declamation that the composer intended to be an inherent part of them. Wagner himself did indeed make or authorize certain excerpts of this sort, in direct contravention of his own principles. The excuse made for them was the [illegible]

From TIMES
Address: New York
Date NOV 17 1912

The only opportunity Brooklyn will have to hear Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, this year will be at the second Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 6, at 8:15. Mr. Kreisler has arrived in this country and will be here until the end of December. He comes under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will appear with no other organization of the kind in the East. He will give no recitals.

E 1884

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.
Date NOV 17 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The only opportunity New York will have to hear Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, this year will be at the second Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, which will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 5, and Saturday afternoon, December 7. Mr. Kreisler has just arrived in this country, and will be here until the end of December. He comes under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will appear with no other organization of the kind in the East. He will give no recitals. In this city he will play the Beethoven Concerto at one concert and the Brahms at the other.

Estab.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 17 1912

The only opportunity Brooklyn will have to hear Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, this year will be at the second Boston Symphony Orchestra concert which will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 6, at 8:15. Mr. Kreisler has arrived in this country and will be here until the end of December. He comes under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will appear with no other organization of the kind in the East. He will give no recitals.

Es 1884

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

Boston Symphony.

The only opportunity Baltimore will have to hear Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, this year will be at the second Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, which will be given in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, December 4. Mr. Kreisler has just arrived in this country and will be here until the end of December. He comes under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will appear with no other organization of the kind in the East. He will give no recitals.

Estab 884

From CITIZENS
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

The only opportunity Brooklyn will have to hear Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, this year will be at the second Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 6. Mr. Kreisler has arrived in this country and will be here until the end of December.

He comes under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will appear with no other organization of the kind in the East. He will give no recitals.

Est 1884

From PRESS
Address: New York
Date NOV

Kreisler Plays Only in Boston.

The only opportunities New Yorkers will have to hear Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, this year, will be at the second pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts on Thursday evening, December 5, and Saturday afternoon, December 7, in Carnegie Hall. Kreisler has just arrived in this country and will be here until the end of December. He comes under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will appear with no other organization of the kind in the East, nor will he give any recitals. In this city he will play the Beethoven Concerto at one concert and the Brahms Concerto at the other.

ork,

BOSTON HERALD,

NOVEMBER 21,

KREISLER SUNDAY CONCERT

The concert which Fritz Kreisler will give in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 1, will be made particularly attractive, inasmuch as he will be assisted by a considerable orchestra of Symphony players under the leadership of Otto Urack, the new assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Urack was engaged last summer to be the successor to Mr. Schoeder at the first desk of the 'cellists and to be assistant conductor of the orchestra. Last winter he was conductor of the Municipal Opera at Barmen, where he did all of the Wagnerian music dramas and all of the Richard Strauss operas, including 15 performances of "Der Rosencavalier." He has conducted opera in Bucharest, Sofia and Belgrade and concerts in the Lower Rhine cities. The program will include a Concerto by Vivaldi with accompaniment of orchestra and organ, Mendelssohn's Concerto and two groups of violin pieces with piano accompaniment. The orchestra under Mr. Urack will open the concert with the overture to

---

From LIFE
Address BROOKLYN, N. Y.
Date NOV 1912

The Boston Symphony Again.

The reappearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck at the Brooklyn Academy of Music last week Friday evening was hailed by a large and typical audience of Brooklyn music lovers with a considerable manifestation of enthusiasm. Dr. Muck's appearance brought the audience to its feet and while the political record for prolonged cheering was not broken, the Brooklyn Philharmonic record might have been. With the exception of the Beethoven symphony the program was the same as the orchestra had given in Manhattan on the preceding evening, but the substitution of the comparatively trivial eighth for the inspiring "Eroica" resulted in depriving the program of substance for which even Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger," with which it closed, did not supply the need. Between the two the orchestra played Berlioz's overture to "The Roman Carnival" and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," with brilliancy and eloquence. For smoothness and perfection of expression the performance was beyond criticism and barring occasional moments in the symphony and Liszt's number when the mind was inclined to wander, it was a charming if not soul-stirring program; one that was characterized as "light" by old Philharmonic subscribers. In the two lower boxes on the left of the stage were Mrs. Camden C. Dike, Mrs. James L. Morgan, Mr. and Mrs. R. Huntington Woodman, Miss Florence I. Chauncey, Mrs. Frederick W. Moss, Miss Theodora Bulkley, Mrs. Frank M. Lupton, Miss Kate V. Barnum, Mrs. S. B. Chittenden and Judge Norman S. Dike and among the familiar figures noticed in the crowded auditorium were Mr. and Mrs. Alfred T. White, Mr. and Mrs. Martin Joost, Mr. Charles J. Peabody, Miss Benson, the Rev. and Mrs. Henry T. Scudder, Mr. David T. Lanman, Miss Brinsmade, Miss Harriet Low, Mr. Benjamin R. C. Low, Miss Grace Merritt, Mr. Grant Notman, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Hammitt, Mr. and Mrs. Horace J. Morse, Mr. George A. Price, Mr. Frank Julian Price, Mrs. Katharine Perry, Miss Perry, Mr. and Mrs. George F. Elliott, Mrs. Nathaniel Matson, Miss Esther Matson, Mr. John F. Praeger, Mr. Hamilton Ormsbee, the Rev. and Mrs. Herman Carl Weber, Miss Haxtun, the Misses Ingalls, Mr. and Mrs. Alexander M. Forman, Mr. Henry M. Congdon, Mr. Ernest A. Congdon, Mr. John J. Petit, Mr. and Mrs. John Anderson, Mrs. Otto Heinigke, Miss Frances M. Finlay, Mr. James Jenkins, Jr., Mrs. Calvin E. Hull, Mrs. Walter Hanford and Mr. and Mrs. Adolph T. Goepel. The next concert is scheduled for Friday evening, December sixth, and Fritz Kreisler is to be the soloist.

BOSTON POST, NOVEMBER 21,

URACK CONDUCTS KREISLER CONCERT

FRITZ KREISLER,

The violin soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is to give a concert Sunday night.

The concert which Fritz Kreisler is to give in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 1, will be made particularly attractive inasmuch as he will be assisted by a considerable orchestra of Boston Symphony players under the leadership of Otto Urack, the new assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Urack was engaged last summer to be the successor to Alwin Schroeder at the first desk of the 'cellists and to be assistant conductor of the orchestra.

Mr. Urack has had much experience in this line of work. Last winter he was conductor of the Municipal Opera at Bremen where he did all of the Wagnerian music dramas and all of the Richard Strauss operas, including 15 performances of "Der Rosencavalier." Previous to that he had conducted opera in Bucharest, Sofia and Belgrade and had conducted concerts in the Lower Rhine cities.

The programme in general will comprise a concerto by Vivaldi with accompaniment of orchestra and organ, the Mendelssohn Concerto and two groups of solo pieces which Mr. Kreisler will play with piano accompaniment. The orchestra, under Mr. Urack, will open the concert with the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" and will end it with the "Oberon" overture of Weber.

NOVEMBER 20,

MONITOR,

OTTO URAK WITH KREISLER

Otto Urak, 'cellist at the first desk of the Symphony orchestra in the place of Alwyn Schroeder, regarded in Germany as one of the promising new conductors, will appear with Fritz Kreisler at the Sunday afternoon concert in Symphony hall, Dec. 1, conducting an orchestra of Boston Symphony men. On the program is a concerto by Vivaldi for solo violin, orchestra and organ, the Mendelssohn concerto and short selections for violin with piano accompaniment. J. P. Marshall will be the organist. The concert is under the direction of C. A. Ellis.

NOVEMBER 20,

TRANSCRIPT,

NEWS OF MUSIC

Mr. Kreisler's Orchestral Concert Here—Ysaye Reappears After Seven Yea[illegible]—Propagating American Music—Mr. Dolmetsch and Loie Fuller—Items and Opinions

AT Symphony Hall, on the afternoon of Sunday, Dec. 1, Mr. Kreisler, the violinist, will appear in an orchestral concert and not in the recital originally proposed for him. Forty or fifty players in the Symphony Orchestra will make the band and Mr. Urack will lead them for the first time. He is one of the newcomers to the orchestra and he was engaged both as one of the first 'cellists and as an assistant conductor, since he had proved his ability in such work in Germany and in the Balkan cities. With him and with the orchestra, Mr. Kreisler will play two concertos—one by Vivaldi, a composer of the eighteenth century, the music of which the violinist so cherishes; the other the familiar and popular piece by Mendelssohn. Vivaldi's concerto, long unknown in concert-rooms generally, enlists an organ too. Mr. Kreisler will play, besides, sundry short solo pieces to a piano accompaniment. Thus has the recital expanded to a concert that will reveal many sides of the returned violinist. His faithful and admiring public here will hardly be lacking.

NOVEMBER 21,

JOURNAL—

SYMPHONY HAS NEW ASSISTANT CONDUCTOR IN OTTO URACK

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has a new assistant conductor in the person of Otto Urack, who has taken Alwin Schroeder's place among the 'cellists of the orchestra. Mr. Urack will make his debut as conductor here on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 1, when he will lead the Symphony players who will assist the soloist of the occasion, Fritz Kreisler, the violinist.

Mr. Urack has had much experience in this line of work. Last winter he was conductor of the Municipal Opera at Barmen, where he did all of the Wagnerian music dramas and all of the Richard Strauss operas, including fifteen performances of "Der Rosencavalier." Previous to that he had conducted opera in Bucharest, Sofia and Belgrade, and had conducted concerts in the lower Rhine cities.

The program in general at this Sunday concert here will comprise a concerto by Vivaldi, with accompaniment of orchestra and organ; the Mendelssohn concerto and two groups of solo pieces which Mr. Kreisler will play with piano accompaniment. The orchestra under Mr. Urack will open the concert with the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," and will end it with the "Oberon" overture of Weber.

TRANSCRIPT,

NOVEMBER 19,

NEWS OF MUSIC

Wagner's Music in Concert

HERE, for a bit of aftermath to the concert of Wagner's music by the Symphony Orchestra last Sunday evening are wise words, printed in the New York Times of Sunday, about fragments of the composer's operas in the concert-room. When Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra last visited New York, he happened to include the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" and the "Siegfried Idyl" in his programmes. Thereupon sundry correspondents complained to the Times of an "excess" of Wagner's music in the relatively few concerts that the Boston Orchestra undertakes in New York—the more regrettable since the New Yorkers may hear Wagner at will at the Metropolitan. To these correspondents the Times rejoins: "Dr. Muck has, and has expressed, strong objection to giving excerpts from Wagner on the concert platform. In the two years in which he was formerly conductor of the orchestra he gave in his forty-eight Boston concerts only five Wagnerian excerpts. Of these two were preludes to dramatic works; those to 'Rienzi' and 'Die Meistersinger.' The others were the 'Siegfried Idyl,' 'Eine Faust Ouverture' and the 'Kaisermarsch,' none of which belong to, or are taken from, an opera or music drama, but were composed and intended as orchestral pieces for separate performance in concert programmes. . . .

"On general principles, however, the objections to Wagnerian excerpts as such are well founded, so far as they relate to fragments taken from the dramatic portions of his operas, wrested from their context and deprived of the stage setting of action, scenery and declamation that the composer intended to be an inherent part of them. Wagner himself did indeed make or authorize certain excerpts of this sort, in direct contravention of his own principles. The excuse made for them was the need in the early days of his struggle to get his music before the public in some way or other. There is now no such need in the chief operatic cities. The climax of absurdity is reached when a dramatic soprano, giving a song recital, thinks it advisable to appear on the platform, gowned, gloved and hatted, and discharge the 'Ho-jo-to-ho' of Brunnhilde from the beginning of the second act of 'Die Walküre'—sometimes even to the pattering accompaniment of a pianoforte." Even in such a concert as that for the Pension Fund, Sunday evening, Dr. Muck confines his programme to Wagner's overtures and preludes, which are surely not under the ban, or to "excerpts," like the apotheosis of Siegfried and the Venusberg music, which are more impressive to many when the efforts of a laboring stage toward half-illusion do not cloud them.

NOVEMBER 20.
ADVERTISER,

SCHUMANN-HEINK TO ALLOW MEN FOLK OPPORTUNITY TO HEAR HER

MME. SCHUMAN-HEINK.

Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink, the famous contralto, discussing the fact that this winter Sunday is to be concert day in Boston, and that practically every great singer in America will appear here on Sunday, points out that the singer's audience will be greatly increased because Sunday gives many men an opportunity to hear great artists who now have practically no opportunity.

Schumann-Heink has thousands of admirers in greater Boston who always hail her coming with delight, but, like Sembrich, Gadski and the other great singers, who give recitals here, she has appealed in the past to women more than men.

If a prima donna gives a week-end noon recital the majority of men are unable to attend, and if she gives a night recital the "tired business man" prefers slippers and fireside to going out again in the evening. Now, with her recital Sunday Mme. Schumann-Heink, like the other singers who are to make Sunday a music day in Boston, expects to greatly increase her list of admirers.

EVENING HERALD,
NOVEMBER 19,

Celebrated Singer and Veteran Conductor Who Is Her Friend

MME. SCHUMANN-HEINK AND HANS RICHTER.
Mme. Heink Will Sing in Symphony Hall Sunday Afternoon and This Will Be Her Only Appearance in Boston.

SUGGESTED MUCK FOR HUB POSITION

Schumann - Heink Recalls Richter's Proposal Made 18 Years Ago.

When Mme. Schumann-Heink was in Bayreuth last summer taking part in the festival she saw much of Hans Richter, the veteran conductor, who has given up all active work. They have been close friends for many years, and Mme. Schumann-Heink has sung under him many times in London and Bayreuth.

"He is the last," said Mme. Schumann-Heink the other day, "of those wonderful men who got their start in the early days of Bayreuth. Seidl is dead, and so are Levi and Mottl, and Richter has given up practically all active work and is content to live quietly at his home in the outskirts of Vienna, with now and then a rare concert appearance in London. It is a curious thing which Richter, Dr. Muck and I were talking over one day that 18 years ago Richter recommended Dr. Muck to Mr. Higginson as the man best fitted to become the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra as the successor to Nikisch. Richter had been engaged, but was afraid to cross the Atlantic. Muck had just started in in Berlin and did not want to leave. Now he is the conductor of the Symphony orchestra, which only shows how curiously things turn out sometimes."

Notwithstanding all reports to the contrary, the Wolfsohn Musical Bureau has informed Mr. Mudgett that Mme. Schumann-Heink's recital in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon will be absolutely her only concert appearance in Boston. She will then have the assistance of Edward Collins, pianist, and Mme. Katharine Hoffman, accompanist.

MONITOR,

NOVEMBER 18,

PENSION FUND CONCERT

Presenting a program of Wagner's music, the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor, gave its first pension fund concert of the season in Symphony hall Sunday evening before an audience that filled the house. The program illustrated the development of the composer's powers from the overture of "Rienzi," which struggles to free itself from the shackles of classic harmony, to an excerpt from the final drama of the "Ring" tetralogy, wherein the theme of the Wagnerian hero, Siegfried, shouts the complete triumph of the new day in music. The performance of the eight selections, though lasting a half hour beyond the usual period of the orchestra's concerts, held the attention o. the audience unfalteringly to the last note. The pieces were as follows: Overture, "Rienzi;" overture, "The Flying Dutchman;" introduction and first scene (Bacchanale), act I., "Tannhauser" (Paris version); prelude, "Lohengrin;" prelude, "Tristan and Isolde;" prelude, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg;" funeral music, "Dusk of the Gods;" prelude, "Parsifal."

The occasion was as interesting for the character of the audience as for the music. A conductor never had more sympathetic listeners in a Boston concert hall. A gathering of musically alert people from the greater city never had a performance prepared more in accord with their artistic enthusiasms. The city establishes a new girt of musical walls a league beyond the old ones at an event like this one. The capital of New England asserts itself, gains a confidence in itself that it can never lose. The civic consciousness expands; the whole Northeast broods again on that plan for a jubilee in its metropolitan city with the Wagnerian music drama as the call. Crabbed roads lost their baffling turns and are divested of their power to delay. Fiddlers lay the rails that unwillingly go in place for engineers.

It is interesting to compare the readings of the "Tristan" prelude by three great conductors who have recently been heard in Boston—Toscanini, Weingartner and Muck. The difference in conception is vast. It compels the listener to the conviction that Wagner will give the twentieth century as much to exercise its interpretive genius upon as Beethoven gave the nineteenth. Nothing but a complete reconstruction of the orchestra can put this composer out of date. Toscanini conceives the "Tristan" prelude as a composition built around a single idea of a long crescendo followed by a short diminuendo. His coloring is as gray as he can make it. Weingartner regards the piece as chiefly significant for its color. He gives its various hues all the brilliancy and contrast possible. Muck finds the highest meaning of the piece in its thematic expression. He neither charges the music with an external character as does Toscanini, nor lets its sentimental qualities overpower his imagination as does Weingartner. He commands the score, but not to the alteration of its intellectual point; he allows its beauties of color to have their influence, but he does not permit them to overshadow everything else. In a word, the Symphony orchestra conductor presents Wagner in a classic light. He lets him appear in his character of a thinker. He compels a restatement of an opinion like that of Professor Paine that Wagner, while the greatest musician since Beethoven, is not so profound a musician as Beethoven.

Dr. Muck's reading of the "Tristan" prelude discloses a philosophic Wagner, a Wagner who meditates deeply and proclaims truth clearly. His readings of all the overtures and preludes hold up to our contemplation a formalist Wagner. Definiteness and proportion of structure are as evident in Dr. Muck's "Parsifal" prelude as they are in Arthur Nikisch's "Leonora" overture of Beethoven.

With extraordinary breadth of tone the brass department of the orchestra made its pronouncements in the music of "The Dusk of the Gods," with wonderful lightness of tone the violins sang the melodies of "Lohengrin" and of "The Mastersingers." Dr. Muck has clarified the tone of both the outside choirs of the orchestra since he has had it in charge. The Wagnerian harmonies are as clear for the trombones and trumpets as are Mozart's harmonies when sounded by a finely rehearsed string quartet. There is as great power as ever but no effect of overdriving. The string tone is never permitted to compete with the brass tone. It must submit to being submerged when the scoring in the lines of the brass choir is heavy. With all the more appeal the tone of the violins sounds out when the brasses subside.

The proof of Dr. Muck's ability in giving the structure of Wagner clarity came in his presentation of the Paris version of the "Tannhaeuser" opening music. So manifestly was the Bacchanale independent of the Pilgrim chorus exposition of the overture that the piece ended without point or purpose. This lack of relationship was the only thing that jarred in the program. Happily Dr. Muck omitted the "Liebestod" in "Tristan," and so kept the classic import of the last half of his concert whole.

[88]

TRANSCRIPT,
NOVEMBER 18,

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

A MEMORABLE CONCERT FOR THE PENSION FUND

Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra Surpass Themselves in a Wagner Programme—The "Venusberg Music" for the First Time Under the Conductor—The Impending Revival of "The Magic Flute" at the Metropolitan—Mr. Hadley Writes a Merry Overture—Items and Opinions

SOMEHOW, some time, it is devoutly to be hoped that Dr. Muck will conduct in Boston in one or another of Wagner's music-dramas, or better still, in all of them even from "The Flying Dutchman" through "Parsifal." As it is, when he conducts in a succession of overtures and preludes interspersed with a fragment or two from the body of the music-dramas, as he did last evening in Symphony Hall, he seems to attain the fullest Wagnerian goal which is the blending of beauty and power of tone, tirelessly, dramatic and characterizing expression, luminous and pliant exposition, high emotional intensity and warm romantic glamor. And with every overture and every prelude we that listen must stop short at the edge of a music-drama, to be so interpreted, upon which the curtain does not rise. We hear from Dr. Muck's hands the glorification of the dead Siegfried in "Götterdämmerung" and are only the more fain to hear all the music that embodies the hero. Dr. Muck makes the music of the Venusberg in "Tannhäuser" sound as it has never sounded here before; and we wonder if he would so transform the music of the Hall of Song and of Tannhäuser's narrative and torture. When a conductor in Wagner's music, who is scarcely matched in the present generation, is to dwell and work for five years among us, there ought to be the will and the way for the exercise of his great abilities upon the whole body of the music-dramas.

The Symphony Orchestra, moreover, would be a unique instrument in Wagner's operas, and hearing the later music-dramas from it, those that like to believe them symphonic poems with the "programmes" acted on the stage might be firmer than ever in their conviction. The Symphony Orchestra is not an operatic orchestra, being busy as the purists would say with higher things; but last evening it had the dramatizing and the characterizing attributes of an operatic orchestra that make each player seem an actor in the music-drama. The band is usually on its mettle when it plays at concerts for its own Pension Fund and yesterday, it surpassed itself. From the flaming trumpet calls that begin the overture to "Rienzi" to the phrases of half-anguished, half-ecstatic hope that end the prelude to "Parsifal," the orchestra seemed the multi-form and multi-colored voice of music that ran a long gamut of intense emotion, vision and speech. Sense of the technical achievement vanished in the power and the beauty of the impartment. Only in cold retrospect does the hearer recall the rich and clangorous sonorities of the brass in the overture to "Rienzi"; the beauty of the songful phrases of the wind instruments in the overture to "The Flying Dutchman"; the marvellous diminuendi that never lost their richness and transparency in the Venusberg music and the prelude to "Lohengrin"; the glowing opulence of instrumental color in the prelude to "Die Meistersinger"; the epic might of tone in the apotheosis of "Siegfried"; and the wonderous instrumental phrasing of the preludes to "Tristan" and to "Parsifal." In the very radiance of the Grail, upon the sunlit air of its temple, seemed to float the phrases of hope out of anguish. Fortunate the tenor Tristan and the soprano Isolde who can so charge the phrases of their duet in the garden with the sorrowful ecstasy of fated passion. And for details what did the individual men of the orchestra not do? For example and standard of them all, recall the drum beats in the glorification of Siegfried, striking the very accents of heroic doom.

The stimulation of the music, the stimulation of the occasion and of the intent audience, and most of all the stimulation of the conductor, played upon the men. Not within long memory has the music of the Venusberg sounded as it did last evening. To its sensual tang and bite Dr. Muck added an almost demoniacal sharpness as of sensuality half frenzied. The nymphs of the goddess swept in great glows of tone out of her caverns. The languors were the languors of amorous intoxication rapt in its visions. The long melody of the end died in surfeit of its beauty. Erotic frenzy, erotic vision, erotic satiety could hardly have been more vividly wrought in tones. Here were all the Venusbergs from Astarte's Temple in purple Tyre to the green slopes of the Horselberg, and the picture was as multi-colored and as glamorous as Sargent's decoration. Comparable in a very different sort of imaginative and expressive power was Dr. Muck's version of the apotheosis of Siegfried. The heroic might of its clangors of lament and glorification rang with the voice of great tragedy. Across them like luminous rifts in the blackness of doom shone the music of the young hero, doing and dreaming, of the Volsung pair, whose son he was, born of a great love. Epic majesty and human tenderness seemed to go hand in hand in the heroic music.

Contrast again the big, bold, fresco-like handling that Dr. Muck gave to the showy and theatrical overture to "Rienzi," with the suffused and aerated beauty with which he and the orchestra wrought the descent and the ascent of the Grail in the prelude to "Lohengrin." Yet, doing these things, he invested the overture with a youthful intensity of frank melody; while curiously organ-like were the tones that finally set the Grail on earth for the clamors and the strife of men. Contrast, again, for range of imaginative insight and imparting eloquence, the freely running, buoyantly self-creating, multi-colored and multi-rhythmed prelude to "Die Meistersinger" as Dr. Muck conceives it, with the voices of adoration and ecstacy, anguish and woe that he draws in linked phrase upon phrase from the prelude to "Parsifal." The prelude to the comedy was bright and warm with the sunshine of earth—and of romance. The prelude to the mystic drama ran in sublimated lights and mysterious shadows.

Most interesting of all was Dr. Muck's version of the prelude to "Tristan." As memory recalls his previous playings of it here, he has seemed to miss something of its intensities of longing. Even last evening some might have objected that he scarcely made the music of love wrest itself out of the music of fate as tragically and piteously as, perhaps, Wagner imagined the transition. But once embarked upon the music of the lovers' longing Dr. Muck gave it, as he never has before in Boston, a subdued intensity that is far more passionate and tragic than the neurotic excitements with which some conductors clothe it. Longing too intense to be fulfilled; desire pursuing its own phantoms and never clasping them ran in aching voice through the music. It sounded as music of tragedy as well as of passion.

H. T. P.

NOVEMBER 23,
JOURNAL-

AUSTRIAN VIOLINIST SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Kreisler's Marvelous Technique Enthralls Large Audience.

SOUSA TO GIVE CONCERT TOMORROW

Numerous Recitals Are Scheduled for Coming Week.

Fritz Kreisler's beautiful art gave a memorable touch to yesterday's Symphony concert. The peerless Austrian violinist made his first appearance since the spring of 1910 in the same Beethoven concerto that he played when he made his debut with the Symphony Orchestra 12 years ago. It was written for an artist, whose graceful style captivated Vienna, Kreisler's native city, a century ago; and grace and brilliancy of tone are the chief characteristics of the style of the soloist whom the large audience recalled several times yesterday.

But Kreisler has something more than a suave, polished tone. His technical display in the cadenzas in the first and third movements of the concerto was marvelous. Even the violinists of the virtuoso orchestra figuratively rubbed their eyes and opened their mouths.

Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony apparently gave the audience much more pleasure in half an hour, than the Sibelius symphony gave in an hour the week before. The classic character of the program was reinforced by Beethoven's third "Leonora" overture.

The same program will be repeated tonight before a house already almost sold out.

Otto Urack, the new 'cellist and assistant conductor of the ochestra, will make his formal bow next week, as soloist in the performance of the Dvorak concerto. The second Brahms symphony and Schumann's "Genoveva" overture will be the other numbers.

NOVEMBER 23,
ADVERTISER,

DR. MUCK CONDUCTS "JUPITER" SYMPHONY

ESPECIALLY EFFECTIVE WAS THE MINUET

Fritz Kreisler Recalled Innumerable Times as Tribute to His Masterly Playing of Violin.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Mozart—"Jupiter" Symphony.
Beethoven—Violin Concerto.
Soloist, Mr. Fritz Kreisler.
Beethoven—"Leonora, No. 3" overture.

Dr. Muck is not dosing us very heavily with ultra-modern dissonances. Having given us the Bischoff symphony (which we consider to be a greater work than the New York critics found it) and the grouchy and gloomy, but nevertheless great, Sibelius symphony, he considerately rewards us with a tonic of Mozart and Beethoven. Whisper it not in Gath, but we do not wildly crave Mozart symphenies. Only in this symphony in C major, and in its delicate companion work, the symphony in G minor, do we entirely enjoy Mozart in this orchestral form. Haydn's symphonies are preferable to us, since here we find the unstrained prattle of an 18th century gossip, while in Mozart we find an effort to be dramatic which seems somewhat puerile to the 20th century concert-goer.

But the "Jupiter" symphony exhibits less of the dramatic and more of the contrapuntal tendency, and Mozart had a faculty of writing fugal work that had not a trace of the odor of midnight oil, as witness the chief theme of the "Magic Flute" overtures, or the finale of this symphony.

We are delighted that Dr. Muck never strains after sensation and never tries to magnify a work to undue proportions. He never tries to swell a frog into an ox, and he allowed the clearness and good balance of this symphony to speak for itself. The Minuet was especially effective, for it was taken a little slower than usual, in something like the dance tempo of this elegant style of composition. The finale was excellently read and played, and the great applause which followed proved that the taste for the true classics in music is not yet obsolete in Boston.

We read recently in a newspaper (the passionate press agent had evidently broken loose) the Ysaye was "not only the greatest living violinist, but the greatest violinist that has ever lived." Paganini is dead and cannot defend himself, but Fritz Kreisler is very much alive and might well throw down the gauntlet to such a claim. He is a giant of the violin, and to hear him in this concerto is to hear him at his very highest point. He may not have the wonderful breadth of an Ysaye, but he is sure as a rock and his tone is exquisitely sympathetic.

Borrowing the advertising language above quoted, we can say (this time without exaggeration) that Beethoven's violin concerto is by far the greatest work in this school ever written. About a fortnight ago we had a great performer in the Brahms violin concerto. When one mentally compared the two works how studious and how pedantic the Brahms dissertation seemed, and how aflame with enthusiasm and gigantic power the Beethoven concerto! That first movement with its majestic figure of four thunderbolts seems to us more impressive than the famous figure of four notes in the fifth symphony. We sometimes wonder whether Schubert borrowed this device in the finale of his great C major symphony.

Mr. Kreisler played this movement properly enough "in King Cambyses vein," for it is heroic even to the verge of bombast. The broad style of the first movement was well contrasted with the lively rondo which ends the work. We cannot but think that the finale is a slight falling off from the power of the beginning of the work, but at any rate the two movements form excellent foils to each other, and it means considerable versatility to win success in both of them,—as Mr. Kreisler certainly did.

The cadenza of the first movement was the most powerful exhibition of technique. The themes are here worked up in a display of double-stopping that is the height of virtuosity, and yet remains good music.

The Larghetto is one of the exhibitions of Beethoven's long breath in such a slow tempo. Few of the later composers can give a continuous flow of thought in such a movement. They generally become fragmentary. The moderns are not often Children of the Larghetto.

The Rondo was played by Mr. Kreisler in a broad and virile manner. The cadenza here too was remarkably effective.

Therefore at the end of the work the artist was recalled innumerable times, and was evidently the lion of the concert.

We never can reconcile ourselves to the title of the overture called "Leonora No. 3." If it were the name of a tugboat, a racing yacht, or even a fire engine, it would be all right, but the numeration sounds odd for so great a work. "The third Leonora Overture" (which sounds a little better) was nobly performed as a close to an altogether satisfying concert. Such music forms a good antidote to the miserable gropings of the present. Only one cannot always rise to the frenetic joy which Beethoven pictures at the end of this work. When Beethoven was joyous he wanted to paint the whole universe red. Hugo Wolf once said that the best test of a composer was—"Can he exult?" There is not the slightest doubt about Beethoven's capacity for exulting, as all the strings of the orchestra and the kettledrummer will testify.

But the overture was nevertheless played clearly, and the trumpet calls which herald the downfall of the wicked Pizarro were also effective. This, by the way, is the most important trumpet passage in Beethoven's scores, for the trumpet was under an eclipse in his epoch, and it was much less, and less prominently, used by Beethoven than by composers before and after.

Dr. Muck read the overture without exaggeration, yet conserving all the strong contrasts. We note that he does not go to extremes of slowness as he sometimes used to do five years ago. He seems to be at his ripest and best in Beethoven and Wagner. Therefore when the distressed Leonora was finally united to her Florestan, and when Pizarro had been banished into the land of Nowhere, everybody went home satisfied without any "ifs" or "buts" whatever, with a sterling performance of sterling music.

NOVEMBER 23.
GLOBE-

KREISLER AGAIN SUPREME ARTIST

Eminent Violinist Plays Beethoven Concerto.

Dr Muck Gives Beautiful Reading of "Jupiter" Symphony.

Fritz Kreisler was soloist at the sixth symphony rehearsal. After an absence of two seasons he was welcomed with lively enthusiasm when he came on. It was a tribute unmistakably laden with the highest regard and esteem of a public for a distinguished artist. At no time has the art of the violinist seemed more ripe, more enriched, or more finely tempered by the scholarship and guidance of a mature mind and judgment, more sensitive to interior and inherent beauty, more perfectly considered, yet more naturally ardent and pervadingly spontaneous.

In his most exalted and inspired moments of the Beethoven concerto temperament never ran away with discretion. In saying much, there was a continence, a reserve of emotional fervor by which he hightened dignity, and left yet more to say. How unobtrusive his technical sovereignty, yet how just and absolute his mastery over all the mechanical needs of the performance. With Kreisler a cadenza ceases to be a series of flourishes, but a flight of inevitable and rhapsodical utterance. In the cadenza of the last movement he suggested a body of strings by the rich fullness of his chord playing.

His tone was instinct with virility controlled into spiritual beauty. His bow is as exacting and imperious a monitor as ever of his sense of rhythm. The proportion and symmetry of his phrasing was of strict classical feeling, yet without rigidity. The atmosphere of each movement was appropriate to the work and its time. In the larghetto his violin sang with all the lofty purity of tone and style of a mistress of the art of classic song; an art glorified in the dawning of the day of romantic feeling. Such playing is sublimated above the consideration of instrument or means. It carries its hearers to artistic hights which are not frequent to the point of congestion.

The pleasure of Mr Kreisler's playing was doubled by the understanding sympathy and balance of Dr Muck's accompaniment. The orchestral pieces were Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony in C major and the Leonora overture No. 3.

It was good to hear the symphony played in the spirit in which it was written, with the grace, the little precise formality, the light elegance and the soft languors of Mozart's time and feeling. It was aristocratic to the minutest embellishment in the strings, to the gossamer-like trills which the violins executed with such remarkable precision and delicacy, and to the superficial melancholy of their airs in the andante, appropriately muted. The euphony and the artistry of the strings both were disclosed as no heroic symphony or sonorous tone poem can disclose them.

The program next week will be as follows: Brahms, symphony No. 2; Dvorak, concerto for violoncello in B minor, Mr Urack, soloist; Schumann, "Genoveva" overture.

NOVEMBER 23,
BOSTON HERALD,

MEMORABLE DAY AT SYMPHONY

Fritz Kreisler Gives Masterly Performance of Beethoven's Violin Concerto.

MOZART'S "JUPITER" HEARD

Beethoven's Leonore Overture No. 3 Closes Sixth Public Rehearsal.

By PHILIP HALE.

The sixth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon. Dr. Muck conducted and Mr. Kreisler was the solo violinist. The program was as follows:

Symphony in C major, "Jupiter"......Mozart
Concerto for violin....................Beethoven
Overture "Leonore," No. 3..........Beethoven

The symphony of Mozart is 122 years old. It is not dramatic, as we now understand the word; it is not emotional according to the present idea of the emotional in art; there are formulas that passed out of fashion long ago and vex modern ears when heard in the compositions of men that flourished long after Mozart's death. And yet this symphony is today a thing of rare beauty and bids fair to outlive the youngest now subject [illegible]

Is this unquestioned vitality due to the exquisite proportion, or to the singular clarity of expression, especially in the Finale that delights the amateur and is a source of wonder to the pedant? Or is it that indefinable something, called taste, or style, which widely differing composers as Rossini and Schumann, Debussy and Richard Strauss find as a chief characteristic of Mozart's music? Debussy, finding this also in the music of Bach, vainly searches for it in the music of Beethoven.

But to some the serenity of Mozart, a serenity observed even in allegro and minuet, is more disquieting than the wild agitation of another. They say with Bacon, there is no excellent beauty that hath not some strangeness in the proportion. They seek for this strangeness, and, failing to discover it within the body of the music, imagine an esoteric meaning. Perfect euphony rasps their nerves. To them Mozart's symphony is an amiable endeavor—the fitting expression of a courtly but philistine period: or the "Jupiter" is dismissed as having only historical interest.

The transition was not abrupt yesterday from the symphony to the concerto so wonderfully played by Mr. Kreisler. Schumann, naming things in the world about which nothing can be said, included this symphony and pages of Beethoven. As for the concerto, the first two movements are companionless in the literature of the violin, and Mr. Kreisler by his musical intensity and consummate skill put the Finale nearly abreast of that which preceded. There are performances that, in the splendor of their beauty, vie with the works themselves, so that the players led by a master hand and the chief interpreter whom they assist are all as re-creators. It would be an impertinence to chatter about Mr. Kreisler's technical skill, though this never seemed so imposing as it did yesterday, especially in the cadenza of his own invention. Or of what avail would be the heaping of one superlative upon another in the rearing of a rhetorical monument? Such eulogy would ill become the dignity, nobility and pure but flaming spirit of the performance. In the routine of concerts there is now and then a great event brought about by the fortunate conjunction of violinist, conductor and orchestra working together in perfect artistry so that the musical thoughts and expression of a Beethoven assume new and fresh and entrancing shapes.

The "Leonore" overture may outlive the opera for which it was written. The whole drama lies in this overture without disturbing minor characters and scenes, without conventional duet and aria, without the inevitable reminder of stage manager and costumer. In the opera there is the sublime scene in the prison; but what do we not have to sit through before this thrill and transport? The performance of the overture brought the end of a concert that should be memorable in the musical annals of this city.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Brahms, Symphony No. 2; Dvorak, concerto for violoncello; Schumann, overture to "Genoveva." Otto Urlach, the assistant conductor of the orchestra will be the solo violoncellist.

NOVEMBER 23,
BOSTON POST,

KREISLER WITH THE SYMPHONY

Memorable Performance of Beethoven's Concerto

BY OLIN DOWNES

The feature of the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall was Fritz Kreisler's memorable performance of the Beethoven violin concerto. This was surely one of the greatest interpretations of the work which have been given in Symphony Hall. More than ever was Mr. Kreisler's supremacy as an artist impressed upon the listener; higher than ever he rose in the esteem of a public which has long welcomed him. The violinist was delayed in beginning the second movement, on account of the storm of applause which broke out as soon as he had stopped for an instant. His reading was as virile and as true in its sentiment as could possibly be desired; it was a reverent interpretation of a masterpiece; yet it was also a notably subjective, the expression of a great artist, deeply versed in classic interpretation, but with something of his own to say.

Mr. Kreisler's performance must stand at the head of his achievements in Boston. Technically it was, of course, thoroughly finished, with always the suggestion of reserve force and dexterity, but the playing of the cadenza may well have appeared to many the culminating point of this performance. The part playing was a marvel of virtuosity and musical feeling. Then the violin sang like 10 instruments instead of one, and this portion of the movement became, as it should, but as it rarely is, the magnificent capstone of the whole structure. The slow movement was nobly sung. Sentiment of the loftiest, simple and pervasive enough to make every hearer akin. And not the least part of this performance was Dr. Muck's accompaniment, played as by brothers-in-arms, directed as if Dr. Muck had done nothing but rehearse with Mr. Kreisler for the last fortnight. At his first performance of this concerto this season with the orchestra in [illegible] there was no rehearsal at all. The programme, a godly programme, was cordially applauded. No symphonic music is more dramatic than Beethoven's third Leonore overture. In few of his pages has Mozart surpassed the musical interest and finish of workmanship which he displayed in the finale of the "Jupiter" symphony. Dr. Muck respects the period and the school of this music, yet he, like other progressive conductors of today, finds this music full blooded, masculine in its character, despite its grace, ravishing the ears with the purity of its orchestral coloring.

---

NOVEMBER 21,
TRANSCRIPT,

THE NEWS OF MUSIC

A CHANGE WITH THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Quiet Appointment of Mr. Urack as Assistant Conductor—His Fitness for the Job—A Facile, Girlish Pianist in Miss von Barentzen — Many Announcements About Impending Concerts — Orchestral Programmes of the Week—Propagating American Music—Items and Opinions

VERY unobtrusively the management of the Symphony Orchestra has made known, almost as a part of the routine of the day, that it is to have an assistant conductor. In recent years when a part of the band has played with a singer, a virtuoso or a dancer, Mr. Strube has lead it, though without official designation of any kind. On rare occasion, when the conductor has fallen ill—a mischance that happened never to overtake Mr. Fiedler—the concert-master has taken the orchestra as Mr. Hess and Mr. Wendling did in their time. It now appears that the engagement and formal appointment of an assistant conductor was a part of the arrangement that restored Dr. Muck to the orchestra, and as such, quite as much as one of the first violoncellists, Mr. Urack was called to the band. He will conduct in concerts in which a contingent from the orchestra assists a singer, violinist, or pianist; he will take the regular Symphony Concerts, should Dr. Muck fall ill—absit omen; and no doubt he will have his share in the "Pop" concerts next spring. He will not, however, lead in the accompaniment of concertos in the regular Symphony Concerts, as Mr. Stock did when he was assistant to Theodore Thomas in Chicago. Dr. Muck picked Mr. Urack for the work of assistant here and persuaded him to undertake the job rather than go to the Royal Opera at Berlin whither he had also been called as a secondary conductor. Mr. Urack's training as a musician and a 'cellist has been long and he has sat at the desk of the first violoncello for some years in the orchestras of the Opera House at Berlin and the Festspielhaus at Baireuth. As a conductor, his experience has been chiefly operatic—at Barmen, a flourishing manufacturing city in Westphalia where he led in the operas of Wagner and Straus last season. It will be interesting to discover his mettle here.

TRANSCRIPT,
NOVEMBER 22,

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

THE PRESENT AND THE PAST OF MR. KREISLER

His Unique Place with His Public Here—Mr. Proctor's Pleasurable Concert—A New Way of the Pianists—Mr. Godowsky Reappears—American Songs in England—Items and Opinions

TODAY and tomorrow at the Symphony Concerts and in a concert of his own a week hence, Mr. Kreisler, the violinist, will reappear in Boston. Even short memories may still recall the time when he first played here, almost unheeded, to little audiences in Steinert Hall. Soon a larger concert-room was necessary to contain those who would hear him. Next he gained the prestige of appearances at the Symphony Concerts and in a few years he became the violinist whom Boston seemed most eager, at each return, to applaud. Now only Mr. Elman can compare with him in popularity here, and their audiences, in amusing contrast, come from very different social strata. The North End is prone to enthusiasms over Mr. Elman; the Back Bay flocks to hear Mr. Kreisler. Mr. Elman by the directness, the intensity and the superabundance of his powers was foreordained to be a popular violinist in the good sense of the word. Similarly, Mr. Kreisler, like Mr. Zimbalist of the younger generation, was foreordained to be the violinist of the musically subtle and sensitive and to appeal to those who like, or affect to like, poise and elegance.

That Mr. Kreisler happens to be a fashionable violinist in no way lessens his eminence among the virtuosi of his instrument in our time. He is unique among them in the exceeding fineness of his tone, in the adroitly shaded beauty that he imparts to it, in his feeling for the course and the variation of a melody, in the weaving of a lacelike filigree of arabesques, in an exquisite sense of proportion and transition. Mr. Elman's transitions, for example, thrill by their cumulative intensity, Mr. Kreisler's persuade by their finely spun euphony. His style is not emasculated. But it has the elegance and the deftness that makes him cultivate as by instinct the polished simplicities of seventeenth and eighteenth century pieces. Yet the writers for the violin in those days when it was still, so to say, an experimental instrument were not always content with gentle fancies and light elegance. They wove their larger and intenser patterns in tones, released more and more fully the voice of the instrument, gave it diversity, brilliance, power. When Mr. Kreisler plays such music he recreates it out of like ardors. He is the violinist of the classic concertos by right of a divining justice of interpretation. He is the violinist of the elder concertos by an imaginative sympathy with them, instinctive and cultivated, that is unique among the virtuosi of our time.

H. T. P.

From TIMES
Address: New York.
Date ....

WAGNERIAN SELECTIONS

Should Not Monopolize Boston Symphony Programmes.

Estab 34

To the Editor of The New York Times:

A few words anent Mr. Aldrich's remarks in last Sunday's TIMES about Wagnerian numbers on concert programmes and particularly the New York programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It would, of course, be absurd to contend that Wagner's preludes and independent orchestral compositions are unsuitable for symphony concert. As one of your correspondents I did not intend to "ban" them. Indeed, I expressly said that an occasional Wagner overture would be welcome. Complaint has not been made, and could not justly be made so far as Boston Symphony concerts in New York are concerned, of a practice that Mr. Aldrich himself very properly and cogently "bans"—that is, the performance of "fragments taken from the dramatic portions of the works, wrested from their context and deprived of the stage setting of action, scenery, and declamation that the composer intended to be an inherent part of them."

My criticism was solely that from any point of view the number of Wagnerian selections has been disproportionately large. The programme for the evening concert of March 21, 1912, originally included the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Tannhauser," which were played, and, as the soloist was detained by illness, the prelude to "Meistersinger" was substituted, making three Wagnerian numbers in all. On Saturday, March 23, 1912, there were rendered the Siegfried Idyl, the funeral march from "Goetterdaemmerung," and the prelude and Liebstod from "Tristan and Isolde." These were the last pair of concerts of last season, and when the programmes for the first pair of this season were announced, each containing a Wagnerian selection, it was not unnatural to apprehend that the former policy of superabundance would be continued.

WILBUR LARREMORE,
New York, Nov. 18, 1912.

SUNDAY HERALD,
NOVEMBER 24.

'Cellist and Assistant Conductor

Otto Urack of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be the 'cello soloist at the Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He will play Dvorak's Concerto and on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 1, as assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the orchestra which will assist in the concert given by Fritz Kreisler.

Despite his youth, Mr. Urack has had a noteworthy career, which has culminated in his appointment as the first assistant conductor the Boston Symphony Orchestra has ever had. He was born in Berlin in 1884 of Hungarian descent. In the Royal High School of Music, Berlin, he studied the 'cello under Hausmann; chamber music under Joachim and composition under Kaempf. From 1903 to 1910 he was principal 'cellist of the Royal Court Opera in Berlin, and since 1908 he has been solo 'cellist of the Festival Orchestra in Bayreuth. During the season of 1911-1912 he was the principal conductor in the Municipal Opera in Barmen, Germany, where he had charge of all the Wagnerian performances and produced there Strauss's "Salome," "Electra" and "Der Rosenkavalier," giving 15 performances of the last named. Previous to that he conducted opera in Bucharest, Sofia and Belgrade.

His success in Barmen was sufficient for him to secure a five years' contract with the Royal Court Opera in Berlin, but from this contract Dr. Muck secured his release in order that he might come to Boston. Last spring when there was a question of a successor to Mr. Schroeder, Dr. Muck recommended Mr. Urack at once. There had always been a plan to fortify the Symphony Orchestra with an assistant conductor, and Dr. Muck warmly recommended Mr. Urack for this post.

Mr. Urack has composed an opera, "Signor Formica," which will be produced this season at Breslau, a light opera, two string quartets and a number of smaller works.

SEMBRICH'S RECITAL

Mme. Sembrich, who returned to America last September for a long concert tour throughout this country, will give her only recital in Boston in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 8, tickets for which will be ready at the box office next Friday. For many years her recitals have been annual features of Boston's musical season, but last year she stayed in Europe giving concerts throughout Germany, Austria and Russia. This will be her first appearance here in two years. The program arranged for Boston differs in many respects from that which she gave in New York. She will sing 27 songs in four groups, the first group being classical airs, the second German songs, the third French and American songs and the fourth eight folk-songs of seven different countries sung in as many languages. Mme. Sembrich is the only one of the great operatic singers who has gone in seriously in the cultivation of folk-songs. Twice in New York she has given recitals devoted entirely to music of this class. In the folk-songs she has selected for Boston she will sing in Canadian French, in the brogue of Ireland, in Norwegian, Greek, Polish, Russian and Hungarian.

ELMAN'S RECITAL

The last of the Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall before the holidays will be given Dec. 15 by Mischa Elman. These concerts, which have been so successful, will be resumed in January. Elman has arranged an attractive program, the principal numbers of which are Beethover's Sonata in F-major for violin and piano; Ernst's concerto in F-sharp minor and Handel's sonata in D-major. He will also play a number of short pieces. Percy Kahn will be his accompanist.

THE BOSTON AMERICAN
NOVEMBER 23, 1912.

HEAR KREISLER AT SYMPHONY

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

Fritz Kreisler was soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. The famous Austrian violinist had not been heard here for more than two years and he had an encouraging reception.

Few people realize it, but Kreisler has been before the public for more than a quarter of a century. His first appearance in Boston was made in old Bumstead Hall in 1888 as a boy of thirteen, a child prodigy.

Like many other musical prodigies, Kreisler's maturity has not belied the promise of his youth, and there is no question today of his rank in the very front row of virtuoso violinists.

Now he is approaching middle age, and is no longer a romantic figure as he wields his bow. His hair is still black and shiny and his little mustache still attracts, but he is a man of thirty-seven, not a willowy boy for women to go wild over, nor a bit of a girl to hypnotize the men.

So when Kreisler plays he is a violinist, not a hypnotist, and we judge him calmly, not hysterically.

He selected the Beethoven concerto in D major, an immortal composition packed with lovely melodies, full of brilliancy and violin difficulties, but composed by a man who used a violin to interpret his music, who did not write to show off a violin.

And as Kreisler played one could not help comparing it with that pompous, blatant, empty and frightfully tedious Brahms concerto which Mischa Elman performed in Symphony Hall one Sunday afternoon not long ago.

Kreisler is still a wizard of tone. Such gorgeous color, such exquisite singing of strings, such glorious triumphing over obstacles, such general brilliancy have seldom been heard in Symphony Hall.

The program was wholly classical. The symphony was Mozart's "Jupiter" in C major, and Dr. Muck played it as one who loves Mozart. Likewise the Beethoven Leonora Overture No. 3, that challenge cartel which all visiting conductors like Nikish and Stock and Stransky love to fling at our conductors was given [illegible] ing and impressive perfor[illegible]

SUNDAY GLOBE—NOVEMBER 24.

Mr Urack This Week's Symphony Soloist

Brahm's Symphony No. 2 in D major, Dvorak's concerto for violoncello and Schumann's "Genoveva" overture make the program for the seventh pair of Symphony concerts this week. The soloists will be Otto Urack, colleague of Heinrich Warnke at the first desk of the 'cellos and assistant conductor of the orchestra.

Mr Urack was engaged last Spring on the warm recommendation of Dr Muck to take the place of Alwin Schroeder, who was retiring from the orchestra, and also to assume the post of assistant conductor. It had long been in the minds of the management of the orchestra to have an assistant conductor and thus be prepared for emergencies which might arise at any time, and for this double appointment Dr Muck was instructed to choose his own man.

Mr Urack, despite his youth, has had a notable career. He was born in Berlin in 1884 of Hungarian descent. He received his musical education at the Royal High School of Music, Berlin, where he studied 'cello with Prof Hausmann, chamber music with Joachim, and composition in the class of Kampf. In 1903 Mr Urack became principal 'cellist of the Royal Opera House, Berlin, and held this position nearly seven years. During this time he did much work in chamber music and frequently appeared as virtuoso soloist in the prinicipal cities of Germany.

Since 1908 he has occupied the desk of principal 'cellist in the Festival Orchestra in Bayreuth. During the season of 1911-12 Mr Urack was engaged as first conductor of the Municipal Theatre in Barmen. He produced here almost all of Wagner's operas and Richard Strauss' "Salome," "Electra" and "Der Rosencavalier."

Offered the position of conductor in the Royal Opera, Berlin, he signed the contract for five years, but after a short time decided to get his release in order to accept Dr Muck's offer to join the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He has composed an opera in two acts, "Signor Formica," to be produced during the present season in Breslau; a light opera, two string quartets and a number of works in the smaller forms. He has also conducted in Bucharest, Belgrade and Sofia.

Fritz Kreisler's Concert.

The program which Fritz Kreisler has arranged for his recital in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, Dec 1, is characteristic of the man and his art. A half of it which he will play will be devoted to forgotten music of the masters of the 17th and 18th Centuries, in the revival of which he has worked so ardently and with such success.

He will have the assistance of an orchestra of Symphony players under Mr Otto Urack, the assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mr John P. Marshall will be the organist. The program calls for two concertos and two groups of shorter pieces.

Mme Sembrich's Concert.

Mme Marcella Sembrich, who returned to America last September for a long concert tour throughout this country, will give her only recital in Boston in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Dec 8, tickets for which will be ready at the box office next Friday.

This will be her first appearance here in two years. The program which she has arranged for Boston will include 27 songs in four groups, the first group being classical airs, the second German songs, the third French and American songs and the fourth eight folk-songs of seven different countries sung in as many languages. Mme Sembrich has made the cultivation of folk-songs a feature of her concerts. In those she has selected for Boston she will sing in Canadian French, in the brogue of Ireland, in Norwegian, Greek, Polish, Russian and Hungarian.

SUNDAY POST, NOVEMBER 24,

Next Week's Symphony Concerts

Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D major, Dvorak's concerto for violoncello and Schumann's "Genoveva" overture make the programme that Dr. Muck has arranged for the seventh Symphony concert, to be played next Friday afternoon and evening. The soloist will be Mr. Otto Urack, colleague of Mr. Heinrich Warnke at the first desk of the cellos, and assistant conductor of the orchestra. Mr. Urack was engaged last spring on the warm recommendation of Dr. Muck to take the place of Alwin Schroeder, who was retiring from the orchestra, and also to assume the post of assistant conductor. It had long been in the minds of the management of the orchestra to have an assistant conductor and thus be prepared for emergencies which might arise at any time, and for this double appointment Dr. Muck was instructed to choose his own man. On another page a sketch of Mr. Urack's career will be found.

The Kreisler Concert

The programme which Fritz Kreisler has arranged for his recital in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon, Dec. 8, is characteristic of the man and his art. A half of it which he will play will be devoted to forgotten music of the masters of the 17th and 18th centuries, in the revival of which he has worked so ardently and with such success. As already announced, he will have the assistance of an orchestra of Symphony players under Mr. Otto Urack, the assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mr. John P. Marshall will be the organist. The programme calls for two concertos and two groups of shorter pieces. The first concerto is one in C major by Antonio Vivaldi, which will be heard in Boston for the first time. The concerto is in manuscript, and Mr. Kreisler is its owner. He played it once in New York several years ago. It is arranged for an accompaniment of strings and organ. The other concerto is the familiar one by Mendelssohn. The orchestra under Mr. Urack will play the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," the overture to "Oberon" and an intermezzo for string orchestra from Mr. Urack's opera, "Signor Formica," which is to have its first performance in Breslau this winter. The programme in full is as follows:

Overture, "The Marriage of Figaro"...Mozart
Orchestra.
Concerto for violin in C major (MS.).Vivaldi
Accompanied by string orchestra and organ.
Mr. Kreisler.
Concerto for violin in E minor...Mendelssohn
Mr. Kreisler.
Intermezzo for strings...............Urack
Orchestra.

Soli for violin:
Andantino ......Padre Martini (1706-1784)
Prelude and allegro...............
Gaetano Pugnani (1731-1798)
Chanson Louis XIII. and Pavane......
Louis Couperin (1630-1665)
La Chasse ....J. B. Carter (1765-1841)
Variations......Giuseppe Tartini (1692-1770)
Mr. Kreisler.

Soli for violin:
Indian Canzonetta ....Dvorak
Caprice Viennois ....Kreisler
Tambourin Chinois ....Kreisler
24th Caprice ....Paganini
Mr. Kreisler.
Overture, "Oberon"...................Weber
Orchestra.

TRANSCRIPT, DECEMBER 2,

MR. KREISLER'S CONCERT

THE VIOLINIST AGAIN IN HIS PRIME

From Vivaldi to Mendelssohn, and from the Seventeenth to the Twentieth Century, He Plays with Equal Mastery of His Instrument and His Music—Mr. Urack Conducts

THE violin has more than once been compared to a child in the hands of its beloved master, and the crude metaphor was never more plausible than in the case of Mr. Kreisler's rich, provocative and fascinating art. The Austrian violinist performed yesterday afternoon for the first time in Boston an extraordinary concerto of the seventeenth century composer, Vivaldi, together with a double cycle of violin soli, ancient and modern, and Mendelssohn's familiar and melodious concerto in E minor. All these compositions, selected apparently with a certain naive disregard of programme exigencies, revealed in a striking and unexpected manner a performance so fine, so unusual, and in number after number so sharply individualized by the soloist, that the fact that this city has listened for the last time to this unique musician and extraordinary man assumes the proportions of an artistic tragedy.

Mr. Kreisler was creditably accompanied by a rather scanty segment of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Urack conducted. The obvious limitations of the small orchestra were nicely adapted to the tonal delicacy of the Vivaldi piece but the performance of the two overtures was much vitiated by the numerical insufficiency. This was especially noticeable in the "Oberon" overture where Weber's formidable and fiery canvass was only meagrely filled in by the orchestra in a manner resembling the thumb nail sketch of an authentic masterpiece. An intermezzo for strings taken from Mr. Urack's opera, "Signor Formica," was sandwiched between the Mendelssohn concerto and the delicious soli of the old composers. In this composition, a pleasing and somewhat mediocre theme is slightly developed without touching the hearer's fancy or greatly engaging his attention.

The concerto in C major of Vivaldi, which Mr. Kreisler unearthed and which he greatly admires, is without question one of the most remarkable musical events of the season thus far. For Vivaldi, quite apart from his merely chronological importance as a developer of the concerto form, is a composer extremely adaptable to an intensely modern interpretation. This is precisely what Mr. Kreisler did with him in a production which was, to say the least, an astonishing tour de force and an act of absolute recreation on the part of the performer. It was a remarkable experience to hear a composition so classically beautiful, so instinct with the conventional ardor and polite sadness of the seventeenth century transformed by this extraordinary Tschek and man of fire into a triumph of poetry, fervent, absorbing, pathetic and absolutely original. What the piano is to De Pachmann, the violin is to Mr. Kreisler, and, incredible as it appears, he actually played the rococo composer as though he were playing Chopin. In the hands of a smaller man this intense modernization of a remote masterpiece would be clearly a tour de force closely verging on the ridiculous, but Mr. Kreisler, a unique artist and assisted by a capable orchestra, made of it a bizarre and at times a very lovely achievement. The polished naiveté, the archaic prettiness which so delights Mr. Arnold Dolmetsch and his friends almost entirely disappears and in its place, you have this strange and enchanting figure madly fiddling on the charming ruins of a lost art. Moreover, this is done, in reality, with positive intuition and without bravura. With loving absorption and a beautiful, shy reverence he carries through his unique conception. And how sweetly he subdues the voice of his instrument all through the solemn second movement, where the golden suavity of the mood is interrupted by the organ stealing through the arabesques which he invokes like a whiff of incense through the open door of a church. All the antique tricks, the archaic endings da cappo and the several devices of Vivaldi's restrained virtuosity reappear in the startling guise of Kreisler's art, and the result is a tone poem, deeply imbued with the strange genius of the performer, supplying to the hearer a modern intuition and voicing a new appeal.

All this contrasted remarkably with the Mendelssohn concerto which immediately followed. It is extraordinary that a modern composition, written by a man of genius and by no means devoid of musical strength, should appear so emasculated following the rich pathos and antique gaiety of an old masterpiece to which the violinist is evidently devoted. The popular concerto was unfortunately placed in the programme; it suffered through comparison and, unlike the other, it did not, on the whole, move the listener. In the group of concert pieces by the old composers, Mr. Kreisler's genius appeared more individualized and amazing. And instance of superior cleverness is found in a little thing by Antoine Cartier (1692-1770) La Chasse. Played by our modern admirers of the remote, it is analogous to a small stage of picturesque marionettes moved by wires. Mr. Kreisler plays it, of course, in anything but a realistic manner. But it is different. Deftly he employs his effects; a pat there; a touch, and it is all over. While in the Variations of Giuseppe Tartini, he plays as violently as any of his countrymen. The violin figuratively shows its teeth. The player rips and tears the theme with a kind of savage delight, and over the instrument peer his eyes cruelly aware. How tender he can be we have seen in the Mendelssohn.

The most obvious comment upon Mr. Kreisler as a violinist is that the instrument in his hands, fulfils, in the highest degree, its primal and lyric function; it sings. He is so far a fashionable violinist that his finely shaded tones appeal to the musically fastidious through their very faultlessness, but to regard Kreisler merely on this basis of technical excellence would be a profound mistake. The fact that he, a Bohemian from the country of Dvoràk (whom he plays enchantingly) should have studied so lovingly the technical classics of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries indicates a nature emotionally complex. But in every case, as I have suggested, he has transfused the old masterpieces with a gypsy-like ardor, startling, audacious and singularly lovable. In fire of the primitive, not the manufactured type, he in no way falls short of Mischa Elman as a technical performer. It is an interesting fact that the pieces which seemed especially to please his listeners and which he was forced to repeat were precisely those in which he approaches, if I may say so, Mr. Elman's fascinating pryotechnics. In these cases he resembled a child suddenly turned loose, laughing, shaking his hair, with complete abandon exerting himself in a naive and joyous display; he was not, like so many popular virtuosi, a many-colored, municipal fountain spouting cold. A golden gaiety and purely lyric mood is, without doubt, the predominant characteristic of Mr. Kreisler's art. His sense of transition and the intellectual content of a melody is beyond praise and his wonderful delight in compositions like the Vivaldi concerto stamps him as unique in a generation of much musical cleverness. As an experience, Mr. Kreisler's recital is permanently remarkable and his playing of the old concerto, to take the most important example of a performance where none was finally representative, is memorable as the expression of a unique musical feeling and a beautiful soul.

C. V. W.

About Concerts

The Symphony Orchestra departed last evening on the second of its journeys to New York and the other cities to which it pays monthly visits. With it went Mr. Kreisler, the violinist, who is to play a concerto at each of the six concerts—Beethoven's, Brahms's, Bruch's in G minor and Mendelssohn's. The symphonies that Dr. Muck has chosen are Brahms's in D, Sibelius's in E minor, and Beethoven's in F. Overtures recently played at the Symphony Concerts here and Brahms's "Academic" overture, besides, will make the rest of the programmes. Almost needless to say, there will be no Symphony Concerts in Boston this week.

MONITOR, DECEMBER 2, 1912

KREISLER CONCERT

Concertos have no terrors for the Sunday afternoon concert audiences at Symphony hall. Yesterday's hearers heard two of them, besides two groups of solo pieces and two orchestral selections. And yet they say the concerto is disappearing as an art form.

The artist of the day perhaps was responsible for this shattering of prognostications. For Kreisler showed so magnificently how well the violin may be played that one forgot to notice how well Kreisler played the violin. An audience that crowded even the standing room at the hall sides showed enthusiasm at all moments and every movement of the concert.

And what a variety of character, permitting every grade of luscious tone color, was exhibited in Mr. Kreisler's selections. For the seeker after novelty Vivaldi's MS. concerto; for the classicist Mendelssohn's gem-like work of faceted perfection; for the musical humorist, Mr. Kreisler's own "Tambourin Chinois"; for the virtuoso admirer Paganini's enormously difficult twenty-fourth caprice literally tossed off by the lion-like performer with an aplomb that its composer probably did not surpass; there was the [illegible] Couperin to rouse interest in

Aside from Kreisler's own playing, which as ever showed no less musicianship than virtuosity, interest was caused by Vivaldi's new work. It has the customary three movements of the concerto, and is a well balanced and conservative work. The violin is given every desired opportunity and there are interesting contrapuntal passages in the first movement. The second movement, andante doloroso, is well named, but not too sentimental. It gives many a flowing phrase to the solo instrument and the work finishes with an allegro in fugal form whose resemblance to a mery jig is contrasted and relieved from overmuch levity by a sudden coda of utmost breadth and of churchly dignity.

Mr. Urack well conducted the orchestra in the concertos and the overtures which marked the end as well as the beginning of the concert, as also his own intermezzo from the opera "Signor Formica," a neat theme treated with surprising effects for the strings. John P. Marshall was organist and in the nine solo pieces Carl Lamson's piano work showed that Boston has accompanists of rank.

The program: Overture, "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart, orchestra. Concerto in C major (MS.), Vivaldi, allegro maestoso; andante doloroso; allegro giusto; accompanied by string orchestra and organ; concerto in E minor, Mendelssohn; intermezzo for strings, from "Signor Formica," Urack, orchestra. Soli for violin: Andantino, Martini; Prelude and Allegro, Pugnani; Chanson Louis XIII. and Pavane, Couperin; La Chasse, Cartier; Variations, Tartini; Indian Canzonetta, Dvorak; Caprice Viennois, Kreisler; Tambourin Chinois, Kreisler; Twenty-fourth Caprice, Paganini. Overture, "Oberon," Weber, orchestra.

THE BOSTON AMERICAN—NOVEMBER 24, 1912.

Fritz Kreisler Will Play Two Concertos

Half of Program of Recital to Be Forgotten Works of 17th and 18th Centuries in Revival.

The program which Fritz Kreisler has arranged for his recital in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon, December 8, is characteristic of the man and his art.

Half of it will be devoted to forgotten music of the masters of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries in the revival of which he has worked with such success.

He will have the assistance of an orchestra of Symphony players under Otto Urack, the assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. John P. Marshall will be the organist.

The program calls for two concertos and two groups of shorter pieces. The first concerto is one in C-major by Antonio Vivaldi, which will be heard in Boston for the first time. The concerto is in manuscript and Mr. Kreisler is its owner.

The other concerto is the familiar one by Mendelssohn. The orchestra under Mr. Urack will play the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," the overture to "Oberon" and an intermezzo for string orchestra from Mr. Urack's opera "Signor Formica,' which is to have its first performance in Breslau this Winter.

The program in full is as follows:

Overture—"The Marriage of Figaro"......Mozart
Orchestra.
Concerto for Violin in C-Major (MS)........
Antonio Vivaldi
Accompanied by String Orchestra and Organ.
Mr. Kreisler.
Concerto for Violin in E-Minor.......Mendelssohn
Orchestra.
Intermezzo for Strings....................Urack
Orchestra.

Soli for Violin—
a. Andantino..........Padre Martini (1706-1784)
b. Prelude and Allegro.......................
Gaetano Pugnani (1731-1798)
c. Chanson Louis XIII. and Pavane........
Louis Couperin (1630-1665)
d. La Chasse...........J. B. Cartier (1765-1841)
e. Variations.......Giuseppe Tartini (1692-1770)
Mr. Kreisler.

Soli for Violin—
a. Indiana Canzonetta.....................Dvorak
b. Caprice Viennois.......................Kreisler
c. Tambourin Chinois.....................Kreisler
d. Twenty-fourth Caprice.................Paganini
Mr. Kreisler.
Overture—"Oberon" ....Weber
Orchestra.

URACK AS SOLOIST FOR 7TH SYMPHONY

Assistant Conductor, a Noted German 'Cellist, Will Be Heard Friday and Saturday.

Brahms' Symphony No. 2, in D-major, Dvorak's concerto for violoncello and Schuman's "Genoveva" overture make the program that Dr. Muck has arranged for the seventh Symphony concert to be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The soloist will be Otto Urack, colleague of Heinrich Warnke at the first desk of the 'cellos, and assistant conductor of Mr. Urack was engaged last Spring on the recommendation of Dr. Muck to take the place of Alwin Schroeder, who was retiring from the orchestra, and also to assume the post of assistant conductor. It had long been in the minds of the management of the orchestra to have an assistant conductor and thus be prepared for emergencies which might arise at any time, and for this double appointment Dr. Muck was instructed to choose his own man.

Mr. Urack, despite his youth, has had a notable career. He was born in Berlin in 1884 of Hungarian descent. He received his musical education at the Royal High School of Music, Berlin, where he studied 'cello with Professor Hausmann, chamber music with Joachim and composition in the class of Kampf. In 1903 Mr. Urack became principal 'cellist of the Royal Opera House, Berlin, and held this position nearly seven years. During this time he did much work in chamber music and frequently appeared as virtuoso soloist in the principal cities of Germany.

Since 1908 he has occupied the desk of principal 'cellist in the Festival Orchestra in Bayreuth. During the season of 1911-12 Mr. Urack was engaged as first conductor of the Municipal Theatre in Barmen; he produced here almost all of Wagner's operas and Richard Strauss's "Salome," "Electra" and "Der Rosencavalier."

His success was such that he was offered the position of conductor in the Royal Opera, Berlin. He signed the contract for five years, but after a short time he decided to get his release from the Royal Opera in order to accept Dr. Muck's offer to join the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

He has composed an opera in two acts, "Signor Formica," to be produced during the present season in Breslau; a light opera, two string quartets and a number of works in the smaller forms. He has also conducted in Bucharest, Belgrade and Sofia.

SCHUMANN-HEINK RECITAL.

Will Sing Five Songs by Beethoven Today at Symphony Hall.

This afternoon's concert at Symphony Hall is the annual song recital by Schumann-Heink. This will be her only appearance in concert during the season. Madame Schumann-Heink has prepared a very interesting list of songs, departing somewhat from the usual. She begins with five songs by Beethoven, four of which will be unfamiliar to most concert-goers. She also has placed on the list two Seventeenth Century tunes. Of the moderns, Richard Strauss and Max Reger are represented, likewise there are two English songs. She will have the assistance of Edward Collins, pianist, and her accompanist will be Mrs. Katherine Hoffman. The program follows:

L. v. Beethoven—a. Die Ehre Gottes, b. Vom Tode, c. Bitten, d. Ich liebe dich, e. Neue Liebe, neues Leben. Chopin—a. Ballade, G minor; b. Berceuse, c. Scherzo, C sharp minor, Edward Collins. Robert Schumann—a. In der Fremde, b. Mondnacht, c. Frumlingsnacht, d. Liebesbotschatt, e. Erl-Konig. Liszt—a. Libestraum, No. 3. Paganini-Liszt—b. La Campanella, Edward Collins. Robert Franz—a. Im Herbst, b. Gute Nacht. Richard Strauss—c. Traum durch die Dammerung, d. Befreit. Max Reger—e. Waldeinsamkeit. H. Reimann Collection, Seventeenth Century—f. Spinnerliedchen. Landon Ronald—a. Down in the Forest. Mary T. Salter—b. Cry of Rachel. Louise Reichardt, Seventeenth Century—c. When the Roses Bloom.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT,

NOVEMBER 25,

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

MME. SCHUMANN-HEINK'S SONG RECITAL

Her Unique Place Among the Singers of Our Generation—The Ripened Artistry of Her Present Maturity—News from the Opera House and Symphony Hall—Mr. Hammerstein's Newest Project—Items and Opinions

WHEN a singer stands at maturity the passing years do not ripen the voice, but they do refine and deepen artistry. Not so many years ago Mme. Schumann-Heink's singing was large outpouring of floods of rich tone, broadly colored with elementary moods and impulses, direct in its musical and emotional appeal, conquering by the intensity of its power and the opulence of its beauty. The voice as mere voice has now lost something of its tonal magnificence. A singer may not be in her fifty-third year (as Mme. Schumann-Heink half cheerfully and half wistfully acknowledges) and have worked hard for thirty seasons and still find her tones as ample, resonant, free and supple as they once were. She must rely more upon their beauty than their power. She must take thought by reflective artistry and order her singing accordingly rather than pour forth her voice by kindled temperamental impulse. For luminous bursts of tone she may substitute adroit light and shade in the coloring of it. For great sweeps of power she may substitute a quieter, deeper and sustained beauty. To the impulses of a big and warm temperament succeed the finer strokes of thoughtful and ripened imagination.

To this maturity [illegible] has now come and it is such a transformation that within a year or two past her singing has undergone. Twelve months ago, she was the "assisting artist" at three concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, and not hitherto in this town had she sung with such beauty of tone, steadily sustained and steadily diversified beauty, such divining and imparting imagination and such refinement and symmetry of style. If her voice had a little passed its golden prime, her artistry was at its brightest and fullest meridian. Then she sang operatic pieces, fragments of music-drama or orchestrated songs. Yesterday, she returned to Symphony Hall for a song recital in the strict and familiar sense of the word, and once more her singing brought this pleasure of ordered, diversified and insistent beauty, finer imagination, deeper feeling, more adroit skill and power tempered and refined into felicity. Yet she still kept the humanness of aspect and voice, mood and emotion, the suggestion of the common lot glorified, enriched and ennobled in her, that make her the most sympathetic and the most democratic singer of these days in America. The common people—to use a convenient but not a deprecatory phrase—rejoice in her. She stirs them because her singing expresses in terms that they can feel and understand, moods and emotions that are half-inarticulate in them, and because it awakens spontaneously their half dormant sense of beautiful and moving song. At the same time, the voice and the artistry that she plies upon it are the pleasure of the sophisticated and the sensitive. In her time, consciously or unconsciously, she has done great service to the broader understanding and appreciation of the arts of song in America. She has spread broadcast its satisfactions and pleasures, opened them to a great half-deaf and half-dumb world æsthetically that scarcely guessed them. She deserves the numbers and the quality of the audience that awaited her yesterday, wherein were all sorts and conditions of men and women, and the applause that the humblest and the highest musically in it heaped upon her. She has led them as has hardly another singer in our generation from admiration and excitement over her voice to understanding and pleasure in her artistry.

The songs that Mme. Schumann-Heink sang yesterday in her appointed programme or that she added to it gave very ample range to her ripened beauty of voice and new richness of artistry. It enabled her to sing two of Beethoven's religious songs with grave intensity of tone and sincerity and earnestness of devout feeling. The listener thought of the motto Beethoven wrote somewhere in his mass: "From the heart to the heart." Yet she did not miss the 'masculine largeness of Beethoven's song, the greatness and depth of spirit that are the ear-mark of most of his music. Woman that she is, she understood no less the masculine passion and sweep of Strauss's "Befreit." Rhetorician he may be in some of his music; in this song he is heroic melodist. He is poetic melodist in turn in his other song, "The Twilight-Dream" that Mme. Schumann-Heink sang, distilling the atmosphere of music and poetry into the still soft beauty of her middle tones. The same beauty, rounded, refined, of a luminous depth and a poetic plasticity, wrought and sustained the mood of musing melancholy in two of Schumann's songs and gained by an artistry that hid itself, the lovely simplicity of Schubert's "Liebesbotschaft," and the playfulness, like glints of sunlight upon the brook itself of his song of the trout. The richer, franker, German expansiveness and humor that are in her had their play in another song of Beethoven and in a folk-ditty or two. Some Germans write their songs almost as if they were singing them to themselves for the sheer pleasure of speaking a mood or an emotion aloud. If they do it beautifully, we poor reviewers seeking for the apt word call the beauty intimate. Of these were the songs by Franz and Reger that Mme. Schumann-Heink sang, and she seemed to whisper their low-voiced and gentle beauty into an audience that her imparting power had concentrated into a single hearing and sympathetic ear.

Those that still crave the old Schumann-Heink of the big sweeps of tone and feeling and the vocal stroke piled on vocal strokes could have their fill in her vevid and somewhat melodramatic version of "The Erl-King" and the plaints of her Rachel crying with the voice of distraught motherhood for children. Yet even they must have known and felt what a far finer thing was the rich, warm, velvety beauty of Mme. Schumann's sustained song, falling on the ear, like the pile of thick, soft carpets to the naked foot; the depths of subdued yet glowing color that she gave it—colors like those in Venetian pictures; and the imagination that caught and wove each phrase into the mood and spirit of the whole. Once Mme. Schumann-Heink sang with a careless opulence of power. Now she sings as though she had caressed each phrase into its place by a persuasive and discriminating artistry, as though she took thought of every tone and so made it the more even and beautiful. She sings now out of the triple resource of the great singer—voice, artistry and life.

H. T. P.

NEWS OF MUSIC

Forthcoming Programmes

TWENTY-EIGHT different pieces stand on Mme. Sembrich's programme for her concert at Symphony Hall on the afternoon of Sunday, Dec. 8—as generous a list as any singer within memory has proposed for a recital here. The unusual group is the array of eight folk-songs in strange tongues with which the concert will end. Here follows the programme in its entirety:

.....Beethoven
Der Kuss .....Mozart
Veilchen .....Paradies
M' ha preso alla sua ragna.....Händel
Lusinghe piucare .....Munro
My Lovely Celia.....Anonymous
Fingo per mio diletto.....
Im Grünen.—Klärchenlied.—Musensohn.Schubert
Brautlieder (1 and 2).—Röselein.....Schumann
Komm, wir wandeln.—In Lust und
Schmerzen .....Cornelius
Les Cloches .....Debussy
L'oiseau bleu .....Dalcroze
Ouvre tes yeux.....Massenet
Before the Crucifix.—Spooks.....La Forge
Constancy .....Foote
Eight Folk-Songs—
Gai lon la.....French Canada
Coolin .....Ireland
Kom Kjyra .....Norway
.....Greece

At the first concert here this season of the Flonzaley Quartet, at Jordan Hall on the evening of Thursday, Dec. 12, it will play Mozart's quartet in D (Op. 7); Tschaikowsky's in the same key (Op. 11)—the quartet of the beautiful slow movement; and Haydn's quartet in G (Op. 76, No. 1). Seemingly "the Flonzaleys" are as devoted as ever to the eighteenth-century music that so well displays their best powers.

When Mr. Godowsky appears at the Symphony Concerts early in December, he will play the fourth piano concerto, in G, of Beethoven.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT,

NOVEMBER 23, 1912

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MR. KREISLER PLAYS BEETHOVEN'S CONCERTO

A Performance of Transcendant and Thrilling Beauty in Which Orchestra and Conductor Also Had Their Share—An Audience That Rejoiced in a Soloist, at Last, of the First Rank—Modernized Mozart for a Beginning and the "Leonora" Overture for Epic Ending

YESTERDAY afternoon, for the first time this season, the "assisting artist" was the most interesting and important element in a Symphony Concert. Hitherto, this autumn, the "soloists" have not been remarkable. Mme. Rappold, for example, is an agreeable, if rather colorless, singer, but she is by no means of the first flight of the Metropolitan that occasionally wings its way into Symphony Hall. Mr. Witherspoon, again, is a capable and intelligent singer in the second or third rank of that same company. He brought a man's voice into the Symphony Concert, where in recent seasons it has been seldom heard, and he made possible the performance of the final scene of "Die Walküre." Mr. Proctor is a pianist of quiet abilities and mild and reflective temperament, who has long lived and worked in Boston and who was presumed to warrant "recognition." If the standards of the concerts are to be the same for the soloists that they are for the orchestra and the conductor, then Mme. Rappold, Mr. Witherspoon and Mr. Proctor hardly deserved a call to them. It may be true that the routine and the requirements of the Metropolitan Opera House make it impossible that its eminent singers should be absent from New York for four days to appear at the Symphony Concerts in Boston. But is that circumstance any sound reason why secondary and inferior singers should be summoned in their stead? If a pianist, a singer or a violinist reaches the high standards that presumably govern the choice of soloists for the Symphony Concerts and if he happens to live and work also in Boston, by all means let him appear at them. Otherwise his domicile and his working place, his lack or his plenitude of "recognition" seem hardly a material consideration.

The Symphony Concerts, now of national and international repute and the crowning artistic glory of Boston in the eyes of the world, do not exist to give secondary singers and virtuosi a hearing, to afford débuts for promising youngsters, or to foster resident "talent" because it happens to be resident. It is an open secret that the management of the concerts is under incessant pressure of many kinds to lower the standards for the soloists and to throw wide the gates that it ought to keep close-barred to all that have not great and matured abilities and wide and established reputations. It is also an observed fact that whenever it has yielded reluctantly to this pressure or itself relaxed those standards, the outcome has been disappointing to performer and audience and has lowered, for the time, the prestige of appearances at the Symphony Concerts. The only "safe and sane" course is a high standard and stout adherence to it. As the Symphony Orchestra now employs a conductor of the first rank and picks its players the world over—in Boston no less than in Paris and Berlin—according to their proved abilities, so it should call to its concerts only soloists of the first rank. If from adverse circumstance, these are unobtainable, it should go its own way. Unassisted, it gives some of its most interesting and best-liked concerts. There are too few rather than too many such. Moreover, its public discriminates shrewdly in the quality of these "assisting artists." Witness the little tumult of applause that greeted Mr. Kreisler when he came to the stage yesterday and the volleys of clapping that followed his playing of Beethoven's concerto. In comparison, the other soloists of the year have received but courteous acknowledgment of their good intentions and fair capabilities. At last an "assisting artist" of the first rank had come and the audience knew and rejoiced.

And yet the glory of as perfect a performance of Beethoven's concerto as human understanding, imagination and executive ability are likely to achieve was not wholly Mr. Kreisler's. Classic though the concerto is, it is primarily a virtuoso piece. It was written in the days when concertos existed for the display of the instrument for which they were written and of the virtuoso who played upon it. Composers—Beethoven no less than the rest—performers and public took them in no other way. Remote was the time wherein composers would regard the solo instrument merely as the conspicuous and dominant voice in an orchestral whole or construe a concerto as a potential symphonic poem (with or without a programme) that must be cast in a form particularly arbitrary and hard to conquer. Beethoven frankly wrote his concerto to display the violin in itself and the signal abilities with it of the virtuoso, Clementi. Therein was its chief and sufficient reason for existence according to every standard of the time. Throughout, Beethoven has written accordingly, and the most exacting of violinists may hardly complain of the opportunities that it offers him and the tests it lays upon him. But to keep his orchestra a mere background and support. He wrought it into the substance of his music, gave it long and significant passages quite to itself; kept it in constant interplay with the solo violin, and ordered with divining imagination the relation of its tone en masse or in isolated voices to that of the dominating instrument.

The result is a concerto in which the orchestra is no less an integral part than the violin, and so the more is it a masterpiece, since it satisfies the old requirements of a virtuoso piece and anticipates the new notion of a kind of hard and fast but infinitely tempting symphonic poem. Dr. Muck has acute understanding, penetrating imagination and the courage of his convictions, and so it was, perhaps, that, apprehending all this, he gave himself and the orchestra their just share in the concerto. The strictly orchestral passages might have stood in a symphony, so justly did the conductor and the band give them clear and beautiful voice. Everywhere they preserved with adroit balance the relation of the whole body of the music to the solo part; everywhere they gained exactly the fusion or the contrast of tone that Beethoven seemingly designed. If they missed not a detail that would enhance the violin against the background they were weaving, or the transition they were compassing, no more did they miss the beauty of a single phrase or the force of a single intervention that fell wholly to them. If Mr. Kreisler's tone was of wondrous and penetrating beauty in the concerto, no less was theirs. The two-fold result was ceaseless beauty.

It is possible to play the violin part in the concerto with a large eloquence, a broad style and an incessant amplitude of tone and accent that Mr. Kreisler does not choose to bring to it. Such grandiloquence is Mr. Ysaye's way with the music. It is possible also to clothe it in intensities of excited tone and excited feeling, which is Mr. Elman's way with it. To do so is to inflate the music to the peculiar temperament of the violinist. Beethoven did not write the concerto in the vein of the "Eroica" symphony or the third "Leonora" overture. He wrote it as so much beautiful or exacting music for the beautiful and achieving voice of the violin. It is not all power and sweep; it is very nearly all fineness and sensibility. Therein it meets Mr. Kreisler's matured talents and temperament half-way so that the music and the violinist exist for the time in a kind of spiritual fusion that completely and perfectly imparts it to those that hear.

Mr. Kreisler's tone is a tone of exquisite fineness and softness, meet for the velvety texture of the music. It is a tone of most sensitive suppleness that bends to every curve of a melody to every lace-like filigree of ornament. It is a tone quick with delicate light and shade that makes its song, its figuration, its arabesque bright with changeful tints and half-tints. The play of light and shadow in it is nearly endless. It is furthermore a tone that can isolate itself like a fine and shimmering thread against the background of the orchestra or fuse itself with one or another of the instrumental voices. It is a tone that springs to every elasticity of rhythm, that can spin itself into the finest of transitions, gather without break or jar light force of a climax, or leap up dominant out of orchestral tumult. Above all it is a tone that glows with the beauty of the song that it sustains and yet in its own right is so full of sensuous loveliness that it falls halo-like upon prosaic figuration. Even in passages for purely technical display, it works its charm of glowing and beautiful rhapsody. The ear, the imagination, the whole listening being respond to such beauty of sound weaving its beautiful patterns upon the air.

A part of this beauty is the beauty of the tone of the violin, most human-voiced of all instruments; a part of it was yesterday the intrinsic beauty of the music; a part may even spring from the flawless technique of the violinist; but more than all the rest the beauty lay in the mind, the imagination, and the spirit of Mr. Kreisler, transfiguring him, his music and his instrument. As the years pass La Duse has simplified and sublimated her acting until it has become of a rarely sensitive and suffused beauty, a beauty from within the actress's own mind and spirit for which play and personage are fortunate to be the means. Such beauty, by a similar process of simplification and sublimation, has Mr. Kreisler's playing of Beethoven's concerto now gained. It is hard to believe it matched in our time. And there he was, by the perverse prose of things, the husky, swarthy Viennese of full body and impassive face, who stood uneasily in the pauses of the concerto and who strode on and off the stage like an alert man of business.

Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony began the concert and Beethoven's third "Leonora" overture ended it. Presumably Mozart's symphonies must be played in these days by orchestras twice or thrice as numerous as those for which he wrote, and probably with fuller-powered instruments. They must be played, too, in halls thrice or four times the dimensions of those for which they were written. And so it is that this "Jupiter" symphony must sound as with great chords, with full-voiced song between, with large and stately minuet, with a fugued finale as big and brilliant and sweeping in its way as though it had come off the table of some eighteenth-century Strauss or Reger. And so, too, perhaps the slow movement must be charged with a passionate moodiness of voice that is far enough from the musing melancholy that was "sentiment" in Mozart's time and music. Gone is the wistfulness of his quasi Italian melody; in its stead are passion and almost power. If Mozart's music must go big under the necessities of modern orchestras and modern concert halls, then make it big also with brilliance or emotion.

There is no other way and Dr. Muck went not nearly so far with this modernized Mozart as does many another conductor. Big as the music had to sound, agitated as he did sometimes make it, he yet kept its brightness, its shimmer, its plasticity, its beauty of pattern and of voice. Pure Mozart in a little hall with a little orchestra and all light loveliness and gentle emotion is doubtless an archaic and eccentric taste to which nobody in this twentieth century could possibly cater. We

TIGHT BINDING

[illegible] the beauty under a magnifying glass, and we shall feel the emotions in the image of our own nervous time. Otherwise we might not appreciate them. No doubt Dr. Muck is right enough in his version of the "Jupiter" symphony—and yet his differentiating and characterizing imagination might carry it back, and his audience with it, into the eighteenth century again. It was only seven years into the nineteenth when Beethoven wrote the third "Leonora" overture, and once more it sounded like music-drama in epic epitome—of what energy, suspense, contrast and deep intensity of emotion, outpouring itself in tones, bending form and substance to its imperious will. Such music of power knows not the years and conquers the fluctuations of minds and spirits in changing times. The softer beauty and the distilled brilliance of Mozart has a harder struggle with them. H. T. P.

TRANSCRIPT,
NOVEMBER 30,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

AN AFTERNOON THAT RELEASED COMPOSERS

Brahms's Second Symphony in a Performance That Set Free Its Beauty—Dvorak's Concerto for Violoncello and Mr. Urack's Distinctions as a 'Cellist—Even Schumann Gains Freedom, Too—The Means to All This Emancipation

A LONGISH programme at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon was lengthened by the prefatory playing of the slow movement from Beethoven's seventh symphony to honor the memory of Mr. Higginson's friend, Dr. Arthur Tracy Cabot, devoted servant, also, to the well-being of the community. In itself, as Dr. Muck had ordered it, the programme seemed longer than it really was. Dvoràk's concerto for violoncello is not short by count of measures. To those that will have none of the 'cello as a solo instrument or of "the literature" for such purposes, the concerto would have been wearisome at half its length. To the rest, who found compensation in the rare beauty of Mr. Urack's tone and the refinement of his skill and even in Dvoràk's effort to give the whole piece his wonted richness of rhythmic energy and instrumental color, it still had its lengths. On the other hand, the symphony, the second of Brahms, was short and Dr. Muck and the orchestra imparted and intensified its richness of melody, diversified its instrumental color and released its warmth of mood and expression as has no performance of the music here within long memory. For ending—and Dr. Muck is now holding his audiences to the end, as he did not in his first term—came Schumann's overture to "Genoveva." When it was done, dramatizing eloquence had actually made Schumann seem like a romantic composer for the theatre.

Brahms was a melodist—the fertile inventor of sensuously beautiful and emotionally expressive melodies in the symphonic music of his time. Thereby it stands in the great line of musical descent after Beethoven and thereby it holds its own with succeeding generations. Whether Brahms invented these melodies spontaneously or after much travail of spirit none may say, but by the evidence of his own music in hearing in the concert hall or in reading from the engraved page, he developed, modulated, interwove and colored them reflectively, abstrusely, sometimes with obvious calculation over arid places. A melody beautiful in itself and quick with feeling underwent this treatment at Brahms's hands, and if conductor and men read the music too literally, fell upon hearers clouded and hardened. Similarly, Brahms was of alert imagination with many sorts of instrumental color. Scarcely a composer equals him in his "feeling" for his horns, for the clarinet, for the many-tinted strings. He was of quick imagination, too, in the contrasts of diversely rhythmed voices in his orchestra. Yet when he set the promptings of these impulses on the engraved page, again he took over-much thought, calculated and hardened once more. Like his melodies, Brahms's instrumental coloring and rhythmic contrasts needs a releasing and intuitive conductor and orchestra.

And, so finally, with the emotional and the poetic quality behind that really prompts this warm beauty of melody, this richly conceived instrumental color, this rhythmic élan, Gray, the poet, in Arnold's familiar phrase, "never spoke out." Brahms, the composer, "spoke out" but usually clouded the intrinsic quality of his utterance by too much reflection and stiffened it by too many pains against spontaneity. Brahms, the abstruse on one side of his musical mind and imagination was Brahms, the tone-poet, on the other. In the old, old phrase, two natures struggled in him and he was not always able to weld them, like some composers of more fortunate temperament, into a triumphant whole. Consciously or unconsciously, he left the conductors to adjust the balance, to give him the necessary release. His own generation of leaders neglected the invitation; the new have seized it—sometimes too eagerly.

Now it was this release that Dr. Muck wrought upon the symphony in D yesterday. He opened its melodies in unclouded beauty, made them run with supple sinews, lifted the mists of reflection from their instrumental colors, set free their rhythms, let emotion and even poetry in tones speak as by unsubdued eloquence. He did so, first, by a divining choice of pace like that, for example, that made the Adagio run more slowly than it usually does, but with a new voice of deep, rich melody, or like that which made the Scherzo glint at first with its quick-running presto and then gather the voice of a quieter and musing song. He did so again and his orchestra with him in the plasticity with which they held Brahms's melodies along their changeful and interwoven course, with revealing accent at every turn. Unless the actual facts of the music left him no escape, he let no instrumental color cloud another, while the horn-players, the wood-winds, the 'cellos and the other strings and the gravely glowing brass outdid themselves in warmth and variety of response and in zest of intuition. Rhythm seemd to quicken rhythm and each trod clear, walking upon the air. Freedom of utterance seemed to spring from freedom of feeling behind. The music sounded as of a released and glorified Brahms.

Beauty of rich melody, mounting, declining, now sustained, now broken, interwoven, contrasted, filled the first movement while horns and clarinets, 'cellos and violins shed their beauty of tone over it. How near seemed the voice, even of Italian melody, to this Brahms of the neighboring Vienna, in the rich, intense and suffused song with which the Adagro wrought its melancholy convolutions in the tonal light and shadow that the instruments lent it. The Scherzo ran like sparks of gay tonal fire that grew softer and coalesced gently when the first flash of the mood subdued itself into glowing tenderness. And the joyous rhythmic rush of the finale as it expanded into larger and larger song. Brahms's horns, usually dusky and deep-voiced, were caught into the song. The strings bit and danced under it like the star over Beatrice's birthday. The coloring seemed gorgeous; the rhythm swept the hearer into it; Strauss might have envied the surge of it all. Brahms released surely, but also Brahms with a conductor who was pushing aside the dross of abstruseness that the pure gold of melody and feeling might shine the clearer, and with an orchestra that caught intuitively every cautious suggestion of instrumental color and enriched it.

Dvoràk was melodist, too, when he wrote his concerto for violoncello, but not in those unhappy and withering years in America the fresh melodist that he once was and that he was never again to be. There is little spontaneity in the concerto, yet how hard and conscientiously he has toiled to make it symphonic music intrinsically interesting as well as a grateful and displayful piece for the violoncello. And sometimes he succeeds. At the very beginning there is warmth of instrumental color and rhythmic energy as though the composer were concentrating his powers. The unfolded melodies give a measure of pleasure in themselves. The adagio has the simple warmth of feeling that flowers in the naive-souled and half-intuitive Dvoràk into something very like beautiful song. The Dvoràk who was more than a "natural" composer after all, plies his skill in harmonic and instrumental coloring, in subtle euphonies for the violoncello and the other instruments and in transitions that have their quick little thrill of beauty and bite. Czech fire does flash mildly out of the final rondo and toward the end when violin and violoncello intervene with soberer song and bear it into deeper and deeper beauty, Dvoràk sings as only do those composers in whom music is really the voice of an inspired, an intuitive impulse. It had not quite faded even in the days of this concerto.

As some of the finer qualities of Dvoràk are in the concerto, so it asks for the finer voice of the violoncello and the finer skill of the 'cellist. Other 'cellists have drawn from their 'cellos a bigger, deeper, broader, showier tone than did Mr. Urack and have made their "passage-work" seem more a feat of strength and agility upon a recalcitrant and complaining instrument. Mr. Urack happens to be a finely tempered musician as well as a finely skilled violoncellist. Being such, he wrought his "passage-work" with an exceeding lightness of hand, with adroit and beautiful gradients of tone, in delicate euphonies with other instruments, with a felicity in cumulative transition that had even its little thrill. Throughout, moreover, his tone had a softness, fineness and brightness that is rare in the virtuosi of the 'cello; there was sensuous quality in it; the 'cello sang tenderly, intimately, as well as deeply and broadly. Its analogue is Mr. Noack's tone among the violins. It sought and gained a beauty that is of musical and imaginative sensitiveness—the beauty that is not of strings and wood and bow or even of virtuosity.

The concert ended, as it had begun, with a released composer—the Schumann of the overture to "Genoveva," the opera that was no romantic opera by all the canons of the theatre, though a master-romanticist of music wrote it. A better text and drama would not have saved Schumann. He was the romanticist who dreams in the spring woods or in the fire-lit shadows and sets his visions and his moods in little pieces. He was too gentle for the big theatre. It wants flame and when he wrote romantically, he wrote in luminous vapors. Yet in this overture, perhaps because symphonic music is more natural to him than music of the opera house, he was dramatic and romantic both—or he seemed so yesterday under Dr. Muck's revealing and quasi-operatic hand. The cavillers may object that the conductor sometimes broke the flow of the music to gain this end and heard emphases and contrasts in his interpreting ear that Schumann may have hardly suspected. So be it, yet it was good to hear the overture sound with a glow of romantic imagination, with strokes of dramatic contrast, with a

---

MONITOR,
NOVEMBER 30,

MR. URACK SYMPHONY SOLOIST

With Otto Urack, 'cellist, making his first appearance as soloist, the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck conductor, gave its seventh public rehearsal of the season in Symphony hall Friday afternoon, presenting the following program: Beethoven, second movement from Symphony No. 7, in A major, Op. 92 (in memoriam, Arthur Tracy Cabot); Brahms, Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73; Dvorak, concerto in B minor, for violoncello, Op. 104; Schumann, overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81.

If any composer ever understood the responsibility implied in writing a concerto for violoncello, it was Dvorak. Nobody better than he knew the tactful devices that would make this solo orchestral form interesting. To begin with, he had a meaning of his own for the word "solo" as applied to the violoncello. This word in its ordinary use refers to the treatment of a particular tone color with other colors in such a way that it remains entirely independent of them. An instrument's titles to independence are, among other things, wide range, facility in execution, capacity for shading and sensitiveness and versatility in expression. They may be summed up in the general qualification of readiness to respond to the performer's emotion. The solo instrument that speaks with the most directness is the voice. The one which has the most abounding melodic appeal is the violin; that which has the broadest harmonic gauge is the piano. [illegible] between the violin and the piano is the violoncello, the instrument that can produce airs on one string and block out harmonic progressions on three others. The violoncello, being a less highly specialized vehicle of expression than voice, violin or piano, has not so commanding a place as a solo instrument.

Dvorak's peculiarity of view in regard to the violoncello is explained in his perfect understanding of its pristine worth on the one hand and of its circumscribed powers on the other. His keen discernment of color values led him to the conviction that the 'cello as a solo instrument must be treated in a way contrary to that which is appropriate to the voice, the violin or the piano. Instead of giving the 'cello an originative position in the music, he gives it a consequent position. The solo line in his score does not compel the other lines to their character; it takes character from them. He gains his concerto effect not by adding orchestra to the 'cello, but by subtracting orchestra from it, until the instrument's individualit stands revealed. Dvorak's inversion o the usual process of concerto construction leads him to treat his solo instrument a large part of the time as o member of a duet. Most ingeniously keeps the flute in inconspicuous a tendance on the 'cello, modifying t tone of the A string, taking all t raucous quality out of it and buoying up so that it seems to have true trel character.

Enwrapping the solo instrument co pletely for a while with sound of stri wood and brass choirs, he will take aw one envelope of tone after another, gra ually reducing the accompaniment un only oboe or lightly bowed violins a distinguishable. And when the 'c has sung a passage of sufficient leng to give some theme its exposition development, he will suddenly termina its meditations with an outburst of t full orchestra.

Zealously the new 'cellist of the chestra read his line in the interesti Dvorak score. With rich, smooth to with masterly execution he perform his part in this music of liberal plan a of nice detail. Mr. Urack performed e quisitely and interpreted sympathet cally. A genial piece of orchestral wri ing had genial treatment at his and a Dr. Muck's hands.

The Brahms symphony will not coun as one of the most brilliant performance of the conductor's first two months. An still the reading did him and his men credit for beautiful quality of tone. All departments of the orchestra had a transparency that they have not had at former concerts, when brilliancy of interpretation has been the aim. Dr. Muck's work of Friday earned the greatest praise for this accomplishment. It was well that the orchestra should give the last week prior to the tour to considering means instead of ends, that it should make the Brahms second symphony a practise piece for tone enrichment and for choir blending. The Schumann overture was a little more communicatively read than any movement in the symphony, except, perhaps, the third. As a program, the three pieces of this week, the concerto, the symphony and the overture, have not the interest that the works offered at former concerts have had, but as a group of repertory selections that have improved th tone of the orchestra in general and detail, they must be recorded as memor

---

THE BOSTON AMERICAN—
NOVEMBER 30, 1912.

URACK HEARD AT SYMPHONY

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

In memory of Arthru Tracy Cabot, the slow movement from Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major was played before the regular program at the Boston Symphony concert yesterday.

The program consisted of the Second Sympnony of Brahms, Dvorak's fine concerto for cello and orchestra, and Schumann's overture to Genoveva.

The program, like most of its predecessors, reflected Doctor Muck's liking for melody. There was no muddy music upon it, nothing but absolute music of the tuneful kind.

Even Brahms is found at his melodic best in the Second Symphony. Less scholastic than in his other works, but none the less interesting harmonically, he has woven his web around fine melodies, and the Symphony makes pleasant hearing.

Dr. Muck is not over fond of Brahms, but he is not a man to be prejudiced against any good composer. His reading of the Second Symphony was sympathetic enough to satisfy the most devout Brahmins.

The Dvorak concerto introduced Otto Urack, the new cellist and assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony. This concerto was composed back in 1896, while the great Bohemian was still a resident of New York. He had the aid of Alwin Schroeder, one of the most brilliant of all cellists in this work, and Mr. Schroeder is said to have written several of the bravura passages.

Dvorak had a gift for sweet and plaintive melody of a sort that could be aptly expressed by the cello. It is not an instrument that seems suited to solo work and the library of cello concertos is not very large. Therefore the Bohemian concerto has become a great favorite with violin cellists.

Mr. Urack has an attractive personality and a way of getting fine, rich tone out of his big music box. He plays with rare tenderness, great spirit and superb technical skill and there is no question at all that he belongs in our Symphony Orchestra at a desk which has accommodated several very great players in the past.

POST, DECEMBER 1,

URACK: ASSISTANT CONDUCTO

Symphony Creates New Post—A Young Conducto Experience in Europe—Working Under Strau —The Stuff a Conductor Is Made Of

Mr. Otto Urack, who was the 'cello soloist at the Symphony concerts of last Friday and Saturday, will make his debut in America as a conductor this afternoon in Symphony Hall, when he will direct orchestral performances and accompaniments at Mr. Kreisler's concert. Mr. Urack is now in his 28th year, but he has behind him a distinguished record, not only as a 'cellist, but as a conductor of opera. A young man who has conducted such works as "Salome," "Electra" and "Rosenkavalier," and won the emphatic approval of Strauss in so doing, has accomplished something at the beginning of a career. Mr. Urack has conducted opera in several of the most important opera houses of Germany and Balkania. He has given orchestral concerts at various festivals in Germany, and as a result of his work as chief conductor at th opera house at Barmen, he was offere the position of conductor at the Roy Opera House of Berlin; and he had a tually signed his contract when D Muck secured his release, in order th Mr. Urack might come to Boston wi him.

Incidentally, Mr. Urack will be t first to occupy the position of assista conductor of the Boston Symphon Orchestra, a position especially a pointed for him, at Dr. Muck's reco mendation.

Mr. Urack did more than work und Strauss's eye. He observed and refle ed for himself, and his description Strauss' conducting is one which su gests another point of view as to nature of Strauss's operas. For stance: "Strauss thinks more of singers, has more regard for th as a factor in the music-drama, th almost any conductor I have e heard. You would not believe h fine-sounding is the score of 'Electr until you had heard it with him. heard another well known music conduct this opera some 10 times, a then I heard a number of performan by Strauss. With the former it all sound and fury, with tremend climax. Well, with Strauss I co scarcely believe my ears. The m texture of the orchestral tone w something to marvel at, it was so fi clear—microscopically clear, in all elements. Each instrument, in one the most complex scores in existen added something to the total effect.

"Then the vocal parts. You not heard every note that was sung on stage; you heard every word. Str is very insistent on this point. works much more with his singers with his orchestra In the places bet the singing, or with the voice pit in a register which shows thr more easily, the orchestra will sud ly flame up, or take the threa the discourse, so to speak, from singer's mouth and develop it dramatic and symphonic manner. we are not to suppose that Str wrote for an immense orchestra wit knowing exactly what he was to His voice parts are equally import at least, with those of the orches and when he conducts, they are hea

Strauss as a conductor is far fr the modern virtuoso. He is far fr

Weingartner, for instance, says Mr Urack. "Weingartner, a very grea man—oh, yes—is also our greatest virtuoso. If one could have a Strauss and a Weingartner in one, there would be the greatest of all conductors. Strauss is a great composer and musician first, then a virtuoso leader of the orchestra. And Weingartner is the opposite. He never forgets the 'publicum.' He will practise in the rehearsal hall—yes—with two large mirrors at each side. He knows then how he looks!"

Strauss, according to Mr. Urack, is a remarkable interpreter, not only of Wagner, Liszt, and his own works, but also of Mozart. Mozart under his fingers becomes somewhat modernized—or, perhaps, the spirit of Mozart is in a language nearer that of our audiences of today. "Strauss reminded me that Mozart in his day was a Wagner, and he also said this. He said: 'Do you not realize that sometimes Wagner is easier to sing against than even Mozart? Do you think that the thickness of basses and celli together is not often a very difficult thickness for the singer? Then think of the heaviest score of Wagner. Think how clear it is, how transparent the tone. It is a living tone, full of color. Properly conducted, this is not a menace, it is an invaluable support for the singer."

Mr. Urack made an interesting comparison between Strauss and his relation to the present period, and the relation of the period of Berlioz to that of Wagner. To this effect: "To me and to others who are better authorities, Strauss is a sort of Berlioz. Today we know and we appreciate, at least to a great extent, the great genius of France. But most of us believe that the greatness of Berlioz was in his ideas, so modern and so intense, rather than in his genius for melody. To this he owes his high position today. But if we look at Wagner, we see there a man who has summed up the whole spirit of his generation, and summed it up, not only in a new but a marvellously beautiful way. Now I think that Strauss is a Berlioz of the future. Some day, sooner or later, the great man comes. Is it not likely that music will simplify—a little? I do not mean a return to Mozart. That is not possible and we would not want it. I mean, the great man who will develop to their ultimate issues the great ideas of Strauss, who will combine with his philosophic vision his harmonic pungency and his extraordinary genius for making melody express the most definite or abstract ideas—this man will have all, but with less complicated effort. That inclusiveness of style, that enormous fertility in the development of ideas, the resources of harmony, and instrumentation, and counterpoint—these should all descend naturally to the successor of Strauss, but with them, let us hope, greater genius of a purely musical character. Strauss is creative, always, and in spite of the shortness or the manner verging on the obvious, of his melodies."

Mr. Urack spoke with an enthusiasm as genuine as it was contagious. He spoke in the manner that a young man in his twenties should speak, and his conversation was especially good to hearken to, for it brought back the realization that there is still some music to be heard; that there is much behind us, but more ahead. All young men should impress this upon their elders!

Contrary to the opinion of many, Mr. Urack, having repeatedly conducted all three works, found Strauss' "Rosenkavalier" the greatest in the finish of its workmanship and the distinction of its ideas. "The waltzes? No, they are not the greatest parts. They please the public. There are other parts that show the greatest composer in Germany today. For instance, the scene between Octavian and the lady to whom he bears the Rose, in the second act; the amazing humor and gusto of the scene at the inn; the final pages of the last act. These occur to me at once. There is so much that I could tell you about it all the morning. Strauss' 'Feursnot' is a great work. You ought to know it here. He wrote every bar of that music from his heart. But the 'Rosenkavalier' is different from the others because it is never for an instant cheap or commonplace. Always some little quality of wit and genius keeps it from the occasional lapses of 'Salome' and 'Electra.' In 'Electra,' by the way, is a scene which would surprise you if you heard it from Strauss—that strange scene between Electra and Clytemnestra. It is marvellous in psychology. It is overwhelmingly dramatic."

"Did you study conducting with anyone?"

"Never! Composition, orchestration—of course, but conducting, not at all. If a man is a conductor he will know it the moment that he takes up his baton, and his men will know it, too. His skill will increase with knowledge and experience, of course, but that is only in degree, not in kind. Some men will study all their lives. If they have not in them especially rhythm and also some personal magnetism, they should stop. There must above all be the faculty of quick communication with the men. You may rehearse all you like. Your signals may be perfectly clear, but with all this, unless you have actual rapport with the players, your performance will be lifeless, however firm your authority."

"——? No one who has once tasted the pleasure of conducting would ever have to ask that question. Naturally I am fond of my especial instrument, the 'cello. But of the orchestra I am fonder still, and when I sit under our great Muck, and feel all that he does, then I want to throw away the 'cello. I want to take the stick myself, and make them play!"

FRITZ KREISLER

Fritz Kreisler's only concert in Boston will be given in Symphony Hall this afternoon at 3:30 o'clock. The distiguished violinist will have the assistance of an orchtstra of Symphony players under Otto Urack, the assistant conductor of the orchestra, who on Friday afternoon made his debut as a 'cello soloist.

Mr. Kreisler will play two concertos and two groups of short pieces, one of classical pieces of the 17th and 18th centuries, the other of modern pieces. The concertos will be by Vivaldi and Mendelssohn. In the Vivaldi concerto the organ of Symphony Hall will be used in the accompaniment, as well as the orchestra. An interesting feature of the programme will be the first performance here of an intermezzo for strings from Mr. Urack's new opera "Signor Formica," which is soon to have its first performance in Breslau.

The programme in full is as follows:

Overture, "The Marriage of Figaro"..Mozart
Orchestra
Concerto for violin in C major (MS)..
Antonio Vivaldi
Allegro maestoso
Adante doloroso
Allegro giusto
Accompanied by string orchestra and organ
Mr. Kreisler
Concerto for violin in E minor...Mendelssohn
Allegro molto appassionato
Andante
Allegretto non troppo; Allegro molto vivace
Mr. Kreisler
Intermezzo for strings, from "Signor Formica"
Urack
Orchestra
Soli for violin:
a. Andantino....Padre Martini (1706-1784)
b. Prelude and Allegro..................
Gaetano Pugnani (1731-1798)
c. Chanson Louis XIII. and Pavane..
Louis Couperin (1630-1665)
d. La Chasse....J. B. Cartier (1765-1841)
e. Variations. Giuseppe Tartini (1692-1770)
Mr. Kreisler
Soli for violin:
a. Indian Canzonetta....................Dvorak
b. Caprice Viennois....................Kreisler
c. Tambourin Chinois....................Kreisler
d. 24th Caprice....................Paganini
Mr. Kreisler
Overture, "Oberon"....................Weber
Orchestra
J. P. Marshall, Organist.

Mme. Sembrich

Next Sunday afternoon, Dec. 8, will bring to Symphony Hall Madame Marcella Sembrich for her only song recital of the season. This will be the first appearance of this artist in two years and her failure to come to Boston last season, for the first time since 1898, made a decided gap in the musical offering of the year, because her concerts had come to be annual fixtures and looked forward to with much pleasure by the hosts of friends and admirers Madame Sembrich has in Boston.

Here she will sing no less than 27 songs in the course of the afternoon. These are divided into four groups, the first being classical arias and songs, the second German lieder, the third French and American songs and the last the folk songs. She will have the assistance as accompanist of Mr. Frank LeForge, who has been with her for so many seasons now.

DECEMBER 1.

HERALD.

FRITZ KREISLER

Fritz Kreisler's only concert in Boston will be given in Symphony Hall this afternoon at 3:30 o'clock. The distinguished violinist will have the assistance of an orchestra of Symphony players under Otto Urack, the assistant conductor of the orchestra, who on Friday afternoon made his debut as a 'cello soloist.

Mr. Kreisler will play two concertos and two groups of short pieces, one of classical pieces of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, the other of modern pieces. The concertos will be by Vivaldi and Mendelssohn. In the Vivaldi concerto the organ of Symphony Hill will be used in the accompaniment as well as the orchestra. An interesting feature of the program will be the first performance here of an Intermezzo for strings from Mr. Urack's opera "Signor Formica" which will soon be performed in Breslau.

The program in full is as follows:

Overture, "The Marriage of Figaro".Mozart
Orchestra.
Concerto for Violin in C major (Ms)..
Antonio Vivaldi
Mr. Kreisler.
Concerto for Violin in E minor.Mendelssohn
Mr. Kreisler.
Intermezzo for Strings, from "Signor
Formica"........................ Urack
Orchestra.
Soli for Violin:
Andantino ....Martini
Prelude and Allegro..............Pugnani
Chanson Louis XIII. and Pavane....
Louis Couperin
La Chase..................J. B. Cartier
Variations ....Tartini
Mr. Kreisler.
Soli for Violin:
Indian Canzonetta ....Dvorak
Caprice Viennois..................Kreisler
Tambourin Chinois..................Kreisler
24th Caprice....................Paganini
Mr. Kreisler.
Overture, "Oberon"..................Weber
Orchestra.
John P. Marshall will be the organist.

LONGY CLUB

Georges Longy, the founder and leader of the Longy Club, has laid out an ambitious program for the coming season, the 13th of this organization. When he first began with his club to play chamber music for wind orchestra, the general impression was abroad that the literature of such music was very limited. In going over his records the other day he found that in the 12 past seasons he has played 97 different compositions 129 times and the field is far from being exhausted, for he has on his prospectus for the coming season no less than seven pieces which have never been heard in Boston.

The Longy Club maintains the organization it has had for the past several years. Its oboes are Messrs. Longy and Lenom; its flutes Messrs. Andre Maquarre and A. Brooke; its clarinets Messrs. Grisez and Mimart; its bassoons Messrs. Sadony and Mueller and its horns Messrs. Hain and Lorbeer, with Mr. Alfred de Voto as pianist. Three concerts are announced for the current season. These will be on Tuesday, Dec. 17; Thursday, Jan. 23, and Thursday, March 6. At his first concert the program will include Mozart's quintet for piano and wind instruments; Reinecke's sonata for flute and piano and Strauss's suite for wind instruments, which has not been played here. Among the new works are Woolett's quintet for wind instruments, Juon's suite for clarinet and two violas, Weingartner's quintet for piano, clarinet and strings,, a Lied and Scherzo for wind instruments by Florent Schmitt, a divertisement by Bernard for wood-wind instruments and nonette by Malherbe for piano, strings and wood-wind. Mr. Longy expects to play two pieces for wood-wind by Howard Brockway. It is his hope also to have one concert devoted chiefly to the compositions of Caplet, conductor of the Boston Opera Company, with the assistance of Mr. Caplet and a singer.

MADAME SEMBRICH

Next Sunday afternoon, Dec. 8, will bring to Symphony Hall Madame Marcella Sembrich for her only song recital of the season. This will be her first appearance in two years.

Madame Sembrich shows no less skill in the arrangement of her program than in the interpretation. Never content to remain in a rut, she always is seeking something new. This year she brings to Boston as the feature of her program a set of eight folk songs of seven different countries which she will sing in the several languages in which they were written. Several seasons ago Madame Sembrich gave a recital in New York devoted entirely to folk songs. It took her two years to prepare the program wanted and while she is a most versatile linguist, there were languages she had to learn purposely for some of the songs. For the concert here she has chosen the best of the list.

She will have as accompanist Frank LaForge, who has been with her for many seasons now. The full program is as follows:

Der Kuss................................Beethoven
Veilchen .... Mozart
M' ha preso alla sua ragna............Paradies
Lusinghe pincare..........................Handel
My Lovely Celia..........................Munro
Fingo per mio diletto...Anon. Arr. by Viardot
Im Grunen, Klaerchenlied, Musensohn....
Franz Schubert
Brautlieder, 1 and 2, Roeselein..........
Rob. Schumann
Komm, wir wandeln, In Lust und Schmerzen ....P. Cornelius
Les Cloches..............................Debussy
L'oiseau bleu...........................Dalcroze
Ouvre tes yeax..........................Massenet
Before the Crucifix, Spooks.....Frank La Forge
Constancy .... Foote
Eight Folk-Songs—
Gai lon la......................French Canada
Coolin .... Ireland
Kom Kjyra.............................. Norway
Ainte Kajmesou.......................... Greece
Coz ja nieboraczck.......................Poland
Dalekaja u blyskaja..............Little Russia
Maroz vize folyik, Csillag eleg Ragzog..
Hungary

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

There will be no Symphony concerts this week as the orchestra is away on its regular December trip. Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist at all six concerts. In Philadelphia and the evening concert in New York he will play Beethoven's Concerto; in Baltimore and the afternoon concert in New York, Brahms's Concerto; in Washington, Mendelssohn's, and in Brooklyn, Bruch's in G Minor. The orchestral pieces played on the trip are Sibelius's Symphony No. 1; Brahms's Symphony No. 2; Schumann's Overture, "Genoveva"; Brahms's "Academic Festival" Overture; Glazounoff's "Ouverture Solennelle" and Beethoven's Overture "Leonora" No. 3. "Sold out houses" will be the rule in every city.

SYMPHONY IN CAMBRIDGE

The third Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given on Thursday evening, Dec. 12. This will mark the first appearance in Greater Boston of the distinguished Russian pianist, Leopold Godowsky, who will also be the soloist at the Symphony concerts the following Friday and Saturday. Godowsky is making his first tour of America in a dozen years. A distinguished pianist before he left here, he has grown greatly in his art. He will play the fourth concerto of Beethoven. The orchestral pieces will be Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, Bach's suite for flute and strings, and Beethoven's overture, "Leonora," No. 3.

MISCHA ELMAN

Few artists have such strong hold on the Boston public as Mischa Elman and the bare announcement of his recital in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 15, has resulted in an extraordinary number of mail orders from Boston and towns within a radius of 50 miles. Elman's appearance here with the Philharmonic Society of New York brought out one of the largest audiences of the season and as he is not scheduled to play this year at a Symphony concert, the eagerness to hear him in recital will be all the greater. His principal pieces will be a Beethoven sonata, a Handel sonata and Ernst's florid Concerto in F-sharp minor. There will also be a number of smaller pieces on the program. Tickets will be ready at the box office, Symphony Hall, next Friday.

SUNDAY GLOBE-
-DECEMBER 1,

Mr Longy and the Novelties His Club Will Play.

Georges Longy, the eminent obist, and the wood wind choir bearing his name, will give three concerts this season, Tuesday, Dec 17; Thursday, Jan 23, and Thursday, March 6. The program of the first concert will be as follows: Mozart's quintet for piano and wind instruments, Reinecke's sonata for flute and piano and Richard Strauss' suite in B flat, op 15, for wind instruments. It was written in 1884, and played for the first time Nov 18, 1884, in Munich, at a concert given by the Meiningen Orchestra, of which Buelow was director. Strauss, at that time 20, conducted. The Barrere Ensemble played it Feb 6, 1911, in New York, for the first time in America. It has not been played in Boston.

Mr Longy has chosen a list of novelties for later programs, which will include a quintet for wind instruments by Woollett, a suite for clarinet and two violas by Paul Juon, a quintet for pianoforte, clarinet and strings by Weingartner, a lied and scherzo for wind instruments by Florent Schmitt, a divertisement by Bernard for wood wind instruments and a nonette by Malherbe for pianoforte, strings and wood wind. He also expects to play two pieces for wood winds by Howard Brockway. It is his hope also to have one concert devoted principally to the compositions of Andre Caplet, French conductor of the Boston Opera Company, with the assistance of Mr Caplet and a singer.

Florent Schmitt made a stir in Paris last Spring at the production of his choral work, "The 46th Psalm." Malherbe came into prominence in Paris last June by producing at his own expense at the Alhambra Theatre his own operas, "Cleanthis" and "L'Emente." which he could not get produced at the Opera.

Fritz Kreisler's Only Concert In Boston This Afternoon.

Fritz Kreisler will give his only concert in Boston this season this afternoon at 3;30 at Symphony Hall. He will be assisted by an orchestra of Symphony players under Otto Urack, the assistant conductor of the orchestra, who, on Friday afternoon, made his debut as 'cello soloist.

It is needless to call the attention of musicians or of the public at large to the position of this distinguished violinist, as an exponent of the noblest traditions and ideals of musical art. His recent performance of the Beethoven concerts at the Symphony concert was one of those rare occasions which assume the aspect of a festival significance.

As an interpreter, who employs a soverign technic, not for display, but to sound and illumine the hidden truth and beauty of the great musical thoughts of the masters, Mr Kriesler is unique. He is inherently and essentially an artist. His program is characterestic of him, and invites the widespread interest which it will unquestionably receive.

Mr Urack is the young cellist of the symphony, who shares the first desk with Mr Warnke. Already he has tried his mettle as a conductor in German opera houses and was selected by Mr Muck for the position of assistant conductor here. Last Winter he was conductor of the Municipal Opera at Barmen, where he did all of the Wagnerian music dramas and all of the Richard Strauss operas, including 15 performances of "Der Rosencavalier." Previous to that he had conducted opera in Bucharest, Sofia and Belgrade and had conducted concerts in the Lower Rhine cities. An intermezzo for strings from Mr Urack's new opera "Signor Formica," which soon will have its premiere in Breslan, will be played here for the first time.

Mr Kreisler will play two concertos and two groups of short pieces, one of classical pieces of the 17th and 18th centuries, the other of modern pieces. The concertos will be by Vivaldi and Mendelssohn. In the Vivaldi concerto the organ of Symphony Hall, played by Mr Marshall, will be used in the accompaniment, as well as the orchestra.

The program in full is as follows: Overture, "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart, orchestra; concerto for violin in C major (MS), Antonio Vivaldi, accompanied by string orchestra and organ; concerto for violin in E minor, Mendelssohn; intermezzo for strings, from "Signor Formica," orchestra, Urack; soli for violin (a) Andantino, Padre Martini (1706-1784); (b) prelude and allegro, Gaetano Pugnani (1731-1798); (c) Chanson Louis XIII and Pavane, Louis Couperin (1630-1665); (d) La Chasse, J. B. Cartier (1765-1841); (e) variations, Giuseppe Tartini (1692-1770), Mr Kreisler; soli for violin (a) Indian Canzonetta, Dvorak; (b) Caprice Viennois, Kreisler; (c) Tambourin Chinois, Kreisler; (d) 24th caprice, Paganini, Mr Kreisler; overture, "Oberon," Weber, orchestra.

[illegible], pianist.

Mme Sembrich in Recital Next Sunday Afternoon.

Next Sunday afternoon, Dec 8, at Symphony Hall, Mme Marcella Sembrich will give her only song recital of the season. This will be the first appearance of this admirable artist in two years. A feature of her program will be a set of eight folk songs of seven different countries, which she will sing in the several languages in which they were written, French Canadian, Irish, Norwegian, Greek, Polish, Russian and Hungarian. While she is a versatile linguist, there were languages she had to learn purposely for some of these songs.

She will sing no less than 27 songs in the course of the afternoon. These are divided into four groups, the first being classical arias and songs, the second German lieder, the third French and American songs and the last the folk songs. She will have the assistance as accompanist of Frank La Forge, who is familiar with her recitals.

JOURNAL- DECEMBER 2,

LARGE AUDIENCE IS PLEASED BY PLAYING OF FRITZ KREISLER

From the moment Fritz Kreisler played the opening strains of the Vivaldi concerto in C major at Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon to the expected final encore presenting his own Vienna waltzes, "Liebesreud" and "Libeslied," the large audience was completely under the magic of his skill. The very size of the audience packing the big hall was a tribute to the high popularity this artist has won in Boston.

His rendering of the Mendelssohn concerto, the Chanson Louis XIII., La Chasse, and his own caprice, Viennois Waltz, was in his best vein, full of power and beauty. And the remainder of the varied program was equally interesting. The violinist was assisted by an orchestra of Symphony players ably conducted by Otto Urack, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Among the numbers was the beautiful intermezzo, "Strings," from the opera, "Signor Formica," written by Mr. Urack, a production which won instant favor.

ADVERTISER,
DECEMBER 2.

KREISLER CONCERT IN SYMPHONY HALL

Famous Violinist Greeted by Immense Audience — Urack Leads Assisting Players.

By S. C. Williams.

Fritz Kreisler gave a concert in Symphony Hall, Sunday afternoon, with the assistance of an orchestra of Boston Symphony players led by Otto Urack, the organization's new assistant conductor. Prof. John P. Marshall played the organ part in Antonio Vivaldi's C Major Concerto, and Carl Lamson played the piano accompaniments for violin soli.

The programme, which was overlong, included the "Oberon" and "Marriage of Figaro" overtures, and an intermezzo for strings from Mr. Urack's opera, "Signor Formica," which is shortly to be produced in Breslau; two violin concertos, that of Signor Vivaldi and Mendelssohn's E Minor, with a dozen or so small violin pieces by 17th and 18th century composers and two moderns, Dvorak and Mr. Kreisler himself.

Unlike his only rival, Ysaye, Kreisler is always sure of a warm welcome in Boston. Yesterday's audience literally exhausted the capacity of Symphony hall, and was most cordial in its behavior.

The great beauty of Mr. Kreisler's playing is something better than the emotional inflammation that drives crowds to madness. He illustrates how art begins where technique leaves off. There is always in his playing something warmly sympathetic that proceeds from the heart. As to his calibre as a musician, it is well understood by the initiate that he stands alone among living violinists. His own cadenzas stand the acid test, and his other compositions have both grace and substance.

While nothing in yesterday's programme called forth Mr. Kreisler's highest art, his playing gave keen pleasure. The Vivaldi concerto, which he disinterred, is without true distinction. The best of the three movements is the Andante. Into the generally quaint music of Martini, Couperin, Pugnani and Cartier the violinist breathed thoroughly characteristic spirit.

Mr. Urack made his first appearance in this city as a conductor, and led his band well. With no opportunity to greatly distinguish himself, he gave Mr. Kreisler excellent support in the concertos and conducted the two overtures played by the orchestra with discreet elasticity. His own intermezzo for strings is a somewhat saccharine effort.

HERALD,
DECEMBER 2,

FRITZ KREISLER'S VIOLIN RECITAL

Artist Surpasses Himself—Symphony Hall Audience Enthusiastic.

An audience that filled every seat in Symphony Hall and occupied every bit of standing room along the side walls greeted Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, yesterday afternoon, at his only concert in Boston this season. He was assisted by a band of Symphony players under the leadership of Otto Urack, assistant conductor of the orchestra. Carl Lamson was accompanist and J. P. Marshall was at the organ. The program was as follows:

Overture, "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart ....Orchestra
Concerto for violin in C major (MS), Antonio Vivaldi..............Mr. Kreisler
Concerto for violin in E minor, Mendelssohn........................Mr. Kreisler
Intermezzo for strings, from the opera "Signor Formica," Urack......Orchestra
Violin solos—Andantino, Padre Martini 1706-1784); prelude and allegro, Gaetano Pugnani (1731-1798); Chanson Louis XIII and Pavane, Louis Couperin (1630-1665), bells muffled; La Chasse, J. B. Cartier (1765-1841); variations, Guiseppe Tartini (1692-1770)....Mr. Kreisler
Violin solos—Indian Canzonetta, Dvorak; Caprice Viennois, Kreisler; Tambourin Chinois, Kreisler; 24th Caprice, Paganini........................Mr. Kreisler
Overture, "Oberon," Weber......Orchestra

As magnificently as Mr. Kreisler has played before in this city and as warmly as he has been received in the past, he never gave more keen pleasure to his hearers and never was his superb artistry greeted with heartier bursts of applause than on this occasion.

Kreisler's manner, like his playing, is always characterized by an air of simplicity, strength and grace. It was so yesterday. Usually in the past there has been a certain personal aloofness about him, however, that has almost verged at times upon hauteur, but yesterday there were few signs of this. The burning enthusiasm for his art and the music of moment, which he has heretofore repressed beneath an intensely calm exterior, seemed to burst all bounds. Without an instant or a trace of sentimentality, yet with ever glowing sentiment; without a hint of extravagance, yet with much more abandon than has been his wont, he infused a visible fire into his work that made all his playing memorable.

Vivaldi's concerto, which is still in manuscript, a beautiful composition whose devotional sentiment is heightened by the touch of the organ, was given with noble appreciation by Mr. Kreisler and was received with marked favor.

The artist's own pieces, the Viennese Caprice and Chinese Tambourine, two bits of rare musical beauty and exquisite characterization, were welcomed with extra warmth by the audience.

Mr. Urack's intermezzo from his opera was heard with interest. It has a background of pleasing melody, but its orchestration has received a modernizing treatment that makes it seem like a pretty picture, whose outlines have been smudged to give it an "impressionist" effect.

GLOBE-
DECEMBER 2.

FRITZ KREISLER.

Famous Violinist Attracts Large Audience at Sunday Concert at Symphony Hall.

Fritz Kreisler's concert at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon was attended by an audience that filled every seat and all the standing room available on each side of the auditorium. The distinguished artist was assisted by an orchestra of Symphony men, Otto Urack conducting. Carl Lamson was accompanist and J. P. Marshall played the organ.

The program was as follows: Overture, "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart, orchestra; concerto for violin in C major (MS), Antonio Vivaldi, accompanied by string orchestra and organ; concerto for violin in E minor, Mendelssohn; intermezzo for strings, from "Signor Formica," orchestra, Urack; soli for violin Andantino, Padre Martini (1706-1784); prelude and allegro, Gaetano Pugnani (1731-1798); Chanson Louis XIII and Pavane, Louis Couperin (1630-1665); La Chasse, J. B. Cartier (1765-1841); variations, Giuseppe Tartini (1692-1770), Mr Kreisler; soli for violin, Indian Canzonetta, Dvorak; Caprice Viennois, Kreisler; Tambourin Chinois, Kreisler; 24th caprice, Paganini, Mr Kreisler; overture, "Oberon," Weber, orchestra.

Kreisler's abilities are of such singular beauty and scope that the man seemingly finds little, if anything, in the range of literature for the violin too difficult, abstruse, old or newly fashioned, unworthy of his notice, if he discovers real merit in the works. Compositions practically unknown, forgotten, oldtimers of the 17th, 18th and earlier centuries, frequently find places in his programs along with the recognized writings of the great masters. In fact he infuses new life into many pieces by the warmth and skill of his wonderful art.

Although cordially received when he reappeared at the Symphony concerts week before last, his greetings yesterday were even more demonstrative, a dozen or more selections giving his auditors better chances, and more of them, in which to express themselves. And had he answered all demands for encores an already generous program would have been greatly prolonged. Fortunately for him his endurance was not too severely taxed and the encores were limited to the latter part of an enjoyable afternoon.

The necromancer of the past has returned with powers undiminished and in recital at the Symphones has again proved his right of rank with the foremost artists of the day.

His part of yesterday's bill began with a Vivaldi concerto, in which were some striking musical contrasts, notably so between the sustained legato of the andante and the "reel-like" measures of the third portion. In the latter Kreisler's heavy chord passages in the finale faily vied in resonance with the voices of the organ.

The familiar E minor Mendelssohn concerto was of absorbing interest, masterly in its clarity and breadth of tone in the appassionato, and delightful in daintiness and fluency of the last division.

Then came the miscellaneous group. A simple little andantino by Martini, an extremely difficult piece in a light vein by Pugnani, Couperin's dance measures, Cartier's "La Chasse" and Tartini's puzzling variations. These ranged from 1630 to 1841 and were made so interesting that each one could have been repeated had Kreisler willed to do so.

The pyrotechnics of violin playing and applause went hand in hand in the closing group. Kreisler's own Tambourin Chinois and Caprice, the latter full of double stops and contrasting tempos, and Paganinii's 24th Caprice, with its pitfalls of pizzicatos, drew forth overwhelming applause, winding up his regular program in a blaze of musical glory. Then came the encores.

The Symphony men, under their assistant conductor, Mr Urack, performed their duties commendably, as did Mr Lamson at the piano and Mr Marshall, organist.

The dainty intermezzo for strings, from Mr Urack's opera, "Signor Formica," was a pleasing little excerpt that met with due appreciation from the audience.

From EVG. TELEGRAPH
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 30 1912

SEVERAL musical events of distinction are to be expected in the coming week. The Boston Symphony, with Fritz Kreisler as soloist, will be heard on Monday; the Metropolitan Opera Company will sing "La Boheme" on Tuesday, with Messrs. Caruso and Amato and Miss Farrar, and the Choral Society will render Verdi's "Requiem" on Thursday. The Orchestra will give its second "popular concert" on Wednesday evening, and the regular Friday and Saturday concerts, with Florence Hinkle as soloist.

Esta 84

From EVG. TELEGRAPH
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 30 191

by the was brought to Orchestra under exclusive contract.

Mr. Kreisler will play the Beethoven Concerto in D, opus 61, and his interpretation of this master-work should be more interesting. There will be but two orchestral numbers on the program. The first is Brahms' symphony in D major No. 2, and the other Schumann's Overture, "Genoveva."

Est 884

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Kreisler in Boston.

Fritz Kreisler, who is to play the Beethoven Concerto at the second Boston Symphony Concert in the Academy of Music next Monday night, played the same work in Boston last Friday afternoon. Commenting on his performance Philip Hale, the distinguished critic, said:

It would be an impertinence to chatter about Kreisler's technical skill, though this never seemed so imposing as it did yesterday, especially in the cadenza of his own invention. Or of what avail would be the heaping of one superlative upon another in the rearing of a rhetorical monument? Such eulogy would ill become the dignity, nobility and pure but flaming spirit of the performance. In the routine of concerts there is now and then a great event brought about by the fortunate conjunction of violinist, conductor and orchestra working together in perfect artistry so that the musical thoughts and expression of a Beethoven assume new and fresh and entrancing shapes.

14

E 1884

From EVG. SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

KREISLER TO PLAY THE SAME PIECE

Brahms' Concerto, Given Monday By Elman, To Be Repeated Here Next Week.

Baltimoreans will be given the opportunity next Wednesday night of comparing the reading by two of the greatest violinists now appearing before the American people of one of the greatest classics in music literature when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its second concert of the present Baltimore series at the Lyric.

Night before last Mischa Elman, as soloist of the New York Philharmonic Society Orchestra, played the Brahms concerto in D major when he gave the work an excellent, enthusiastic reading. The same composition will be played next Wednesday night by Fritz Kreisler when that artist appears as soloist with the Boston Symphony.

Many music lovers regard the Brahm's D major concerto second only to Beethoven's, and contend that there is a wide gap that separates these two concertos from all others.

Other numbers for the coming concert will be Beethoven's Symphony No. 8, which the great composer styled his "Little Symphony;" Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, and Beethoven's "Leonora" No. 3 overture.

Dr. Karl Muck, of course, will conduct.

Esta 884

ADVERTISER,
DECEMBER 2,

KREISLER CONCERT IN SYMPHONY HALL

Famous Violinist Greeted by Immense Audience — Urack Leads Assisting Players.

By S. C. Williams.

Fritz Kreisler gave a concert in Symphony Hall, Sunday afternoon, with the assistance of an orchestra of Boston Symphony players led by Otto Urack, the organization's new assistant conductor. Prof. John P. Marshall played the organ part in Antonio Vivaldi's C Major Concerto, and Carl Lamson played the piano accompaniments for violin soli.

The programme, which was overlong, included the "Oberon" and "Marriage of Figaro" overtures, and an intermezzo for strings from Mr. Urack's opera, "Signor Formica," which is shortly to be produced in Breslau; two violin concertos, that of Signor Vivaldi and Mendelssohn's E Minor, with a dozen or so small violin pieces by 17th and 18th century composers and two moderns, Dvorak and Mr. Kreisler himself.

Unlike his only rival, Ysaye, Kreisler is always sure of a warm welcome in Boston. Yesterday's audience literally exhausted the capacity of Symphony hall, and was most cordial in its behavior.

The great beauty of Mr. Kreisler's playing is something better than the emotional inflammation that drives crowds to madness. He illustrates how art begins where technique leaves off. There is always in his playing something warmly sympathetic that proceeds from the heart. As to his calibre as a musician, it is well understood by the initiate that he stands alone among living violinists. His own cadenzas stand the acid test, and his other compositions have both grace and substance.

While nothing in yesterday's programme called forth Mr. Kreisler's highest art, his playing gave keen pleasure. The Vivaldi concerto, which he disinterred, is without true distinction. The best of the three movements is the Andante. Into the generally quaint music of Martini, Couperin, Pugnani and Cartier the violinist breathed thoroughly characteristic spirit.

Mr. Urack made his first appearance in this city as a conductor, and led his band well. With no opportunity to greatly distinguish himself, he gave Mr. Kreisler excellent support in the concertos and conducted the two overtures played by the orchestra with discreet elasticity. His own intermezzo for strings is a somewhat saccharine effort.

HERALD,
DECEMBER 2,

FRITZ KREISLER'S VIOLIN RECITAL

Artist Surpasses Himself—Symphony Hall Audience Enthusiastic.

An audience that filled every seat in Symphony Hall and occupied every bit of standing room along the side walls greeted Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, yesterday afternoon, at his only concert in Boston this season. He was assisted by a band of Symphony players under the leadership of Otto Urack, assistant conductor of the orchestra. Carl Lamson was accompanist and J. P. Marshall was at the organ. The program was as follows:

Overture, "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart .... Orchestra
Concerto for violin in C major (MS), Antonio Vivaldi .... Mr. Kreisler
Concerto for violin in E minor, Mendelssohn .... Mr. Kreisler
Intermezzo for strings, from the opera "Signor Formica," Urack ...... Orchestra
Violin solos—Andantino, Padre Martini 1706-1784); prelude and allegro, Gaetano Pugnani (1781-1798); Chanson Louis XIII. and Pavane, Louis Couperin (1630-1665), bells muffled; La Chasse, J. B. Cartier (1765-1841); variations, Guiseppe Tartini (1692-1770) .... Mr. Kreisler
Violin solos—Indian Canzonetta, Dvorak; Caprice Viennois, Kreisler; Tambourin Chinois, Kreisler; 24th Caprice, Paganini .... Mr. Kreisler
Overture, "Oberon," Weber ...... Orchestra

As magnificently as Mr. Kreisler has played before in this city and as warmly as he has been received in the past, he never gave more keen pleasure to his hearers and never was his superb artistry greeted with heartier bursts of applause than on this occasion.

Kreisler's manner, like his playing, is always characterized by an air of simplicity, strength and grace. It was so yesterday. Usually in the past there has been a certain personal aloofness about him, however, that has almost verged at times upon hauteur, but yesterday there were few signs of this. The burning enthusiasm for his art and the music of moment, which he has heretofore repressed beneath an intensely calm exterior, seemed to burst all bounds. Without an instant or a trace of sentimentality, yet with ever glowing sentiment; without a hint of extravagance, yet with much more abandon than has been his wont, he infused a visible fire into his work that made all his playing memorable.

Vivaldi's concerto, which is still in manuscript, a beautiful composition whose devotional sentiment is heightened by the touch of the organ, was given with noble appreciation by Mr. Kreisler and was received with marked favor.

The artist's own pieces, the Viennese Caprice and Chinese Tambourine, two bits of rare musical beauty and exquisite characterization, were welcomed with extra warmth by the audience.

Mr. Urack's intermezzo from his opera was heard with interest. It has a background of pleasing melody, but its orchestration has received a modernizing treatment that makes it seem like a pretty picture, whose outlines have been smudged to give it an "impressionist" effect.

GLOBE-
DECEMBER 2.

FRITZ KREISLER.

Famous Violinist Attracts Large Audience at Sunday Concert at Symphony Hall.

Fritz Kreisler's concert at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon was attended by an audience that filled every seat and all the standing room available on each side of the auditorium. The distinguished artist was assisted by an orchestra of Symphony men, Otto Urack conducting. Carl Lamson was accompanist and J. P. Marshall played the organ.

The program was as follows: Overture, "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart, orchestra; concerto for violin in C major (MS), Antonio Vivaldi, accompanied by string orchestra and organ; concerto for violin in E minor, Mendelssohn; intermezzo for strings, from "Signor Formica," orchestra, Urack; soli for violin Andantino, Padre Martini (1706-1784); prelude and allegro, Gaetano Pugnani (1731-1798); Chanson Louis XIII and Pavane, Louis Couperin (1630-1665); La Chasse, J. B. Cartier (1765-1841); variations, Giuseppe Tartini (1692-1770), Mr Kreisler; soli for violin, Indian Canzonetta, Dvorak; Caprice Viennois, Kreisler; Tambourin Chinois, Kreisler; 24th caprice, Paganini, Mr Kreisler; overture, "Oberon," Weber, orchestra.

Kreisler's abilities are of such singular beauty and scope that the man seemingly finds little, if anything, in the range of literature for the violin too difficult, abstruse, old or newly fashioned, unworthy of his notice, if he discovers real merit in the works. Compositions practically unknown, forgotten, oldtimers of the 17th, 18th and earlier centuries, frequently find places in his programs along with the recognized writings of the great masters. In fact he infuses new life into many pieces by the warmth and skill of his wonderful art.

Although cordially received when he reappeared at the Symphony concerts week before last, his greetings yesterday were even more demonstrative, a dozen or more selections giving his auditors better chances, and more of them, in which to express themselves. And had he answered all demands for encores an already generous program would have been greatly prolonged. Fortunately for him his endurance was not too severely taxed and the encores were limited to the latter part of an enjoyable afternoon.

The necromancer of the past has returned with powers undiminished and in recital at the Symphones has again proved his right of rank with the foremost artists of the day.

His part of yesterday's bill began with a Vivaldi concerto, in which were some striking musical contrasts, notably so between the sustained legato of the andante and the "reel-like" measures of the third portion. In the latter Kreisler's heavy chord passages in the finale faily vied in resonance with the voices of the organ.

The familiar E minor Mendelssohn concerto was of absorbing interest, masterly in its clarity and breadth of tone in the appassionato, and delightful in daintiness and fluency of the last division.

Then came the miscellaneous group. A simple little andantino by Martini, an extremely difficult piece in a light vein by Pugnani, Couperin's dance measures, Cartier's "La Chasse" and Tartini's puzzling variations. These ranged from 1630 to 1841 and were made so interesting that each one could have been repeated had Kreisler willed to do so.

The pyrotechnics of violin playing and applause went hand in hand in the closing group. Kreisler's own Tambourin Chinois and Caprice, the latter full of double stops and contrasting tempos, and Paganini's 24th Caprice, with its pitfalls of pizzicatos, drew forth overwhelming applause, winding up his regular program in a blaze of musical glory. Then came the encores.

The Symphony men, under their assistant conductor, Mr Urack, performed their duties commendably, as did Mr Lamson at the piano and Mr Marshall, organist.

The dainty intermezzo for strings, from Mr Urack's opera, "Signor Formica," was a pleasing little excerpt that met with due appreciation from the audience.

From EVG. TELEGRAPH
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 30 191
Date

SEVERAL musical events of distinction are to be expected in the coming week. The Boston Symphony, with Fritz Kreisler as soloist, will be heard on Monday; the Metropolitan Opera Company will sing "La Boheme" on Tuesday, with Messrs. Caruso and Amato and Miss Farrar, and the Choral Society will render Verdi's "Requiem" on Thursday. The Orchestra will give its second "popular concert" on Wednesday evening, and the regular Friday and Saturday concerts, with Florence Hinkle as soloist.

Esta 84

From EVG. TELEGRAPH
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 30 191
Date

KREISLER SYMPHONY

the Boston Symis Academy, Mon- ed importance from the presence as soloist of Fritz Kreisler, the Austrian violinist, whose only announced appearance in Philadelphia this will be. Mr. Kreisler reached New York a fortnight ago, and will sail for home before Christmas. He was brought to this country by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under exclusive contract.

Mr. Kreisler will play the Beethoven Concerto in D, opus 61, and his interpretation of this master-work should be more interesting. There will be but two orchestral numbers on the program. The first is Brahms' symphony in D major No. 2, and the other Schumann's Overture, "Genoveva."

Esta 884

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Kreisler in Boston.

Fritz Kreisler, who is to play the Beethoven Concerto at the second Boston Symphony Concert in the Academy of Music next Monday night, played the same work in Boston last Friday afternoon. Commenting on his performance Philip Hale, the distinguished critic, said:

It would be an impertinence to chatter about Kreisler's technical skill, though this never seemed so imposing as it did yesterday, especially in the cadenza of his own invention. Or of what avail would be the heaping of one superlative upon another in the rearing of a rhetorical monument? Such eulogy would ill become the dignity, nobility and pure but flaming spirit of the performance. In the routine of concerts there is now and then a great event brought about by the fortunate conjunction of violinist, conductor and orchestra working together in perfect artistry so that the musical thoughts and expression of a Beethoven assume new and fresh and entrancing shapes.

Es 1884

From EVG. SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

KREISLER TO PLAY THE SAME PIECE

Brahms' Concerto, Given Monday By Elman, To Be Repeated Here Next Week.

Baltimoreans will be given the opportunity next Wednesday night of comparing the reading by two of the greatest violinists now appearing before the American people of one of the greatest classics in music literature when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its second concert of the present Baltimore series at the Lyric.

Night before last Mischa Elman, as soloist of the New York Philharmonic Society Orchestra, played the Brahms concerto in D major when he gave the work an excellent, enthusiastic reading. The same composition will be played next Wednesday night by Fritz Kreisler when that artist appears as soloist with the Boston Symphony.

Many music lovers regard the Brahm's D major concerto second only to Beethoven's, and contend that there is a wide gap that separates these two concertos from all others.

Other numbers for the coming concert will be Beethoven's Symphony No. 8, which the great composer styled his "Little Symphony;" Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, and Beethoven's "Leonora" No. 3 overture.

Dr. Karl Muck, of course, will conduct.

Esta 884

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The first of the three soloists announced for its New York concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is Fritz Kreisler, who will play at both of the concerts to be given by that organization in Carnegie Hall the coming week. The evening concert will be on Thursday, December 5, at 8:15, and the matinee concert on Saturday, December 7, at 2:30 o'clock. Mr. Kreisler's only appearance in New York will be in these concerts. Many requests have been made that he give a recital in this city, but as he is to be in this country only a few weeks, sailing the end of this month, and his time is fully occupied by his appearances with the Boston Symphony, he finds it impossible to do so.

On Thursday evening, the programme will be Sibelius's symphony in E Minor No. 1, Beethoven's concerto for violin in D Major and Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture. This first symphony of Sibelius was played by the Boston Symphony under Dr. Muck on February 21, 1907.

The programme for Saturday afternoon will be classical. The symphony will be Beethoven's No. 8 in F Major. Mr. Kreisler will play the Brahms concerto and the other two numbers will be Schumann's overture, "Genoveva" and Beethoven's "Leonora" No. 3 overture. The two programmes in their proper order are as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 5.
Symphony No. 1, in E Minor..........Sibelius
Concerto for violin in D, Op. 61.....Beethoven
Overture, "Academic Festival".........Brahms

SATURDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 7.
Symphony No. 8, in F Major........Beethoven
Overture, "Genoveva"...............Schumann
Concerto for violin and orchestra in D..Brahms
Overture, "Leonora," No. 3.........Beethoven

From EVG. SUN
Address: New York
Date

Both of the Boston Orchestra's second pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday and Saturday begin with a symphony, the place of honor after each being reserved for Fritz Kreisler. By his contract with C. A. Ellis these are positively the only appearances of the Austrian violinist in New York.

On the evening programme are Sibelius's first symphony, Beethoven's violin concerto and Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture.

Matinée goers hear Beethoven's eighth symphony, Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, the Brahms concerto and Beethoven's "Leonore" No. 3.

From EVG. MAIL
Address: New York.
Date

The second two Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall will begin Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, when Fritz Kreisler will make his only appearances in New York. Thursday evening he will play the Beethoven concerto and Saturday afternoon the Brahms. Thursday evening the opening number will be Sibelius's first concerto in E minor, and the closing number will be the Brahms Academic Festival overture. Saturday afternoon the symphony will be Beethoven's F major symphony No. 8, and the other number will be Schumann's "Genoveva" overture and Beethoven's "Leonora No. 3."

From GLOBE
Address: New York
Date

The first of three soloists announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its New York concerts is Fritz Kreisler, who will play at both concerts in Carnegie Hall next week, Thursday evening, Dec. 5, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 7. Mr. Kreisler's only appearances in New York will be at these concerts. On Thursday the programme will comprise Sibelius's first symphony in E minor; Beethoven's concerto for violin, and Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture. The programme for Saturday afternoon will comprise Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Brahms's violin concerto, Schumann's overture to "Genoveva," and Beethoven's third "Leonora" overture.

From POST
Address: New York NOV 30 1912
Date

Fritz Kreisler will make his only appearances in New York this season next week at the Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing the Beethoven concerto at the first of these concerts and the Brahms at the second. On Thursday evening the programme will be Sibelius's symphony in E minor No. 1, Beethoven's Concerto for violin in B major, and Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture. This first symphony of Sibelius's was played by the Boston Symphony under Dr. Muck in 1907 and made a deep impression. It is characteristic of the genius of the composer. The programme for Saturday afternoon will be classical; it includes Beethoven's Symphony No. 8, Schumann's overture "Genoveva," and Beethoven's "Leonora" overture No. 3.

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York.
Date

Symphonie-Konzerte.

Das dritte Konzertpaar der Boſtoner findet kommenden Donnerstag Abend reſp. Samstag Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall unter Leitung von Dr. Carl Muck ſtatt. Der Soliſt iſt Herr Fritz Kreisler, der am Donnerstag das Beethoven'ſche und am Samstag das Brahms'ſche Violinkonzert mit Orcheſterbegleitung vortragen wird. Der Wunſch, Kreisler in einem eigenen Recital zu hören, konnte nicht erfüllt werden, da der Künſtler Mühe haben wird, in den wenigen Wochen ſeines diesmaligen amerikaniſchen Aufenthalts ſein pflichtungen als Soliſt des Boſt cheſters nachzukommen. Muck bi Donnerstag die Erſte Symphonie belius und Brahms' „Akademiſ Ouverture" und am Samstag N die Beethoven'ſche Achte, des „Leonoren"-Ouverture No. 3 u mann's „Genoveva"-Ouverture.

Das Programm des New Yor phonie-Konzerts kommenden Frei mittag iſt eine Wiederholung d Sonntag-Programms dieſes das oben unter Sonntags-Kon zeichnet iſt.

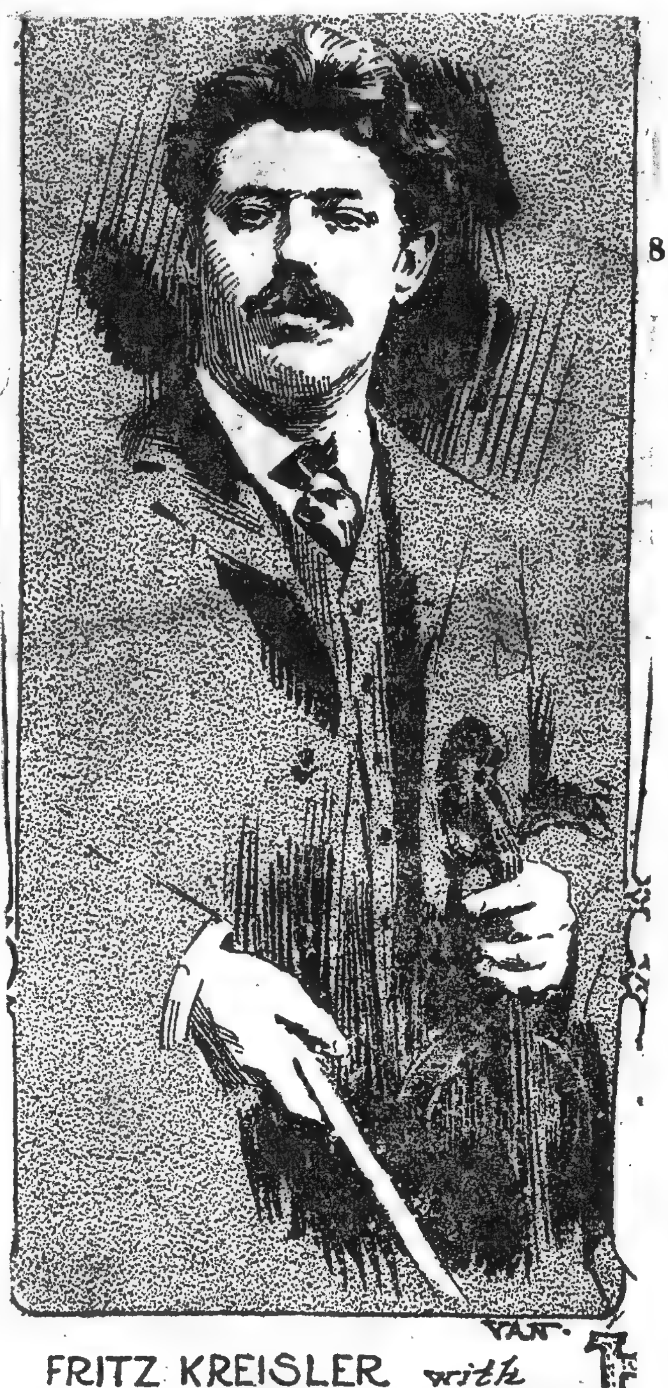
From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N.Y.
Date

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music next Friday evening will bring another of Dr. Muck's fine programmes and the interest of the occasion will be much heightened by the presence as soloist of the violinist, Fritz Kreisler, whose only appearance in Brooklyn this will be. As is generally known, Mr. Kreisler is in America for a few weeks under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and his appearances are limited in the East to concerts of that organization. During the coming week he is soloist at all the Boston Symphony concerts on its second Southern trip. Here he will play that notable work for the violin, Bruch's first concerto in C minor.

The programme which Dr. Muck has arranged begins with the first symphony of Sibelius, which was heard here under Dr. Muck six years ago. The second symphony, of which Mr. Fielder was so fond, is better known than the first, but many connoisseurs regard the first as the greater work of the two and, at any rate, more truly characteristic of the genius of the composer. Sibelius in all his music reflects the traits of his country and his people. Often it is stern, harsh and rugged, yet these qualities are offset always by bursts of extraordinary lyric beauty. Sibelius is one of the few composers of our day who has something to say of his own and is able to say it in an idiom of his own. He has copied from no one, but works out his own problems in his own way. The other numbers will be Brahms' jolly "Academic Festival" overture and Glazounoff's pompous and splendid "Ouverture Solennelle." The programme in its proper order is as follows: Sibelius, Symphony No. in E Minor; Brahms' overture, "Academic Festival;" Bruch, Concerto for Violin in C Minor, No. 1; Glazounoff, Ouverture Solennelle.

The second of five lecture recitals on the Philharmonic concert programme, as given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Friday evening, will take place on Thursday afternoon at 4 o'clock in the lecture hall, Academy of Music. Daniel Gregory Mason will interpret the selections with appropriate pianoforte illustration.

From WORLD
Address: New York
Date



FRITZ KREISLER with
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
©by A. DUPONT NY

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.
Date

Established

Photo © by Aimé Dupont

Fritz Kreisler
Boston Symphony Orchestra

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.
Date ....

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The first of the three soloists announced for its New York concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is Fritz Kreisler, who will play at both of the concerts to be given by that organization in Carnegie Hall the coming week. The evening concert will be on Thursday, December 5, at 8:15, and the matinee concert on Saturday, December 7, at 2:30 o'clock. Mr. Kreisler's only appearance in New York will be in these concerts. Many requests have been made that he give a recital in this city, but as he is to be in this country only a few weeks, sailing the end of this month, and his time is fully occupied by his appearances with the Boston Symphony, he finds it impossible to do so.

On Thursday evening, the programme will be Sibelius's symphony in E Minor No. 1, Beethoven's concerto for violin in D Major and Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture. This first symphony of Sibelius was played by the Boston Symphony under Dr. Muck on February 21, 1907.

The programme for Saturday afternoon will be classical. The symphony will be Beethoven's No. 8 in F Major. Mr. Kreisler will play the Brahms concerto and the other two numbers will be Schumann's overture, "Genoveva" and Beethoven's "Leonora" No. 3 overture. The two programmes in their proper order are as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 5.

Symphony No. 1, in E Minor	Sibelius
Concerto for violin in D, Op. 61	Beethoven
Overture, "Academic Festival"	Brahms

SATURDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 7.

Symphony No. 8, in F Major	Beethoven
Overture, "Genoveva"	Schumann
Concerto for violin and orchestra in D	Brahms
Overture, "Leonora," No. 3	Beethoven

1884

From POST
Address: New York
Date

Fritz Kreisler will make his only appearances in New York this season next week at the Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing the Beethoven concerto at the first of these concerts and the Brahms at the second. On Thursday evening the programme will be Sibelius's symphony in E minor No. 1, Beethoven's Concerto for violin in B major, and Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture. This first symphony of Sibelius's was played by the Boston Symphony under Dr. Muck in 1907 and made a deep impression. It is characteristic of the genius of the composer. The programme for Saturday afternoon will be classical; it includes Beethoven's Symphony No. 8, Schumann's overture "Genoveva," and Beethoven's "Leonora" overture No. 3.

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York.
Date ....

Symphonie-Konzerte.

Das dritte Konzertpaar der Boſtoner findet kommenden Donnerstag Abend reſp. Samstag Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall unter Leitung von Dr. Carl Muck ſtatt. Der Soliſt iſt Herr Fritz Kreisler, der am Donnerstag das Beethoven'ſche und am Samstag das Brahms'ſche Violinkonzert mit Orcheſterbegleitung vortragen wird. Der Wunſch, Kreisler in einem eigenen Recital zu hören, konnte nicht erfüllt werden, da der Künſtler Mühe haben wird, in den wenigen Wochen ſeines diesmaligen amerikaniſchen Aufenthalts ſeinen Verpflichtungen als Soliſt des Boſtoner Orcheſters nachzukommen. Muck dirigirt am Donnerstag die Erſte Symphonie von Sibelius und Brahms' „Akademiſche [illegible] Ouverture" und am Samstag Nachmi[illegible] die Beethoven'ſche Achte, des Mei[illegible] „Leonoren"-Ouverture No. 3 und Sch[illegible]mann's „Genoveva"-Ouverture.

Das Programm des New Yorker Symphonie-Konzerts kommenden Freitag Nachmittag iſt eine Wiederholung des letzten Sonntag-Programms dieſes Orcheſters, das oben unter Sonntags-Konzerte verzeichnet iſt.

From WORLD
Address: New York
Date ....

Boston Symphony.

At the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Dec. 5, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 7, Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist, these being his only appearances in New York during the coming season. On Thursday evening he will play the Beethoven Concerto, and on Saturday afternoon the Brahms Concerto. On Thursday evening the Symphony will be the first of Sobelius in E minor and the other number on the programme, Brahms' "Academic Festival" Overture. On Saturday afternoon the Symphony will be Beethoven's in F major No. 8, the other numbers being Schumann's "Genovera" Overture and Beethoven's "Lenora" No. 3 Overture.

1884

Just like illustration.
DINING ROOM SUIT is ma
Co., of Grand Rapids, Mi CRAFTS FURNITURE has purchased by more people of than any other.
Construction and Work methods of cabinet work ar

FRITZ KREISLER with BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
©by A. DUPONT N.Y.

From EVG. SUN
Address: New York
Date ....

Both of the Boston Orchestra's second pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday and Saturday begin with a symphony, the place of honor after each being reserved for Fritz Kreisler. By his contract with C. A. Ellis these are positively the only appearances of the Austrian violinist in New York.

On the evening programme are Sibelius's first symphony, Beethoven's violin concerto and Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture.

Matinée goers hear Beethoven's eighth symphony, Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, the Brahms concerto and Beethoven's "Leonore" No. 3.

1884

From EVG. MAIL
Address: New York.
Date ....

The second two Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall will begin Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, when Fritz Kreisler will make his only appearances in New York. Thursday evening he will play the Beethoven concerto and Saturday afternoon the Brahms. Thursday evening the opening number will be Sibelius's first concerto in E minor, and the closing number will be the Brahms Academic Festival overture. Saturday afternoon the symphony will be Beethoven's F major symphony No. 8, and the other number will be Schumann's "Genoveva" overture and Beethoven's "Leonora No. 3."

From GLOBE
Address: New York
Date ....

The first of three soloists announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its New York concerts is Fritz Kreisler, who will play at both concerts in Carnegie Hall next week, Thursday evening, Dec. 5, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 7. Mr. Kreisler's only appearances in New York will be at these concerts. On Thursday the programme will comprise Sibelius's first symphony in E minor; Beethoven's concerto for violin, and Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture. The programme for Saturday afternoon will comprise Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Brahms's violin concerto, Schumann's overture to "Genoveva," and Beethoven's third "Leonora" overture.

1884

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N.Y.
Date ....

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music next Friday evening will bring another of Dr. Muck's fine programmes and the interest of the occasion will be much heightened by the presence as soloist of the violinist, Fritz Kreisler, whose only appearance in Brooklyn this will be. As is generally known, Mr. Kreisler is in America for a few weeks under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and his appearances are limited in the East to concerts of that organization. During the coming week he is soloist at all the Boston Symphony concerts on its second Southern trip. Here he will play that notable work for the violin, Bruch's first concerto in C minor.

The programme which Dr. Muck has arranged begins with the first symphony of Sibelius, which was heard here under Dr. Muck six years ago. The second symphony, of which Mr. Fielder was so fond, is better known than the first, but many connoisseurs regard the first as the greater work of the two and, at any rate, more truly characteristic of the genius of the composer. Sibelius in all his music reflects the traits of his country and his people. Often it is stern, harsh and rugged, yet these qualities are offset always by bursts of extraordinary lyric beauty. Sibelius is one of the few composers of our day who has something to say of his own and is able to say it in an idiom of his own. He has copied from no one, but works out his own problems in his own way. The other numbers will be Brahms' jolly "Academic Festival" overture and Glazounoff's pompous and splendid "Ouverture Solennelle." The programme in its proper order is as follows: Sibelius, Symphony No. in E Minor; Brahms' overture, "Academic Festival;" Bruch, Concerto for Violin in C Minor, No. 1; Glazounoff, Ouverture Solennelle.

The second of five lecture recitals on the Philharmonic concert programme, as given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Friday evening, will take place on Thursday afternoon at 4 o'clock in the lecture hall, Academy of Music. Daniel Gregory Mason will interpret the selections with appropriate pianoforte illustration.

1884

INE
ew York.

Fritz Kreisler
Boston Symphony Orchestra
Photo © by AIME DUPONT

From MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address New York

Date DEC 1 - 1912

The first of the three soloists announced for its New York concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is Fritz Kreisler, who will play at both of the concerts to be given by that organization in Carnegie Hall the coming week. The programmes of both are here given:

THURSDAY EVENING, DEC. 5, AT 8.15.
Symphony No. 1, in E minor..............Sibelius
Concerto for Violin in D, Op. 61........Beethoven
Overture, "Academic Festival"............Brahms
Soloist, Mr. Fritz Kreisler.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON, DEC. 7, AT 2.30.
Symphony in F major, No. 8...........Beethoven
Overture, "Genoveva"......................Schumann
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in D....Brahms
Overture, "Leonora" No. 3.............Beethoven
Soloist, Mr. Fritz Kreisler.

From PRESS

Address New York

Date DEC 1 - 1912

The first of the three soloists announced for its New York concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is Fritz Kreisler, who will play at both of the concerts to be given by that organization in Carnegie Hall this week. The evening concert will be on Thursday, December 5, at 8.15, and the matinee concert on Saturday, December 7, at 2.30. Kreisler's only appearances in New York this season will be at those concerts. Many requests have been made that he give a recital in this city, but as he is to be in America for only a few weeks, and as his time is occupied fully by his appearance with the Boston Symphony, he finds it impossible to do so.

On Thursday evening the programme will include Sibelius's Symphony in E minor, No. 1, Beethoven's Concerto for violin in D major and Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture. The first symphony of Sibelius was played by the Boston Symphony, under Dr. Muck, on February 21, 1907. It made a deep impression and many connoisseurs regard it as a greater work than the second symphony, which is known much better. At any rate, it seems to be more characteristic of the genius of the composer.

The programme for Saturday afternoon is classical. The symphony will be Beethoven's No. 8 in F major. Kreisler will play the Brahms concerto, and the two other numbers will be Schumann's overture, "Genovera," and Beethoven's "Leonora" No. 3 overture.

From [illegible]

Address

Date

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT BRILLIANT

Pleasing Programme Delightfully Rendered by Boston Orchestra, and Fritz Kreisler, Violinist.

There were few vacant seats in Infantry Hall last night at the second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the audience was not only very large but more than usually enthusiastic and responsive to the efforts of the musicians. Added to this there was a programme that was particularly pleasing and a soloist whose work was of exceptional excellence, while the orchestra was in the best of form and played with especially good expression and skill.

There were but three numbers on the list, but all of these offerings were thoroughly delightful and gave such satisfaction that the applause was long and insistent while tribute was paid also by the very close attention that was given to the musicians and the complete quiet that prevailed during the long numbers.

The programme was arranged as follows:

Overture, "Leonora," No. 3 op. 72..Beethoven
Concerto in D-major for violin and orchestra, op. 61........................Beethoven
I. Allegro ma non troppo.
II. Larghetto.
III. Rondo.
Symphony No. 1, in E-minor, op. 39...Sibelius
I. Andante mo non troppo, Allegro energico
II. Andante, ma non troppo leuto.
III. Allegro.
IV. Finale (Quasi una fantasia); Andante; Allegro molto.

The "Leonora" overture is rarely heard except where the opera of "Fidelio" is played entire. It is a beautiful composition and was performed with delicacy of touch and sympathetic feeling by the orchestra, the light and strong passages alike being rendered in a manner that held the audience and roused it to sincere endorsement at the close.

The symphony by Jan Sibelius has been played here once before under the direction of Dr. Muck some years ago, but was new to many and was heard again with real pleasure by those who attended the former concert when it was among the numbers. It is strong and full of feeling, which is the natural expression of the intense patriotism that led to the composer's banishment by Russia and the somewhat wild tone may also be an ovation when he appeared, and at the end of his selection the audience would not be satisfied until he had come forth several times in response to the importunity of his admirers. The selection is rated as the most important work of its kind and Kreisler has been given the distinction of being called its greatest interpreter. In that judgment his auditors last night will concur, for he played the concerto in a manner that proved his mastery of the violin and his ability to make the instrument express all that was in the mind and heart of the composer and the musician. His technique seems faultless and his expression is wonderful in its variety and vividness. It was a rare treat to hear him and that it was fully appreciated was told by the warmth and insistence of the applause.

---

STATE PRESIDENT A GUEST.

From STANDARD UNION

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music next Friday evening will bring another of Dr. Muck's very brilliant programmes, and the interest of the occasion will be much heightened by the presence as soloist of the violinist, Frits Kreisler, whose only appearance in Brooklyn this will be. As is generally known, Mr. Kreisler is in America for a few weeks under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and his appearances are limited in the East to concerts of that organization. During the coming week he is soloist at all the Boston Symphony concerts on its second Southern trip. It is hardly necessary at this late date to comment on the wonderful lovely art of this great musician. Here he will play that most notable work for the violin, Bruch's first concerto in C Minor. The programme which Dr. Muck has arranged begins with the first symphony of Sibelius, which was heard here under Dr. Muck six years ago. The second symphony of which Mr. Fiedler was so fond is better known than the first, but many connoisseurs regard the first as the greater work of the two, and at any rate, more truly characteristic of the genius of the composer. Sibelius, in all his music reflects the traits of his country and his people. Often it is stern, harsh and rugged, yet these qualities are offset always by bursts of extraordinary lyric beauty. Sibelius is one of the few composers of our day who has something to say of his own, and is able to say it in an idiom of his own. The other numbers will be Brahms's jolly "Academic Festival" overture and Glazounoff's pompous and splendid "Overture Solennelle."

FRITZ KREISLER,
Violinist.
Copyright A. Dupont.

From WORLD

Address New York City.

Date

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music next Friday evening will bring another of Dr. Muck's brilliant programmes. The interest of the occasion will be much heightened by the presence as soloist of the incomparable violinist, Fritz Kreisler, whose only appearance in Brooklyn this will be. The programme:

Sibelius...........Symphony No. 1 in E Minor
Brahms.........Overture, "Academic Festival"
Bruch.....Concerto for Violin in G Minor No. 1
Glazounoff..................Overture Solennelle

From HERALD

Address: New York

Date

Boston Hears Mr. Fritz Kreisler.

[SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE HERALD.]

Boston, Mass., Friday.—Mr. Fritz Kreisler, Austrian violinist, made his first appearance here this afternoon, after an absence of several seasons, as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He played the Beethoven concerto and aroused much enthusiasm, being recalled eight times. Mr. Kreisler came to this country to play a limited number of times with the Boston Symphony, and this was the opening concert.

From BULL

Address

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

To Give Notable Concert on Second Appearance in Infantry Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a most notable programme at its concert in Infantry Hall to-night, under Dr. Karl Muck. Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist and will play the Beethoven Concerto, the greatest work of a great composer, and a work that Kreisler interprets better than any of the violinists of modern times. Kreisler is on leave of absence from the Austrian army, and it is a fortunate circumstance for lovers of his playing that he was enabled to get away for even a short time.

The symphony to be produced is the first of Sibelius, which Dr. Muck played in Boston last week, and with which he scored one of the most notable of his many successes. It is a work of wonderful lyric beauty. The programme in full is as follows:

Overture, "Leonora," Op. 72, No. 3, Beethoven; Concerto for Violin in D, Op. 61, Beethoven (1. Allegro, ma non troppo. 2. Larghetto. 3. Rondo); Symphony No. 1, in E-minor, Op. 39, Sibelius (1. Andante, ma non troppo; allegro energico. 2. Andante ma non troppo, lento. 3. Allegro. 4. Finale. quasi una fantasia; andante; allegro molto).

From JOURNAL

Address

Date

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Fritz Kreisler, Solo Violinist, Stars in the Beethoven Concerto.

The Boston Symphony orchestra made its second appearance of the season last night in Infantry Hall and was greeted, as usual, nowadays, by a large and enthusiastic audience. The programme, in which was noted a return to the former style of placing the symphony last, was as follows:

Overture, "Leonora," No. 3, op. 72..Beethoven
Concerto in D-major for violin and orchestra, op. 61..........................Beethoven
I. Allegro ma non troppo.
II. Larghetto.
III. Rondo.
Symphony No. 1, in E-minor, op. 39....Sibelius
I. Andante mo non troppo; Allegro energico.
II. Andante, ma non troppo lento.
III. Allegro.
IV. Finale (Quasi una fautasia): Andante; Allegro molto.

The programme was rather long, though of only three numbers, both the concerto and the No. 3 "Leonora" overture being about the most lengthy works of their kind extant. But no one was disposed to complain of the length of the concerto, for through the masterly playing of Fritz Kreisler it assumed the place of chief interest on the programme. We do not often hear such playing, for the simple reason that there is but one Kreisler. The audience sat spellbound by his wizardry and gave him an ovation as genuine as it was well deserved.

Jan Sibelius is the first composer of note to come out of Finland, where, indeed, very little attention has been paid to any form of music until within the last 50 years. This symphony in E-minor is one of the four which he has composed thus far, and he has a goodly number of smaller compositions to his credit. Dr. Muck introduced this work to us several years ago, during his first sojourn here as conductor of the Boston orchestra. It cannot be said that it improves on acquaintance. There is little of pure music in it, but plenty of queer noises. It seems to be some sort of "tone-poem" rather than a symphony, but as the programme is not given the hearer is in doubt what it is all about—perhaps the adventures and fate of some Finnish Till Eulenspiegil—it sounds as much like that as anything. However, both Dr. Muck and his players worked at it with a vigor and determination highly commendable.

The third concert by the orchestra will be given on Tuesday evening, Dec. 31. The soloist will be Miss Elena Gerhardt, soprano.

W. A. P.

From TIMES

Address: New York

Date

The feature of the second Boston Symphony programme to be played at the Academy of Music on Dec. 6 will be the appearance of Fritz Kreisler as soloist, his only appearance in Brooklyn during the current season. He will play Bruch's Concerto in G minor No. 1. The orchestral numbers will be the Symphony in E minor No. 1 by Sibelius, Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture, and Glazounoff's Ouverture Solennelle.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TIMES
Address: New York
Date NOV 24 1912

At the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Dec. 5, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 7, Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist, these being his only appearances in New York during the coming season. On Thursday evening he will play the Beethoven concerto, and on Saturday afternoon the Brahms concerto. On Thursday evening the symphony will be the first of Sibelius in E minor, and the other number on the programme Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture. On Saturday afternoon the symphony will be Beethoven's in F Major No. 8, the other numbers being Schumann's "Genoveva" overture and Beethoven's "Leonora" No. 3 overture.

E , 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From POST
Address: New York
Date NOV 23 1912

At the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 5, and Saturday afternoon, December 7, Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist, these being his only appearances in New York during the coming season. On Thursday evening he will play the Beethoven concerto, and on Saturday afternoon the Brahms concerto. On Thursday evening the symphony will be the first of Sibelius in E minor, and the other number on the programme Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture. On Saturday afternoon the symphony will be Beethoven's in F major, No. 8, the other numbers being Schumann's "Genoveva" overture and Beethoven's "Leonora" overture.

Establi
Newspaper

From POST
Address: New York
Date 912

The only opportunity Brooklyn will have to hear Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, this year will be at the second Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, December 6, at 8:15.

The First Established and Most
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York.
Date

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

At the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 5, and Saturday afternoon, December 7, Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist, these being his only appearances in New York during the coming season. On Thursday evening he will play the Beethoven Concerto and on Saturday afternoon the Brahms Concerto. On Thursday evening the symphony will be the first of Sibelius in E minor and the other number on the programme Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture. On Saturday afternoon the symphony will be Beethoven's in F major, No. 8, the other numbers being Schumann's "Genoveva" overture and Beethoven's "Leonora" No. 3 overture.

E 884
"ROMEIKE" NEW
The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From PRESS
Address: New York
Date

At the second pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Thursday evening, December 5, and Saturday afternoon, December 7, in Carnegie Hall, Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist, making his only appearances in New York this season. On Thursday evening he will play the Beethoven Concerto and on Saturday afternoon the Brahms Concerto. On Thursday evening the symphony will be the first of Sibelius (E minor) and the other number on the programme Brahms's "Academic Festival" Overture. On Saturday afternoon the symphony will be Beethoven's in F major, No. 8, the other numbers being Schumann's "Genoveva" Overture and Beethoven's "Lenora," No. 3, Overture.

Es 1884

Address: New York.
Date 23 1912

Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist at the second two Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, December 5, and the following Saturday afternoon. These will be his only appearances in New York this season. Thursday evening he will play the Beethoven concerto and Saturday afternoon he will play Brahms.

Thursday evening Dr. Muck will present a symphony in E minor by Sibelius and Brahms Academic Festival Overture. Saturday afternoon the programme will include Beethoven's eighth symphony, the third overture Leonore and Schumann's "Genoveva" overture.

E , 1884

From EVG. TELE
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 23 1912

At the second Boston Symphony concert at the Academy, December 2, Fritz Kreisler, the soloist, will play the Beethoven violin concerto. The symphony will be Brahms in D major, No. 2, and the third number will be Schumann's overture, "Genoveva."

Established: London, 1881; New York, 1884

From
Address
Date

At the second Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 2, Fritz Kreisler the soloist, will play the Beethoven concerto. This will be his only appearance in this city during the current season. The symphony will be Brahms, in D-Major No. 2, and the third number will be Schumann's overture, "Genoveva."

E , 1884

At the Matinee

Date 20 1912

SPLENDID CONCERT BY SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra, given in Infantry hall, Tuesday evening, attracted a very large, distinguished and critical audience, which expressed its appreciation of the splendid work done by Dr. Karl Muck and his aggregation of accomplished musicians, which work seems to improve as concert follows concert:

As usual with Dr. Muck the program was all that could be desired and was as follows:

Overture, "Leonora," No. 3, op 72 .... Beethoven
Concerto in D-major for violin and orchestra, op. 61 .... Beethoven
I. Allegro ma non troppo.
II. Larghetto.
III. Rondo.
Symphony No. 1, in E-minor, op. 39.... .... Sibelius
I. Andante mo non troppo; Allegro energico.
II. Andante, ma non troppo lento.
III. Allegro.
IV. Finale (Quasi una fantasia); Andante Allegro molto.

The "Leonora" overture, while a familiar work with all music lovers, is always received with pleasure, and that in spite of its unusual length. The Beethoven concerto in D-major, for violin and orchestra, was a perfect delight, for Fritz Kreisler's playing made it all too short, and as great is his art that it proved to be one continuous charm. He is certainly a great violinist, one of the greatest in the world today, and never has he been heard to better advantage than he was at last night's concert.

The symphony No. 1 in E-minor, by Jan Sibelius, is a peculiar work, probably largely due to the peculiar character of the Finnish composer, and it is doubtful if it will ever prove a "popular" work with lovers of classical music, for while it would not be proper to say that it is inharmonious, it certainly fails to appeal to the senses as such works are supposed to do. Whether it is a good sample of Finnish musical ideas remains for time to tell.

However, the orchestra did grand work under the baton of Dr. Muck, and the concert was one that was fully in keeping with the high standard established by the Boston organization.

The third concert by the Symphony orchestra will be given on Tuesday evening, Dec. 31. The soloist will be Miss Elena Gerhardt, soprano.

Est 884

From WORLD
Address: New York
Date

for her.

The only opportunity Brooklyn will have to hear this year Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, will be at the second Boston Symphony concert which will be given in the Academy of Music Friday evening, Dec. 6. Mr. Kreisler has arrived in this country and will be here until the end of December. He comes under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will appear with no other organization of the kind in the East. He will give no recitals.

Es 1884

From SUN
Address: New York
Date NOV 24 1912

At the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 5, and Saturday afternoon, December 7, Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist, these being his only appearances in New York during the coming season. On Thursday evening he will play the Beethoven concerto and on Saturday afternoon the Brahms concerto On Thursday evening the symphony will be the first of Sibelius in E minor and the other number on the programme Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture. On Saturday afternoon the symphony will be Beethoven's in E major, No. 8, the other numbers being Schumann's "Genoveva" overture and Beethoven's "Leonora" No. 3 overture.

E 884

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York.
Date

ON THE MUSI

At the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 5, and Saturday afternoon, December 7, Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist, these being his only appearances in New York during the coming season. On Thursday evening he will play the Beethoven Concerto and on Saturday afternoon the Brahms Concerto.

On Thursday evening the Symphony will be the first of Sibelius' in E minor. The other number on the programme is Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture. On Saturday afternoon the Symphony will be Beethoven's in F major, No. 8, and the other numbers Schumann's "Geneveva" overture and Beethoven's "Leonora" No. 3 Overture.

Es , 1884

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York.
Date 912

Symphonie-Konzerte.

Im kommenden Konzertpaar des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters wird Herr Fritz Kreisler als Soliſt am Abend des 5. Dez. das Beethoven'ſche und am Nachmittag des 7. das Brahms-Konzert ſpielen. Dr. Muck dirigirt Donnerstag die E-Moll-Symphonie von Sibelius und Brahms' „Akademiſche Feſtouverture" und am Samstag Nachmittag Beethoven's Achte, die Leonoren-Ouverture No. 3 und Schumann's „Genoveva"-Ouverture.

In den Konzerten der Philharmoniker kommenden Donnerstag Abend reſp. Freitag Nachmittag iſt Herr Yſaye der Soliſt, und zwar wird er Bruch's G-Moll-Konzert und das altitalieniſche klaſſiſche Corelli'ſche Konzert für Solo - Virtuoſe, Streicher und Orgel ſpielen. Das Programm umfaßt ferner Beethoven's 5., „Don Juan" von Richard Strauß und „Luſtſpiel - Ouverture" des 13jährigen Komponiſten Erich Korngold als Novität. Die Soliſtin der Philharmoniker im nächſten Sonntagskonzert am 1. Dezember iſt Frau Schumann-Heink.

Herr Walter Damroſch wird in den kommenden Konzerten ſeines Orcheſters am 1. und 6. Dezember Brahms' Vierte Symphonie und Sinegaglia Ouverture „Le Baruffe Chiozotta" dirigiren. Soliſt iſt Herr Gottfried Galſton, der Beethoven's „Kaiſer"-Konzert zum Vortrag bringen wird.

Das erſte diesjährige Abonnements-Konzert des Volpe'ſchen Symphonie-Orcheſters unter Leitung von Herrn Arnold Volpe bringt Beethoven's Fünfte, Liszt's „Mazeppa", die „Freiſchütz"-Ouverture und zwei Sätze aus der Tſchaikowsky'ſchen Serenade für Streichorcheſter. Zum Andenken an den verſtorbenen Herrn Alfred L. Seligman wird Popper's Requiem für drei Celli zum Vortrag gelangen. Soliſt iſt der Bariton Herr Arthur Philipps, der eine Arie aus Benvenuto von Diaz ſingen

Establish

From
Address
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

To Give Notable Concert on Second Appearance in Infantry Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a most notable programme at its concert in Infantry Hall to-night, under Dr. Karl Muck. Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist and will play the Beethoven Concerto, the greatest work of a great composer, and a work that Kreisler interprets better than any of the violinists of modern times. Kreisler is on leave of absence from the Austrian army, and it is a fortunate circumstance for lovers of his playing that he was enabled to get away for even a short time.

The symphony to be produced is the first of Sibelius, which Dr. Muck played in Boston last week, and with which he scored one of the most notable of his many successes. It is a work of wonderful lyric beauty. The programme in full is as follows:

Overture, "Leonora," Op. 72. No.

Esta '84

From AMERICAN
Address: New York.
Date ....

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The first of the three soloists announced for its New York concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is Fritz Kreisler, who will make his only appearance this season here at the concerts announced for Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. On Thursday evening the programme will be Sibelius's Symphony in E-minor No. 1; Beethoven's Concerto for violin in D-major, and Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture. On Saturday afternoon the programme will be classical. The ymphony will be Beethoven's No. in F-major. Mr. Kreisler will pl the Brahms concerto, and the ot two numbers will be Schumann's rture to "Genoveva" and Beethovk "Leonora" No. 3 overture. Dr. will conduct.

E , 1884

From .... PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Address ....
Date ....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The appearance of Fritz Kreisler as soloist at the second Boston Symphony concert in Infantry hall this evening makes the concert one of the most notable that Providence will have this year. It will be Kreisler's only appearance in this city. He is to play the Beethoven concerto, the greatest work of its kind in the literature of music and Kreisler is unquestionably its greatest interpreter.

The symphony will be the first of Sibelius. Dr. Muck had this on the Boston program played last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening and achieved one of the most notable successes of the season with it. Sibelius is one of the few modern composers who really has something of his own to say and is not content to work in the idiom of men that have gone before him. It is a work full of primeval savagery and yet has episodes of wonderful lyric beauty. The program in full is as follows:

Beethoven, overture, "Leonora" No. 3, op. 72; Beethoven, concerto for violin in D, opus 61; 1, Allegro, ma non troppo; 2, Larghetto; 3, Rondo; Sibelius, Symphony No. 1, in E-minor, op. 39; 1, Andante ma non troppo; Allegro energico; 2, Andante, ma non troppo lento; 3, Allegro; 4, finale (Quasi una fantasia); Andante; Allegro molto.

A limited number of admissions will be sold at the hall at one dollar each.

E , 1884

From ....
Address ....
Date .... NOV 3 0

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Fritz Kreisler, the Austrian violinist, who was brought to this country by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under exclusive contract and will play with that organization in a series of its concerts in cities of the East, will make his only appearance in Philadelphia at the symphony concert in the Academy of Music on Monday evening next.

Mr. Kreisler will play the Beethoven Concerto here. It is generally conceded that in the interpretation of this masterwork he is without a rival. When he played the Concerto in Boston recently he was the object, it is said, of an enthusiasm the like of which has never been seen in Symphony Hall, the orchestra joining with the audience in paying tribute to his remarkable performance.

There will be only two orchestra numbers on the program. The first is Brahm's ever-lovely symphony in D-Major No. 2, and the other Schumann's overture "Genoveva."

rk, 1884

MONITOR,
NOVEMBER 23,

KREISLER IS HEARD WITH THE SYMPHONY

Two events made the Symphony rehearsal of yesterday afternoon notable. The first was the playing of a Beethoven concerto by Fritz Kreisler, without doubt the greatest player of the day in the violin concerto of Beethoven. The second was the return to prominence of Mozart in the Symphony programs, marking the return of Dr. Karl Muck to his second term with the Symphony orchestra.

Mr. Kreisler's selection was the concerto in D major, for violin, op. 61. His interpretation of the first movement, allegro ma non troppo was intellectual, technical, dignified. His handling of the bow was splendidly firm and decided. The precision of his notes, the skill with which he brought them out, clear, firm, clean cut, controlled, held his audience breathless but his appeal was to the intellect rather than to the heart. This was met by the orchestration of the accompaniment, tender, sympathetic, melodic, exquisitely beautiful. In the second and third movements the playing of Kreisler gained in sweetness, his touch was more delicate, the violin more human. The cadenza leading to the finals of the second movement was superb. At the close of the concerto he was recalled again and again, the audience seeming as though it would never end in its desire to give him praise.

The Mozart number was such a treat as Symphony subscribers have not had in four years. This composer's works appeared but little on the programs during the last four years and this was the first time this season. Its reintroduction included the greatest symphony of that great composer, symphony in C major, with fugue finale, the "Jupiter" symphony (K 551), conducted by one who is acknowledged to be a perfect master of Mozart composition.

Under the baton of Dr. Muck the orchestra played as with one mind, tripping as daintily and easily through the measures as the purling of the clear waters of a brook. It was as light, as unlabored as the appearing of dew on a flower, as delicate as its shimmering in the moonlight, as radiant as its sparkle in the sun. Whether it was the dancing melody of the flute, the martial call of the trumpets and drums, the yearning of the strings, or the rollicking bassoon, the music was pervaded by a richness and depth of thought and sentiment that lost nothing of strength by being sweet. The interpretation was exquisitely dainty, delicate and refined, warm, rich and sympathetic. There seemed not a blurred or lagging note in the whole symphony. The notes were clear and clean, the attacks firm, the violins as one instrument.

The overture to "Leonore," No. 3, op. 72, by Beethoven, furnished the closing number of the program. Its daring harmonic subtleties, its tender cadences, its buoyancy and impetuous strength, its pathos and its outbursts of fury were played with an intellectual as well as a sympathetic understanding of the thought of the composer. Dr. Muck seems unable to draw an unmusical tone from an instrument. Whatever is played richness and depth of thought are the basis of every note.

The program of yesterday, made up entirely of old classics, promises a wealth of musical composition for this season, drawn from storehouses so little heard of late years as to be all but forgotten. They appear once more with a freshness and beauty that is inspiring.

From TIMES
Address: New York
Date .... DEC 1 - 1912

Concerts of the Week

The first of the three soloists announced for its New York concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is Fritz Kreisler, who will play at both of the concerts to be given by that organization in Carnegie Hall the coming week. The evening concert will be on Thursday, Dec. 5, at 8:15, and the matinée concert on Saturday, Dec. 7, at 2:30. Mr. Kreisler's only appearances in New York will be in these concerts. Many requests have been made that he give a recital in this city, but as he is to be in this country only a few weeks, sailing the end of this month, and as his time is fully occupied by his appearances with the Boston Symphony, he finds it impossible to do so.

On Thursday evening the programme will be Sibelius's symphony in E minor, No. 1; Beethoven's concerto for violin in D major, and Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture. This first symphony of Sibelius was played by the Boston Symphony under Dr. Muck on Feb. 21, 1907.

The programme for Saturday afternoon will be classical. The symphony will be Beethoven's No. 8. Mr. Kreisler will play the Brahms Concerto, and the other two numbers will be Schumann's overture, "Genoveva," and Beethoven's "Leonora" No. 3, overture. The two programmes in their proper order are as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING, DEC. 5.

Sibelius...........Symphony No. 1 in E Minor
Beethoven......Concerto for violin in D, Op. 61
Brahms......Overture, "Academic Festival"

SATURDAY AFTERNOON, DEC. 7.

Beethoven........Symphony No. 8 in F Major
Schumann.............Overture "Genoveva"
Brahms..Concerto for violin and orchestra in D
Beethoven........Overture, "Leonora" No. 3

⁂

k, 1884

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date ....

Boston Symphony Concert

Fritz Kreisler's only appearance here this season will be made at the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music tomorrow night. The great violinist, who stands in the front rank with Eugene Ysaye, has not been in America in three seasons. He had originally no intention of coming to America this year, but last spring, when C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was in Berlin, he persuaded Mr. Kreisler to come to America for a few weeks under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony, to play a series of concerts with that organization in eastern cities and, incidentally, two or three concerts of his own and two appearances with western orchestras.

Mr. Kreisler arrived in New York a fortnight ago, and will sail for home in the latter part of this month. Here he will play the Beethoven concerto. He played this masterpiece with the Boston Symphony in Boston on the 22d and 23d of last month.

Doctor Muck has placed only two solely orchestral works on the program, the first being Brahms' lovely symphony in D

Geraldine Farrar will sing Mimi in "La Boheme" at the Metropolitan Tuesday night. Giorgio Polacco will make his debut in Philadelphia as a conductor at the same time. Fritz Kreisler will be heard for the only time this season at the Academy tomorrow night.

major No. 2 and the second, Schumann's overture, "Genoveva." The order of the program is:

Brahms ....Symphony in D major, No. 2
Beethoven........Concerto for violin in D, op. 61
Schumann........................Overture, "Genoveva"

Bi 884

NEW YORK
CABLE ADDRESS,
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .... PUBLIC LEDGER
Address .... Philadelphia, Pa.
Date .... 1 - 1912

* * *

Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, will make his only appearance in Philadelphia at the second Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. Mr. Kreisler, who has not been in America for three years, had originally no intention of coming to America this year, but last spring when C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was in Berlin he persuaded Mr. Kreisler to come to America for a few weeks under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony, to play a series of concerts with that organization in Eastern cities, and incidentally two or three concerts of his own and two appearances with Western orchestras. Mr. Kreisler arrived in New York a fortnight ago, and will sail for home in the latter part of this month. Here he will play the Bethoven concerto, in the interpretation of which he has, by general consent, no rival. He played this masterpiece with the Boston Symphony in Boston on the 22d and 23d of last month, and at both the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon and the concert on Saturday evening he received ovations of a character which are usually reserved for prima donnas. The orchestra was as loud in its praises as the audience itself.

Doctor Muck has placed only two really orchestral works on the programme, the first being Brahms' lovely symphony in D major No. 2, and the second Schumann's overture, "Genoveva." The order of the programme is as follows:

Brahms.........Symphony, in D major, No.
Beethoven......Concerto, for violin, in D, op. 6
Schumann...............Overture,

k, 1884

From SUN
Address: New York
Date DEC [illegible]

Established:

Fritz Kreisler Soloist Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Photo Copyrighted by A. Dupont.

The first of the three soloists announced for its New York concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is Fritz Kreisler, who will play at both of the concerts to be given by that organization in Carnegie Hall the coming week. The evening concert will be on Thursday, December 5, at 8:15 o'clock, and the matinée concert on Saturday, December 7, at 2:30 o'clock. Mr. Kreisler's only appearances in New York will be in these concerts. Many requests have been made that he give a recital in this city, but as he is to be in this country only a few weeks, sailing the end of this month, and as his time is fully occupied by his appearances with the Boston Symphony, he finds it impossible to do so.

On Thursday evening the programme will be Sibelius's Symphony in E minor No. 1, Beethoven's concerto for violin in D major and Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture. This first symphony of Sibelius was played by the Boston Symphony under Dr. Muck on February 21, 1907. It made a deep impression here, as it has wherever else the orchestra has played it, and many connoisseurs regard it as a greater work than the second symphony, which is so much better known. At any rate, it seems to be much more characteristic of the genius of the composer.

The programme for Saturday afternoon will be classical. The Symphony will be Beethoven's No. 8 in F major. Mr. Kreisler will play the Brahms concerto and the other two numbers will be Schumann's overture, "Genoveva" and Beethoven's "Leonora" No. 3 overture. The two programmes in their proper order are as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 5.
Symphony No. 1 in E minor........Sibelius
Concerto for violin in D, op. 61...Beethoven
Overture, "Academic Festival."......Brahms
SATURDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 7.
Symphony No. 8 in F major.....Beethoven
Overture, "Genoveva."...........Schumann
Concerto for violin and orchestra in D.
Brahms
Overture, "Leonora" No. 3.......Beethoven

NEW YORK

NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date [illegible] 1 - 1912

* * *

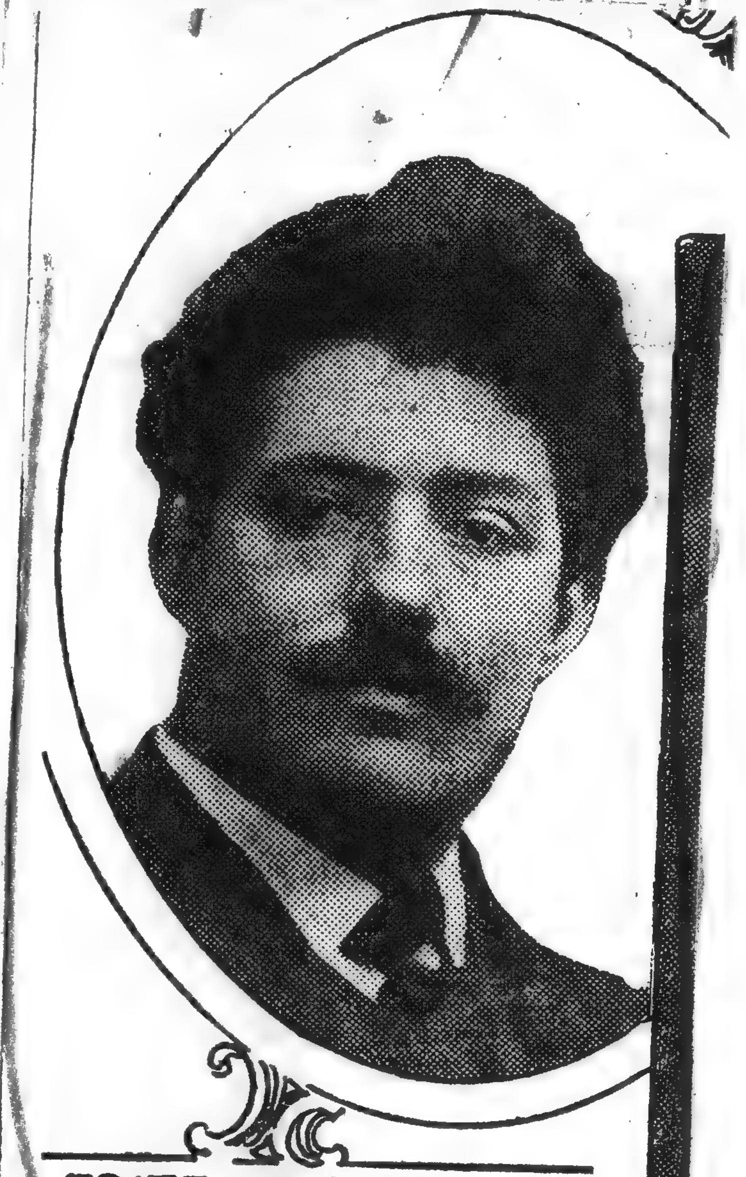
Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, will make his only appearance in Philadelphia at the second Boston Symphony Concert in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. Mr. Kreisler, who has not been in America in three years, had originally no intention of coming to America this year, but last Spring when C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was in Berlin, he persuaded Mr. Kreisler to come to America for a few weeks under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony, to play a series of concerts with that organization in Eastern cities and incidentally two or three concerts of his own and two appearances with Western orchestras.

Mr. Kreisler arrived in New York a fortnight ago and will sail for home in the latetr part of this month. Here he will play the Beethoven Concerto in the interpretation of which he has, by general consent, no rival. He played this masterpiece with the Boston Symphony in Boston on the 22d and 23d of last month and at both the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon and the concert on Saturday evening he received ovations of a character which are usually reserved for prima donnas. The orchestra was as loud in its praises as the audience itself.

Dr. Muck has placed only two really orchestral works on the program, the first being Brahams' symphony in D Major, No. 2, and the second, Schumann's Overture, "Genoveva." The order of the program is as follows:—

Brahms.........Symphony in D Major, No. 2
Beethoven....Concerto for Violin in D, Op. 61
Schumann...............Overture, "Genoveva"

Estab... 84



FRITZ KREISLER
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
DEC. 2 © AIME DUPONT

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date [illegible]

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its second concert of the season in Washington next Tuesday afternoon at the New National Theater, when the programme will be a discussion of Sibelius' Symphony Opus 39, No. 1; Brahms' academic overture, Glazounoff's overture, "Solennelle," and Mendelssohn's E minor concerto for violin, with Fritz Kreisler as soloist.

The chief interest of this concert will center in the performance of Mr. Kreisler and the symphony of Sibelius, a comparatively new work, composed thirteen years ago. The true appreciator will await the reading of this work with unusual interest. Dr. Muck first produced it in this country in 1907, when the composer was scarcely known here.

Sibelius is steadily growing in the appreciation of Americans. Newmark, in a paper read before the Concert-goers' Club in London, in 1906, said of Sibelius: "The nearer I approached to the work of Sibelius the larger it loomed, until its limitations seemed to recede into an unknown past and stretch into an unconjectured future. I began to realize that it was not merely a large packet of new music, but a new country and the representative of an unfamiliar culture."

Sibelius comes of an imaginative Northland people, the Fins, and his music is national. It is full of the spirit of the cold north sea, of dull leaden skies, and of heroes and tragic adventures. The wild berserker spirit is in it; the spirit of desolate windswept wastes; it is the music of a land of tragic tales of the sea, of the life of a simple folk in their grim, but heroic, battle with nature in her unkind moods. Sibelius has written four symphonies and many songs and piano pieces. He is but just beginning to be understood, but in the estimation of many able judges he is one of the greatest composers of the day.

The next number on the programme is the Brahms' overture. The true German loves Brahms' academic overture reminiscently, for he has gathered together into a lively symphonic masterpiece three of the Fatherland's most popular student songs. In character this overture, written as an expression of gratitude for the degree conferred upon Brahms, is in direct contrast with the tragic mood of the Sibelius Symphony. It is full of good cheer and the joy of living.

Following Brahms comes the violin number. Washington is being treated to a feast of big violin exponents this win-

E... 884

Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date [illegible]

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, will make his only appearance in Philadelphia at the second Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. Mr. Kreisler, who has not been in America in three years, had originally no intention of coming to America this year, but last spring when C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was in Berlin he persuaded Mr. Kreisler to do so for a few weeks under an exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony, to play a series of concerts with that organization in Eastern cities, and incidentally to give two or three concerts of his own and to make two appearances with Western orchestras.

